Kurds opposed the quick hanging, the sentence resulting from just one case against Saddam: the killing of at least 148 men and boys in retribution for a 1982 assassination attempt in the Shiite town of Dujail. Now Saddam will not testify in the trial over the Anfal military campaign against the Kurds, in which he is accused of unleashing chemical attacks that killed tens of thousands of villagers.

DOJ_NMG_0111268

"The truth of what happened in al-Anfal has been buried," said Abu Abdul Rahman, a 38-year-old Kurdish taxi driver.

Division That Caught A Dictator Takes His Execution In Stride (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

KILLEEN, Tex., Dec. 30 — They went to war to oust him, tracked him to his spider hole and battled the insurgency he left behind. But on Friday night, as Saddam Hussein faced the gallows in Baghdad, the soldiers of Fort Hood had better things to do than to count down a dictator's final minutes.

Three years and two weeks after troops of the Fourth Infantry Division celebrated their capture of Mr. Hussein by printing up T-shirts with his shaggy likeness and the boast, "We got him," the bars, restaurants and shopping malls of this central Texas city that supports the vast Army post were packed with troops and their families doing, it seemed, everything but following the death watch in Iraq.

Televisions flickered overhead to the clink of beer bottles, but the whoops of excitement were for football-game end runs and touchdown passes.

But around 9 p.m. local time, when news of the execution filtered out and some channels were switched to the news, Chad Story, an Army pilot, sat with his wife, Angela, in the Outback Steakhouse, and called it "great news."

"I just found out two seconds ago," he said, acknowledging that he had not realized how imminent the death had been.

But he said he did not expect much to change in Iraq. "They'll be no effect on the war, unfortunately," he added. Asked if he supported continued American involvement, he hesitated.

"Say yes," Mrs. Story prompted, "it's your job."

As word spread, soldiers in sweatshirts and turned-around ball caps seemed surprised that the sentence would be carried out so quickly, wondering aloud whether it would be shown on television.

Fort Hood, which is the largest active duty armored installation in the country — covering 340 square miles in central Texas halfway between Austin and Waco, and stretching 26 miles east to west with a population of 71,000, including 42,000 troops — was closed to news media interviews over the holidays, an Army spokesman said. But soldiers, many either just back from Iraq or about to go, were everywhere in and around Killeen.

Travis Fowler, a motor transportation specialist with two tours in Iraq, was at the A-1 Classic Tattoo parlor, watching his friend, Randy Rayburn, commemorate his graduation from basic training with his first tattoo, an inked tribute to his native Oklahoma. The proprietor, a heavily tattooed giant who said he went by the name Cowboy, bars television from his premises.

"It breaks my heart," Cowboy said. "I got a lot of tattoos that are not coming back."

At a Hooters restaurant, Pvt. James Jones, a combat engineer with orders to go to Iraq early in 2007, sat with his father, James, a Korea veteran; his mother, Tina; and other family members, aware, they said, that history was being made.

"He's caused misery for generations," Private Jones said. "I wish it would hurry up and happen."

He said it was lucky Mr. Hussein was not facing American justice. "Here you can appeal it for 20 years," he said.

Across the room, Christopher Patin, a paratrooper bound for Afghanistan, said he had been in Iraq when news of Mr. Hussein's capture crackled over the radio, stoking hopes that the war would be over soon. "It didn't work out as we planned," he said.

Still, he said he applauded the pending execution. "Justice will be served," he said.

Across Highway 190, which divides Killeen into parallel commercial strips, a 24-hour Wal-Mart was crowded with soldiers and their families, many thronging the television section with sets tuned not to news channels but to sports.

Specialist Kenneth Kirkland, back last month from fueling helicopters in Iraq, roamed the aisles with his wife, Traciee, who is a manager at Subway and was still wearing her employee nametag.

Fearful of what she called "so much horrific news," Mrs. Kirkland said, "I quit listening to the news when my husband was over there."

But now, she said, she was following events closely. "My God," she said, "they're finally going to kill him."

DOJ_NMG_0111269

At a table in Boston's Restaurant, Jerome Kyler, a building contractor who was visiting Killeen for the funeral of his father-in-law, a retired military officer, said the execution would shorten the war.

"He wasn't really a leader; he just had a lot of followers," Mr. Kyler said.

A relative, Anthony T. Craig Jr., a crane operator for the city of Killeen, was not so sure. "There's somebody following in his footsteps," Mr. Craig said.

Celebration in Michigan

DEARBORN, Mich., Dec. 30 — In this Detroit suburb that is home to the largest Iraqi community outside the Middle East, hundreds of people celebrated Mr. Hussein's death long into the early hours of Saturday morning, praising God as affording them revenge against the man whose regime killed many of their relatives. They expressed hope that the hanging would quell some of the violence in their homeland.

"The best gift for our happy new year is the murder of Saddam Hussein," Imam Husham al-Husainy, director of the Karbalaa Islamic Education Center, shouted from atop a parked car after news reports confirmed the execution.

Warren Avenue, a thoroughfare lined with Middle Eastern shops and eateries, was jammed with sport-utility vehicles and minivans, their drivers honking incessantly while passengers waved Iraqi and American flags through the windows.

Many gathered outside the Karbalaa center early in the evening had lost uncles, fathers and brothers to Mr. Hussein's Baathist regime.

Mr. Hussein's death, they said, keeps future generations of Iraqis from suffering as their families did.

"It's the biggest happy day in my whole life," 19-year-old Ahmed Alaboudi said. "We lost millions of people because of Saddam. But now our home is going to calm down, and everything is going to be O.K."

Many in the crowd of about 200 said there would be fewer insurgents with Mr. Hussein gone.

"They have nothing to fight for," said Diaa Tamimi, 38, who was arrested three times in Iraq because his uncle did not like Mr. Hussein. "Now I think they'll give up."

Mr. Husainy, the imam, said: "The world without Saddam is a much safer place. Even if he is behind bars, he still gives hope and support to his followers and to the terrorists."

The celebration — confined mostly to one parking lot — was smaller and more subdued than the demonstrations throughout Dearborn when Mr. Hussein was captured.

Reaction From Times Square

In Times Square, the news began appearing on the enormous television screens around 10:30 p.m. on Friday, but few of the tourists snapping pictures immediately noticed.

Pak Mark, 45, from White Plains, said: "I actually don't think he should die. He's a head of state. There's a lot of other people who have done a lot worse. There's a lot of atrocity that's done all over the world. Why only him?"

Pat Robertson, 52, who was visiting from Oxford, Miss., spent a year in Baghdad screening Iraqi police recruits. Ms. Robertson said the execution was a victory for fledgling democracy. "They did it themselves," she said. "I'm so proud of them."

Andy Sierra, 20, of Brooklyn, noted that Osama bin Laden was still at large.

"The U.S. should stop worrying about this whole execution and find bin Laden," Mr. Sierra said. "That's all we're hearing about: Saddam getting executed. Another group of soldiers are getting murdered every day and we're still worried about the same thing. We're not worrying about what else is out there."

An Overnight Death Watch, And Then Images Of The Hangman's Noose (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

Of course American television was going to show Saddam Hussein's execution. In a medium that feeds on immediacy, it was just a question of not having to wait too long to see it. And the coverage of the Iraqi dictator's last moments turned out to be an enervating, overnight death watch.

DOJ_NMG_0111270

When the first images of the hanging began trickling onto CNN and other cable news shows just before 4 a.m., the death looked oddly casual. Mr. Hussein, who refused a hood, wore a black overcoat and a calm, bland expression that made him look almost like a visiting dignitary on a factory tour.

Some news reports said the condemned man shouted "Allah-u akbar," Arabic for "God is great," on the gallows, but the camera showed Mr. Hussein being escorted by masked men into a shabby room, seemingly listening in a considering way as one of the guards gestured to his own neck as if to explain how the process works. The man slipped a black scarf around Mr. Hussein's neck, then the noose, and then the camera stopped.

It took another few hours for Fox, MSNBC and CNN to transmit Iraqi television's record of the aftermath: grainy, jumpy shots, possibly taken by a cellphone camera, of Mr. Hussein's body, lying wrapped in a sheet, his face uncovered and his neck, as a Fox anchor put it, "horribly twisted."

Throughout the night, cable news anchors repeatedly assured viewers that for deep-rooted cultural reasons, the Iraqi public would need to see a videotape of Saddam Hussein's execution — as if implying that left to their own devices, the anchors would prefer to just flash a photocopy of the death certificate.

For its own cultural reasons, American television needed to paint morbid curiosity and the competitiveness of live television as a duty executed soberly and reluctantly. "This need to show pictures, some of which are very gruesome, frankly, must be important" for the Iraqi government, the CNN overnight anchor, Stephen Frazier, told Ryan Chilcote, as the close-ups of Mr. Hussein's body crossed the screen. Mr. Frazier then asked the reporter to explain the "apparent bruising" on the dead man's face.

The Saturday morning shows were more subdued, trying to finesse the jarring contrast between scenes of American well-wishers lined up outside a church in Palm Desert, Calif., to pay their respects to former President Gerald R. Ford, and Iraqis dancing in the streets of Sadr City in Iraq — and Dearborn, Mich. — to celebrate Mr. Hussein's inglorious execution.

The networks mostly chose not to begin the day with the most lurid shots. On ABC's "Good Morning America," Terry McCarthy, a Baghdad-based reporter, said the network was not showing Iraqi images of Mr. Hussein's body because "we think they are a little too graphic to show on television."

The news that Mr. Hussein was indeed dead came late on Friday night, and anticlimactically after hour upon hour of creepy music, blood-colored graphics and montages of Mr. Hussein's most infamous moments, particularly his spider hole capture in 2003, when an American military camera recorded a hairy, befuddled Mr. Hussein being prodded and poked like a vagrant being searched for lice.

As the deadline loomed, and commentators filled time with pronouncements like "the clock is ticking on Saddam Hussein," even on-air personalities looked restless. After devoting his entire hour on CNN to the impending hanging, Larry King asked, "Is there something ghoulish about this?" Mr. King looked a little let down when he had to sign off before the execution, promising viewers, "It is really imminent now."

Shortly after 10 p.m., anchors announced that Iraqi news organizations were declaring Mr. Hussein dead, but there were no live images or sound bites to bolster those bulletins. Baghdad was still asleep, so reporters who stayed up all night to record the moment could not deliver an instant reaction.

CNN got around it by showing tape of Iraqi-Americans holding a rowdy outdoor demonstration in Dearborn, Mich. Iraqi state television apparently also felt the need to punctuate execution images with celebratory scenes: CNN reported that Iraqi state television was also showing images of Iraqi-Americans cheering in Dearborn. Those turned out to be images taken from the CNN signal.

Before the first pictures arrived, some anchors fretted on air about whether they could be shown. CNN's Anderson Cooper seemed most worried about the content, telling viewers that a decision over how much to show would be made "at the highest levels" of CNN. But Iraqi television did not show Mr. Hussein's death throes on Friday, so the ethical quandry was somewhat muted.

Fox was much less squeamish, pumping up the Friday night vigil with graphics that promised "The end is near!" and "Date with Death" and urging viewers to stay tuned to Fox News.

DOJ_NMG_0111271

All the networks tried to prepare viewers with long biographies of Mr. Hussein and his many crimes. CNN put together a report on the history of toppled leaders' executions, from Mussolini in 1945 to the deposed Afghan president, Najibullah, who was hanged from a Kabul traffic post by the Taliban in 1996. CNN even interviewed a forensic scientist who used a plastic medical school dummy, a rope wrapped around its neck, to explain that asphyxiation can be painless and quick.

But when the pictures arrived, there was no getting around the raw barbarity of the moment. On New York's ABC "Eyewitness News," the morning anchor, Michelle Charlesworth, turned to Jim Dolan and said, "Remind us of what kind of monster this man was."

What The Dictators Can't Stop (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Dictators die harder than most of us. Having wielded unlimited power in life, they seem to be sustained by a stubborn belief in their ability to stare down death, too. In his final moments yesterday, Saddam Hussein refused the offer of a hood to cover his eyes.

Such defiance lends a particularly morbid quality to the last days of dictators such as Hussein and the now-infirm Fidel Castro. They follow in the reluctant footsteps of Spain's Francisco Franco and of many other tyrants-in-extremis before el rais Saddam and el jefe Fidel were confronted, respectively, with a hangman's rope and the withering ravages of disease.

Survival is the dictator's primary occupation -- as well as his justification for ruthlessness. "His main contribution to life, finally, is fear; but fear such as thunder, cancer or madness may provoke," author William Kennedy wrote of the fictional caudillo that Gabriel GarcÃ-a MÃ¡rquez created in "The Autumn of the Patriarch." Facing death, the dictator is "the embodiment of egocentric evil unleashed," Kennedy continued in a masterful 1976 book review for the New York Times.

The year before, GarcÃ-a MÃ¡rquez was in Madrid, as was I, for Franco's 40 days and nights of dying, inch by inch. Moreover, meetings I had with Hussein around the same time and later with Castro instantly gave me the impression that neither intended to go into the night quietly -- or at all. They could not and would not let others pretend to command their people, nor would they allow history to tamper with the image they willed for themselves.

When he ruled Iraq, Hussein left nothing to chance. A visitor who might greet him had to wash his or her hands with a mysterious blue liquid and pass through a maze of metal detectors in his vast palace. Among the scores of guards and aides, only one was trusted to know which room Hussein would use to greet the visitor.

For years after that encounter, I published open letters to Hussein urging him to get out of the dictator business or at least to quit slaughtering his nation's Kurds, Shiites and Sunni dissidents. I can stop. The approach of the hangman's rope finally focused his mind on my point.

Or so it seemed in the farewell letter that Hussein's lawyers claim the deposed tyrant wrote. Released one day after Iraq's highest court upheld his death sentence last week, the letter urges Iraqis "not to hate, because hatred does not leave space for a person to be fair. . . ." Even U.S. troops should not be hated.

The lawyers would have us remember Hussein as a pious, forgiving ruler concerned about his people's welfare. They saw this as a useful legal tactic. But I doubt it is the way Hussein wanted us to remember him. On the witness stand in his two trials, he remained generally fierce and defiant, refusing to be anything other than a man whom others must fear or else.

Those who would blame all of Iraq's current evils on the American occupation are already busy airbrushing Hussein's image. But we cannot let death obscure his role in creating the inferno that is Iraq today. He leaves behind a country successfully recast in his own ferocious image to a degree far greater than I had imagined.

Before 2003, I believed that Iraqis were largely a people held hostage by Hussein, his murderous clan and the Baathist machine. But far more Iraqis turned out to be like Hussein -- ready to use torture and assassination in the pursuit of wealth and power -- than the world's best intelligence agencies had predicted, as David Kay's official analysis of the CIA failure to understand pre-invasion Iraq details. These Iraqis are Saddam Hussein's enduring legacy.

I suspect that Hussein preferred to go out in a grim finale that will be portrayed by his disciples as victor's justice than to waste away, in solitude and yet under the public's watchful gaze, as Castro is doing in Havana.

DOJ_NMG_0111272

Cuba's situation after Castro will not be as traumatic or bloody as Iraq, in large part because Castro did not feel it necessary to rule as harshly and sadistically as did Hussein. As GarcÃ-a MÃ¡rquez, Castro's friend, has written: "The Latin American reality is totally Rabelaisian." It misshapes Latin dictators in ways different than do the blood feuds of the Middle East.

But both dedicated their lives to what GarcÃ-a MÃ¡rquez calls "the solitary vice of power." Their deaths will lighten their crimes and responsibilities not a whit.

Keeping Faith With A Bloody Tradition (LAT)

By Christopher Hitchens

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

I WAS SITTING with President Jalal Talabani of Iraq earlier this month when Iraqi television was broadcasting the trial of Saddam Hussein. The hearings had shifted into their second phase, concerning the mass murder of Iraq's Kurdish minority in the 1980s, and video footage of gassing and shooting had been played in court, to ram home the anguished statements of numberless survivors.

There was something both satisfying and unsettling about the juxtaposition. It is fitting that Iraq's first-ever elected president is a Kurd, but I couldn't help noticing that he didn't much want to be drawn out on the subject. The party that he leads — the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan — is an affiliate of the Socialist International, which opposes the death penalty. In the grimmest days of the "Anfal" — Saddam Hussein's Koran-inspired name for the genocide — one of the Kurds' best friends was Danielle Mitterrand, wife of the late president of France, whose most lasting monument will be his abolition of the guillotine. It was she who had proposed to the Iraqi opposition that it should become the first Middle Eastern government to do away with capital punishment.

This did not happen, of course. Instead, the death penalty remains on the books in Iraq, and the execution of Hussein took place at dawn on Saturday. (It is probably not a coincidence that the verdict of the Iraqi appeals court against Hussein specifically stated that nobody — including the president of the country — had the right to commute the sentence of death).

It's too bad. There are a number of things that should cause qualms about both the trial and the sentence of Hussein. For instance, both were caught up in the sectarianism that now dominates everything in Iraq. To some, it is enough that Hussein was convicted of massacring the inhabitants of a Shiite village, Dujail, in 1982, and his hanging need not have anything specifically to do with his much larger and even crueler crimes against Kurdistan, Kuwait, Iran and the Iraqi people more generally.

Further, it's unclear what benefits his execution brings. I have heard of Shiite politicians who say that Hussein's death will help repress the Sunni insurgency by depriving it of a figurehead and rallying point and by destroying the chance of a Baathist restoration. This seems to me the most extreme foolishness and stupidity. There was no chance in any case of Hussein returning to power, and it seems just as likely, if not more so, that his execution will actually inflame violence rather than calm it. (While speaking of "execution," many of these same Shiite leaders are linked to death squads that murder their fellow Iraqis every single day and night.)

Almost every transfer of power in Baghdad for the last half a century has been accompanied by the killing of the previous incumbents. British-backed Prime Minister Nuri Said was dragged through the streets and torn to shreds in 1958; his remains were then dug up and run over by cars. I remember as a boy seeing one of his replacements, the pro-communist Abdul Karim Qassim, on television, his head lolling after the attentions of a Baathist firing squad.

The most lurid of all these moments, in this most bitter and harsh society, came with the sadistic video that Hussein himself made of the purge of his party after his seizure of power. Nobody who has seen that footage — of terrified men dragged by goons from the room, while the survivors weep with fear and relief and Hussein indulges in a luxurious cigar — is likely to forget it. And this atrocity was only the curtain raiser to further orgies of mass murder and torture of which we have unimpeachable evidence from the regime's own archives.

"After such knowledge," as T.S. Eliot asked in "Gerontion," "what forgiveness?"

Jonathan Randal, a former Washington Post correspondent, repeated this question in the title of one of the best books on the subject of the Kurds. For many Iraqis, nothing could possibly begin to cancel the recent past except an act of exemplary vengeance. And — to argue against myself further — for many other Iraqis, there could be no security or peace of mind while

DOJ_NMG_0111273

Hussein continued to breathe. It was rather the same with Nicolae Ceausescu in Romania, where citizens could not get the oppressor out of their minds and where a new start was not thinkable to many until he was certified as dead.

This, in essence, also was the psychological underlay of the Nuremburg war crimes trials: The beasts had to die, and to be seen to have died. One could not bear to live on the same planet as them, and the memory of their victims would be profaned if they were long outlived by their murderers.

It is for this combination of fear, insecurity and agony that some favored the execution of Hussein in public, or at least on television. Without this assurance (or perhaps, even with it) many citizens would have difficulty believing that the tyrant was actually gone. This moves us almost into the realm of exorcism — as if there were not enough "faith-based" horror in Iraq as things already stand.

But Iraq is not going to be free of beasts just because Hussein has gone through the trapdoor. And some of the beasts who still roam the country will be the ones applauding the loudest.

(In this connection, it might have been better for a certain Ginger Cruz, an official at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, to have kept quiet instead of loudly seconding a verdict that doesn't call for any comment from her. The Embassy should be concentrating on the job of combing the torturers and assassins out of the Iraqi police force that American taxpayers are subsidizing.)

Commenting on the killing of Nuri Said in 1958, that great student of Mesopotamia, Freya Stark, reflected on "the savagery for which Iraq in her long history has ever been notorious … the pendulum swing of murder, ancient and long familiar, which has made the pattern from the day when the first Ali was stabbed in Kufa, and probably long before. Even the massacre of the Prophet's family is no novelty on that soil."

It would have been no offense to justice if Hussein had been sentenced to spend the rest of his days in prison without the possibility of parole, but it would represent a break with that sanguinary tradition. And it might be no bad thing if Americans, especially those who supported the breaking of his death grip on Iraqi society, found ways of conveying their distaste for this rushed and vindictive — and partial — version of a process of reckoning that ought to have been sober, meticulous and untainted.

Bombs Kills 68, Wounds Dozens In Iraq (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD (AP) — Bombings killed at least 68 people in Iraq on Saturday, including one planted on a minibus that exploded in a fish market in a mostly Shiite town south of Baghdad.

The attacks came hours after Saddam Hussein was hanged in Baghdad for ordering the killings of 148 Shiites in the city of Dujail in 1982. Despite concerns about a spike in unrest, Saturday's violence was not unusually high and there was no indication it was related to the execution.

The U.S. military also announced the deaths of three Marines and three soldiers, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops in Iraq, with 109 service members killed.

The bombing at the fish market in Kufa, a Shiite town about 100 miles south of the Iraqi capital, killed 31 people and wounded 58, said Issa Mohammed, director of the morgue in the neighboring town of Najaf. The man blamed for parking the vehicle was cornered and killed by a mob as he walked away from the explosion, police and witnesses said.

Shoppers had crowded into the market to buy supplies for the four-day Eid al-Adha festival, the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar for Shiites.

Television footage showed hundreds of men in traditional Arab headdresses swarming around the minibus' charred frame, toppled on its side in the street. Ambulances and fire trucks pulled up to the site, and a coffin was loaded on top of a car.

In northwest Baghdad, two parked cars exploded one after another, killing 37 civilians and wounding 76 in a mixed neighborhood of the Iraqi capital, police said.

The Marines died Thursday of wounds from fighting in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said. A soldier also died in combat Friday in Anbar, and two others were killed by roadside bombs in Baghdad, the military said.

Their deaths pushed the December death toll past the 105 U.S. service members killed in Iraq in October. At least 2,998 members of the U.S. military have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

DOJ_NMG_0111274

Saddam was hanged early Saturday, after his conviction last month for crimes against humanity in connection with the Dujail killings. Curfews were enforced in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit and in Samarra, both in the predominantly Sunni Salahuddin province north of Baghdad.

Mostly peaceful demonstrations broke out in several towns across Iraq, with hundreds of people marching in the streets carrying Iraqi flags and banners. Despite the curfew, gunmen in Tikrit paraded with his picture and fired their weapons into the air, calling for vengeance.

Police said Iraqi troops arrested 39 suspects with "quantities of weapons" in Balaz Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad.

On Friday, a suicide bomber killed at least nine people near a Shiite mosque in Baghdad, and 32 tortured bodies were found across the country.

December was also shaping up to be one of the worst months for Iraqi civilian deaths since the AP began keeping track in May 2005.

Through Thursday, at least 2,139 Iraqis have been killed in war-related or sectarian violence, an average rate of about 76 people a day, according to the AP count. That compares to at least 2,184 killed in November at an average of about 70 a day, the worst month for Iraqi civilians deaths since May 2005. In October, AP counted at least 1,216 civilians killed.

The AP count includes civilians, government officials and police and security forces, and is considered a minimum based on AP reporting. The actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported.

Car Bombs Target Shiites In Iraq (CNN)

CNN.com, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Car bombs and a suicide bomber left at least 75 people dead and more than 100 wounded Saturday, the day former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was executed for crimes committed during his rule.

At least 66 people were killed in car bomb attacks on markets in a Shiite area of Baghdad and the southern Shiite town of Kufa.

Residents have been shopping for the Eid al-Adha Muslim holiday, which started Saturday for Sunnis and will start Sunday for Shiites.

The first attack targeted a local market in the historic town of Kufa, killing at least 30 civilians and wounding 45 others, an Iraqi Interior Ministry official said.

The second struck a busy market in Baghdad's northwestern district of Hurriyah, killing at least 36 people and wounding another 77, an Interior Ministry official said.

Three car bombs went off nearly simultaneously in that attack, two on a side street near a shopping area, and a third nearby, he said.

In three additional incidents, a car bomb killed a person and wounded four others near an amusement park south of Baghdad; another killed two people in western Baghdad; and a suicide bomber killed at least six in Tal Afar.

Kufa is part of the key southern province of Najaf. U.S. troops handed security control of the area to Iraqi troops and police last week. The transfer is considered the most significant so far because of Najaf's religious importance.

U.S. troops have remained in the province but are not in charge of conducting active patrols and are, according to U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, only to be involved in operations when called on by authorities.

Two years ago, the U.S. military and Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mehdi Army militia fought in and around Najaf and Kufa.

Saturday's attacks followed the execution of former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, a Sunni.

Some predicted the execution would exacerbate violence between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq. Sunnis were a minority ethnic group that enjoyed protection and power during the Hussein regime. They battle, often violently with the majority Shiites, who were persecuted then and now dominate the Iraqi government.

In addition Saturday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of three more American soldiers. The casualties raised the number of American personnel killed in Iraq this month to 109, making December the deadliest month of 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0111275

A roadside bomb went off near a Multi-National Division-Baghdad patrol Friday, killing a soldier and wounding three others in southwest Baghdad, the U.S. military said in a written statement. The soldier was accompanying a top military leader to outlying areas to meet with troops at the time of the blast, the military said.

The death was the third U.S. casualty announced Saturday.

A roadside bomb also killed a U.S. soldier on combat security patrol in northwest Baghdad Friday, and another U.S. soldier was killed in combat in Anbar province, the military said.

The U.S. troop death toll for this year has reached 818 -- 2,991 since the war began.

Seven American civilian contractors of the military also have died in the conflict.

On Friday, the British Ministry of Defense announced its 127th death in the war. A roadside bomb killed a soldier, who belonged to the Duke of Lancaster's Regiment, 2nd Battalion, while on patrol in the southern Iraqi city of Basra.

Also Friday, a suicide bomber targeted a Shiite cleric north of Baghdad, killing him, his brother and seven others, authorities in Iraq said. The killings took place in the Diyala provincial town of Khalis.

The bomber had waited near the house of Sheik Kadhim Hameed Qassim, the sheik of Khalis Shiite Mosque, and self-detonated when the cleric, his security and family members arrived after Friday prayers, Diyala officials said.

The province, northeast of Baghdad, has seen much violence.

In addition to the 10 killed, including the suicide bomber, 15 others were wounded, the Iraqi Interior Ministry said.Other developments

Coalition forces killed six insurgents during a series of raids in Baghdad and northwest of the capital Friday, the U.S. military reported. Seventeen people were detained.

Two Iranian diplomats were released Friday after being detained in Iraq by the U.S. military for more than a week, according to IRNA, Iran's official news agency. The pair were seized during a raid in Baghdad on December 21, U.S. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told reporters Wednesday.

Al Qaeda's No. 2 man, Ayman al-Zawahiri, discussed Iraq and Afghanistan and condemned Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas during an address to Muslims two days before the start of Eid al-Adha, an Islamic festival. An audiotape released on Islamist Web sites Friday marked the ninth released by al Qaeda in the last six months.

Shi'ite Hostages' Kin Fear Revenge Slayings (WT)

By Aqeel Hussein

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The families of hundreds of Shi'ite men snatched off the streets by Sunni extremists are waiting to hear their fate after kidnappers threatened to kill them if the execution of Saddam Hussein went ahead.

As many as 450 men are thought to have been seized by Sunni militants during the past two months as hostages against the execution.

Iraqi security forces said the families of the men, most of whom worked for Shi'ite political parties, had been told they would be killed if Saddam was executed.

Col. Mahdi al Salamy, from the Interior Ministry, said hundreds of people had been reported missing over the past two months.

"We have many situations of Shi'ite people being disappeared and their bodies never being found," he said.

He said between 400 and 450 Shi'ite men were thought to have been kidnapped.

"We received many messages from families telling us that their sons were being held as hostages, waiting for Saddam to be executed," he said.

Most of the men were taken in the area around Latifiyah city, a Sunni stronghold 25 miles south of Baghdad. The Interior Ministry said the men were seized as they drove between the Shi'ite holy city of Najaf and Baghdad.

Gunmen set up fake checkpoints and ordered the men from their cars, seizing four or five hostages at a time. About 80 men were also taken from Taji city when gunmen stopped three buses and ordered off the men inside.

The seizures went on for two months before Iraqi army units moved into the area and shut down the checkpoints.

DOJ_NMG_0111276

Talking hours before Saddam's execution, relatives of the hostages said they were resigned to their fate.

Haider al Hachami said his brother, Kadri al Hachami, had been snatched a month ago as he drove from work in the Al Rashdia area of Baghdad to his home in the Shi'ite district of Al Shualaa.

He did not hold out any hope because his brother worked for the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the main Shi'ite party in Iraq.

"One day after his kidnapping a gang rang and told me, 'Your brother was working with the SCIRI party and he is now held as a hostage with us and all of them will be executed if Saddam is killed,' " he said. "Anyway, he will be killed. If that is so, I prefer to kill Saddam Hussein because I have lost my brother. He is dead, because he is working for the SCIRI party."

Officials said the men were thought to have been taken by a group known as the 20th Revolution Brigade, the military wing of the Islamic Resistance Movement, which has previously been linked to the kidnapping of foreign workers in Iraq.

Haider al Hachami said his brother was 32 and married with three children.

"He did not come back home and after one day these people called and told us those things and no one called after that," he said. "They did not ask for anything, only for no execution of Saddam Hussein. And they told me to tell the SCIRI party that they would do this, with hundreds of other people."

Saddam Exchanged Taunts Before Hanging (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 31, 2006

Iraqis awoke Saturday to television images of a noose being slipped over Saddam Hussein's neck and his white-shrouded body, the pre-dawn work of black-hooded hangmen. They went to bed as new video emerged showing Saddam exchanging taunts with onlookers before the gallows floor dropped away and the former dictator swung from the rope.

Saddam was buried shortly before sunrise Sunday in a family plot next to the graves of his two sons, witnesses said. Those who saw the ceremony said only a few people were present for the burial in Ouja, where Saddam was born.

In Baghdad's Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City, victims of his three decades of autocratic rule took to the streets Saturday to celebrate, dancing, beating drums and hanging Saddam in effigy. Celebratory gunfire erupted across other Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad and other predominantly Shiite regions of the country.

There was no sign of a feared Sunni uprising in retaliation for the execution, and the bloodshed from civil warfare was not far off the daily average — 92 from bombings and death squads.

Outside the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, west of the capital, loyalists marched with Saddam pictures and waved Iraqi flags. Defying curfews, hundreds took to the streets vowing revenge in Samarra, north of Baghdad, and gunmen paraded and fired into the air in support of Saddam in Tikrit, his hometown.

Still, authorities imposed curfews sparingly in contrast to the several-day lockdown put in place after Saddam was sentenced to death Nov. 5.

By several accounts, Saddam was calm but scornful of his captors, engaging in a give-and-take with the crowd gathered to watch him die and insisting he was Iraq's savior, not its tyrant and scourge.

"He said we are going to heaven and our enemies will rot in hell and he also called for forgiveness and love among Iraqis but also stressed that the Iraqis should fight the Americans and the Persians," Munir Haddad, an appeals court judge who witnessed the hanging, told the British Broadcasting Corp.

Another witness, national security adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie, told The New York Times that one of the guards shouted at Saddam: "You have destroyed us. You have killed us. You have made us live in destitution."

"I have saved you from destitution and misery and destroyed your enemies, the Persian and Americans," Saddam responded, al-Rubaie told the Times.

"God damn you," the guard said.

"God damn you," responded Saddam.

New video, first broadcast by Al-Jazeera satellite television early Sunday, had sound of someone in the group praising the founder of the Shiite Dawa Party, who was executed in 1980 along with his sister by Saddam.

DOJ_NMG_0111277

Saddam appeared to smile at those taunting him from below the gallows. He said they were not showing manhood.

Then Saddam began reciting the "Shahada," a Muslim prayer that says there is no god but God and Muhammad is his messenger, according to an unabridged copy of the same tape, apparently shot with a camera phone and posted on a Web site.

Saddam made it to midway through his second recitation of the verse. His last word was Muhammad.

The floor dropped out of the gallows.

"The tyrant has fallen," someone in the group of onlookers shouted. The video showed a close-up of Saddam's face as he swung from the rope.

Then came another voice: "Let him swing for three minutes."

The responses within Iraq to Saddam's death echoed the larger reaction across the Middle East, with his enemies rejoicing and his defenders proclaiming him a martyr. While Iranians and Kuwaitis welcomed the death of the leader who led wars against each of their countries, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the execution prevented exposure of the secrets and crimes the former dictator committed during his brutal rule.

Some Arab governments denounced the timing of the 69-year-old former president's hanging just before the start of the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar, Eid al-Adha. Libya announced a three-day official mourning period and canceled all celebrations for Eid.

Within Iraq and across the world, the airwaves were alive with pictures of Saddam in death, a bruise on his cheek, his neck elongated and twisted impossibly to the right — grisly proof that the man who had tormented and killed so many during a bloody quarter-century rule was truly dead.

But some Iraqis — like 34-year-old Haider Hamed, a candy store owner in east Baghdad — wondered what would really change with the execution of Saddam, who was just four months shy of his 70th birthday.

"He's gone, but our problems continue," said the Shiite Muslim, whose uncle was killed in one of Saddam's many brutal purges. "We brought problems on ourselves after Saddam because we began fighting Shiite on Sunni and Sunni on Shiite."

At least 80 Iraqis died in bombings and other attacks Saturday, and police said 12 more tortured bodies were found dumped in Baghdad. The U.S. military announced six more service members — three soldiers and three Marines — were killed.

The execution took place on the penultimate day of the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops, with the toll reaching 109. At least 2,998 members of the U.S. military have died in Iraq since the war began in March 2003, according to an AP count.

On Sunday, Saddam was interred near his sons Odai and Qusai in the main cemetery in Ouja, a small town outside Tikrit. The sons and a grandson were killed in a gunbattle with the American forces in Mosul in July 2003.

Iraqi government officials initially wanted to bury Saddam in secret in an unmarked grave to prevent the burial site from becoming a place of pilgrimage.

But the Tikrit burial was facilitated after negotiations in Baghdad between the government and U.S. officials and a delegation that included the governor of Salahuddin Province and the head of Saddam Hussein's Albu-Nassir clan, Al-Arabiya satellite television reported late Saturday.

Um Abdullah, a Sunni and teacher in Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, said she would wear black to mourn the city's favorite son.

"Saddam will be a hero in our eyes," she said. "I have five kids and I will teach them to take revenge on Americans."

Police blocked the entrances to Tikrit and said nobody was allowed to leave or enter the city for four days. Despite the security precaution, gunmen took into the streets, carrying pictures of Saddam, shooting into the air and calling for vengeance.

Security forces also set up roadblocks at the entrance to another Sunni stronghold, Samarra, and a curfew was imposed after about 500 went into the streets to protest the execution.

Among minority Sunnis there was deep anger, born not only of Saddam's execution but of the loss of their decades-long political and economic dominance that began with Saddam's ouster in the U.S. invasion nearly four years ago.

"The president, the leader, Saddam Hussein is a martyr and God will put him along with other martyrs," said Yahya al-Attawi, who led prayer at a towering Sunni mosque constructed by Saddam in Tikrit.

There were cheers at the cafeteria of a U.S. outpost in Baghdad as soldiers having breakfast learned Saddam had been hanged.

DOJ_NMG_0111278

But members of the Army's 2nd Battalion, 17th Field Artillery Regiment, on patrol in an overwhelmingly Shiite neighborhood in eastern Baghdad, said the execution wouldn't get them home any faster — and therefore didn't make much difference.

"Nothing really changes," said Capt. Dave Eastburn, 30, of Columbus, Ohio. "The militias run everything now, not Saddam ."

Staff Sgt. David Earp, who also fought in 1991's Operation Desert Storm, said the execution worried him.

"In my opinion, something big is going to happen," said Earp, of Colorado Springs, Colo. "There will be a response. Probably not today because they know we are looking for one, but soon."

U.S. Deaths In Iraq Mark Increased Presence (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

FORT LEE, Va. -- In a little-known museum tucked away on the grounds of an Army post near Richmond, a memorial wall just inside the door quietly announces a profound change in the nation's fighting force.

Name upon name, the wall honors soldiers who have died in the combat zones of Iraq and Afghanistan: PFC Lori Piestewa, CPT Kimberly Hampton, SPC Lizbeth Robles, SGT Jessica Housby. . . . All 59 are women.

They are casualties in a conflict that has seen women serving in larger numbers than before, in a wider array of jobs, amid violence that heeds no front line.

As the U.S. death toll in the Iraq war approaches 3,000, the memorial at the U.S. Army Women's Museum is a solemn acknowledgment that women have quietly taken a place in the nation's procession of flag-draped coffins and military funerals.

In all, 62 service women from all branches have died in Iraq, about two-thirds of them in hostile fire. By comparison, in World War II, historians say, 16 women were killed in action. In Vietnam, one woman's life was claimed by enemy fire; in the Persian Gulf War, five.

Most previous female casualties were nurses. Now the female dead include military police, truck drivers, intelligence analysts, helicopter pilots, medics, mechanics, media escorts and kitchen managers. At least 13 left behind children. More than half were younger than 25.

It is a scenario that experts once predicted would lead to a public outcry against "women in body bags." Instead, the casualties appear to have melded into the nation's experience of war.

"I think people have come to the sensible conclusion that you can't say a woman's life is more valuable than a man's life," said retired Air Force Brig. Gen. Wilma Vaught, president of the Women in Military Service for America Memorial Foundation. "We don't want to lose any of them."

* * *Spec. Jessica Cawvey

In the museum where Jessica Cawvey and other women are honored, there is a large interactive screen near the memorial wall. With the touch of any name comes a face, a biography, sometimes a video clip -- life by life, soldier by soldier.

Cawvey's biography mentions how she joined the Illinois National Guard in hopes of making a better life for her young daughter, Sierra. She was a single mother, enlisting in summer 2001, when few people foresaw a long and violent war.

By the time her Guard unit was shipped overseas, Cawvey was an accounting student at Illinois State University, having graduated on the dean's list with a two-year degree from Parkland College, not far from her home town, Mahomet, Ill.

In Iraq, Cawvey, 21, worked in convoys in a transportation company. She was widely viewed, her mother said in an interview, as fun-loving and upbeat.

She was last home in July 2004, for her two-week break, which she had arranged to coincide with Sierra's sixth birthday. Her mother recalled that Cawvey "took her to the zoo, she took her to the aquarium, she took her everywhere she went."

Before Cawvey returned to finish her duty in Iraq, her daughter insisted that she pledge not to get killed, locking pinkies with her as a form of promise. Jessica Cawvey was wary about this, her mother recalled, but gave in .

Three months later, Cawvey was killed near Fallujah, her vehicle hit by a roadside bomb. "Mommy pinkie-sweared she wouldn't die," the girl told her grandmother.

"We had to explain it was not Mommy's fault, that she wanted to come home," said Kevin Cawvey, the soldier's father.Spec. Toccara Green

DOJ_NMG_0111279

Beside the narrative about Toccara Green, there is a photograph of her family members, taken shortly after her death, in front of their home in the Baltimore suburb of Rosedale. The first woman from Maryland to die in the war, Green was killed five days after she last saw them.

The 23-year-old soldier was part of a supply convoy Aug. 14, 2005, when a bomb went off during a refueling stop in Asad, in the turbulent Anbar province.

"Because she was not on the firing line, we never really thought something like that would happen to her," said her mother, Yvonne Green, "but as we and so many others have found out . . . those bombs are everywhere."

Women make up 11 percent of deployed U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan. But because they do not serve in traditional "frontline" combat units -- infantry, artillery, armor, Special Forces -- their casualties are proportionately smaller, 2 percent of the lives lost.

Just days before she was killed, "Tee" had been home for a two-week break. She had enjoyed a big family cookout, skated at her favorite roller rink, prayed at her Baltimore church, joined her mom for shopping and her aunt for a movie.

Her older brother was a Marine, and her father was a Baltimore police detective, and it seemed natural, her mother said, that Green would wear a uniform, too. Although she had done a semester at Norfolk State, and then Morgan State, she gave up college for the Army. The military, she had decided, would be her career.

"Anyone who knew her would tell you that was her calling," her mother said. "It was just something that was in her. It was part of her like her right arm."Sgt. Amanda Pinson

Two photos of Amanda Pinson appear on the screen; she wears camouflage in one and a T-shirt that says "Angel" in the other. Pinson was killed by a mortar round outside a building on her post in Tikrit.

On that day in March, she was walking toward her fiance, a fellow soldier, to join him for lunch. She was wearing an engagement ring he had given her in Iraq.

Pinson was 21, a cryptologist from the St. Louis area who had been inspired by the Sept. 11 attacks to join the military. She worked in the intelligence unit for the Army's elite 101st Airborne.

"She was so strong," said her father, Tony Pinson. "She had so much heart, and she earned so much respect for her abilities. She was very hard-driven, working around the clock. You couldn't tell her she couldn't do something. She would prove you wrong."

On the day she was killed, her fiance was injured, but "she absorbed most of the impact," her father said. He said he thought that would have been her wish. Her fiance had two children from a previous marriage.

She was just starting out.1st Lt. Ashley Henderson Huff

It is her wedding day in this museum photograph, and Ashley Huff wears a jeweled tiara, her blue eyes looking out happily, all future and promise.

Near the photo, the display mentions Huff's love for the University of Georgia, where she graduated. The die-hard Bulldogs fan was a sorority girl and an ROTC standout.

Huff was killed in September by a suicide bomber in Mosul. She was 23.

Her mother, Janet Henderson, had not heard of the museum but finds solace in the idea of keeping her daughter's memory alive.

"I don't think the American public knows that there are young women, 23 years of age, working in Iraq and putting their lives on the line every day," Janet Henderson said. "They need to know that women like Ashley are doing so much there. She truly believed in her work and in protecting this country."

Huff led a unit of the military police in Irbil, and much of her work involved training Iraqi police. Her biggest project was a proposal for a police academy. "Ashley pushed and pushed and pushed until she got it approved," her mother said. "That was her biggest accomplishment."

Before her deployment, she had married her college sweetheart, Brian Huff. "We had a beautiful, beautiful wedding," her mother recalled. "We planned it for six months, we planned every detail, and it was a dream wedding, and she looked like a princess."

DOJ_NMG_0111280

She was looking forward to buying a house with her husband and starting a family, her mother said. One day, she hoped to work in politics or diplomatic affairs.

The last time they spoke, her daughter told her: " 'Mom, I'll be home soon, and we'll have the best Christmas,' " her mother recalled, crying softly as the holiday approached.Pfc. Hannah McKinney

She is standing with her new husband and young son in the photograph, and her family members say she wanted nothing more than to be back with them in the United States. But she never got the chance after Sept. 6, when she was run over in the pitch-black night in an accident that has been under Army investigation.

This is the story her mother tells by phone one recent day as McKinney's 2-year-old son scampers around, trying to hang candy canes on his grandmother's Christmas tree in Redlands, Calif. "Her son will never know his mom," Barbie Heavrin said.

McKinney was a single mother when she enlisted over her parents' objections, telling them: " 'The Army would never send a young mother, a single mother, to Iraq,' " her mother said.

Before she shipped out in 2005, McKinney married her fiance in a civil ceremony. The couple was planning a wedding around the Christmas holiday at Immanuel Baptist Church in Highland, Calif.

"We would have been preparing for that right now," her mother said. "We had a funeral at the church instead of a wedding."Sgt. Jennifer Hartman

The story about 21-year-old Jennifer Hartman mentions her roots in Pennsylvania and her enthusiasm for riding snowmobiles and ATVs. She is pictured in uniform and with her younger brother and sister.

Hartman was killed by a suicide car bomber Sept. 14, near her work site in a power plant in Baghdad. "She would have been back in Texas on Nov. 10," her mother said. "She would have been home for Christmas."

The oldest of three children, Hartman enlisted while she was in high school, drawn to the promise of college tuition benefits and aware that her family, with two daughters and a son, could not afford so much higher education.

Her mother, Bernice Hartman, said the Army recruiter promised them that she would not be sent to Iraq, saying the Army " 'would take someone off the street before they take your daughter.' " Bernice Hartman said the words had haunted them.

"We would have never signed," she said, her voice breaking.

Since Jennifer Hartman's death, her father has been unable to sleep. Bernice Hartman has so many questions, about how it happened, about the two soldiers who died with her. "It just seems like everything you want to know, they can't tell you," she said.

* * *

At the museum, Ron Bingham, who works with the collections, describes the memorial as an evolving tribute. It started with only the wall of names in 2004. When the interactive display of photographs and stories was added in 2005, it became much more, and now it expands all the time as more photographs and life details are gathered and as the toll of war grows.

Visitors often linger at the display. Sometimes they talk about the soldiers' lives. Sometimes they leave in tears.

"Every woman from a private to a general has an important story to tell," Bingham said. "The idea is to get as much information as possible to preserve their stories for future generations."

After Duty In Iraq, They're Back On The Beat (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

LAPD officers who have returned from reservist deployments find parallels and contrasts with their military service in the Mideast.

Ron Von Gober has had his share of close calls as a Los Angeles police detective, including the time a group of toughs patted him down during an undercover drug buy in Hollywood and discovered he was wearing a wire.

Surrounded, Von Gober pulled his gun and held the angry thugs at bay while he backed off and then ran to safety.

But Von Gober's closest brush with death happened far from the streets of L.A.

He was the gunner atop a Humvee on a highway outside Baghdad last year when a roadside bomb went off, sending shrapnel into one of his hands and leaving a spray of cuts across his head.

Evacuated from Iraq to an Army hospital in Germany, Von Gober recovered from his wounds and received the Purple Heart.

DOJ_NMG_0111281

Now he can be found back chasing criminals for an auto theft detail at the LAPD's Van Nuys Division.

The 50-year-old cop is one of dozens of LAPD officers who have returned to the sometimes dangerous streets of Los Angeles after being deployed as military reservists to the meaner streets of Iraq.

He also is one of five LAPD officers who are back on the job after being wounded in combat. Two others who were injured have not rejoined the force, and another, a helicopter pilot, chose to retire after a brief return.

Von Gober said his decision to come back to potentially dangerous duty with the LAPD was an easy one.

"We go out in the field every day and we really make a difference," he said. "I arrested someone this morning for auto theft. It feels good to be part of that."

Christopher Burke cites a similar motivation. A four-year LAPD veteran, he suffered wounds to his left leg and face July 31 when a roadside bomb hit his Humvee in Ramadi, Iraq, west of Baghdad.

Although he is still recuperating from the latest round of surgery, doctors expect the 27-year-old to make a full recovery, and Burke said he looks forward to returning to the LAPD.

"I still have it in me to have a career being a cop," Burke said. "I just like making things right. People who shouldn't be on the street — I want to be the person who takes them off the street."

That continued drive, seen in so many of those returning from the war, has admirers in and out of the department.

"They are extraordinary individuals," said Police Chief William J. Bratton. "It's a phenomenal commitment when you think of it."

Bratton was on hand recently for a ceremony at the Police Academy, where a Marine general gave Burke his Purple Heart.

Burke's fiancee and Von Gober's wife were supportive of their decisions both to go to war and to return to the police force.

"My wife was a police officer for 20 years," Von Gober said. "Her father was a cop. Her brother was a cop. She had her hands full with the two kids, but she was understanding."

Experts estimate that more than 500 peace officers in California have been called to active military duty since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Police agencies are required to let officers go to military service, even if they volunteer, and the LAPD keeps paying its officers' salaries — minus whatever they collect in military pay — and benefits.

The LAPD has received special recognition from the Department of Defense for its support of officer-soldiers; it is one of only a few agencies in the country to assign an officer full time to help employees make the transition back to police work from military service.

Military liaison Dennis Denoi, a police officer and former Marine, has smoothed the transition of more than 200 LAPD employees who are members of reserve and National Guard units called to active military duty, many to Iraq and Afghanistan.

Returning officers are given medical tests and refresher training. Psychological counseling is also available.

"They really took care of me," said Officer Brandon Valdez, a Marine Corps Reserve sergeant who suffered an arm injury when a roadside bomb exploded near his convoy.

Now a gang enforcement officer in the LAPD's Southeast Division, Valdez didn't leave behind violence when he left Iraq. Just months after his return, gang members opened fire on him from a passing car.

Valdez was not injured, and he brushes off the incident today.

"I just do my job," he said.

That job, policing a city that has had more than 450 homicides this year, is challenging enough. So why volunteer to go to a country where more than 2,000 people were killed just in October?

"I lost a few buddies, and the guilt was killing me," Burke said. "So I called up the Marines and said, 'The next unit to go — I want to go.' For me, personally, it was peace of mind."

Von Gober, who traded his .38-caliber police revolver for a heavy M-60 machine gun, said he volunteered to go to Iraq to be part of something historic and to fulfill his sense of adventure.

It didn't matter that he was teased by fellow soldiers for being a 50-year-old private.

For Jonathan Kirkpatrick, 39, an LAPD patrol sergeant who has 10 years with the department, joining the Marines followed in the footsteps of his father.

DOJ_NMG_0111282

He served more than five years in the military before joining the LAPD, only to be called up as a reservist.

Kirkpatrick's experience as a police officer helped him distinguish himself during his five months in the battle zone at the outset of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

He received a Bronze Star, with a V for valor, for heroism during a battle with Iraqi forces in the town of Gharraf.

Kirkpatrick was credited with risking his life by leading a successful rescue after a U.S. artillery unit was pinned down and its company commander seriously wounded.

"We were the next unit back, and they told us to go get 'em, so we did," Kirkpatrick said recently as he prepared to begin his shift patrolling the streets of the North Hollywood Division.

Kirkpatrick sees some positive parallels between serving in the Marine Corps and wearing an LAPD badge that help explain why he has done both.

"There is a certain camaraderie," he said. "It's the people you work with. There is just something about working together in a challenging job."

Another similarity: There have been complaints that the U.S. did not send enough soldiers to Iraq to keep the peace, and complaints have been made here about the size of the LAPD.

"We are understaffed and undermanned here in the LAPD," Kirkpatrick said. "But you feel like you are really doing something together that is challenging. You are put to the test."

Some returning officers face adjustments.

Von Gober's foes these days are car thieves instead of insurgent bombers, but he now carries a backup gun and extra ammunition, a holdover from the days when he did not want to be caught short of firepower in Iraq.

In addition, Von Gober admits that he is irrationally vigilant whenever he drives under freeway overpasses while on the job in the San Fernando Valley.

One similarity Burke noticed centers on the danger to Iraqi civilians from insurgents if they are seen cooperating with American troops.

"If the gangbangers here see you talking to some innocent person, that can put them in danger," he said.

However, Burke said the similarities pretty much end there.

He said he has never fired his police firearm and never been shot at in Los Angeles, but exchanged fire with attackers many times in Iraq.

"People like to make comparisons between the war in Iraq and the war on the streets of Los Angeles," he said. "To the extent gangs are shooting at you instead of insurgents, it's similar.

"But in Los Angeles you don't have to worry on every street corner whether a bomb is going to go off or someone's going to shoot an RPG [rocket-propelled grenade] down at you."

patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

U.S. General Predicts Increased Fighting In Afghanistan (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

AP, December 30, 2006

CAMP SHARONA, Afghanistan — The outgoing U.S. commander in Afghanistan predicted more fighting this spring and summer and said Taliban militants would try to overrun towns to "unhinge the Afghan people's morale."

Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry also said the recent killing of a high-level Taliban commander shows that fugitives such as Osama bin Laden and Mullah Omar will one day slip up, and that the U.S. will strike.

Eikenberry, who is expected to rotate out of Afghanistan in late January, said he expected militants this spring to attack border security posts, to extend their use of suicide bombs and to mass in groups of 25 to 100 for assaults on towns that serve as seats of local government.

But Eikenberry said none of the Taliban's efforts would provide "a significant military challenge" for U.S., NATO and Afghan forces, which he said have improved greatly in the last year.

DOJ_NMG_0111283

"The capability exists for that array of allied and Afghan forces to dominate militarily wherever they move to," he told The Associated Press.

Eikenberry said that as he looks ahead to the spring and summer, "I anticipate higher levels of fighting."

When asked if that was in comparison to 2006, he said: "We should not be surprised by levels of fighting in parts of southern Afghanistan that rivaled what we saw last year."

Violence rose sharply in Afghanistan in 2006, killing an estimated 4,000 people, the deadliest year since the U.S.-led coalition swept the Taliban from power in 2001.

Militants launched a record 117 suicide attacks this year, about a six-fold increase over 2005, killing 206 Afghan civilians, 54 Afghan security personnel and 18 soldiers from NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said spokesman Maj. Dominic Whyte.

The number of U.S. troops killed in Afghanistan dropped slightly, from 93 in 2005 to 87 in 2006. But the number of casualties suffered by other NATO countries rose sharply.

On Friday, Eikenberry traveled to three U.S. bases in the rugged mountains of eastern Afghanistan to talk with commanders and meet the soldiers who must fend off attacks by Taliban militants entering from Pakistan.

Eikenberry said an "extraordinary amount of resources" from throughout the U.S. government — and including help from the Afghan and Pakistani governments — are being used to hunt down al-Qaida leader bin Laden and Taliban leader Omar, who are generally thought to be hiding in the mountainous region of the Pakistan-Afghan border.

He said the killing in a U.S. airstrike Dec. 19 of Mullah Akhtar Mohammad Osmani, regarded as one of three top associates of Omar, shows the U.S. is ready to strike.

"With that intensive effort that is out there, eventually opportunities will occur, and when those opportunities present themselves, as we demonstrated with Osmani, we're ready to strike," he said. "We continue the full-court press against them. One day they slip, one day they make a mistake, and we'll be there ready to strike."

Eikenberry is expected to rotate out of the country next month as Gen. Dan K. McNeil, a four-star U.S. general, prepares to take command of all NATO forces in Afghanistan.

1,373 Miles Into The Heart Of Afghanistan (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

Shahr-i-Safa, Afghanistan — AS a hair-thin line on a map, Afghanistan's national Ring Road looks easy enough to conquer.

But tell war-hardened Afghans that you're going to travel its entire 1,373-mile length unarmed, facing winter and a raging insurgency, and they look at you like you're completely mad.

Five years after the fall of the Taliban, it shouldn't be such a challenge.

Rebuilding the two-lane highway that connects Afghanistan's major cities has been a centerpiece of the U.S.-led effort to transform the nation. It is so important that Afghanistan's president, Hamid Karzai, said that President Bush once demanded daily updates on the roadwork from Kabul south to Kandahar, the seat of power under Taliban rule.

U.S. grants have paid for rebuilding a third of the road, according to Afghan government figures. Japan, Saudi Arabia and Iran are responsible for repairing other sections, a rare case in which Washington and Tehran are working toward the same goal. Officially, the $1.05-billion project is almost finished.

But as with many things in Afghanistan, there is a chasm between the rhetoric and reality.

Some of the best stretches of the road are among the Taliban's favorite killing grounds. This fall, Canadian troops led the biggest ground battle in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's 57-year history, in part to regain control of a stretch of highway west of Kandahar. The NATO offensive cleared the insurgents, but guerrillas and highway robbers still prey on travelers in many other places.

About 40% of the road isn't finished. Some sections are nothing more than muddy tracks through the country's lawless Wild West, where you can drive for hours without seeing another vehicle fishtailing and backsliding through the muck along with you.

The only way to understand the condition of the road and grasp what it says about Afghanistan is to drive it.

DOJ_NMG_0111284

The trip took my interpreter, driver and me seven days, inching along slippery edges of steep cliffs, wandering in the wilderness without road signs, suffering two flat tires, a ruptured radiator and a spinout on mountain ice.

On the way, we managed to avoid a Taliban ambush, a potential kidnapper or highway robber, a suicide bomber and a gunman who fired close enough to take off one of our heads.

Getting ready

I KNEW some of the Ring Road all too well. I traveled it for weeks in the early Taliban era a decade ago, when years of war and neglect already had reduced the highway to patches of broken asphalt connected by dirt, rocks and ruts. A trip that would take a few hours on a proper road was days of torture, the speedometer straining to break 10 mph as the vehicle crawled over shell craters and pond-sized potholes.

This time, I would be leaving from Kabul with interpreter Wesal Zaman and driver Zyarat Gul. A quiet and calm man, Gul had gotten us home safely from other terrible places.

Before starting out, we visited three experts at the Economics Ministry to find out what we were in for.

Sayed Arif Nazif, the ministry's director of design, told us that the building of the road began in the mid-1970s. The United States helped, but most of the money came from the Soviet Union and Arab countries.

Farmers used the road to get their produce to market. Afghanistan became the world's largest exporter of dried grapes, apples and other fruit. It also sent an assortment of nuts.

"In those days, in terms of our roads, we were much more advanced than neighboring countries," Nazif said. "But because of the wars and other problems, all our roads were destroyed."

Soviet troops and tanks poured down the Ring Road to invade Afghanistan in the dead of night on Dec. 25, 1979, setting off a decades-long tailspin from which Afghans are still trying to recover.

The rebuilding of the road is supposed to help revive the economy and break down ethnic differences by allowing Afghans to travel more freely. Although dried fruit exports are 20% of what they were before the wars, reconstruction is showing benefits, Nazif said. This year, the repaved road allowed farmers to get fresh pomegranates, grapes and apples to Kabul's airport, and the first few flights delivered the produce to wealthy Persian Gulf states.

I had a more pressing question: "How long do you think it would take to drive the whole Ring Road?"

Nazif shifted in his seat. "Take the length of 1,373 miles, and divide by an average speed of 50 miles an hour," he said.

"That sounds like we could do it in maybe four days," I replied, trying to do some quick mental math. Nazif smiled and nodded, but we both knew Afghanistan was a lot more complicated than that.

Before we started, we took some precautions that are prudent for any trip into the countryside: We loaded the car with two spare tires, a shovel, bottled water and snacks. And we made one rule: If Gul, an ethnic Pashtun like most of the Taliban, saw anything on the horizon or felt anything he didn't like, he should turn around without pausing to ask us.

A small victory

AS the Ring Road begins a steady climb out of Kabul on a 27-mile section rebuilt by the Taliban, the horizon is bright white with towering snow-covered mountains. The road is as smooth as any in the United States. But the government can't afford to keep it plowed, so it was covered with packed snow and ice that brought long lines of heavy transports to a halt on the highlands near Ghazni.

We were less than six hours into the journey near Shahr-i-Safa when we saw the first signs of Taliban activity.

Four insurgents armed with AK-47s and rocket-propelled grenades had ridden two motorcycles to a hill overlooking a stretch of the highway near Qalat. About 3 p.m., they opened fire on a civilian truck taking supplies to an Afghan military base, a common guerrilla tactic.

Normally, insurgents carry out swift attacks and make a getaway into the desert. But this time a pickup carrying half a dozen Afghan national army troops happened by. They pinned the guerrillas down from behind and called in a second unit to attack from the front.

We reached the scene about half an hour after the battle ended. Jubilant Afghan troops were smiling and joking next to three Taliban corpses, like scavengers enjoying quality roadkill. One of the dead men lay on his back with his knees bent, as if he might jump up at any moment. But the bullet hole in his neck left no doubt his war was over.

DOJ_NMG_0111285

The fourth fighter escaped, so the victory wasn't complete, said Afghan army Maj. Atullah Maiwandwal.

It was a battle too small to make the news, let alone change the course of a war. But the major and his men had achieved something significant: Without U.S. military advisors or foreign backup, they defended a piece of highway rebuilt with a $237-million U.S. grant, the sort of gradual progress that often gets lost amid the noise of suicide bombings and other insurgent attacks.

"Where are your bodyguards?" one soldier asked, stunned that we were traveling the highway without weapons.

We explained that we preferred to travel unencumbered by armed escorts. So as night fell, we rushed off to Kandahar, which has been staggering under a wave of suicide bombings. The governor gave us beds in his guest house.

Early the next morning, we headed west into Helmand province, the scene of fierce fighting this year between NATO forces and the Taliban.

A large billboard on the edge of Kandahar declared that the highway was being rebuilt as a gift of the Japanese people.

Actually, the 70 miles of road that Japan pledged $76 million to fix is the same bumpy, cracked surface that it has been for years. The area is too dangerous for road crews.

It is the hashish harvest season, and marijuana plants as big as Christmas trees are stacked by the thousands against mud-brick homes, curing in the sun. Villagers scrape the gooey resin, which is pressed into blocks and exported along the same routes that move the opium used to produce heroin, a big source of the insurgents' income.

Hundreds of gunmen prowl the Ring Road in Helmand. They are members of private militias who take orders from local warlords and drug barons and operate illegal checkpoints, mostly to squeeze money from truck drivers.

As one longtime resident of Lashkar Gah, the provincial capital, told us, "They are loyal to the government until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and then until the next morning they're enemies."

As we neared the Lashkar Gah turnoff, in an area where we were told that kidnappers had abducted two German journalists, our driver broke our one rule.

The broken rule

GUL slowed for a speed bump, and instead of accelerating when a militiaman jumped up with an AK-47, he stopped. Gul opened the driver's window, apparently weighing the comparative risks of getting shot and getting kidnapped. The gunman stuck his head in, saw me in the back seat and smiled like a dog sniffing fresh meat.

"Get us out of here!" I shouted at Gul, and he hesitated. "Get moving!"

Gul hit the gas. The barrel of the gunman's rifle clunked off the rear side of the car. Not daring to look back, I tensed for the shot that didn't come.

In Lashkar Gah, we stopped at a construction agency funded by the United States Agency for International Development, or USAID, where we previously had met cook Khudai Nazar. At 64, he is old enough to remember what is possible with peace, and young enough to believe he might live to see it again.

We asked what he remembered of the Ring Road of his childhood. He sent his son for an opaque plastic sandwich bag stuffed with browning reference letters and old photographs.

They tell of a more innocent age, from the late 1940s to the 1970s, when American workers and their families lived in Helmand. They were building a dam, a power plant, irrigation canals and other development projects in the Afghan desert.

In one black-and-white photograph, Nazar is 12 years old and standing on a lush lawn surrounded by a white picket fence with his new bicycle, a gift from Rose and Don Wonderly of Portland, Ore.

"The first time I met with her, I didn't understand English," recalled Nazar, who speaks with an American accent. "American people always like children, and they didn't have any. She said come every day to my house and I'm gonna teach you English."

Within a few days, Rose was giving the boy new clothes and encouraging other American families to leave him some of their hand-me-downs. The Wonderlys left in 1960.

By the time the Soviets invaded in 1979, Nazar had worked for a string of other Americans: George Belissary promoted the servant to a warehouse job; JoAnn and Ronald Thompson of Sacramento praised his bread-baking skills; Jack and Maxine Smith wrote of their fondness for his pastries and good humor.

DOJ_NMG_0111286

The Smiths had to flee the Soviet occupation after 17 months in Afghanistan, and in her last words to him, Nazar said, Maxine urged him to take his wife and their 10 children to Pakistan.

"She said, 'Just send me a message and I'll have a house waiting for you — everything,' " Nazar said wistfully. It was clear in his breaking voice that he wished he could have left. But he never found enough money, or will, to turn his back on the land of his birth.

Nazar bid us farewell with the hope that some of his long-lost American friends might try to reach him, maybe even risk a visit.

Three hours after we left Lashkar Gah, a suicide bomber walked into the well-guarded compound of the provincial governor, a few blocks from where we'd visited Nazar, and blew himself up in the parking lot, killing eight people.

The Wild West

HEADING north toward Herat, we drove for several hours past mountains weathered so smooth they seemed molded from clay. We reached Herat that night, putting us more than halfway along the Ring Road at the end of our second day.

Swift progress made us overconfident. We talked about being back in Kabul in a day or so. We marveled at the traffic lights operating at all the main intersections in Herat, the only major city to escape the destruction of Afghanistan's wars.

The pleasure was short-lived. The next morning, 35 miles northeast of Herat, the highway abruptly ended. We didn't see asphalt again for three days.

Iran was supposed to complete 70 miles of paved road from Herat into Badghis province, but its contractors suddenly stopped work, said Gov. Mohammed Naseem Tokhi. Some say the money ran out; others cite unspecified problems between Iran and the rest of the international community, Tokhi said. He has received no official explanation.

The Afghan national government hasn't even been able to find a country willing to fund construction of the road through the rest of the province.

Entering Badghis was like driving back into biblical times. Ours was the only internal-combustion engine running for miles. Most people were walking or riding donkeys. The gray smoke of cooking fires seeped through the black fabric of nomads' low-slung tents.

The province's people, many of whom are Pashtuns, have long felt cut off from the rest of the country. Now they are largely missing out on billions of dollars in international aid, and that makes Badghis an ideal recruiting ground for insurgents. Grinding poverty and poor health have left even moderates angry with Karzai's government and its foreign backers.

Prolonged drought followed by devastating floods last month left three-quarters of the province's people without enough food, Tokhi said. The only roads into the province are so bad that relief agencies are having a tough time reaching people. Many could die during the winter, he said.

In the frontier town of Bala Murghab, a Ring Road bridge is a dangerously unstable span covered with metal sheets laid by people who salvaged them from a derelict factory. The 200,000 residents of the surrounding area have no electricity, and their water is so bad that diarrhea is a main killer.

Smoldering rage exploded this fall when gunmen stormed the district commissioner's new headquarters, a three-story yellow brick building built by USAID. They blasted a rocket-propelled grenade through the guardhouse and fired assault rifles at offices and police cars, shattering most of the main building's windows. The district commissioner fled for his life. Three foreign workers at a U.S.-based agency's compound escaped by hiding in their garden as rampaging mobs looted the buildings.

When the aid agency shut its office, townspeople persuaded its Afghan supervisor, Ghalam Seddiq, to become mayor. Slipping another prayer bead along a string as he talked to us, Seddiq said the attackers wanted to stop the aid agency's education programs and prevent children from learning, a Taliban priority.

The center of town is a ramshackle bazaar, where merchants glared as we drove along muddy streets. A large padlock sealed the front doors of the only hotel. The elderly caretaker said it was too dangerous to stay there, but the new district commissioner ordered the hotel to open for us.

In this Afghan version of a Wild West town, Abdul Jalil Sekandari is the deputy sheriff.

DOJ_NMG_0111287

Guarded by a young man with an AK-47 slung over his shoulder, Sekandari dropped by our hotel room that night. By the glow of an oil lamp, he griped about the government and foreign aid, personally guaranteed our safety and invited us to spend the night with him in the police station. We thought our odds were better in the hotel.

Good riddance

WE rode out of town at first light. We weren't far into the countryside when a man in a Taliban-style black turban lurking near a disabled Soviet tank leveled his Kalashnikov rifle and took a potshot at us. We heard the loud hiss-snap of a bullet passing close by, but he didn't fire again. It must have been a good-riddance round.

Soon even the dirt road disappeared into a labyrinth of mud tracks that crisscrossed broad valleys. We fishtailed and churned our way through dense fog, along tire ruts at least 2 feet deep. The four-wheel-drive car jerked and bucked like a rodeo bull.

There were no road signs, and no other vehicles. So the only thing to do was ask directions from a shepherd or a farmer working the sodden earth with a wooden plow pulled by his donkey.

"Does this road go to Maimana?" we asked an old man at one crossroads.

"Yes. But others prefer that way," he replied, nodding toward a dirt road heading in the opposite direction.

When we pulled in for a rest in Maimana, a pool of green fluid spilled out of a hole in the radiator, which a mechanic pounded shut the next morning.

We finally returned to paved highway at Andkhoi, a dust-blown place near the border with Turkmenistan, where for centuries tribal weavers have produced some of Afghanistan's best carpets.

Mohammed Ikram, a dealer representing more than 400 female weavers, was at the roadside, squatting in the dirt to measure a carpet in a floral design of red, blue and yellow. It would go to Pakistan, where a trader would pay about $210 a yard, attach a "Made in Pakistan" label and export it to the United States or Europe for hundreds of dollars in profit, Ikram said.

If Afghanistan could have peace and security, traders would follow the Ring Road straight to Andkhoi, he imagined. "And if tourists come here, then we will all be rich," Ikram said, smiling.

Paved highway awaited us on the other side of town, so we pressed on south to Mazar-i-Sharif, chattering about how good it would feel to have hot water and lights.

Come back later

MAZAR-I-SHARIF means Tomb of the Exalted. It is home to one of the holiest sites in Islam. Some Shiites believe it is the final burial place of Hazrat Ali, the prophet Muhammad's cousin and son-in-law, who was assassinated and first buried near Baghdad in the 7th century. Blood is still being spilled over the schism that followed, but not in Afghanistan.

Robbers are the biggest threat on the roads around Mazar. Andkhoi's carpet traders say they are regularly fleeced by gunmen demanding illegal road taxes.

After a night of comfort in Mazar, it was an easy drive to the Salang Tunnel, a 1.7-mile passage at 11,034 feet built by the Soviets through the Hindu Kush mountains on the route south to Kabul.

In winter, howling blizzards pummel the Salang's peaks. Avalanches, asphyxiation and plunges off cliffs have killed dozens of travelers.

As we headed up the pass, we recalled another trip a few weeks earlier when Gul skidded on black ice in the tunnel. The wheels hit the edge of a concrete walkway so hard that the front axle broke. He was elected to walk through a blizzard to a public works outpost a mile down the mountain. It was the middle of the night and deathly cold. A few workers huddled around a small wood stove.

"Is anyone hurt?" one asked when Gul asked for help.

"No."

"Are there any women?"

"No."

"Are you stuck in the middle of the road?"

"No."

"Then go back to your car and come back in the morning."

DOJ_NMG_0111288

This time, we made it through the tunnel and most of the Salang Pass without problems. The sky was ice blue, the road mostly clear. It seemed too easy for the end to such a hard journey.

Just then, Gul put the car into a 360-degree spin. A snow bank kept us from going over the edge.

We sat silently for a few seconds, staring up at the meandering Ring Road to see whether that was the worst that would happen — or whether fate was about to catch up with us in the form of a sliding truck.

Our luck held. There wasn't anyone close enough to harm us.

The car, with every bolt, spring and cable caked in mud, creaked and shimmied its way down the Shomali plains, and in a few hours we were overlooking Kabul, sprawled out across a plateau and shrouded in brown smog. The capital hadn't had a suicide bombing for days. The only thing left to worry about was traffic.

Don't Grow The Army (WP)

By Gordon Adams, John Diamond

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Pete Schoomaker, The Post, the New York Times, and many Democrats and Republicans have converged over the past month in support of a serious expansion of the U.S. Army -- a permanent addition of 40,000 to 90,000 over the current ceiling of 507,000 troops.

This proposal is a bad idea. It is irrelevant to the stresses the Army is experiencing in Iraq. It would build enormous long-term costs into the defense budget, and it presumes a role in the world for the U.S. military that the voters emphatically opposed in November.

To be sure, the concept has a certain easy appeal, especially to Democrats. Calling for more forces and more defense spending puts forth a "strong-on-defense" posture as a buffer against the perpetual charge that Democrats are weak on national security.

And the call for more troops highlights the all-too-real damage done to the Army by the Bush administration's stubborn refusal to adjust course when it was clear the U.S. strategy in Iraq wasn't working. Expanding the Army, some would argue, would relieve the stress of repeated rotations to Iraq.

Moreover, urging an expanded Army has the political advantage of reiterating a key criticism about the Iraq mission: that President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld belittled the prewar advice of Army Chief of Staff Eric Shinseki and didn't send enough troops to get the job done.

Finally, for some, enlarging the Army represents a vote for the troops over defense contractors, who convinced the administration that it could wage war without having to cancel Cold War-era weapons programs.

What the advocates fail to recognize is that enlarging the Army wouldn't solve the problems they claim it would solve, and it would create serious new problems. Plainly put, it is bad national security policy.

First, deciding to add to the Army today would do nothing to deal with the stress of Iraq. The hype about our Army is true: Our troops are the world's best. And it takes time to make them so. The lag time for recruitment, training and deployment means that new forces would be available far too late to ease the stresses now facing the Army in Iraq. Even on a fast track, it might be as long as five years before an additional combat-ready brigade would be ready to deploy there.

Second, from a budgetary perspective, the costs involved in any significant increase in the size of the Army are simply eye-popping. Recruiting, training, housing, paying, equipping and supporting two additional divisions would add nearly $80 billion to defense spending between now and 2015. Add to that the rapidly growing costs of providing health care and retirement pay -- perhaps $3 billion to $5 billion. Ultimately it is the size of the force that drives the entire defense budget. Adding to that size would increase budgets by tens of billions of dollars for years to come.

At a more fundamental level, proponents of enlarging the Army, particularly the Democrats, avoid the basic question of what the mission of this larger Army would be. Are the supporters of Army expansion, many of whom opposed the invasion of Iraq in the first place, now arguing that we need an Army to better carry out more Iraqs somewhere else in the world?

One of the few things all sides in the Iraq debate seem to agree on is that we want the Iraqis to take over security so we can bring our troops home as early as possible. Yet, supporters of expanding the Army appear to be creating an American force sized to better perform a global occupation and peacekeeping mission -- one deployed around the world to impose or restore order well into the future.

DOJ_NMG_0111289

If this is about invading Iran, or carrying out a land war in China, as The Post has suggested, then maybe we need to have a national debate about that strategy, not slip it in sideways by expanding the Army without agreeing on the mission. The experience of Iraq has clearly dulled America's appetite for continuing in the role of designated global occupier and nation-builder.

Historically, our military's mission is to fight and win America's wars -- decisively, with overwhelming force -- not to invade and occupy distant territories to create empires or settle local conflicts that we can barely understand, let alone referee.

Iraq represents the latest sobering reminder of a lesson for Democrats and Republicans alike in the post-Cold War world: Even the world's only remaining superpower, with forces unmatched by any other military on the planet, is limited in what it can do with its troops.

Donald Rumsfeld used to say that only four of Iraq's 18 provinces were troubled, but he neglected to consider the implications of his own statement: That even 140,000 U.S. soldiers -- just about the largest force that the United States could sustain in Iraq over several years -- could not pacify part of one country. The world's lone superpower, spending more on defense than the next dozen nations combined, has all that it can handle -- indeed, more than it can handle -- trying to deal with unrest in part of a single country the size of California. At nearly half a trillion dollars and counting, our power, skill and money buy us a losing outcome in one small corner of the world.

The point is not to belittle the extreme difficulty of the mission facing our troops but to highlight it and come to grips with the limits even of formidable military power set amid hostile populations. Our enemies, well aware of the dominance of conventional American forces, cordially decline our invitation to fight on our terms, under the traditional rules of military force-on-force, with defined battlefields largely separated from populations.

Terrorism is not a political movement so much as a logical weapon of choice for political extremists facing a superpower. There will always be a military component to meeting this threat. But as administration spokesmen have testified, the primary role in this "long war" may well belong not to the military but to the State Department, foreign assistance agencies, and the Treasury and Justice departments, supported by the appropriate application of force (usually in small numbers and with Special Forces troops, not Army brigades). The Army does not need to grow to perform this mission; it needs to refocus.

The question the new Congress must deal with is one not of enlarging the Army but of redefining the armed forces' mission in today's world. Do we want an Army big enough to invade and occupy Iran or Syria? Or do we want a tailored, restructured force designed to play its role in the pursuit of terrorist organizations (along with other tools of statecraft) and with enough heft to play a part in peacekeeping operations, deter potential adversaries and decisively win intense but brief conventional conflicts? This strategic alternative is hardly an endorsement of the "Rumsfeld doctrine." The U.S. military as currently sized can still "go heavy" when needed. What it can't do is remain indefinitely bogged down in a static mission with inadequate body armor and no strategy.

A program of troop reductions and phased redeployment from Iraq would in effect increase the size of the Army by relieving the force of a burdensome, costly and unproductive mission. There will be opportunities to retrain and reequip to redress the shortcomings in armor and tactics so neglected by the Rumsfeld Pentagon. These are the issues the new Congress and the White House must deal with, not an elusive search for an irrelevant and costly capability for a mission that the nation does not want to pursue.

Gordon Adams is a fellow and John Diamond a public policy scholar at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Sugar Land Program To Snag Internet Predators Recognized (HC)

By John Pape, Chronicle Correspondent

Houston Chronicle, December 31, 2006

Mayor provides initiative details in national forums

Sugar Land's Internet safety program is being hailed as a "best practice" by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, as well as being featured as a model during a recent U.S. Department of Justice summit in Washington, D.C.

Mayor David Wallace was invited to present his city's "Keep Kids E-Safe" initiative to more than 1,000 mayors from across the nation, as well as to justice department personnel looking for ways to combat the increasing problem of cyberpredators.

The program has received national attention as an innovative cross-sector collaboration involving all levels of government, nonprofit organizations and the business community, city officials said. Keep Kids E-Safe utilizes education, enforcement and prevention to help parents, families and communities protect children from online predators.

Wallace said that he first realized how serious the problem was after seeing an undercover investigation conducted by NBC's Dateline news magazine more than a year ago.

Wallace talked to members of the Mayor's Youth Advisory Council to see if they would be interested in taking on a possible project. The 125-member council is a city-sponsored teen group that provides government leaders insight into the development of programs and services impacting young people.

Through meetings with Sugar Land Police Chief Steve Griffith and representatives of the Texas Attorney General's Cyber Crimes Unit, the youth council formulated a plan for addressing Internet safety. The plan, Wallace said, consisted of three basic components.

Youths educated"The first step was to go into the seventh grades to help educate the students about the dangers of Internet predators. The information came from the youth advisory council members, so it was more of a peer-to-peer discussion than something coming from an adult," Wallace said.

The presentations were a partnership between the youth council, the Sugar Land Police Department, Fort Bend ISD, the Texas Attorney General's Office and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. More than 600 public and private middle school students attended the educational sessions.

The program also included a presentation by Wallace and a demonstration by the Cyber Crimes Unit that featured a 34-year-old detective posing online as a 13-year-old girl with blonde hair and blue eyes. Within 15 minutes of entering a chat room, the fictitious young girl was propositioned.

"That really got (the students') attention and led to a discussion of the fact that you don't know who you're communicating with," Wallace said.

After the presentations, students signed Internet safety pledges, which were then taken home to share with parents.

Sugar Land stingAfter the youth education phase of the program, Sugar Land Police worked with the Attorney General's Office to conduct a sting operation similar to that depicted in the Dateline program. Using numerous computer stations in what was dubbed the "Cyber Crime War Room," six agents from the Cyber Crimes Unit simultaneously held multiple chat room conversations with various individuals, Wallace said. Within minutes, agents posing online as young children were propositioned, engaged in conversations and received obscene photos.

"We had six detectives from the Attorney General's Office working with our police officers in the war room. When (the online investigators) gave a clue that they're 12 or 13, you literally see the predators start to swarm," Wallace said. "It was truly frightening."

During the two-week sting operation, detectives arrested three predators who came to the fictitious 13-year-old's "home," and collected evidence that led to warrants being issued for the arrest of 24 others.

"It was an eye-opening experience. It literally was within only a matter of minutes that the detectives posing as a young girl were propositioned," Wallace said.

Parents informedThe final component of the program involved parental education. Seminars were held for parents, presenting information designed to help them talk with their children and teens about Internet safety.

"It was critical that parents understand how their children can be at risk even from their own homes, especially those parents who think such things can never happen in Sugar Land. By having the sting operation, it allowed me to look parents in the eye and tell them, 'it has happened in Sugar Land,' " Wallace explained.

DOJ_NMG_0111291

The cost of the program to taxpayers was less than $2,000, Wallace added, making it affordable for almost any city to implement. The success of the effort led to it being featured as a "best practice" by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, as well as catching the attention of the U.S. Justice Department and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"The (U.S.) Attorney General has made child protection a cornerstone of his agenda, and that led to the meeting with folks from the justice department and child protective services. We had about 800 people attend the meeting in Washington, and we provided over 700 packets of information on our program to them," Wallace said.

Wallace praised the assistance of Comcast Cable for providing a $25,000 grant to pay for several thousand of the informational kits. The materials include handouts, a CD containing PowerPoint presentations for both children and adults, and public service announcements.

"Comcast was good enough to also prepare the public service announcements. All of the materials can easily be personalized by other cities by adding that city's logo and adding an introductory message from the local mayor," Wallace said. "Although we did the legwork here in Sugar Land, the material can be used anywhere. If it protects a child from becoming the victim of an Internet predator, it's well worth the effort we put into it."

Continued operationsCapt. Gary Cox, head of the Sugar Land Police Department's investigative division, said that his department will continue working sting operations with agents from the Attorney General's Office. He hopes that some day the department will be able to develop its own cybercrime operation.

"This will be an ongoing effort. The Attorney General's Office was very willing to come down and work with us and were happy to help train our officers," Cox said. "Eventually, we'd like to develop the resources and manpower to have our own unit dedicated to cybercrime."

While the state officers worked the two-week sting, Cox rotated his staff of 12 investigators to take part so they could all learn the operation. The officers watched the techniques used to identify predators, as well as learned what was needed to make a case.

"It's not exactly like you see on TV. On TV they can lead people on more than we do," Cox explained.

The predators are typically quick to commit a violation with little encouragement, Cox said. During its last session, the state Legislature passed a law making online solicitation of a minor a felony, he said.

"Just making a solicitation or sending an obscene photo is, in itself, a violation of the solicitation of a minor statute. We get all the chat logs and that makes for a very clean case against an offender," Cox explained.

He emphasized that anyone convicted under the online solicitation law must, in addition to any sentence imposed, register as a sex offender.

Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott said statistics released last August showed that one of every seven children will receive a sexual solicitation while online.

The Year In Death (WP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

THE YEAR 2006 saw the fewest executions in the United States in a decade, 53. The use of capital punishment has been dropping since 1999, when 98 people were executed. The number of new death sentences is also falling precipitously, according to data from the Death Penalty Information Center, and the number of people on death row is dropping off as well. At least for now, capital punishment remains in retreat.

Perhaps the most striking indicator of this retreat is the degree to which executions are becoming a local phenomenon. While the preponderance of states have a death penalty, very few use it as a routine feature of their criminal justice systems. This year, 14 states carried out executions, but only six of them -- Texas, Ohio, North Carolina, Florida, Oklahoma and Virginia -- carried out more than one. Together, these states accounted for 85 percent of executions this year. All by itself, Texas, which executed 24 people, accumulated 45 percent. Over the previous three years, the leading six states for executions accounted for between 70 and 83 percent of executions annually. The less the death penalty gets used, the more it becomes a creature of its heartland: the South, and Texas especially.

DOJ_NMG_0111292

Although 38 states and the federal government have the death penalty on their books, only 18 states have executed more than 10 people since the Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976. Many states with laws that permit capital punishment use it only rarely -- such as Maryland -- and some don't use it at all.

Now is a good time to push for repeal of death penalty laws in states outside the region truly committed to its use. Crime and murder rates, though increasing, remain low. Many Americans are rightly concerned by the rash of wrongful convictions, including those of death row inmates who have been exonerated. The death penalty's decline should be translated into policies that will prevent its easy re-emergence if circumstances change.

Pratfalls And Prophecies In 2006 (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

The controversies of the year past -- Iraq, immigration, domestic surveillance and the rest, plus the political battles that climaxed in the Democratic victories in November -- all contributed to an exceptionally heavy load of reader-generated corrections and objections. Thanks to e-mail, many more of you are now contributing to this annual year-end "goofs" column, where I review (and repent) some of the judgments and misjudgments of the past year.

To start with the simplest, in an August piece about Ohio politics, I wrote that Ted Strickland was trying to become the first member of Congress since Rutherford B. Hayes to be elected governor of Ohio. Several of you pointed out that I had ignored two subsequent figures who moved from Congress to that governorship, James M. Cox and Frank B. Willis.

An interview with Bill Gates produced a wave of protests. The Microsoft billionaire was in Washington to lobby for an expansion of the H-1B visa program, which provides entry for foreign-born scientists and engineers offered jobs in the United States. Gates said that the limit on their numbers was hurting America's competitive position.

The letter writers, many of whom identified themselves as unemployed or underemployed people with similar skills, claimed that the H-1B workers were taking their jobs and working at lower wages. I waded through a mass of testimony and evidence, supplied by both sides in the controversy, without being able to resolve the issue. It will probably come up again when the next Congress tackles immigration reform, and this time, I promise I'll look at both sides before I write about it.

I had a similar experience when I wrote about Sen. Joe Biden's proposal for decentralizing the government of Iraq, allowing more authority for separate Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. I commended the Biden proposal as a step forward from what was already, in May, a seriously stalemated and deteriorating situation in Iraq.

But after the column appeared, I received several communications from people with as much knowledge of Iraq as Biden possesses. They argued that such a step toward federalism had serious dangers. It would be difficult to apply in urban areas such as Baghdad, where ethnicities and sects are mixed, and it risked, the correspondents said, inviting other countries such as Iran and Turkey to spread their influence into a partitioned Iraq.

Those same objections have blocked adoption of the Biden plan, but meanwhile, Iraqis fleeing violence have increasingly separated themselves into Shiite or Sunni strongholds, leaving the situation even worse than if there had been an orderly and legal division of authority.

Another column that drew great protest was one in which I took my colleagues in the media to task for their treatment of Karl Rove in the Valerie Plame leak investigation. When the special prosecutor announced that he was not charging Rove with anything, I reviewed some of the many articles that had accused the White House aide of masterminding the "outing" of Plame and said that an apology was in order.

The e-mail and letter writers argued that the simple fact that Rove had escaped prosecution did not mean that he was innocent of using his position to harass and frustrate critics of the administration. He had, after all, confirmed Plame's identity to at least two reporters working on the story. Even if the original leak came from elsewhere, these letter writers said, Rove was no innocent.

But I still believe that there is an important cautionary tale for the media in the Rove-Plame story. Too many of us got way ahead of the facts and let our suspicions grow into assumptions and assertions for which we had no evidence. That tendency to get ahead of the story is rampant in the media just now, fed by the speedup of news delivery through the Internet and cable. Just look at the stories announcing -- in 2006 -- who are "serious" candidates for president in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0111293

Speaking of politics, I'm embarrassed to say that the one state I wrote about that I got wrong was Michigan, where I had spent enough time to have known better. I thought Gov. Jennifer Granholm was going to be sunk by unemployment in the auto industry, but she put on a great campaign and won.

On the other hand, I saw both stages of the Connecticut race correctly -- Joe Lieberman losing the primary but winning as an independent in November. And the downfall of the Republican Congress and rise of an independent breed of Democrats was forecast here from early March onward.

But a column about Hillary Rodham Clinton, touching lightly on the state of her marriage, drew lots of catcalls -- a tip-off that this subject will be a tough one to handle if she enters the presidential race. Bring on 2007.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Groundbreaking Changes Due At Prisons (WILNJ)

By LEE WILLIAMS And ESTEBAN PARRA, The News Journal

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, December 31, 2006

Federal investigation requires Delaware to renovate prison health care

Delaware Correctional Center near Smyrna is among the Delaware prisons looking at major changes in inmate health care after an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice found the prison system guilty of civil rights violations. News Journal file

Inmate Anthony Pierce died of a brain tumor.

It's been more than a year since a coalition of concerned citizens, lawmakers and clergy marched on the governor's mansion and knelt in prayer asking for better health care for inmates in Delaware's prisons. They were galvanized by horrific conditions outlined in a series of stories in The News Journal, the first of which appeared in late September 2005 -- a series Correction Commissioner Stan Taylor charged was "sloppy reporting" in a five-page response the newspaper published.

What's happened since will bring groundbreaking changes to Delaware's prison system:

• On Friday, following a nine-month investigation, the U.S. Department of Justice announced that federal investigators found "substantial civil rights violations" inside four Delaware prisons. For example, the report noted, flesh-eating bacteria inside Gander Hill prison went undiagnosed and untreated, placing "inmates and staff at risk of acquiring the infection and passing it to others in the community."

• Taylor and Attorney General Carl Danberg signed an 87-point agreement with the federal government that calls for sweeping changes in Delaware's penal institutions. The state promised to correct the deficiencies and "meet generally accepted professional standards." However, the state did not admit to violating any inmate's civil rights or breaking any other federal law.

• The 55-year-old Taylor, who's served the past 11 years as commissioner, announced this month that he will retire on Feb. 1. On Saturday a prison spokeswoman announced that Paul Howard, Taylor's longtime bureau chief of prisons, is retiring the same day. Prison spokeswoman Gail Minor Stallings said Howard's departure had nothing to do with the federal report that orders the state to completely renovate its prison health care system.

• Trial lawyers say the damning federal findings will serve as a road map for inmate lawsuits against the state.

• Senate Minority Leader Charles Copeland, R-West Farms, said Saturday the federal government might have taken a "wait and see" approach, if the state had reacted once concerns about inmate care were first raised by the newspaper, and by the citizen coalition he co-founded.

"If there had been a positive response from the state, the feds might have not felt the need to be the hammer," said Copeland, who estimates that changes ordered by the Justice Department will cost $20 million to $30 million more than the state already spends annually on prisons.

• House Majority Leader Wayne Smith, R-Clair Manor, said he was disturbed about the agreement being signed in secret. "I am troubled that we (lawmakers) were not consulted about something this important. By signing this, the governor and the attorney general have obligated the state to spending money without the General Assembly's consent -- and I think we should have learned about this from them, rather than from a reporter."

DOJ_NMG_0111294

Copeland wasn't alone in suggesting that had state officials acknowledged serious problems existed, rather than denying their existence, the pain and suffering among inmates and their families -- as well as the final cost of taxpayer dollars -- would not have been as high.

Sen. Karen Peterson, D-Stanton, an early backer of the federal probe who wrote a letter in support of the investigation to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, said it's not as though the state pleaded no-contest to the federal charges of poor inmate health care.

"It's worse than that," Peterson said. "They don't think they did anything wrong."

Peterson receives letters from inmates seeking help for their medical conditions nearly every day.

"I'm glad the federal government did a thorough investigation and has an action plan so the state is not violating the civil rights of the inmates," Peterson said. "We could have saved money if the state wasn't in a state of denial."

Federal prison regulators identified a host of problems inside prisons, including inadequate screening and health assessments, inadequate treatment of inmates with infectious diseases, inadequate treatment of inmates with serious mental illness, and deficiencies in the state's suicide-prevention measures.

They found substantial civil rights violations at Baylor Women's Correctional Institution, Young Correctional Institution, the Delaware Correctional Center and the Sussex Correctional Institution.

Inmate died from brain tumor

Dover lawyer Steve Hampton, who represents several inmates and their families including the young daughter of Anthony Pierce, who became known as "the brother with two heads" as an inmate at Sussex Correctional Institution. Pierce, who was profiled in a series of articles by The News Journal, was serving a 14-month sentence from an attempted burglary.

He died from a brain tumor after his condition was mishandled by prison medical staff. The state settled a wrongful death lawsuit in a confidential agreement last year.

"If the Pierce case didn't shock them and let them know something was wrong, what does it take?" Hampton asked. "If Taylor is still saying there were no civil rights violations, what does it take? It's still wrong."

In January of 2001, a prison doctor employed by a private medical contractor said the marble-size lump was most likely a cyst or an ingrown hair. Seven months later, when the growth had become like a second head, a prison doctor stabbed the bulging tumor five times with an 18-gauge needle, withdrawing a bloody fluid that he emptied into a trash can.

Michelle Thomas, who worked for the prison's medical contractor, held the hand of Pierce while the doctor removed the fluid. She was aghast and quit shortly thereafter.

"That boy was growing another head," Thomas recalled in an interview with The News Journal. "It was the most grotesque thing I have ever seen in my life. ... All of us who worked there will forever carry his death on our conscience."

Federal investigators cited the case of Anthony Pierce "as the most extreme example" of care denied in Delaware prisons.

Inaction

The federal investigation was prompted by a series of News Journal articles, information investigators built upon:

• AIDS-related inmate deaths: Nearly one in four inmates who died in Delaware prisons since 2000 died of AIDS-related causes. Federal investigators found care was especially poor for inmates with chronic diseases such as AIDS, hepatitis C, diabetes, asthma and hypertension.

• Suicides: The suicide rate inside Delaware prisons during 2001-2002 was double the national average.

As he was being booked into Gander Hill prison in November 2004, Christopher Barkes told the mental health screener he had attempted suicide before, while in Gander Hill, and that he was taking medication for depression. Rather than placing Barkes on suicide watch, they placed him alone in a cell, unsupervised. Barkes hung himself hours later.

In findings sent to Gov. Ruth Ann Minner, federal prison regulators noted that the "state's practices regarding suicide prevention substantially depart from generally accepted professional standards and expose inmates to significant risk of harm."

DOJ_NMG_0111295

• Lack of medication: Nearly every inmate interviewed by The News Journal complained that, if they managed to get drugs prescribed to them, they often didn't receive it. Federal investigators confirmed that at Gander Hill "inmates had not received their medication, or that the medication administration was undocumented."

Like Taylor, Minner initially attacked the series, stating through a spokesperson that "the Department of Correction would welcome an opportunity to provide a briefing on the inmate health care system and to correct the many factual errors in recent news articles about the level of care being provided to Delaware."

When the Justice Department first made inquiries into the state's prison system, Minner's legal counsel, Joseph C. Schoell, sent a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales calling The News Journal's series "misleading."

In a written statement released Oct. 4, 2005, Minner said, "Like any program, there are areas we would like to improve, and the Commissioner has repeatedly said that. But to say the system is in crisis is not only wrong, but irresponsible."

Nearly two months later, while careful not to admit mistakes or confront a mounting toll of inmate deaths, Minner said it was time to determine whether inmates in Delaware were being treated "outside the parameters of acceptable medical practice."

She announced that Division of Public Health Director Dr. Jaime Rivera would start quarterly surveys of random inmate medical files to identify cases or procedures that may be below standard.

What effect the reviews had, if any, is not known.

Problems with staff denied

Ken Fields, spokesman for Correctional Medical Services, the Department of Correction's current health care provider, denied there are problems with CMS staff.

"In fact, to my knowledge, the consultants who have been retained by the Department of Justice have not even been to all of the facilities referenced in the news release," Fields said. "So, we are perplexed as to how they reached conclusions about the quality of care. In fact, in some cases, we walked away from our discussions with those involved with a distinctly different impression of what they found."

Fields said CMS has "strengthened the team of health care professionals meeting the needs of inmate patients ... added additional orientation and training for health care staff, and we have in place a new regional management team of highly qualified medical staff."

Sen. James T. Vaughn, D-Clayton, served as Department of Correction commissioner from 1976 to 1979, and chairs the Senate Adult and Juvenile Correction Committee.

When problems were first revealed, Vaughn blocked prison reform legislation from being heard in committee, even though every member of his committee wanted the legislation discussed.

Vaughn said he was inclined to wait until the federal government completed its investigation before debating state legislation that would overhaul medical services at the Department of Correction.

The reform bill he blocked, which had the support of minority and majority leaders in the Senate, would have required testing inmates for HIV/AIDS, hepatitis and tuberculosis, provided medical training to guards, and required Correctional Medical Services to deliver records of inmate deaths for review and made other records available to the state for audit.

"I think it would have been a good start," said Margaret Rose Henry, D-Wilmington East, who sponsored the blocked bill. "Prisons are too crowded, the inmates need screening when they come in and when they come out, or we're just perpetuating the problem in a larger society."

Vaughn did not respond to calls or e-mails Friday or Saturday.

Copeland compared the changes ordered in the settlement agreement to Henry's bill.

"That cost was estimated at $20 million to $30 million to implement," Copeland said. "Read through point-by-point what the Justice Department put together. Ultimately, it's the same."

Litigation

Although the state entered into the settlement agreement, it was careful to avoid admissions that could be used against it in litigation said Jeffrey K. Martin, a Wilmington attorney who has defended several inmates in federal court and complained about medical conditions in state prisons.

DOJ_NMG_0111296

"For the administration to deny that there are no civil right violations is mere posturing," Martin said. "If the state wants to brush this under the rug, one only needs to glance at this report to see numerous civil rights violations."

Martin said the U.S. Department of Justice's investigation points to overwhelming deficiencies that the state must now address.

"It's as if the prison system has to start all over," he said, adding that he hopes the DOC actually follows through with its agreement. He noted Delaware's prison system has not always kept its word, after problems have been pointed out to them.

Martin, who represented a prison counselor taken hostage by an inmate and sexually assaulted July 2004, said that incident pointed to many security failures, including doors being propped open. Despite these findings, Martin said he continues to hear about unaddressed safety issues.

"I know that doors continue to be chucked," he said, adding that he wonders how the findings will fair. "My concern is with compliance."

Although the report itself more than likely cannot be used in a courtroom, Martin said it "gives potential litigants a road map."

Martin said the settlement agreement will be reviewed by inmates, as well as their family members, in search of deficiencies relevant to health care administered by the prison system.

Karen Barkes, the wife of 37-year-old Chris Barkes, who committed suicide while in prison on a charge of loitering, said she hopes the settlement between Delaware and the U.S. Justice Department will be a wake-up call to state officials who have hesitated in the past to make changes.

"They know when Chris died that there was a problem with intake and how many people have died since," Karen Barkes said. "That prison administration has not wanted to look at the problems." Reporter Patrick Jackson contributed to this article.

Contact investigative reporter Lee Williams at 324-2362 or lwilliams@delawareonline.com.

Contact Esteban Parra at 324-2299 or eparra@delawareonline.com.

Post a Comment View All Comments

Posted by: WBMJ!- Mon Jan 01, 2007 12:46 pm

As an ex-employee of Gander Hill Prison, I had personally reported medical infractions repeatedly to the current contracted medical provider Correctional Medical Services and their administration. The former on-site health administrator also attempted to bring serious infractions to both CMS and the Department of Corrections attention and was literally "thrown out" of the prison by the warden! Both DOC and CMS wish to turn deaf ears to any problem with appropriate medical treatment at Gander Hill because it saves both agencies money in the long run.

Yes, prisons are for human beings who are there allegedly for committing a crime and for their punishment. This punishment does not include the withholding or ignorance of their healthcare needs as provided for them under their Constitutional Rights. As per my source, it is my understanding Andre had "problems" recognized that CMS had a duty to act upon when he entered the prison system during his intake process and CMS should have ordered "screening" that may have stabilized the condition that led him to kill himself. Other employees who were ushered out the door by CMS and DOC brought similar issues forth in the past and were told repeatively "just do your job."

That's why I am not there anymore; my patients were already judged by a court and also by the God of their particular religious beliefs. It is not anyone's place to provide additional punishment by withholding medical treatment and causing additional anguish to the patient (and in Andre's case, his family)!

The Department of Justice just completed a report on their inspection of the Delaware prison system echoing the words, "appalling conditions." This report is available online at delawareonline.

This also came about the same time the NCCHC (a private agency which approves prison healthcare credentialing) approved Gander Hill in proper operation of its facility.

Rights Groups To Seek Action On Profiling, Elections (FREEP)

By Deborah Barfield Berry, Gannett News Service

Detroit Free Press, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With Democrats taking control of Congress on Monday, civil rights groups will be pressing for an aggressive agenda that includes a ban on racial profiling, an overhaul in some election practices and stepped up oversight of the Justice Department.

Because of last month's vote in Michigan, civil rights advocates also may urge Congress to take a stand on affirmative action, depending on the outcome of several cases before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Advocates are concerned about the potential national implications of Michigan's Proposal 2 initiative approved in November that bans racial preferences in state hiring and university admissions.

"We will be looking to see if there is any role for Congress to play," said John Britton, chief counsel for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

Advocates say civil rights issues are more likely to have a platform and encounter less resistance than in the Republican-controlled Congress, especially with members of the Congressional Black Caucus heading powerful committees, including Rep. John Conyers of Detroit on the Judiciary Committee.

But experts caution that civil rights issues must compete with other Democratic priorities, such as high college costs, minimum wage increases and accessible health care.

"Congress is going to have a lot on its plate. ... It's going to be a bit of a climb uphill" for some civil rights issues, said Hugh Price, a senior fellow with the Brookings Institution and former president of the National Urban League.

Among the issues civil rights groups want Congress to address:

• More workplace protections for lesbian, gay and transgendered people.

• Voting rights for the District of Columbia.

• The disparity in arrests and sentencing of minorities.

"There's a real appetite on the hill to address some of the problems that have been lingering," said Caroline Fredrickson, Washington director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "I think Democrats were reluctant to push hard on those things knowing they would lose."

One measure, backed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and other groups, would ban racial profiling by law enforcement officials and provide federal funding to retrain officers. The measure has failed for at least the past eight years under Republican rule.

Congress has been "in some cases hostile to the civil rights agenda and in some cases indifferent" Fredrickson said.

In what civil rights officials describe as one of the few victories last year, Congress renewed the Voting Rights Act.

But civil rights groups were disappointed last fall when the House approved a measure that would require voters to show photo identification when they go to the polls for federal elections in 2008 and to show ID that certifies their citizenship by 2010.

Republicans said it would help protect against voter fraud.

The Kennedy Factor On The Roberts Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

THE Supreme Court, having decided only four cases since the term began in October, has not exactly been living in the fast lane. But the pace is about to pick up.

The coming months will be a testing time for the young Roberts court, including decisions due by early summer on abortion, school integration and environmental policy, with an unusually large emphasis on cases of significance to the business community.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. has spoken often of the virtues of a court that speaks modestly and unanimously. Those goals may well prove elusive. The court's conservative bloc reached out to hear challenges to voluntary integration plans put in place by the public school systems of Louisville, Ky., and Seattle, which had been upheld by lower courts.

If the Dec. 4 arguments were any indication, a majority will overturn student assignment plans that seek to maintain racial balance in systems that struggled for years to achieve it. The outcome is likely to prove divisive both within the court and outside it.

DOJ_NMG_0111298

The Nov. 8 arguments in two cases on the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 did not provide such a clear basis for prediction. Instead, they served to showcase Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's position at the center of a court that is closely divided in cases that Justice Antonin Scalia has described as battles in the culture war. Before she retired a year ago, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor held that pivotal position.

Justice Kennedy did not tip his hand during the abortion arguments. But enough other justices tipped theirs to make clear that the first federal statute ever to make an abortion procedure a crime will stand or fall depending on Justice Kennedy's opinion.

As the term proceeds, the court will also have its say in its first brush with the issue of global climate change. But in this instance — a statutory rather than constitutional case — the court's word will not be the last. Whatever the justices decide about the Bush administration's refusal to regulate carbon dioxide in automobile emissions, the new Congress may well have something to say.

A Retreat On Rationing Free Speech? (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

A three-judge federal court recently tugged a thread that may begin the unraveling of the fabric of murky laws and regulations that traduce the First Amendment by suppressing political speech. Divided 2 to 1, the court held -- unremarkably, you might think -- that issue advocacy ads can run during an election campaign, when they matter most. This decision will strike zealous (there is no other kind) advocates of ever-tighter regulation of political speech (campaign finance "reformers") as ominous. Why? Because it partially emancipates millions of Americans who incorporate thousands of groups to advocate their causes, groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Rifle Association.

And Wisconsin Right to Life. It is another organization by which people assemble (see the First Amendment) to speak (see it again) in order to seek redress of grievances (the amendment, one more time). In 2004 Wisconsin Right to Life was distressed because Wisconsin's senators, Russ Feingold and Herb Kohl, were helping to block confirmation votes on some of President Bush's judicial nominees. It wanted to run ads urging people to "contact Senators Feingold and Kohl and tell them to oppose the filibuster."

But Feingold was running for reelection, and the McCain-Feingold "reform" makes it a crime for entities such as Wisconsin Right to Life to use their corporate funds to broadcast an "electioneering communication" within 30 days of a primary or 60 days of a general election. An "electioneering communication" is one that "refers to" a candidate for federal office.

Although in 2003 the Supreme Court upheld McCain-Feingold, the court said later that it would consider appeals against the law "as applied." The majority on the three-judge court, preserving the distinction between electioneering and grass-roots lobbying, held that Wisconsin Right to Life's ads were exempt from the McCain-Feingold election-eve blackouts of speech because the ads were not "coordinated" with a candidate's campaign and did not engage in "express advocacy" -- did not use the words "vote for" or "vote against" a candidate.

The dissenting judge wanted to examine the "intent" of the ads by examining their "context," looking for clues as to whether the group hoped to not only advocate an issue but influence an election. Imagine: Judges scouring the political landscape, searching for evidence (people's past opinions or associations; e-mails and other communications) that would empower them to rule that grass-roots lobbying about an issue is "really" the functional equivalent of electioneering (express advocacy).

Such a process would necessarily be so protracted that no challenged ad could be authorized in time for an election. Besides, Bob Bauer, a Democratic campaign lawyer, rightly warns that the prospect of such inquiries should "make a sensible citizen's blood run cold." An uncircumscribed inquiry into "intent" would become "an intrusive process" in which an organization's internal communications would be subpoenaed and political operatives and consultants would be "put under oath and questioned about what they meant and intended and thought."

The Wisconsin Right to Life case is probably heading for the Supreme Court. There, Justice Samuel Alito occupies the chair that Sandra Day O'Connor occupied when she voted with the majority in the 5 to 4 ruling that upheld McCain-Feingold.

Still, the reformers' zeal for regulating speech is undiminished. The Federal Election Commission recently fined some "527" groups (named for the tax code provision under which they organize) $630,000. Their offense? Issue advocacy in 2004 that, "taken as a whole," could "only be interpreted by a reasonable person as containing the advocacy of the election or defeat" of a federal candidate. Editorial writers at The Post and the New York Times, ever eager to regulate political advocacy not done by newspaper editorial writers, approved, although the Times thought the fines insufficient, and although The Post, calling the current law "murky," thought the FEC should have enforced the murkiness quicker.

DOJ_NMG_0111299

The Times no longer bothers to pretend that its rationale for speech regulation is fear of corruption or the appearance thereof. Rather, the Times justifies suppressing 527s on aesthetic grounds -- they are run by "hard-edged activists" and their ads are too negative. Presumably, suppressing 527s will elevate political discourse -- and, presumably, it is the government's business to enforce the elevation. The Post also is tellingly silent about the reformers' original corruption rationale for rationing political speech by restricting the political money that finances it. Instead, The Post says 527s wield "significant" -- by implication, excessive (relative to The Post's?) -- influence.

Bauer wonders why, absent a compelling government interest in combating corruption, unregulated speech resulting in influence should be a federal offense. When, as surely it will, the Supreme Court considers that question, it can begin undoing the damage it did at the time it affirmed McCain-Feingold and licensed government to ration political speech.

ANTITRUST:

States Scramble To Scrutinize Airline Takeover (SLT)

Salt Lake Tribune, December 31, 2006

Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff isn't opposed to US Airways' hostile bid for Delta Air Lines - yet.

But that could change in the coming weeks. The top law enforcement officer in Utah, who waged an antitrust fight against Microsoft Corp. a few years back, has teamed up with attorneys general in a dozen other states to investigate the impact of a Delta buyout on airline competition and ticket prices.

"It looks like and smells like a classic redundant merger, which often is anti-competitive and sometimes does violate antitrust laws. If we conclude that it is, then we can possibly bring an action to stop it," Shurtleff said last week.

In most cases, states have authority to challenge corporate mergers. The airline industry, however, is the one area where states are powerless to approve or reject mergers out of hand. That power is the sole right of the U.S. Department of Justice, said Jim Dick, an attorney who worked in the antitrust division of the Justice Department and whose private practice involves antitrust work in the airline industry.

"The states don't have a role. What they can do, though, is have an investigation and present their findings to the Justice Department, which is very likely to give them serious consideration," said Dick, who works in Washington, D.C., for the Cleveland-based law firm of Squires Sanders and Dempsey.

The investigation, already two weeks old, is a race against time. Delta, which has spurned the offer, is plowing forward with its plan to exit bankruptcy as a free-standing airline before next summer. The No. 3 U.S. carrier has set a meeting Feb. 7 with a federal judge to show why the plan contains enough information for creditors to vote on it.

At the same time, US Airways continues to assert that its $8.4 billion offer provides more value to creditors than Delta's stand-alone plan. US Airways contends that the merger could be completed in the first half of 2007 and should be done while Delta is in bankruptcy. And spokesman Philip Gee says his Tempe, Ariz.-based airline believes its offer to buy Atlanta-based Delta will pass antitrust review.

"That is based on a thorough city-pair-by-city pair analysis, the type the Department of Justice will perform," Gee said.

Justice Department officials did not respond to telephone calls seeking comment.

If the buyout succeeds, there could be far-reaching repercussions in Utah. Delta's westermost hub at Salt Lake City International Airport is a crucial piece of the local economy. In 2004, Delta shut its hub in Dallas and moved most of those operations to Salt Lake.

Since it filed for bankruptcy in September 2005, Delta has added more than 30 new nonstop routes from the airport. Today, the hub supplies 6,000 direct and indirect jobs. It plays a big role in efforts to recruit new employers. And it brings thousands of visitors who might not come here otherwise.

DOJ_NMG_0111300

US Airways has pledged to preserve the hub, but skeptics - including Shurtleff, the leadership of the Utah House and Senate, several Salt Lake County Council members and Ed Bastian, Delta's chief financial officer - doubt that is possible. A US Airways hub in Phoenix is just 700 miles south of Salt Lake. The company also has major airline operations in Las Vegas.

If the Salt Lake hub were closed or scaled back, "what you would expect out of that is fewer flights, fewer nonstops, fewer seats and, therefore, higher prices and poorer service," Shurtleff said.

Which states have joined with Utah to examine the merger is unclear. Representatives of the National Association of Attorneys General, which is coordinating the communication between state investigators, were unavailable last week. Florida has confirmed it's taking part. Shurtleff said he believes New York and Pennsylvania are on board, and the attorney general of Georgia has been approached. In Utah, the lead investigator is James Palmer, one of Shurtleff's top antitrust lawyers.

Shurtleff agrees that the authority to approve or reject the US Airways-Delta merger rests with federal regulators and not the states. But states do have the power to shape or at least block the merger through lawsuits.

Under federal law, states can file antitrust lawsuits in order to protect consumers, he said.

"These [mergers] have to be approved by the Department of Justice, but we are not bound by that. We often take action independent of the federal government on these antitrust issues," Shurtleff said.

Perhaps the classic example of states standing up for consumers is the role they played in the government's legal battle against Microsoft Corp. In 1998, the Justice Department and a group of states sued the software titan, alleging it illegally used its monopoly in computer operating systems to stop competitors from bringing their operating systems to the market.

Utah took part. After a federal appeals court upheld a lower court, which found that Microsoft abused its monopoly power, Microsoft and the department reached a settlement. Utah and several other states refused to go along, saying the terms didn't go far enough. Their intransigence forced Microsoft to make more concessions.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

His Omnipresence May Show His Clout, But Now Bruno Is On The Defensive (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

ALBANY, Dec. 29 — To get a sense of the celebrity and clout wielded around here by State Senator Joseph L. Bruno, the silver-maned Republican majority leader, consider this: One night last summer, minor league baseball fans who visited the Joseph L. Bruno Stadium across the river were given Joseph L. Bruno bobblehead dolls.

Over at the Albany International Airport, a bronze bust of Senator Bruno greets arrivals from the airport's observation deck. In Troy, people can catch performances at the Joseph L. Bruno black box theater. And at the public television station, WMHT, producers scurry about in the new Joseph L. Bruno Broadcast Operations Center. The area is full of projects and buildings for which Mr. Bruno secured state aid.

And his clout inside the Capitol building is even greater. For 12 years Mr. Bruno has been one of the three men who have effectively controlled state government, and he is poised to become the most important Republican official in New York State now that Gov. George E. Pataki is leaving office.

Mr. Bruno's ascension has a silver-lining aspect to it; he was simply the last man standing after Republicans were routed at the polls on Election Day, leaving them without a statewide office for the first time in decades. The State Senate is now the party's last, and shrinking, power base.

But at what should be his crowning moment, Mr. Bruno finds himself on the defensive as never before. The F.B.I. is investigating his business ties, newspapers are exploring his financial relationships with people seeking help from the state, some Republicans are grumbling that he is tarnishing their troubled party, and for the first time, a member of his conference, Senator John J. Bonacic, a Hudson Valley Republican, is calling on Mr. Bruno to step down.

Mr. Bruno, who was the light-heavyweight boxing champion of his Army regiment in Korea, and at 77 still weighs in at 173 to 175 pounds, is making it clear that he has plenty of fight left in him. He said during an interview on Friday that he fully expected to be re-elected as temporary president of the Senate — the title that gives him vast power over the body — when the Senate convenes here on Wednesday.

"I have 33 votes in my conference, as I sit here, out of 34," he said.

And Mr. Bruno bristled at news reports that the federal government was investigating his decision to award a $500,000 member item grant — the type that goes to individual lawmakers' pet projects — to Evident Technologies, a company with a former director, Jared Abbruzzese, who had business dealings with Mr. Bruno. Mr. Bruno said that the state gave aid to Evident before he did, and that the money was intended to keep the company from moving out of state.

"It gets me a little bit excited, because they all want to moan and groan and point to Evident," he said in his office. "Evident is one of the most worthwhile projects to be funded that I have funded. Now the fact that a friend of mine, it turns out, that I had a financial relationship with — too damn bad. What am I, a second-class citizen? Is he a second-class citizen? We vetted that through the whole process, O.K.?"

"I'm getting crucified," he said. "And you know something? Tomorrow, if I had that situation to do over, I'd do exactly what I've done."

Mr. Bruno said he entered politics in large part to try to reverse the state government's hostility to business through taxes and regulations.

Although throughout his political career, Mr. Bruno has been dogged by questions of whether his public and private roles were in conflict — from the state contracts won by his telecommunications firm, Coradian, to how legislation he worked on could affect investors — he has never before been accused of wrongdoing.

"My attitude has been, you think I'm in a conflict, then you prove it, and if you're right I'll pay the consequences," he said in an interview in 1994, shortly after he ousted the former Senate majority leader, Ralph J. Marino, in a coup orchestrated in part by Governor Pataki and Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato.

"But I'm not going to ever back off because somebody alleges there's a conflict," he said, "because I have spent my life in business and government trying to prove that businesspeople can be effective in government."

Mr. Bruno grew up with seven siblings in a cold-water flat in Glens Falls, N.Y. His mother had a botched gallbladder operation at age 33, and seven operations later, too poor to afford proper care, died at 44. His father shoveled coal in a paper mill for 32 years, and, Mr. Bruno said, was too proud to accept welfare.

"My childhood was miserable, in plain English, except for the love of my mother and my father," he said. "My father always had a work ethic: you'd take nothing that didn't belong to you, take nothing that you didn't earn. Honesty was his byword."

Mr. Bruno took his first job when he was just 9, delivering pastries each morning to a nearby shirt factory. He was paid in day-old pastries, breakfast for his family.

He went on to put himself through college delivering ice, and afterward went into business selling frozen food in bulk to families as a way to persuade them to buy Amana freezers. He can still rattle off large parts of the pitch: "Frozen food is healthier for you than anything else, if it's flash frozen. You trap all the goodness in everything."

Then, after borrowing $5,000 with a partner, he started Coradian, the telephone company. In 1975 Mr. Bruno was elected to the State Senate, forgoing a race for Congress, he said, in large part so that he could stay active in business.

When Mr. Bruno became majority leader, he was widely regarded as a conservative choice. But over the years he has moved to the left, passing gay rights legislation that had long stalled in the Senate and overriding Governor Pataki's veto to increase the state's minimum wage to $7.15, which takes effect on Monday.

It is a measure of his political skills and his good personal relations that he has received support this month from some of the state's most liberal union leaders and from Conservative Party officials.

"I learned in my tenure that if you're not elected, you can't govern," he said, adding that he believed compromise was essential. "In this state, if you don't move to the center, and sometimes the left of center, you're not going to survive."

The Republicans lost a Senate seat in November, giving them a 34-to-28 majority, though they held power despite the Democratic onslaught in every other area. But Senator Michael A. L. Balboni, a Nassau County Republican, just announced that he is leaving to join the Spitzer administration, setting up the possibility that Republicans could lose another seat.

DOJ_NMG_0111302

Mr. Bruno said he did not think other senators would leave. “I think my members, most of them, want checks and balances, a bipartisan, two-party system,” he said.

Mr. Bruno continued as a top executive at Coradian until 1990, selling phone systems to state and local governments as well as to businesses. He said he believed his job as a state senator might have hurt his business more than it helped.

The company was sold in 1990 for $23 million, and Mr. Bruno started a consulting firm, Capital Business Consultants. The firm has been subpoenaed in the inquiry, as investigators try to discern whether his clients won assistance from the state.

“Everything I have done, we have done to the letter of the law,” Mr. Bruno said. He added that he had disclosed all the information the state required, and that he did not think it would be fair to clients who expected confidentiality to disclose their names now.

“We are a part-time Senate, a part-time Legislature,” he said. “Everybody here does something else, almost everybody, and I think that’s right, that’s the way it ought to be. Do you remember this from your civics class? We are a citizen Legislature. Citizens, farmers, lawyers, businesspeople, doctors, retirees, that’s what we are.”

Bumbling Against Terror (PPG)

By Jack Kelly, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 31, 2006

The FBI's record doesn't inspire confidence that we're being well protected

The House International Relations committee issued a report last week criticizing the FBI's investigation of the 1995 bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City.

Jack Kelly is national security writer for the Post-Gazette and The Blade of Toledo, Ohio (jkelly@post-gazette.com, 412-263-1476).

The FBI failed to pursue credible information that Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols had help, the committee said.

The FBI shouldn't have abandoned its search for John Doe No. 2, the committee said. Jayna Davis, then a reporter for a television station in Oklahoma City, said she found at least 20 witnesses who identified Hussain al-Hussaini, a former Iraqi soldier, as the man they saw with Timothy McVeigh.

And the FBI should have investigated more thoroughly contacts between Mr. McVeigh and Andreas Strassmeir, a German national who was a paramilitary instructor at Elohim City, a neo-Nazi compound near the Arkansas border, the committee said.

The FBI says its investigation was exhaustive, but the discovery just two years ago of a large cache of explosives in a house in which Mr. Nichols lived (and which the FBI had searched) casts some doubt on that claim.

Investigative reporter Peter Lance has just completed his third book describing FBI blunders (or worse) in the war on terror.

In his first, "A Thousand Years for Revenge," Mr. Lance showed how the 1993 World Trade Center bombing could have been prevented were it not for negligence by senior FBI officials in New York, and how the FBI had been informed in 1995 of al-Qaida's plans to use airplanes to attack American landmarks.

In his second, "Cover Up," Mr. Lance described how the FBI ignored intelligence about al-Qaida provided by a young mobster, Gregory Scarpa Jr., in order to protect a corrupt FBI agent. (Former Special Agent Lindley DeVecchio was indicted last March on four counts of murder chiefly because of the information Mr. Lance provided in this book.)

Mr. Lance's third book, "Triple Cross," focuses mainly on how Ali Mohamed, one of Osama bin Laden's closest aides, bamboozled the FBI into thinking he was helping the bureau even as he was plotting multiple acts of mass terror.

Mr. Lance, who has won five Emmys, is a better reporter than he is a writer. Reading one of his books is like panning for gold: You've got to sift through a lot of silt to get to the nuggets. For me, the most valuable nuggets in "Triple Cross" are the additional details Mr. Lance provides on the scoops in his earlier books.

On July 17, 1996, TWA 800 disintegrated over Long Island Sound. The FBI and the National Transportation Safety Board concluded the crash was caused by the accidental explosion of the center wing fuel tank. What the 270 witnesses who thought they saw a surface-to-air missile streaking toward the aircraft before the explosion actually saw was a "zoom climb" by the damaged aircraft after its nose had been blown off, the FBI and NTSB said.

DOJ_NMG_0111303

Former airline pilot Ray Lahr considers this improbable: "Such a steep climb is much beyond the capabilities of the engines alone on a large transport aircraft," he said. Last month a federal judge in Los Angeles ordered the FBI and the NTSB to turn over to Mr. Lahr documents they'd been trying to keep from him. The case Mr. Lahr presented was sufficiently strong "to proceed based on his claim the government acted improperly," the judge said.

The most startling thing reported by Mr. Scarpa was that al-Qaida operative Ramzi Yousef, who was in a cell next to him in prison, claimed that he had arranged to have TWA 800 destroyed. Mr. Yousef was about to go on trial for plotting to blow up a dozen airliners in Asia and wanted a mistrial declared.

Minutes after TWA 800's destruction, Mr. Yousef made a brief telephone call in his native language of Baluch, according to Mr. Lance and Jack Cashill, who wrote a book about TWA 800. It was translated by the National Security Agency: "What had to be done has been done. TWA 800 (last two words unintelligible)."

If what Mr. Lance says is true -- if only a small fraction of what Mr. Lance says is true -- the best that can be said of the FBI is that it has been grossly negligent.

A story in the New York Sun Wednesday also does not inspire confidence in the bureau. According to an FBI court filing, the files in 22 of 94 investigations into leaks of classified information are missing.

"Knowing what I know, I can confidently say that until the investigative responsibilities for terrorism are removed from the FBI, I won't feel safe," said former FBI agent Robert Wright in June 2001. Reading Mr. Lance's book won't make him feel any safer.

Our Bumbling FBI (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), December 31, 2006

THE House International Relations committee issued a report last week criticizing the FBI's investigation of the 1995 bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City.

The FBI failed to pursue credible information that Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols had help, the committee said.

The FBI shouldn't have abandoned its search for John Doe No. 2, the committee said. Jayna Davis, then a reporter for a television station in Oklahoma City, said she found at least 20 witnesses who identified Hussain al-Hussaini, a former Iraqi soldier, as the man they saw with Timothy McVeigh.

And the FBI should have investigated more thoroughly contacts between McVeigh and Andreas Strassmeir, a German national who was a paramilitary instructor at Elohim City, a neo-Nazi compound near the Arkansas border, the committee said.

The FBI says its investigation was exhaustive, but the discovery just two years ago of a large cache of explosives in a house in which Nichols lived (and which the FBI had searched) casts some doubt on that claim.

Investigative reporter Peter Lance has just completed his third book describing FBI blunders (or worse) in the war on terror.

In his first, A Thousand Years for Revenge, Mr. Lance showed how the 1993 World Trade Center bombing could have been prevented were it not for negligence by senior FBI officials in New York, and how the FBI had been informed in 1995 of al-Qaeda's plans to use airplanes to attack American landmarks.

In his second, Cover Up, Mr. Lance described how the FBI ignored intelligence about al-Qaeda provided by a young mobster, Gregory Scarpa, Jr., in order to protect a corrupt FBI agent. (Former Special Agent Lindley DeVecchio was indicted last March on four counts of murder chiefly because of the information Mr. Lance provided in this book.)

Mr. Lance's third book, Triple Cross, focuses mainly on how Ali Mohamed, one of Osama bin Laden's closest aides, bamboozled the FBI into thinking he was helping the bureau even as he was plotting multiple acts of mass terror.

Mr. Lance, who has won five Emmys, is a better reporter than he is a writer. Reading one of his books is like panning for gold: You've got to sift through a lot of silt to get to the nuggets. For me, the most valuable nuggets in Triple Cross are the additional details Mr. Lance provides on the scoops in his earlier books.

On July 17, 1996, TWA 800 disintegrated over Long Island Sound. The FBI and the National Transportation Safety Board concluded the crash was caused by the accidental explosion of the center wing fuel tank. What the 270 witnesses who thought they saw a surface-to-air missile streaking toward the aircraft before the explosion actually saw was a "zoom climb" by the damaged aircraft after its nose had been blown off, the FBI and NTSB said.

DOJ_NMG_0111304

Former airline pilot Ray Lahr considers this improbable: "Such a steep climb is much beyond the capabilities of the engines alone on a large transport aircraft," he said. Last month a federal judge in Los Angeles ordered the FBI and the NTSB to turn over to Mr. Lahr documents they'd been trying to keep from him. The case Mr. Lahr presented was sufficiently strong "to proceed based on his claim the government acted improperly," the judge said.

The most startling thing reported by Scarpa was that al-Qaeda operative Ramzi Yousef, who was in a cell next to him in prison, claimed that he had arranged to have TWA 800 destroyed. Yousef was about to go on trial for plotting to blow up a dozen airliners in Asia and wanted a mistrial declared.

Minutes after TWA 800's destruction, Yousef made a brief telephone call in his native language of Baluch, according to Mr. Lance and Jack Cashill, who wrote a book about TWA 800. It was translated by the National Security Agency: "What had to be done has been done. TWA 800 (last two words unintelligible)."

If what Mr. Lance says is true - if only a small fraction of what Mr. Lance says is true - the best that can be said of the FBI is that it has been grossly negligent.

A recent story in the New York Sun also does not inspire confidence in the bureau. According to an FBI court filing, the files in 22 of 94 investigations into leaks of classified information are missing.

"Knowing what I know, I can confidently say that until the investigative responsibilities for terrorism are removed from the FBI, I won't feel safe," said former FBI agent Robert Wright in June, 2001. Reading Mr. Lance's book won't make him feel any safer.

Jack Kelly is national security writer for The Blade and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette.

Contact him at: jkelly@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1476.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Ethics Panel Concludes Conyers Inquiry With A Warning But No Punishment (RC)

By Susan Davis

RollCall.com, December 30, 2006

The House ethics committee concluded its three-year inquiry into incoming Judiciary Chairman John Conyers on Friday, voting to take no punitive action against the Michigan Democrat but warning him not to use Congressional staff for any campaign or personal purposes in the future.

The inquiry was self-initiated by the ethics panel following news reports in December 2003 that Conyers had on multiple occasions demanded his Congressional staff do both political work outside of their official duties as well as personal errands and favors for the lawmaker and his wife, such as babysitting and tutoring his children.

In a joint statement, ethics Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and ranking member Howard Berman (D-Calif.) said Conyers had agreed to the terms set out by the panel to ensure that his office complies with House rules pertaining to Congressional staff. The committee further stated that Conyers cooperated with the investigation, providing documents and other information at the panel's request.

"In the course of providing information to the committee, Representative Conyers acknowledged what he characterized as a 'lack of clarity' in his communications with staff members regarding their official duties and responsibilities, and accepted responsibility for his actions," the committee said in a statement, "Representative Conyers also provided the committee with documents indicating that he had begun taking steps to provide clearer guidance to staff regarding the requirement that campaign work and official work be separate."

Conyers agreed to six conditions laid out by the panel, and if he abides by them the matter will remain closed.

He must prohibit his personal staff, other than his chief of staff, from performing any campaign-related work even if done on a voluntary basis, unless the employees takes paid leave from their Congressional duties. He must also inform his staff in writing of the terms of their Congressional or campaign work as well as distribute a memo to his staff that clarifies all House rules relating to their duties. Conyers must maintain a "detailed time-keeping system" as to his Congressional staffers' duties and require all of his staff to attend a briefing by an ethics committee counsel on House rules that pertain to campaign and non-official work on behalf of a Member of Congress. And Conyers' personal Congressional staff must hold annual meetings to discuss and explain House rules, with all new employees required to learn the rules as part of their orientation.

DOJ_NMG_0111305

Conyers Accepts Responsibility For Possible Ethics Violations (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan, Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, December 30, 2006

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) has "accepted responsibility" for possibly violating House rules by requiring his official staff to perform campaign-related work, according to a statement quietly released by the House ethics committee late Friday evening.

The top Republican and Democratic members on the ethics panel, Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), said in a statement that Conyers acknowledged a "lack of clarity" in communicating what was expected of his official staff and that he accepted responsibility for his actions.

"[Conyers] agreed to take a number of additional, significant steps to ensure that his office complies with all rules and standards regarding campaign and personal work by congressional staff," they stated. "We have concluded that this matter should be resolved through the issuance of this public statement."

The finding by the ethics panel could spark debate, and perhaps eclipse, the first week of the incoming-Democratic majority's plans to change the House ethics rules, as well as raise questions about Conyers' standing to chair the Judiciary Committee.

On Dec. 14, Conyers sent a letter to his supporters from his campaign website announcing that he had been elected as chairman-designate of the House Judiciary Committee. Berman is the second-ranking Democrat on the panel.

A spokesman for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said Conyers will remain chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

The House ethics committee conditions that Conyers has agreed to must be complied with throughout the 110th Congress.

Conyers had alarmed Democrats, poised to recapture the House after 12 years in the minority, by indicating that he would begin impeachment proceedings against President Bush.

In May, a spokesman for Pelosi, said that she told her Democratic colleagues in a closed meeting, "that impeachment is off the table; she is not interested in pursuing it."

As House Republicans and Democrats prepare for former President Gerald Ford's funeral and the transfer of power set to take place next week, aides to Pelosi were not available for comment.

The ethics inquiry began in December, 2003 when former staff members complained to the ethics panel, formerly named the House Committee on Standards and Official Conduct, that Conyers had required his official staffers to work on campaigns, babysit his children, and run personal errands. Conyers subsequently hired Stanley Brand, a well-respected defense lawyer with a long track record of defending public officials implicated in corruption cases.

In 2003, Reps. Joel Hefley (R-Colo.) and Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.) headed the ethics committee.

The Hill reported last March that two former Conyers' aides alleged that he repeatedly violated House ethics rules by requiring aides to work on local and state campaigns, and babysit and chauffeur his children. Deanna Maher, a former deputy chief of staff in the Detroit office, and Sydney Rooks, a former legal counsel in his district office, shared numerous letters, memos, e-mails, handwritten notes and expense reports with The Hill.

They also sent the same materials to the House ethics panel, the FBI and the U.S. attorney's office. House rules allow the chairman and ranking member of the ethics panel to initiate informal inquiries into allegations of misconduct in the absence of a formal complaint.

Hastings and Berman said in their statement that Conyers provided information and documents to the panel. Committee staff also interviewed witnesses. They also said that Conyers agreed to take six steps to ensure that the matter remain closed. First, he agreed to prohibit his personal congressional staff, other than his chief of staff, from engaging in any voluntary campaign-related work in the 110th Congress unless that staff members takes a leave of absence and obtains prior approval from the wthics Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0111306

He also must take several additional steps to make it abundantly clear to his government-paid aides that they need not work on campaigns to gain employment or stay employed in his office. In addition, he will have to maintain a detailed time-keeping system that he implemented during the course of the committee's inquiry.

"Provided that the above requirements are complied with, this matter will remain closed, and the Committee will take no further action on it," Hastings and Berman said.

The following is the text of the House ethics committee statement regarding Conyers:

December 29, 2006

Statement of Chairman Doc Hastings and Ranking Minority Member Howard L. Berman Regarding Representative John Conyers

The Chairman and Ranking Minority Member, pursuant to Committee Rule 18(a), initiated an informal inquiry in December 2003 into reports that members of the congressional staff of Representative John Conyers had performed campaign activity on official time and in some instances using official resources, and that some staff members may have been compelled to do campaign work or personal work for Representative Conyers. The assertions in the reports, if true, could implicate a number of laws and House rules applicable to Members, including: House Rule 23, clause 1 (requiring the conduct of a Member or employee to reflect creditably on the House of representatives); House Rule 23, clause 8 (requiring that congressional staff perform official duties commensurate with compensation); 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) and corresponding regulations of the Committee on House Administration (providing that official funds may be used only for the purposes appropriated); and 18 U.S.C § 606 (prohibiting adverse personnel action or intimidation to secure a "contribution of money or other valuable thing" including services, for a political purpose). Committee Rule 18(a) permits the Committee, in the absence of a filed complaint, to consider "any information in its possession indicating that a Member, officer, or employee may have committed a violation of the Code of Official Conduct or any law, rule, regulation, or other standard of conduct . . ." The Chairman and Ranking Minority Member may jointly gather additional information concerning such a potential violation unless and until an investigative subcommittee is established. During the course of their inquiry, the Chairman and Ranking Member asked for and received information, including documents, from several sources, including Representative Conyers. Committee staff also interviewed witnesses regarding the allegations. In the course of providing information to the Committee, Representative Conyers acknowledged what he characterized as a "lack of clarity" in his communications with staff members regarding their official duties and responsibilities, and accepted responsibility for his actions. Representative Conyers also provided the Committee with documents indicating that he had begun taking steps to provide clearer guidance to staff regarding the requirement that campaign work and official work be separate. After reviewing the information gathered during the inquiry, and in light of Representative Conyers' cooperation with the inquiry, we have concluded that this matter should be resolved through the issuance of this public statement and the agreement by Representative Conyers to take a number of additional, significant steps to ensure that his office complies with all rules and standards regarding campaign and personal work by congressional staff. Representative Conyers has agreed to the following conditions:

1. Prohibiting his personal congressional staff (other than his Chief of Staff) from performing any campaign-related work, including work done on a voluntary basis, during the 110th Congress, unless the staff member takes a paid position on his campaign while on leave without pay status and obtains prior written approval from the Committee.

2. Informing staff members in writing of the prohibition set forth above against the voluntary performance of campaign work.

3. Distributing a memorandum to each member of his personal congressional staff which clearly sets forth all House rules concerning (1) the performance of campaign and other non-official work by congressional staff members and (2) the prohibition against the performance of any campaign-related work being conducted in either his congressional or district offices. Additionally, this memorandum will explicitly state that the performance of campaign or other non-official work by staff members may not be required as a condition of their employment.

DOJ_NMG_0111307

4. Directing that meetings of his personal congressional staff be held annually in which the House rules concerning staff participation in campaign activities are discussed and explained. In addition, a description of these rules will be made a part of the orientation for all new staff employees.

5. Continuing to maintain the detailed time-keeping system initiated by Rep. Conyers during the course of the Committee's inquiry.

6. Requiring that all members of his congressionalstaff attend a briefing conducted by Committee counsel on the application of, and compliance with, applicable House rules concerning the performance of campaign and other non-official work by congressional staff members.

Provided that the above requirements are complied with, this matter will remain closed, and the Committee will take no further action on it.

Job Evaluation: George W. Bush (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

IT'S THAT TIME of year, when the drones of corporate America gather their No. 2 pencils and call over to human resources for all the personnel files. The dirty little secret (or maybe it's not so secret) is that managers resent these yearly job performance evaluations as much as employees do. But why let the private sector have all the fun? An election is a kind of evaluation, of course, but what if our elected officials had to fit their year's accomplishments on the same kind of form with which millions of the rest of us are familiar? For President Bush, the results would not be encouraging.

*

Knowledge of job: Below expectations. Despite describing himself as "the decider," employee often abdicated important decisions to others, as in his insistence that he could do nothing about prison conditions at Guantanamo Bay without judicial branch input.

*

Job effectiveness: Below expectations, even his own, and not just in his controversial and poorly planned takeover of despotic foreign operation (also see previous evaluations). Confirmation of favored candidate for a top-level judicial branch appointment was a major achievement. But failed to rally support in legislative branch and among own partisans for positions on which he was in the right, such as his call for comprehensive immigration reform.

*

Critical thinking skills: Meets expectations, which were low. Instead of building bridges to opponents within the legislative branch on foreign policy, he demonized them with this election-year rant: "The Democrat [sic] approach comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses." Failed to dismiss key architect of war until after Republicans were routed in midterm elections.

*

Works well with others: Meets expectations. More successful at staking out common ground with headstrong allies of own party than at seeking out compromise with extra-party rivals who may actually be useful to policy goals. Needlessly provoked Democrats with renomination of partisan flame-thrower to major international body even after it was clear that nominee was unfit for the job. Unclear at the end of this performance period whether he will accept any advice from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

*

Financial management: Exceeds expectations. Federal budget deficit is smaller than expected, though employee's insistence that this is a result of his tax cuts is unpersuasive. Also, after the election, indicated that he was open to fresh talks with Democrats about Social Security.

*

Areas for improvement: New management in legislative branch will require considerable improvement in people skills, especially but not exclusively in identifying a "way forward" in Iraq. To borrow a phrase associated with one of employee's predecessors, present employee needs to adopt a "kinder, gentler" rhetorical style, one that acknowledges past mistakes and doesn't demonize those who think differently.

DOJ_NMG_0111308

Ten Suggestions For Rescuing The Bush Legacy (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

Particularly after all the tributes to Gerald Ford in the last few days, President Bush may be pondering his own legacy and obituary. Sorry, Mr. Bush, but it doesn't look good right now, with your obit perhaps beginning something like this:

"George W. Bush, who achieved tremendous acclaim for his handling of the 9/11 terror attacks but left office vilified and disgraced, mired in the Iraq war and stalemated at home, his hard-line partisan tactics souring the electorate and crippling his beloved Republican Party for a generation, died. ..."

But Mr. Bush, your plight isn't hopeless. In the holiday spirit, let me offer you 10 suggestions for what you can do in 2007 to try to rescue your legacy.

First, seriously engage Iraq's nastier neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and renounce permanent military bases in Iraq. None of that will solve the mess in Iraq. But these steps will suggest that you are belatedly trying to listen and are willing to give diplomacy a chance. They may also help at the margins: renouncing bases is a simple move that has no downside and will make it harder for Iraqi militants to argue that Americans are just out to steal Iraqi oil and grab military bases.

Second, start an intensive effort to bring peace to the Middle East. Work with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia to flesh out his peace proposals. And vigorously back the Geneva Accord approach to an Israeli-Palestinian peace, since everybody knows that is what a final peace deal will look like. Frankly, it seems unlikely that peace is going to break out anytime soon in the Middle East, but there is a huge dividend for America's image if we at least try.

Third, confront the genocide in Darfur. President Bill Clinton has said that the biggest regret of his administration is not responding to the Rwandan genocide, and someday you — and your biographers — will rue your lame response to Darfur. For starters, how about inviting the leaders of Britain, France, China, Egypt and Saudi Arabia to travel with you to Darfur and Chad to see firsthand the women who have been mutilated and raped, the men whose eyes have been gouged out? Follow that up with a no-fly zone, an international force to prop up Chad and the Central African Republic, and a major push for an internal peace among Darfur tribes.

Fourth, encourage Dick Cheney to look pale in public. Then he can resign on health grounds, and you can appoint Condi Rice or Bob Gates to take his place. Mr. Cheney has been the single worst influence on your foreign policy, as well as the most polarizing figure in your administration. There's no better move you could make to signal a new beginning than to accept Mr. Cheney's resignation.

Fifth, revive the theme of compassionate conservatism by extending your excellent five-year AIDS program (while not being so squeamish about condoms in the future). And above all, work with Europe to promote incentives for business investment in Africa, modeled after the African Growth and Opportunity Act program. The best hope to raise Africa's standard of living is to nurture factories manufacturing clothing, shoes and toys for export.

Sixth, address climate change. Nobody expects you to be an Al Gore, but you sully America's image when you run away from any serious attempt to curb carbon emissions.

Seventh, put aside those thoughts of a military strike on Iranian nuclear sites, and make it clear to Israel that we oppose it conducting such an attack. A strike would set back Iran's nuclear programs by only five years or so, but it would consolidate hard-line rule there for at least 25 years.

Eighth, instead of giving up on Social Security, revive the reform proposals that President Clinton urged in 1999. That does mean bringing the budget back into black ink, which will mean phasing out some tax cuts for the wealthy.

Ninth, address our disgraceful inequities in health care. You could push for comprehensive coverage for children up to age 5 (as President Jimmy Carter tried to achieve a generation ago), and for almost zero cost you could mount a public health campaign to tackle obesity in children. Mike Huckabee, the Republican governor of Arkansas, has shown how state governments can fight diabetes and obesity, and you should take his approach nationwide.

Tenth, don't toss this newspaper to the floor and curse the press for your unpopularity. Instead, borrow from your playbook after you lost the New Hampshire primary in 2000 — grit your teeth, retool and steal ideas from your critics and rivals. It worked then, and it just might help in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0111309

A New Year For School Reform (NYT)

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

The No Child Left Behind Act broke new ground when it required the states to educate impoverished children up to the same standards as their affluent counterparts, in exchange for federal aid. The law did not just drop out of the sky. It represented a deliberate attempt by Congress to ratify and accelerate the school reform effort that swept the country in the early 1990's, when the states began to embrace standards-based accountability systems that quickly showed promising results.

The achievement gains have fallen far short of what Congress hoped for when it passed the landmark federal law — and also far short of what the country needs to keep pace with its economic rivals. In addition, student performance has flattened in recent years. In many cases, that is because states that reaped all of the early, easy gains that are typically achieved by merely paying attention to a long-neglected problem failed to do the tougher work necessary to sustain their reforms.

Recent studies offer sobering news about the challenges that lie ahead. Happily, there is also encouraging news from the states that have stayed the course and continued to build rigorous, standards-based reforms.

The value of the standards movement itself was underscored this year in an analysis that was part of Education Week magazine's annual survey of student achievement. Analyzing student performance between 1992 and 2005, the study found clear signs of progress, especially in fourth-grade math performance, which had gone up nearly two grade levels since 1992. Black and Hispanic students, by the way, showed larger gains than their white counterparts over that same period. Had the scores of white students not risen at all, the progress by black and Hispanic students would have substantially erased the white-minority achievement gap.

The news was less heartening in reading performance, which inched up only about two points over the same time period. Even so, Education Week found that reading achievement for black, Hispanic and low-income fourth graders had risen at nearly three times the national average.

Low-income students still lag far behind their affluent counterparts. But the data in a subsequent study by the Fordham Foundation shows that states that commit to rigorous standards and accountability systems can make progress in this difficult area. The bad news is that only eight states even achieved what Fordham described as "moderate progress."

Those states are: Delaware, Florida, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Texas, Washington and California. In California especially, statewide reforms (and, in Los Angeles, dynamic leadership by the former superintendent, Roy Romer) are clearly having an effect. These gains are tentative and will certainly evaporate if the states lose momentum. But they show that performance for low-income students can be nudged upward if states hew to rigorous reforms.

That bad news is that too few states are actually doing that.

With the easy achievement gains already behind us, the next level of progress will require rigorous systemic change. The states, for example, will need to adopt rigorous examinations that track the federal test, the National Assessment of Educational Progress, more closely. They will have to crack down on state teachers colleges that turn out poor graduates, and devise ways — including differential pay — to persuade highly qualified teachers to work in failing schools that they have historically avoided. To move forward, the country must also find new ways to support and transform failing schools, beyond labeling them failures and presuming that the stigma will inspire better performance.

These are difficult issues. But they are the ones that Congress needs to focus on as it moves toward reauthorizing No Child Left Behind.

Playing The Angles (WP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

INCOMING HOUSE Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) pledged to run the "most open" Congress in history. Unfortunately, that promise doesn't seem to extend to letting the American people see what's really happening on the House floor. In a letter released the Friday before Christmas, Ms. Pelosi delivered a lump of coal to C-SPAN, which had asked to be freed from the restrictive rules that -- since House proceedings first were televised in 1979 -- have kept the cameras under control of the House and limited footage to tight shots of the podium or the lawmaker who's speaking. Senate rules are similarly constraining. As C-SPAN's president, Brian Lamb, explained in his letter to Ms. Pelosi asking that the cable network's cameras be permitted in the chamber, "This compromise was crafted long ago to convince wary members to allow congressional sessions to be televised, and in the ensuing years it has become an anachronism that does a disservice to the institution and to the public. . . . Rules and established practices prevent congressional cameras from taking individual reaction shots or from panning the chamber, leaving viewers with an incomplete picture of what's happening in the House of Representatives."

DOJ_NMG_0111310

Through its years of televising floor proceedings, and its sober, unbiased coverage of congressional hearings and other events,

C-SPAN has demonstrated that it is both essential and responsible. There is no reason to prevent its cameras from operating freely in both the House and Senate. Ms. Pelosi, however, disagrees. "I believe that the dignity and decorum of the United States House of Representatives are best preserved by maintaining the current system of televised proceedings," she wrote to Mr. Lamb.

But why shouldn't those who want to see what's going on in the House -- it's the people's House, after all -- be able to have the same view as if they were in the chamber? What's to hide -- lawmakers orating to an empty House, or, to take one example, then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay buttonholing a balky member during the Medicare prescription drug vote in 2003?

C-SPAN may have better luck with another of its requests: to have immediate access to voting records. As Mr. Lamb explained in his letter, the House has had electronic voting for decades, but "official public release of individual votes is still delivered long after a vote has closed" -- often hours later. Ms. Pelosi said she had asked the House clerk to look into a change; it's hard to imagine that this can't be done.

And Now, A Word From Chile... (NYT)

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

Everyone who followed the debate about privatizing Social Security back in 2005 has vivid memories of the Chilean model. Sometimes it seemed impossible to get through any discussion of fixing Social Security without hearing a free-market paean to the way Chile had given its workers control over their own retirement investments, followed by a demand that the United States get on the same boat.

Therefore, it seems worthwhile to note that the Chileans are now bailing water.

The Chilean government recently announced that in 2007 it plans to pursue far-reaching reforms aimed at creating a larger government role in Chileans' old-age security. The reforms are urgently needed. It has been nearly a generation since the regime of Gen. Augusto Pinochet began to supplant Chile's government-supported retirement system with a plan for Chilean workers to save 10 percent of their salaries in private accounts. Today, roughly half of Chile's labor force has either not participated or has not accumulated enough to generate what the government considers a minimum payout of about $140 a month.

The overarching problem for Chile — and the real lesson for the United States — is that private savings are not a substitute for a guaranteed core tier of old-age support. The first measure of success of a retirement system is not how much certain individuals manage to sock away, but whether the system as a whole provides basic dignity for all. By that measure, Chile's privatized system has failed and Social Security has succeeded.

Social Security does need some changes to protect it over the long term. The best solution would involve a combination of modest benefit cuts and modest tax increases, which could be phased in gradually over decades and could guarantee a government benefit that replaces about 30 percent of preretirement income on average, compared with a replacement rate of about 35 percent today.

Getting there would require sacrifices from both political parties. Republicans would have to give up on their privatization efforts. And the Democrats would have to control their knee-jerk tendency to preface any discussion of Social Security with a pledge never to cut anyone's future retirement benefits. President Bush will also have to go further if there is to be any chance of progress while he is still in office. Tax increases must be a part of any plausible Social Security reform mix. Unfortunately, the president appears unalterably opposed even to something as overdue as raising the cap on earnings that are subject to Social Security tax.

DOJ_NMG_0111311

As long as tax increases are off the table, severe benefit cuts become unavoidable. If the gap in Social Security's finances were closed through benefit cuts only, the average worker's payout would equal only about 10 percent of preretirement earnings. Such bare-bones benefits would signal the end of Social Security, as surely as would privatization.

As the debate unfolds anew in 2007, another vital lesson to remember from the Chilean experience is that institutions, once dismantled, are not easily restored.

OTHER NEWS:

A Solemn Homecoming (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

To the strains of a Navy piper's farewell, the clank of sword scabbards and the bang of an artillery salute, Washington welcomed the body of former president Gerald R. Ford last evening.

The ceremonies began four days of services and tributes in the city he left three decades ago.

The journey of the president's body, from its arrival at Andrews Air Force Base about 5:15 p.m. to its installment in the Capitol Rotunda about two hours later, took place in the early evening darkness that was broken by floodlights, streetlights and simple holiday decorations.

It was attended by modest but somber crowds that lined the avenues of Alexandria, where the former president once lived. People also gathered in silence as his hearse, and the limousine bearing his wife, Betty, 88, paused beside the flickering fountains of the World War II Memorial. The cortege of about 40 vehicles then moved slowly along the broad and empty expanse of Constitution Avenue toward the gleaming dome of the Capitol, bright against the night sky. The casket bearing Ford's body was carried up the steps to the grand, columned east entrance of the House of Representatives.

The casket was placed on the same bier as the one used for Abraham Lincoln 141 years ago and Ronald Reagan 2 1/2 years ago.

In the ceremony that followed, Betty Ford looked composed as she sat between Vice President Cheney and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). The service closed with the former first lady bowing her head over her husband's casket, her clasped hands on the flag that covered it. It was Washington's second presidential state funeral in 31 months and different from the more elaborate leave taking accorded Reagan. But there was elegance to last night's proceedings, as the former chieftains of 30 years ago, several using canes, stood by with younger mourners who said they knew little more than that the former president had been an honorable and decent man.

"It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely through a crisis that could have turned to a catastrophe," said Cheney, among those who eulogized Ford at the service. "We do know this: America was spared the worst, and this was the doing of an American president. For all the grief that never came, for all the wounds that were never inflicted, the people of the United States will forever stand in debt to this faithful servant we mourn tonight."

U.S. Rep. Vernon J. Ehlers (R), who represents the Grand Rapids, Mich., district where Ford was a congressman decades ago, teared up as he said, "People are finally starting to realize what he did for this country and how special he was."

President Bush did not attend last night's ceremonies. He and first lady Laura Bush plan to pay respects tomorrow, when they return to Washington from Texas. Bush also plans to speak at Ford's funeral Tuesday at Washington National Cathedral.

Bush, in his weekly radio address yesterday, said: "Gerald Ford distinguished himself as a man of integrity and selfless dedication. He always put the needs of his country before his own, and did what he thought was right, even when those decisions were unpopular. Only years later would Americans come to fully appreciate the foresight and wisdom of this good man."

Ford served 25 years as a Republican congressman from Michigan before he became Richard Nixon's vice president in 1973, succeeding the disgraced Spiro T. Agnew. He became president in 1974 when Nixon resigned in the wake of the Watergate scandal. In one of his early acts as president, he issued a pardon absolving Nixon of any Watergate-related crimes.

He died Tuesday at age 93 at his home in California.

DOJ_NMG_0111312

"In the nation's darkest hour, Gerald Ford lived his finest moment. . . . He knew the road to national healing began with the courage to forgive," said Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), the Senate's president pro tem, who also spoke at the state funeral.

Outside the Capitol, hundreds of people waited to pay their respects. Some waited five hours or longer before getting into the Rotunda late in the night.

They included Becky Reese, 47, and her husband, Ralph, 48, of West Chester, Ohio, who prolonged a stay in Washington to attend the viewing. They were with their sons, Benjamin, 12, and Evan, 9. They planned to drive home as soon as they left the Rotunda last night.

Becky Reese sat on the ground with her back against the metal grates. Her children were huddled against her: "We decided this would be a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity." She said her children saw the services for former president Ronald Reagan on television and said they wanted to be on hand when Ford was honored.

Her husband said that Ford was the first presidential candidate he ever voted for, and he fondly recalled the Ford years as calmer than the presidencies before and after it. "There was just no real big news," he said. "You didn't have Iran. You didn't have Watergate. It was quiet. No news was good news."

As midnight approached, the crowd diminished, but people continued to come.

The day began with private services at Ford's church in California. Then his body was carried aboard an official presidential jumbo jet for the cross-country flight to Andrews Air Force Base.

The plane arrived in darkness, and Ford's flag-covered casket was carried from the aircraft to a black hearse by eight uniformed service members.

Black artillery pieces fired a 21-gun salute, belching smoke that drifted like fog across the tarmac, as a military band played "Hail to the Chief" and "America (My Country 'Tis of Thee)", which had been requested by the family.

Standing by in the evening chill were several dozen honorary pallbearers, including former secretaries of state Henry A. Kissinger and James A. Baker III, former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld, former transportation secretary William T. Coleman Jr. and Cheney, who had once been Ford's chief of staff.

Once the music stopped, the quiet was broken only by a long roll of drums and the shouted orders of the military commanders.

Betty Ford, looking tiny on the arm of white-gloved Army Maj. Gen. Guy C. Swann 3d, watched as the casket was carried by and then took a seat in a limousine, where she could be seen wiping her face with a handkerchief.

The cortege left the air base at 5:53 p.m. and traveled via the Capital Beltway, which was briefly closed, to Alexandria, where the Fords lived when the former chief executive represented his Michigan district in the U.S. House.

Along Washington Street, a crowd of several hundred assembled around the intersection with King Street, and those who went to pay respects were joined by a throng of shoppers. Word spread through the crowd that Ford had once lived in Alexandria.

Sylvia Lukens, a 37-year resident of Alexandria, waited in the cold for about an hour to see the president who had once lived a few blocks from where the motorcade was passing. "I liked that Ford still had affection for this town," Lukens said. "Even when he entered the high echelons of power he stayed here. That says a lot about the man."

As the motorcade drove through, the crowd burst into soft applause. "He had no pretenses, that was what was so refreshing about the man," Lukens said.

The procession then made its way north, crossing Memorial Bridge over the Potomac River and heading for the World War II Memorial.

At the Ford family's request, the cortege paused on floodlit 17th Street before the twin stone arms of the Mall's World War II Memorial plaza.

Ford served as a navigator and gunnery officer on the aircraft carrier USS Monterey at the height of the war in the Pacific, and one of the memorial's 24 metal relief panels depicts a frenetic moment on the deck of a carrier, with a plane about to take off amid hurrying pilots and crew.

As the hearse stopped, Navy Chief Boatswain's Mate Carlos Ribbot, 41, stepped forward, saluted with his right hand and with his left raised a stainless steel boatswain's pipe hanging from an ornately braided rope lanyard around his neck.

DOJ_NMG_0111313

Ribbot, a native of Humacao, Puerto Rico, played the three long, solemn notes that constitute "piping the side," the Navy's traditional farewell.

As Ribbot piped, a group of 12 Eagle Scouts from local Boy Scout troops gave their three-fingered salute as they stood at attention in olive green pants and tan shirts, draped in merit badge sashes. Ford is the only president to have been an Eagle Scout, said Alan F. Lambert, scout executive of the National Capital Area Council.

One of the Scouts was Jeb James, 17, of Arlington County, a member of Troop 664 in Baileys Crossroads. "It's a pretty big honor," James said. "He's the only Eagle Scout to become president. . . . Didn't he fight in World War II, and he saved his boat? He played for Michigan, and was the MVP center for his team."

The cortege moved along Constitution Avenue and just before 7 p.m. wheeled slowly around a corner into the Capitol plaza, which was illuminated by floodlights.

American flags on the front fenders of the hearse barely fluttered in the evening stillness, as the hearse pulled up in front of the broad stone steps leading up to the House chamber. In two lines, flanking the path of the coffin, stood dignitaries and celebrated figures from Ford's past.

After cannon volleyed again in salute, Ford's casket was carried slowly up the steps to the House portico. At 7:43 p.m., with the coffin on the Lincoln bier, in the Rotunda, beneath the dome, the service began.

Ford joins a list of presidents who have lain in state beneath the Rotunda. It includes Reagan, Dwight D. Eisenhower, William H. Taft, Warren G. Harding, William McKinley Jr., James A. Garfield and Herbert Hoover.

Last night, after leaving the Rotunda, Joris Nieuwint, 28, from the Netherlands described the scene as impressive.

"It was very stately -- a huge room with a very big casket with a U.S. flag around it," he said. His wife, Dorien, 26, said people in line had been complaining about the cold while waiting. "Once you got in the room," she said, "everything was forgotten. Everyone was silent and respectful."

Ford's Final Visit To Capitol (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

The nation paid tribute yesterday to Gerald R. Ford's legacy of service -- in the military, in Congress and as the president who helped to heal the country after the Vietnam War and Watergate.

"Tonight we say goodbye to a true gentleman, an exceptional leader and our good friend," Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, said in the Capitol Rotunda, where the former president's body rested in a flag-draped casket. "In our nation's darkest hour, Gerald Ford lived his finest moment. He was the man the hour required."

It was noted repeatedly that Mr. Ford never aspired to be president, but served honorably after the Watergate scandal forced Richard M. Nixon to resign.

"President Ford proved as worthy of that office as any who had ever come before," said Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff. "He assumed power without assuming airs; he knew how to treat people. He answered courtesy with courtesy; he answered discourtesy with courtesy."

Mr. Cheney also addressed the 38th president's decision to pardon Mr. Nixon, which was so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election.

"It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely though a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe," he said. "Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon."

Mr. Ford died Tuesday at age 93.

Yesterday evening, an aircraft from the White House fleet brought Mr. Ford's body to Andrews Air Force Base from services near his adopted California home.

In Washington, hundreds waited along the route the former president's motorcade took on its way to the Capitol -- through Alexandria, where he once lived; to the National World War II Memorial, in honor of his service in the Navy; and past the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0111314

Lights covered the arch at the World War II Memorial dedicated to the Pacific Theater, where Mr. Ford served aboard the USS. Monterrey. As the funeral motorcade paused at the memorial, a bos'n mate stepped forward to play "Piping Ashore," a piercing whistle heard for centuries to welcome officers aboard a ship and now to honor naval service. Mr. Ford's wife, Betty, was seen waving to the crowd from her vehicle.

The pageantry was muted, as Mr. Ford wanted, but the ritual unfolded according to traditions dating back to the mid-1800s.

A motorcade was arranged instead of the horse-drawn caisson familiar to Americans from the funerals of Presidents Ronald Reagan in 2004 and John Kennedy in 1963.

The military flyover that is also traditionally part of a state funeral in Washington will happen instead in Grand Rapids, Mich., where Mr. Ford's body will be entombed Wednesday on a hillside near his presidential museum.

In another departure from tradition, pallbearers placed Mr. Ford's casket outside the House chamber before it was taken to the Rotunda, where his body will lie until Tuesday morning. That honored Mr. Ford's 25 years of service in the House as a congressman from Michigan and minority leader. On Tuesday, Mr. Ford's body will rest briefly outside the Senate chamber, commemorating his service as vice president, which also made him Senate president.

During the Rotunda ceremony, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said the country "needed" the man whose ambitions were said to go no further than the post the Illinois Republican currently holds.

"In 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince," Mr. Hastert said. "We needed a healer, we needed a rock, we needed honesty and candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

The ceremony was interrupted when William Broomfield, 84, a former Michigan congressman who served with Mr. Ford in Congress, collapsed. He was attended by outgoing Sen. Bill Frist, a physician, before being taken out in a wheelchair. Mr. Frist, Tennessee Republican, later indicated that Mr. Broomfield was OK.

After the ceremony, Mrs. Ford walked to the casket with the aid of her son and rested her clasped hands briefly on top of it.

As the crowd followed her out of the Rotunda, the Rev. Barry C. Black, chaplain of the Senate, made one final reference to Mr. Ford's role in healing the nation.

"Accept our gratitude for his courage to decide based upon principles, for his pragmatic leadership during cynical times and for his long life of exemplary service," Mr. Black said.

Earlier yesterday, in Palm Desert, Calif., a 13-hour period of public viewing ended just as the sun rose over the resort community where Mr. Ford and his wife settled nearly 30 years ago. People waited up to three hours to pay their respects at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church.

Barbara Veith, 69, said Mr. Ford's "everyman" persona drew her to the viewing.

"There is something personal about his passing even though we didn't really know him," Miss Veith told the Associated Press. "He just kind of had an everyman quality to him though he was far from it. He was the president."

President Bush, who plans to attend the funeral service on Tuesday, praised Mr. Ford during his weekly radio address.

"In his 2½ years as President, Gerald Ford distinguished himself as a man of integrity and selfless dedication. He always put the needs of his country before his own, and did what he thought was right, even when those decisions were unpopular," Mr. Bush said. "Only years later would Americans come to fully appreciate the foresight and wisdom of this good man."

Cheney Hails Ford's Pardon Of Nixon (AP)

By Calvin Woodward, Jeff Wilson

AP, December 30, 2006

With the thunder of cannon and the whistle of a bos'n pipe, the nation's capital honored Gerald R. Ford's memory Saturday in funeral ceremonies recalling the touchstones of his life, from combat in the Pacific to a career he cherished in Congress to a presidency he did not seek.

Old colleagues, today's leaders and ordinary Americans remembered him as a man called to heal the country from the wounds of Watergate, the scandal that shattered Richard Nixon's presidency in 1974 and brought the even-keeled Ford to the Oval Office.

DOJ_NMG_0111315

Ford's decision to pardon Nixon, so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election, was dealt with squarely in his funeral services by his old chief of staff, Vice President Dick Cheney.

"It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely though a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe," said Cheney, speaking in the Capitol Rotunda where Ford's body rested in a flag-draped casket. "Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon."

Ford, In Final Journey, Returns To Washington (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30 — After a slow journey past the touchstones of his political life, Gerald R. Ford was brought to a place of honor Saturday under the Capitol dome, where a crowd of dignitaries gathered to commemorate the man whose presidency encompassed one of the most tumultuous periods of American history.

Many of Mr. Ford's most prominent protégés came to mourn him, remembering the era of political unity, however brief, he oversaw after the Watergate scandal. Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff and was an honorary pallbearer, said, "Few have ever risen so high with so little guile or calculation."

Representative J. Dennis Hastert, the departing House speaker, recalled that "in the summer of 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince, an aloof aristocrat or a populist firebrand."

"We needed a healer; we needed a rock," Mr. Hastert said. "We needed honesty, candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

Betty Ford, 88, the former first lady, stood silently during prayers for her husband of 58 years, her eyes downcast. Mrs. Ford appeared frail but poised, and at the ceremony's end moved forward and bowed her head, her hands lightly touching her husband's coffin.

President Bush did not cut short his vacation in Crawford for the weekend ceremony. He and his wife, Laura, are scheduled to return Monday to pay their respects as Mr. Ford lies in state in the Capitol, before the formal state funeral at the National Cathedral on Tuesday. In his weekly radio address, which was dedicated to the 38th president, Mr. Bush described him as "a great man who devoted the best years of his long life to public service."

"He always put the needs of his country before his own and did what he thought was right, even when those decisions were unpopular," Mr. Bush said. "Only years later would Americans come to fully appreciate the foresight and wisdom of this good man."

Also missing from Saturday's service was Donald H. Rumsfeld, the recently retired secretary of defense, who had served in that same capacity under Mr. Ford. Although he had been scheduled to be a pallbearer, Mr. Rumsfeld was kept away by a snow storm. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, traveling on an official trip to South America, also did not attend.

The ceremony was briefly interrupted when, after the opening prayers, a retired Michigan congressman collapsed. The congressman, William Broomfield, 84, was treated by medical attendants and by Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the departing majority leader, who is also a physician.

Understated to the end, Mr. Ford had requested a simple motorcade, rather than an elaborate horse-drawn caisson, to carry his remains to the Capitol. He had asked to return one last time, for a relatively simple service, to Congress — "my real home," as he called it when he spotted it below during his flight out of Washington in 1977.

But on a cloudless Saturday night, as military personnel carried his coffin up the Capitol steps, Mr. Ford was given the full pomp of a presidential funeral, only the third such service in three decades. After lying in state for three days, Mr. Ford's remains will be flown to Grand Rapids, Mich., for his burial next week.

Mr. Cheney praised his former boss for his "capacity to forgive" and for being "always a striver — never working an angle, just working." He noted that Mr. Ford had been treated more kindly in hindsight than when he was in office, after he pardoned former President Richard M. Nixon.

DOJ_NMG_0111316

"In politics, it can take a generation or more for a matter to settle, for tempers to cool," Mr. Cheney said. "The distance of time has clarified many things about Gerald Ford. And now death has done its part to reveal this man and the president for what he was."

Democrats and Republicans, many of whom worked alongside Mr. Ford in his decades in Congress, returned to honor a president who served the nation in a time of turmoil. So, too, did several members of the Supreme Court, including Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state and, most recently, a co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, which issued recommendations for a new policy in Iraq, served as an honorary pallbearer. Senators Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska; Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan; and Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, stood in the forefront of the gathering in the Capitol.

The 747 carrying Mr. Ford's coffin from a private service in Palm Desert, Calif., landed just after sunset at Andrews Air Force Base outside Washington. Members of the Ford family filed solemnly down the steps to the tarmac, where they were met by a special honor guard.

Military personnel escorted Mrs. Ford to the waiting crowd of dignitaries. The group watched silently as uniformed soldiers lowered the coffin from the plane.

A 21-gun salute was fired under the klieg lights, and a military band played "My Country 'Tis of Thee." In the crowd were other honorary pallbearers, including Alan Greenspan, the former chairman of the Federal Reserve; Henry A. Kissinger, the former secretary of state; Bob Dole, the former Senate majority leader; and Brent Scowcroft, the former national security adviser.

An image of Mrs. Ford captured her solitary grief: seated alone in the back seat of a limousine, she wiped away a tear, then turned to gaze out the window into the darkness.

The motorcade then pulled away, carrying Mrs. Ford and her family on an emotional tour of the life she and her husband shared in Washington a quarter-century ago.

On an unseasonably warm winter night, people lined the streets of Alexandria, the Virginia suburb where the Fords lived during his 25 years in Congress, to wave to the motorcade. At the World War II Memorial on the National Mall, the procession paused in front of large clusters of veterans and Eagle Scouts — two groups to which Mr. Ford had belonged — as they stood in mourning.

From one end of the Mall to the other, historic monuments were flooded in light, providing a dramatic backdrop for the motorcade's winding journey toward the Capitol. A circle of flags around the Washington Monument flew at half-staff.

Kathy Kocharhook, 52, of Cupertino, Calif., said she and her 25-year-old son had extended their Christmas vacation in Washington to attend the memorial services. Ms. Kocharhook called Mr. Ford a "very decent man who gave a lot of service to the country" and recalled his healing effect on the country after the Watergate scandal and the resignation of Nixon.

"It was almost a sigh of relief that we could begin anew — a second life," she said. "We needed someone with honesty and decency and a sense of honor for the office they were holding, and Gerald Ford was a good man for that."

Nation Honors Ford At Capitol Rotunda (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The nation honored Gerald R. Ford in funeral ceremonies Saturday that recalled the touchstones of his life, from combat in the Pacific to a career he cherished in Congress to a presidency he did not seek. He was remembered as the man called to heal the country from the trauma of Watergate.

Ford's decision to pardon Richard Nixon, so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election, was dealt with squarely in his funeral services by his old chief of staff, Vice President Dick Cheney.

"It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely though a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe," said Cheney, speaking in the Capitol Rotunda, where Ford's body rested. "Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon."

Hundreds of ordinary Americans lined up for a chance to view the closed, flag-draped casket of the 38th president late into the night and through the weekend. From teenagers in sweatshirts to mothers pushing infants in strollers, they flowed into the night in two steady streams along velvet ropes encircling the casket, pausing only for the periodic changing of the military guard standing watch.

DOJ_NMG_0111317

The Washington portion of Ford's state funeral opened with a procession that took his casket from Maryland to Virginia and then over the Memorial Bridge -- dressed in flags and funeral bunting -- to the World War II memorial, past the White House without pausing and on to the U.S. Capitol for the first service and a lying in state that continues until Tuesday morning.Watergate a common theme

Although Ford's family planned the state funeral to emphasize Ford's long service in the House, Watergate quickly set the tone of the proceedings.

"In our nation's darkest hour, Gerald Ford lived his finest moment," Republican Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska told the Rotunda service. "He was the man the hour required."

Said House Speaker Dennis Hastert: "In 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince. We needed a healer, we needed a rock, we needed honesty and candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

The Rotunda ceremony was interrupted when William Broomfield, 84, a former Michigan congressman who served with Ford in Congress, collapsed. He was laid out on the floor of the Rotunda, and attended to by Sen. Bill Frist, a physician, before being taken out on a wheelchair. Frist later indicated Broomfield was OK.

Lights bathed the granite arch of the memorial commemorating the Pacific theater as Ford's nighttime funeral procession, bearing his wife, Betty, and the casket of the 38th president, stopped there in tribute to his years as an ensign and gunnery officer. The other arch, representing the Atlantic theater, stood in darkness.

Mrs. Ford sat stoically in the line of gleaming limousines, clutching a tissue and dabbing her face on occasion, then walked slowly at the Capitol on the arm of her military escort, soon followed by the casket bearing her husband of 58 years. Another round of cannon fire rang out.

After the ceremony, Mrs. Ford walked to the casket with the aid of her son and rested her clasped hands briefly on top of it.

The pageantry was muted, as Ford wanted, but the ritual unfolded with regal touches and according to exacting traditions dating back to the mid-1800s.

In one departure from tradition, pallbearers placed his casket outside the House chamber before it was taken to the Rotunda to lie in state. That honored Ford's years of service in the House as a congressman from Michigan and minority leader.

Similarly, Ford's body will rest briefly outside the Senate chamber on Tuesday, commemorating his service as vice president, which also made him Senate president.Procession tours Washington

On the way to Capitol Hill, World War II veterans and Boy Scouts gathered by the memorial and saluted at the brief, poignant stop. Mrs. Ford waved through the window. A bos'n mate stepped forward to render "Piping Ashore," a piercing whistle heard for centuries to welcome officers aboard a ship and now to honor naval service.

The event, without words, recalled Ford's combat service aboard the aircraft carrier USS Monterey. In December 1944, when a typhoon struck the Third Fleet, Ford led the crew that battled a fire sparked by planes shaken loose in the storm, taking actions that some credited with saving the ship and many lives. He sought no award, and received none.

The Capitol commemorated a man whose highest ambition, never realized in an era of Democratic control of Congress, was to become House speaker.

History intervened; he became vice president when Spiro Agnew resigned in scandal, then president when Nixon left office in disgrace. "A funny thing happened to me on the way to becoming speaker," he once cracked.

In Palm Desert, California, a 13-hour period of public viewing ended just as the sun rose over the resort community where Ford and his wife settled nearly 30 years ago. People waited up to three hours to pay their respects at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church before an aircraft from the White House fleet flew Ford's remains and the funeral party to Washington.

The funeral procession to the Capitol lacked the full trappings, by the design of Ford and his family. A motorcade was arranged instead of the horse-drawn caisson most familiar to Americans from the funerals of Ronald Reagan in 2004 and John Kennedy in 1963.

Ford, a man of modest character whose short presidency lacked the historic drama of Kennedy's and Reagan's, also was mourned without the riderless horse customarily included in the procession.

DOJ_NMG_0111318

The thundering military flyover that is also part of a full-throttle state funeral in Washington will happen instead in Grand Rapids, Michigan, where Ford will be entombed Wednesday on a hillside near his presidential museum. Ford represented the city in the House for 25 years.

Ford died Tuesday at age 93. He became president when Nixon resigned in August 1974 and then was defeated by Jimmy Carter in the 1976 election.Hundreds pay tribute in California

Six days of national mourning began Friday with military honors and a simple family prayer service at St. Margaret's, where the Ford family has worshipped for many years. Mourners ranging from children to the elderly had walked through quickly and then reboarded their buses -- a process taking less than two minutes.

Barbara Veith, 69, said Ford's "everyman" persona drew her to the viewing.

"There is something personal about his passing even though we didn't really know him," Veith said. "He just kind of had an everyman quality to him though he was far from it -- he was the president."

During his weekly radio address on Saturday, President Bush called Ford a "courageous leader, a true gentleman and a loving father and husband."

"He always put the needs of his country before his own, and did what he thought was right, even when those decisions were unpopular," Bush said. "Only years later would Americans come to fully appreciate the foresight and wisdom of this good man."

When they return to Washington from their Texas vacation on Monday, Bush and first lady Laura Bush plan to pay their respects to Ford while he lies in state at the Capitol. On Tuesday, the president will speak at Ford's funeral at Washington National Cathedral before Ford's remains are taken to Grand Rapids.

Thousands Wait For Cortege To Be A Part Of U.S. History (WT)

By Joseph Weber

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

A light fog was settling on the District late yesterday afternoon when Joe Callaghan began his nearly five-hour wait to see the casket of former President Gerald R. Ford lie in state inside the Rotunda of the U.S. Capitol.

"This is U.S. history, and I wanted to be a part of it," said Mr. Callaghan, 47, a Florida resident who was returning from Pennsylvania, where he was visiting family for the holidays. "President Ford was a good man. I'm not of the [Republican Party], but he was a good man."

Mr. Callaghan was one of hundreds who began standing in line long before the public viewing began after 8 p.m., and among the thousands who came to the region to mourn the death of the 38th president.

Mike Cole, 43, of Mansfield, Ohio, also was traveling in the region and changed plans so his family could witness history and pay their respects to Mr. Ford.

"I was a kid during Watergate and when Ford later became president, so I didn't know much about him at that time," said Mr. Cole, standing with his wife and two children at the National World War II Memorial hours before the motorcade arrived. "Now I look back and realize he did a good job. He brought some order to this country."

The Ford family requested the brief ceremony at the memorial, off 17th Street Northwest, to honor the president's service in the Navy during World War II.

Veterans and Boy Scouts saluted as they waited inside the memorial grounds, whose Pacific Theater arch was lighted to honor Mr. Ford's duty aboard the aircraft carrier USS Monterey.

Senior Chief Boatswain Mate Carlos Ribott, a U.S. Navy piper, played "Piping Ashore," a whistle traditionally used to welcome officers aboard ship and now to honor naval service.

The casket arrived at Andrews Air Force Base at about 5:30 p.m., then joined the awaiting motorcade, which traveled along the Capital Beltway, past the Ford family's former home in Alexandria, across the Memorial Bridge, into the District and past the war memorial before reaching the East Steps of the Capitol at about 7:15 p.m.

Mourners applauded the motorcade, trimmed in flags and bunting, throughout the procession. The route was most crowded along the final leg, on Constitution Avenue Northwest, with hundreds sitting on sidewalks and on the steps of such historic U.S. landmarks as the National Archives building and the Smithsonian Institution museums.

DOJ_NMG_0111319

Additional officers from the Metropolitan Police Department, the U.S. Capitol Police and other agencies were on duty yesterday, lining the motorcade route, other city streets and walking the Capitol grounds. However, no arrests or other problems were reported.

"He was my boss. He was the commander in chief," said Maj. Mike Conroy, who was commissioned in the Army in 1975. "He brought Midwestern values and common sense to the presidency at a time when the nation was hurting. I also admired his athleticism, including his football career at the University of Michigan and his low handicap in golf."

Maj. Conroy, 54, stood at the foot of Capitol Hill, along the procession route, where many people used their cell phones and cameras to take pictures of the motorcade of gleaming black limousines.

Among them was Micah Kauffman, 31, a missionary working with orphans in Romania who brought his camera.

"Ford was president when I was boy, the first one I remember," said Mr. Kauffman, a member of the Christian Aid Ministry. "I'm going to take these pictures back to show the children."

Mr. Ford, 93, died Tuesday night at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif. He was honored Friday with prayer services at St. Margaret's Church in Palm Desert, Calif. The casket was flown from California yesterday morning.

The public viewing last night followed a ceremony in the House of Representatives, where Mr. Ford served for 24 years. The casket was then moved to the Rotunda. The public viewing continued until midnight. The viewings resume today and tomorrow from 9 a.m. until 6 p.m. The national funeral service is Tuesday and includes a ceremony at the Washington National Cathedral. Mr. Ford will be buried Wednesday in his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich.

"I want my children to see this," said Mark Remington, 46, of Clifton, who stood along Constitution Avenue with his wife and six children, ages 2 to 12. "I want them to be part of history."

"Good Man, Faithful Servant" Honored (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson, Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a day of somber ceremony, the body of Gerald R. Ford was flown Saturday from Palm Springs to Washington, where the former president was hailed for his role in helping heal the nation in the aftermath of the Watergate scandal.

A black-draped bier of rough pine used in funerals for Abraham Lincoln and other American dignitaries held the coffin of the 38th president, who will lie in state inside the Capitol until Tuesday.

Ford will be transported to Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday morning for a memorial service that will be attended by President Bush. The six days of funeral rites are scheduled to end Wednesday, when Ford will be buried in his boyhood home of Grand Rapids, Mich.

As the focus shifted Saturday from Ford's adopted home in the Coachella Valley to the nation's capital, the former president was fondly saluted by career politicians who, along with family members and longtime friends, attended the evening service in the Capitol Rotunda.

"In 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "We needed a healer. We needed a rock. We needed honesty and candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

At the evening service, speakers repeatedly described Ford as a man of decency who led a traumatized nation away from a divisive political crisis.

"He was not just a nice guy, the next-door neighbor whose luck landed him in the White House," said Vice President Dick Cheney in the main eulogy of the night. Cheney, who served as chief of staff to Ford, said his former boss "led our republic safely through a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe."

"For all the grief that never came, for all the wounds that were never inflicted, the people of the United States will forever stand in debt to the good man and faithful servant we mourn tonight," Cheney said.

The honorary pallbearers included longtime Republicans such as Cheney; James A. Baker III, who served as Ford's undersecretary of Commerce and went on to become secretary of State; Alan Greenspan, a top economic advisor to Ford who later became Federal Reserve chairman; and former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger. Former Defense Secretary Donald H.

DOJ_NMG_0111320

Rumsfeld also was scheduled to be a pallbearer but was unable to reach Washington from New Mexico because of bad weather.

The day's events, which featured patriotic music, military honors and touching moments of family privacy, bore the down-to-earth imprint of Ford, who took part in his own funeral planning and sought to play down some of the majestic trappings of a state funeral.

"He would not want it to be ostentatious," said William Brock, a Republican senator from Tennessee during Ford's presidency.

Before reaching the Capitol, Ford's hearse passed through the suburban neighborhood he lived in as a congressman and vice president, and paused for a moment of respect near the World War II Memorial.

Ford had declined a Washington military flyover and chose a standard hearse rather than a horse-drawn caisson for his trip to the Capitol. Those choices contrasted with those of some earlier presidents, such as Ronald Reagan and Lyndon B. Johnson, both of whom had military flyovers and horses at their state funerals.

In another unusual gesture, Ford had chosen to have his flag-draped coffin rest briefly outside the House chamber, where he served for a quarter-century as a congressman, including more than eight years as Republican leader.

After the stop at the House chamber, military pallbearers hoisted the coffin past onlookers lining the House's amphitheater-like Statuary Hall, past carved likenesses of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson, and carried the casket into the circular heart of the Capitol, the ornate Rotunda that features busts of presidents and explorers, wreathed panels and frescoed scenes of American history.

They then placed it on the 141-year-old bier, known as a catafalque, beneath the soaring Capitol dome.

Ford died Tuesday at age 93. President Nixon appointed him vice president after the resignation of Spiro T. Agnew, and he became an unelected president in 1974 when Nixon resigned during the Watergate scandal. Ford later pardoned Nixon, an act that enraged much of the country and may have doomed his prospects to be elected president.

On Saturday, however, his leadership was applauded. "In our nation's darkest hour, Gerald Ford lived his finest moment," said Republican Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska.

At one point, as a Navy choir began a tribute to Ford, the ceremonies were interrupted when former Rep. William S. Broomfield (R-Mich.) collapsed. Broomfield, who was among the official greeters at the Capitol when the funeral procession arrived, was taken from the chamber. Among those tending to Broomfield was outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a physician.

The condition of the 84-year-old Broomfield, who served in the House for 36 years, was not immediately known, although he was believed to be receiving medical attention Saturday night.

The Rotunda resonated with hymns played by an Army brass ensemble as several hundred dignitaries filled the cavernous hall. The guests included senior Bush administration officials, three justices of the Supreme Court, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and many past and present lawmakers.

After the benediction, Stevens, Hastert and Cheney placed wreaths of white lilies and roses at three points around the coffin, representing the executive branch and the two chambers of Congress in which Ford served. Betty Ford and the four Ford children approached the flag-draped casket; the former first lady placed her folded hands on the coffin for an extended moment before departing.

As the poignant ceremony came to an end, the U.S. Army Brass Quintet performed an old Shaker tune whose title seemed to fit with the theme of Ford's life: "Simple Gifts."

Earlier Saturday, several hundred people lined the perimeter of Palm Springs International Airport to bid goodbye to Ford, who had made the area his home after leaving the White House.

In Palm Springs, members of the Ford family stood, hands over their hearts, while a Marine band played. A 21-gun salute was performed by a Marine regiment out of Twentynine Palms.

Betty Ford, dressed in a black dress and dark sunglasses, was in a wheelchair as she boarded a jetliner from the White House fleet. The aircraft, which when used by President Bush is known as Air Force One, departed at 10:15 a.m.

DOJ_NMG_0111321

Though Ford had sought to avoid an excess of pomp, the day nonetheless brimmed with choreographed ceremony once the former president's body reached Washington at twilight.

As Ford's casket was lowered from the plane, the Air Force Band performed "Hail to the Chief," and a 21-gun salute rang out as dignitaries watched.

Nine pallbearers carried the late president from the aircraft to his hearse, and the 32-vehicle motorcade took him one last time through his old neighborhood of Alexandria, Va. Ford lived there in a time when vice presidents maintained private residences.

The funeral cortege paused along the National Mall at the World War II Memorial, where a granite arch in honor of the Pacific battleground glowed in brilliant light. Ford, a Navy ensign and gunnery officer, saw action aboard the aircraft carrier Monterey. A Navy piper played, and Betty Ford waved to the several hundreds onlookers, including veterans and Eagle Scouts, who had waited for the motorcade to arrive.

Shortly after 7 p.m., the cortege arrived at the Capitol, where a crowd of Washington officials was waiting on a clear, cool night.

Betty Ford, appearing stoical in her grief, stood with a white-gloved military escort as her late husband received another 21-gun salute. A band played "America the Beautiful" as eight military pallbearers carried the coffin up the 45 steps and into the House.

In his weekly radio address Saturday, Bush paid tribute to the former president, describing Ford as a "courageous leader, a true gentleman and a loving father and husband" who "displayed a decency, patriotism and courage that Americans will always admire."

State Funeral Honors Ford (DETN)

By Gordon Trowbridge

Detroit News, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Gerald Ford returned Saturday evening to the House that was his professional home, taking a final trip through the halls of the Congress in which he served for nearly three decades.

The motorcade transporting the deceased 38th president of the United States arrived at the U.S. Capitol's East Steps outside the House Saturday evening, greeted by more than a dozen former congressional colleagues. Already, the procession had moved through Alexandria, Va. -- the Ford family's Washington-area home while he served 13 terms in the House -- and past the World War II Memorial, where the convoy paused to honor his World War II service in the Navy.

But it was the House of Representatives, a beloved institution to Ford, that provided the center stage for Saturday's ceremonies in Washington, part of a three-day mourning period in the nation's capital. The man who turned down chances to run for Michigan governor and the Senate, who said his highest goal in politics was to become Speaker of the House, was carried up the Capitol's steps and through a corridor to the entrance to the House chamber, and paused there for several moments to mark his time as representative of Michigan's 5th Congressional District and his service as the Minority Leader of House Republicans, before moving on to the Capitol's ornate Rotunda.

Ford held a seat in the House from 1948 to 1974 -- when, as a disgraced Richard Nixon resigned the presidency, Ford assumed the nation's highest office in one of the most difficult periods in American political history.

"This is the opportunity for President Ford's colleagues, present and former, to honor him and also to reminisce on the remarkable career he had," said Rep. Vernon Ehlers, R-Grand Rapids, who now holds Ford's old House seat.

"Whenever I meet anybody around here, and they ask where I'm from, I tell them Grand Rapids, and they say, 'Oh, yeah, Jerry Ford's seat.' They still call it Jerry Ford's seat. That tells you something about him."

In a brief ceremony in the Rotunda, congressional leaders and Vice President Cheney eulogized Ford, praising his leadership during the crisis of Watergate and honoring the widow he left behind, former First Lady Betty Ford, who gained nationwide respect for her battles against breast cancer and drug dependency.

"The president was not a hard man to read," said Cheney, Ford's first White House chief of staff, as he turned to Betty Ford. "And nothing was more obvious to the friends than the source of his happiness. That was you."

DOJ_NMG_0111322

House Speaker Dennis Hastert remembered Ford as a midwestern everyman.

"He represented the strength of the middle america that forged him," said Hastert. "He never changed, even when power was thrust upon him."

Top officials greet motorcade

Among the ceremonial greeters for the arrival of the funeral procession: Rep. John Dingell, D-Dearborn, as well as former Michigan congressmen Guy Vander Jagt and William Broomfield. Also in the group were former Democratic House Speaker Tom Foley; former Rep. Lee Hamilton, who co-chaired the Iraq Study group; and current Rep. Charles Rangel of New York and Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi.

A list including an old-lion liberal such as Rangle alongside the conservative Lott is indicative of Ford's consensus-building ways, Ehlers said. "He was always very good at putting together groups with varying ideas, and then proceeding to make his decisions using his best judgments," Ehlers said.

The honorary pall bearers accompanying the casket were a who's who of late 20th Century Washington: Vice President Cheney, who served in the Ford White House, as well as former secretaries of state Henry Kissinger and James Baker, former National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft and former Chairman of the Federal Reserve Alan Greenspan. Former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who also served Ford at the Pentagon, was listed before the ceremony as an honorary pall bearer, but was not among the group escorting the casket up the Capitol steps.

An Air Force 747 jet from the presidential fleet, which had carried Ford's remains from California on Saturday morning, touched down at Andrews Air Force Base, Md., outside Washington, just after sunset.

Ford's history noted

Once in downtown Washington, the procession halted in front of the World War II Memorial on the National Mall, where a group of Boy Scouts -- honoring Ford's status as an Eagle Scout -- and military veterans stood watch. A Navy bosun's mate performed the ceremony of piping Ford aboard -- an honor rendered to dignitaries as they arrive aboard ship. Also on hand were female graduates of the service academies, which opened to women during Ford's presidency.

After the funeral procession's arrival at the Capitol, it moved to the House chamber were it paused, flanked by portraits of founding fathers Thomas Jefferson and John Quincy Adams. From there, Ford's body was to be carried to the Capitol's ornate Rotunda, and placed on a pine catafalque -- a rough platform built to display the casket of President Abraham Lincoln and subsequently used for the 26 men to have lain in state in the Capitol.

In the Rotunda, as former first lady Betty Ford looked on, dignitaries including many members of the congressional leadership, Supreme Court Chief Justice John Roberts, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and members of the city's diplomatic corps attended a memorial service before the chamber was opened for public viewing.

On all minds were the difficult circumstances under which Ford assumed the presidency.

"When he took his oath of office as president, we were a people shaken by disbelief, wracked with cynicism and paralyzed by doubt," said Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who spoke as president pro tem of the Senate. "In our nation's darkest hour, he lived his finest moment. He was the man the hour required."

Throughout the day, as a small army of protocol experts, press aides, police, military personnel and television technicians bustled about the Capitol finishing arrangements for the procession's arrival, tourists and mourners walked the Capitol grounds, many of whom made the trip specifically to honor Ford.

Washington is the second of a three-leg funeral journey that began in California Friday and will end when Ford's body is buried at his presidential museum in Grand Rapids on Wednesday. He will lie in state in the Capitol's ornate Rotunda until Tuesday morning, when he will receive a state funeral at the National Cathedral.

Before the flight to Washington, nearly 20,000 people visited St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., to view the flag-draped mahogany coffin from late Friday afternoon to Saturday morning.

President Bush was not among the mourners in Washington on Saturday; he remained in Crawford, Texas, where he is expected to stay until Monday, when he will join mourners viewing Ford's remains at the Capitol. In his weekly Saturday radio address, Bush praised Ford's World War II service, his 13 terms in the House, and his assumption of the presidency amid the disarray of Watergate.

DOJ_NMG_0111323

"Providence gave us Gerald Ford's steady hand and calm leadership during a time of great division and turmoil," Bush said. "He guided America through a crisis of confidence, and helped our nation mend its wounds by restoring faith in our system of government."

Solemn Tribute For President Ford (NSDY)

By Jonathan Abrams, Michael Muskal

Newsday, December 31, 2006

The body of Gerald R. Ford arrived in Washington this evening as the official mourning for the 38th president shifted from the personal grief that marked the ceremonies in California to the more formal protocol of a state funeral.

Through each step of the obsequies, the ceremonies became more grandiose, the military presence larger and the guest list filled with more political celebrities, many of whom served in the relatively short Ford administration.

The six-day mourning period is less elaborate than that for Ronald Reagan in 2004. There has been no military flyover; gone was the symbolism of the riderless horse marking the passing of a leader.

Instead, there were several simple motorcades with a hearse, emphasizing the modesty of a man who became president through a series of accidents during a politically tempestuous period.

Several thousand people lined the route and greeted the arrival of the flag-draped body at the Capitol where Ford will lie in state in the Rotunda. A 21-gun salute was followed by "Hail to the Chief."

Then eight military pallbearers carried the casket up the east steps of the Capitol, past a double line of servicemen and civilian dignitaries from Ford's past, including honorary pallbearers Henry A. Kissinger, former secretary of State, Brent Scowcroft, former national security advisor, and Alan Greenspan, former head of the Federal Reserve.

Betty Ford, escorted and sometimes leaning on Maj. Gen. Guy Swan III, waited at the top of the 45 stairs. She followed the casket inside the Capitol as it moved through the building to the Rotunda. Along the way, it rested before the door to the House of Representatives where Ford served 25 years. He often said his political goal was to become Speaker, a job he never won.

Despite the New Year's holiday, the funeral drew an A-list crowd of Supreme Court justices, law-makers and religious leaders to the Rotunda. The coffin was placed on the same black catafalque built for Abraham Lincoln.

The Rev. Daniel P. Coughlin, House chaplain, gave the invocation and mentioned civility and reconciliation, themes that marked Ford's administration. Many commentators have noted both traits seem to be in short supply in the current, more rigid era.

The ceremony was briefly interrupted when an elderly man seemed to faint during a performance by the U.S. Navy Sea Chanters Chorus, singing "God Bless America" and the Navy hymn "Eternal Father Strong to Save."

The man, identified as a former congressman from Michigan, was treated by Sen. Bill Frist, a physician and then take by wheelchair outside the Rotunda.

Senate President Pro Tempore Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), and Vice President Dick Cheney, who was Ford's chief of staff, briefly spoke before presenting wreaths that were placed by the coffin.

Retired Rear Adm. Barry C. Black, the Senate chaplain, gave the final benediction, before the family paid its respects. Betty Ford placed her clasped hands on the casket and bowed her head.

Ford will lie in repose Sunday and Monday. On Tuesday the body will be flown to Grand Rapids for burial at the Gerald R. Ford Museum on Wednesday.

Earlier, the plane carrying Ford and his family flew through the growing dusk and touched down at Andrews Air Force Base about 5:15 p.m., or 2:25 p.m. in Los Angeles.

Then in the dark, the family led by widow Betty Ford left the plane, known as Air Force One when the president is on board.

They watched as the flag-draped casket, carried by military pallbearers, brought the body from the plane for the arrival ceremony.

The Air Force Band performed "Hail to the Chief," and a 21-gun salute with 21 individual shots was fired. The second song, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," also known as "America," was chosen by the family.

DOJ_NMG_0111324

Ford's body was greeted by nine of the honorary pallbearers, led by Cheney and Bob Dole, Ford's running-mate in their unsuccessful national campaign in 1976.

The 32-vehicle motorcade then traveled through Alexandria, Va., where the Fords once lived. The motorcade went past the World War II Memorial. There, he was piped ashore, a salute to Gerald Ford's Navy Service.

The ceremonies in Washington were more elaborate than the private simplicity of St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, where the Ford family mourned Friday and today.

Thousands of people filed past the casket in St. Margaret's Episcopal during the night and early morning hours as the public paid its respects following a private ceremony for family and friends on Friday.

Ford died at home in nearby Rancho Mirage on Tuesday. The former congressman from Grand Rapids, Mich., who was appointed vice president and then elevated to the presidency amid the turmoil of the Watergate scandal, was 93.

Like its arrival on Friday, the departure of the coffin from the church at about 9 a.m. was more about simplicity than the ostentatious flourishes that mark the passing of the leader of a nation.

The flag-draped coffin was wheeled by two military pallbearers from the church down the aisle to the waiting hearse. An American flag was carried in front of the coffin; a presidential flag followed.

As it left the church, a military honor guard stood at attention as a Marine band from Twentynine Palms offered presidential honors, playing "Hail to the Chief."

There was a presenting of arms to salute the body, but there was no firing of weapons.

Betty Ford, 88, escorted by Maj. Gen. Swan and accompanied by her children stood nearby.

They entered waiting limousines and followed the hearse, with two small U.S. flags and a small presidential seal to Palm Springs International Airport. There a plane from the presidential fleet waited to take the casket and the family to Washington.

The tone changed by the time the body arrived at the airport. Hundreds of people crowded a grandstand near the airport to watch the brief departure ceremony.

To the sound of cannon firing a 21-gun salute, the body was carried by eight military pallbearers, representing different branches of the service. The notes of "America the Beautiful" played by the Marine band flowed through the air.

A frail-looking Betty Ford watched. She was gently held on one side by a military escort, but she also clutched the hand of her daughter, Susan, for added support. It was a scene repeated later at Andrews Air Force Base and in Washington.

President Bush remained at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, on Saturday. He will return to Washington on Monday.

In his weekly radio address, President Bush again eulogized Ford, calling him a "courageous leader, a true gentleman and a loving father and husband."

"Gerald Ford never lost the spirit that Americans grew to admire so much," Bush said.

President Ford Eulogized In U.S. Capitol As "Healer" (BLOOM)

By Kevin Miller, Jonathan D. Salant

Bloomberg, December 30, 2006

Dec. 30 (Bloomberg) -- President Gerald Ford was praised at his state funeral in the Capitol Rotunda as a man of courtesy and dignity whose qualities served the U.S. well to mend the wounds of the Watergate political scandal and the Vietnam War.

``We needed a healer, we needed a rock," House Speaker Dennis Hastert said in the eulogy in Washington. ``We needed honesty and character and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

Hastert, an Illinois Republican, was joined by Vice President Dick Cheney and Senator Ted Stevens of Alaska, the Senate President Pro Tempore, in offering tributes before Ford's wife, Betty, their family and government officials. The speakers touched on whether the only man to become president without the vote of even a single American did so not by happenstance, but by Providence.

``His path to office was unlikely," Stevens said. ``History will show it was no accident."

The decision to pardon to Richard Nixon, whose resignation in August 1974 propelled Ford into the White House, likely cost Ford an election in his own right two years later, the speakers said. Yet history is showing that Ford made the right call, given that the U.S. was also trying to resolve rifts caused by the Vietnam War, Cheney said.

DOJ_NMG_0111325

``It's far from the worst fate that a man be remembered for his capacity to forgive," Cheney said, standing at a lectern with Nixon's daughter, Tricia Nixon Cox, among those seated behind him. Ford resolved ``a crisis that could have turned into a catastrophe."

Arrival in Washington

Ford's flag-draped casket arrived at Andrews Air Force Base outside Washington from California just after sunset. The casket was loaded into a hearse for a final trip to the nation's capital. En route, the motorcade passed through Alexandria, Virginia, where the Fords lived during his years in Congress, and then paused at the World War II Memorial on the Washington Mall. Ford served in the Navy during the conflict, reaching the rank of lieutenant commander.

At the Capitol, Ford's casket was carried up the steps leading to the House, recognizing his 24 years as a member of that body. Honorary pallbearers included Cheney, former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, former Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill, former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and James Baker and former National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft. All were also members of Ford's administration. Cheney served as Ford's chief of staff.

Sanford Weill

Another honorary pallbearer was former Citigroup Inc. Chairman Sanford Weill, a friend of Ford's who was a donor to the Gerald R. Ford School of Public Policy at the University of Michigan. Ford was a member of Citigroup's board.

The ceremony was briefly interrupted when former Representative William Bloomfield, a Michigan Republican and one of the officials assigned to greet the Ford family at the Capitol, collapsed in the audience and was taken to George Washington University Medical Center.

Ford's body will lie in state through Tuesday in the Capitol Rotunda, the same place where mourners paid tribute to President Ronald Reagan in June 2004, the last state funeral.

On Tuesday, his casket will first be taken to the Senate side of the Capitol to commemorate his tenure as vice president, the official who presides over the Senate. From there, a motorcade will take his remains to the National Cathedral for a memorial service. His body will then be flown for burial to Grand Rapids, Michigan, near his presidential museum.

American flags are being flown at half staff for 30 days.

Died at 93

Ford had lain in repose in Palm Desert, California, since Friday. He died Dec. 26 at age 93, the oldest ever ex-president, eclipsing Reagan, also 93 when he died in 2004.

He represented Michigan in the House from 1949 to 1973, rising to become minority leader. Nixon tapped him as vice president to replace Spiro Agnew, who resigned after facing bribery charges stemming from his tenure as governor of Maryland.

Nixon resigned in August 1974 rather than face impeachment because of his efforts to obstruct an investigation into Democratic Party headquarters at the Watergate complex in Washington. Ford then became the 38th U.S. president, the only occupant of the White House never elected as either president or vice president.

``Our long national nightmare is over," Ford declared as he assumed the office. ``I assume the presidency under extraordinary circumstances. This is an hour of history that troubles our minds and hurts our hearts."

The Nixon Pardon

Ford pardoned Nixon a month after taking office, an act that contributed to his defeat in 1976.

Calling Watergate ``an American tragedy," Ford said in a speech, ``It could go on and on and on, or someone must write the end to it. I have concluded that only I can do that, and if I can, I must."

Twenty-five years later, in 2001, Ford received the John F. Kennedy Profile in Courage Award for pardoning Nixon.

``People have finally started to realize what he did for this country," Representative Vernon Ehlers, a Michigan Republican, said as he waited for Ford's procession to arrive at the Capitol. Ehlers is from Grand Rapids, Michigan, the district Ford represented in Congress.

Election Loss

Before losing the presidency to Democrat Jimmy Carter, Ford fended off a primary challenge from Reagan. Four years later, Reagan was elected president and served two terms. In 1980, as Reagan prepared to accept the Republican presidential nomination, he held unsuccessful talks with Ford about having the former president join the ticket.

DOJ_NMG_0111326

In recent years, Ford was in declining health. He could no longer travel to Washington for the annual Gerald Ford awards for reporting on the presidency and defense. He was hospitalized as late as October. In August, he traveled to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minnesota, for a pacemaker and for stents in his arteries to improve blood flow. He had a stroke while attending the 2000 Republican National Convention in Philadelphia.

``I never heard him utter and unkind word," Cheney said, who like many of the dignitaries in the room worked for Ford during his presidency from 1974-77. ``He answered courtesy with courtesy. He answered discourtesy, with courtesy."

"Everyman" Ford Honored In Rotunda (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

RollCall.com, December 30, 2006

In a ceremony marked by solemn tributes and a bit of momentary chaos, former President Gerald Ford was honored Saturday night in the Capitol Rotunda as a man who restored faith in America's political system.

Senate President Pro Tem Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), outgoing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Vice President Cheney each spoke about Ford, reflecting on how the 38th president was able to reunite a wounded nation following the Watergate scandal and Vietnam War.

"While his path to office was unique, history will know Gerald Ford's presidency was no accident," Stevens said of the only president to never be elected either president or vice president.

He added: "History will know that in our hour of need, our nation sought him."

Ford, 93, died Tuesday at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

Hastert recalled how even as a football player at the University of Michigan, Ford had a "big and solid" presence that reflected upon his solid convictions. Those convictions, Hastert said, gave Ford the ability to lead the United States following years of turmoil.

"He reminded us who we should be, and he helped us to heal," Hastert said.

"He never changed," Hastert later added. "Even when power was thrust upon him, he remained an everyman."

The three speakers also praised former first lady Betty Ford, who sat quietly near his casket.

Betty Ford "literally offered hope to millions of Americans," Stevens said, while Cheney called her the former president's "source of happiness."

The ceremony was briefly interrupted when former Rep. William Broomfield (R-Mich.) collapsed a few feet behind leaders such as Cheney and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Capitol Police, medical personnel and several funeral attendees — including outgoing Senate Majority Leader and heart surgeon Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) — rushed to the 84-year-old's side.

Broomfield was wheeled out of the Rotunda and the ceremony resumed about five minutes later. His condition was not immediately known at press time.

Washington's Republican elite and an eclectic mix of other leaders attended the service, ranging from Chief Justice John Roberts to members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to Washington, D.C., Mayor-elect Adrian Fenty (D), who postponed his inaugural activities to honor the official six-day mourning period of the late president.

As Ford's casket arrived at the Capitol, the blast of cannons boomed outside in a 21-round salute and guests walked into the service. The United States Army Brass Quintet played selections including "America the Beautiful" and "The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

House Chaplain Daniel Coughlin opened the service by reflecting on how Ford's strong convictions and faith helped move the nation into a positive direction.

"Mighty is the hand that could turn a page of history," Coughlin said.

At the conclusion of the service, Cheney escorted Betty Ford was to her late husband's casket. She paused briefly to touch the casket, leaned over it and left.

Cheney also was among the honorary pallbearers for the service. Others included Rumsfeld, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, former Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.) and Alan Greenspan, the former head of the Federal Reserve.

DOJ_NMG_0111327

Cheney, who served as Ford's chief of staff, said that while the decision to pardon former President Richard Nixon likely cost him re-election, it remained the right thing to do, and history will remember Ford for making the right decision.

Ford's body arrived by airplane in the Washington area early Saturday evening after a day of public viewing in Palm Desert, Calif. Upon arrival, the body was taken from Andrews Air Force base to the Capitol, pausing momentarily in front of the World War II Memorial to honor Ford's Navy service.

A number of national figures have lain in state in the Rotunda. Civil rights pioneer Rosa Parks was the most recent person to do so — her flag-draped casket sat in the Rotunda for two days in October 2005. The last president given the honor was former President Ronald Reagan, who laid in state for three days following his death in June 2004.

Visitors may view Ford's casket until midnight Saturday and from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Sunday and Monday. A service at the National Cathedral is scheduled for Tuesday, when Ford's body then will be flown to be buried in Michigan.

The waiting area to view Ford's casket in the Rotunda is at Third Street and Maryland Avenue Southwest.

Cell phones and other electronic devices must be turned off in the Capitol, and no photography or other electronic recording will be allowed, according to an Architect of the Capitol press release.

Public and staff tours also are temporarily on hold, set to resume on Jan. 3. The 110th Congress is scheduled to open the following day.

At The Capitol, VIP Roll Call Has Many No-Shows (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

The military band drilled. Wreaths with white roses hung outside the House and Senate chambers. In the Capitol Rotunda rested the black velvet catafalque that once bore the remains of Abraham Lincoln.

Everything was in place for Gerald R. Ford's state funeral last night -- everything, that is, but the statesmen.

President Bush sent his regrets; he was cutting cedar and riding his bike on his ranch in Texas. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and his deputy, Richard Durbin, couldn't make it, either; they were on a trip to visit Incan ruins. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi took a pass, too -- as did nearly 500 of the 535 members of Congress.

A 6-to-3 majority of the Supreme Court, including Ford's appointee, John Paul Stevens, ruled against attending. All the nation's governors were invited; few, if any, came. Apparently only two Cabinet members -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez -- accepted the invite.

Congressional staffers and Ford family representatives scrambled to find sufficient greeters and honorary pallbearers to join Vice President Cheney and a score of former lawmakers and Ford administration officials. Organizers had to scratch one name they had circulated Friday as a pallbearer: Elford Albin Cederberg, the former Republican congressman from Michigan, died eight months ago.

Waiting in the Capitol crypt -- the holding place for lawmakers attending the rites for Ford -- Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) noted the absence of a quorum. There were only eight congressmen in the room, and a couple of them were watching the Texas-Iowa football game. "What's the score?" one called out.

"Everybody's got to deal with their own schedule," Sensenbrenner, who brought his wife and son to the funeral, said of his absent colleagues. But in his minority view, funerals "are important," he said. "When you're in an official position, it's one of the things that's the right thing to do."

The American people quickly outdid their representatives in respect for the departed president, as several hundred citizens lined up for a late-night public viewing of the casket. But the populace, too, was slow to rally. Capitol police erected barriers to contain thousands, but by mid-afternoon yesterday, only 20 people were in line -- providing a luxurious person-to-portable-toilet ratio of 1:1.

Ford, a onetime college football star, would have understood that New Year's weekend is a difficult time for a funeral. His 6:30 ceremony was tucked in between the 4:30 p.m. Alamo Bowl (Texas vs. Iowa) and the 8 p.m. Chick-Fil-A Bowl (Virginia Tech vs. Georgia). And it was just bad luck that the ceremony would fall on the same day as James Brown's funeral, a Redskins home game and the appearance of photos showing Saddam Hussein in the hangman's noose.

DOJ_NMG_0111328

The modest 38th president -- a "Ford, not a Lincoln" was his famous self-description -- probably would not have fretted about the attendance.

His family, reflecting his wishes, dispensed with the horse-drawn caisson, the military flyover and the round-the-clock viewing that accompanied Reagan's rites here in 2004. And high officials will have a chance to improve on their performance when a second ceremony is held for Ford on Tuesday at Washington National Cathedral. Certainly, though, official Washington could have done better by Ford last night.

Had the majority of America's leaders dragged themselves to the Capitol, they would have developed the inevitable lumps in the throat as they felt the percussive pounding of the cannon battery, heard the gentle strains of "America the Beautiful" and viewed the crisp steps of a military guard carrying the flag-draped casket. But, as it happened, there were only 77 chairs put out for mourners in the vast Rotunda; staffers were invited in to pad the crowd and make the room look less empty.

Bob Dole, Alan Greenspan, Henry Kissinger, Brent Scowcroft and other luminaries from the Ford orbit were there. Chuck Hagel, Bill Frist and Mitch McConnell were among about 10 senators visible in the crowd, and departing Speaker Dennis Hastert and outgoing Senate President Pro Tempore Ted Stevens offered workmanlike eulogies.

Cheney graciously overlooked his old boss's posthumously published view that the Bush administration had made a "big mistake" and should not have gone to war in Iraq. "He answered discourtesy with courtesy," Cheney told the mourners. Former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld, an honorary pallbearer, was a no-show -- reportedly the victim of a delayed flight. And if pallbearer James A. Baker III was in attendance, he proved elusive to the cameras.

Democratic attendance was rather more sparse. The official greeters included Rep. John Dingell, former congressman Lee Hamilton and former speaker Tom Foley. Spied in the crowd were Sens. Chuck Schumer, Carl Levin and Byron Dorgan, and incoming House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer.

Conservatives were quick to condemn Reid and Durbin, who proceeded with four other senators on a trip to South America, knowing they would miss the rites in Washington. "He's the incoming Senate majority leader, for crying out loud, and he can't even show a little bit of respect?" commentator Mike Gallagher demanded on Fox News.

But the disregard was bipartisan. The White House sent out a press release from Crawford, Tex., detailing the logistics of last night's service, then added an asterisk: "Please note that President George W. Bush will not be attending this event." He will pay his respects when he comes back to Washington, then go to the other service on Tuesday. Aides pointed out that this was the same thing Bush did for Reagan's funeral, but Bush had a better excuse that time: He was hosting the G-8 summit of world leaders, not clearing brush on the ranch.

Instead, Bush phoned in a eulogy, using his usual Saturday radio address to proclaim Ford a man of "selfless dedication" and saying, "He always put the needs of his country before his own."

It was a rare trait in official Washington last night.

"No Point In Being Bitter" (WP)

By Bob Woodward, Christine Parthemore

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Upon becoming president in August 1974, Gerald R. Ford faced the task of ending a war -- a war not of his own making. In two wide-ranging interviews with Ford conducted in 2004 and 2005 by The Washington Post's Bob Woodward and Christine Parthemore, the former president revealed the depths of his disillusionment and frustration during the final years and months of the Vietnam War. The interviews, excerpted below, were granted on the condition that they not be made public until Ford's death.

Bob Woodward : [Vietnam] is the big master problem you got handed.

Gerald R. Ford: My approach was, we inherited the problem with the job. It's my obligation on behalf of the country to try and solve the damn thing.

You know, there was a fundamental mistake made back after World War II, when the French had committed to support the Vietnamese. In fact, I went down to Saigon [in 1953]. . . . I wanted to find out why we're going to spend a lot of money in South Vietnam on behalf of the South Vietnamese. I was in Saigon, stayed at the ambassador's residence, and I went over to the French military headquarters, and boy, all these French generals and colonels were dressed up here out in Saigon and telling me how they were gonna win the war against the [North] Vietnamese.

DOJ_NMG_0111329

Well, it sounded good on paper, and they ought to know more than I did. Well, in about six months the French got the hell kicked out of them in Dien Bien Phu. . . . The point is, we were on the wrong side of the locals. We made the same mistake that the French did, except we got deeper and deeper in the war. We could have avoided the whole darn Vietnam War if somebody in the Department of Defense or State had said, "Look here. Do we want to inherit the French mess?"

What do you think about Vietnam in retrospect? Digging very deeply, what was the mistake? I don't know that you ever looked at [Defense Secretary Robert S.] McNamara's book "In Retrospect," but he says we were wrong, terribly wrong.

I know, and that used to bother me, because if we were wrong, why did he participate? I used to sit in the Congress and hear him testify to support the [Lyndon B.] Johnson commitment of 250,000, or whatever it was, U.S. personnel, and he never backed off until he got out.*

* *How do you feel about it now? Ten years later, you were the president of the United States who had to eat that national humiliation.

It was a combination of following the recommendations of top people in the executive branch and the feeling that we got involved in this, we better finish it. So it was not a pleasant decision over that long 10-year period to try and rationalize it. I don't think I ever adequately did.

Did you ever, as president, during that period, particularly April '75 during the evacuation, wake up in the morning and say, "What happened here? How did I get dealt this mess? "

I couldn't help but wonder that, but we had a plan, or at least it was on paper a plan. . . . In retrospect, you wonder how unwise you were. In retrospect, if you could sit there and see in reality, I would hope you would do it differently, but we went along. And we finally had to concede that the South Vietnamese were inadequate to solve the problem.

But if you look at the memos internally in the Johnson administration, '65, '66, '67, they are saying to themselves: The South Vietnamese are corrupt, terrible. We bet on the wrong horse here.

Well, if that's the way they felt, why in the hell didn't they go to the public? They never related that to us.*

* *When [Richard M.] Nixon came in, in '69, and took over as president, took over the war, did you ever have any conversations with him or [Henry] Kissinger about what to do, or how to -- or your old friend [Melvin] Laird, who was defense secretary? . . . Even Nixon was saying we were gonna get out. He always said, "Peace with honor. "

He was obsessed with that phraseology.

What did it mean ?

That we had saved Vietnam from becoming communist. That was his goal, superficially, and that's what he kept emphasizing. And we're preventing the domino theory from taking place in Asia. Well, the domino theory never really materialized. . . . Nixon really believed that, that it won't take place if we stayed firm. . . .

I hope we never live through another era like that in American history. The answers were very evasive. The results were very disillusioning.*

* *What's the big lesson from all of this? What's the big lesson from the broadest history ?

Well, I've often thought about that, Bob, based on my 30 years in government in very difficult times. We have to assume that we are the most powerful nation in the world militarily, and that we have some obligations on behalf of democracies worldwide . But I don't think we can force democracy on people or a nation that aren't prepared for it. But that doesn't mean we should go to war to change their mind. We believe in democracy and we think it's the right policy. We had a standoff with the Soviet Union , but we never went to war with the Soviet Union for other good and sufficient reasons, economic and so forth. That ill-fated system failed. . . .

I'm often asked . . . does the president today have a tougher job than you and [Ronald] Reagan had about our enemies? I said I think Reagan and I and [Jimmy] Carter, we had a relatively simple problem. That sounds kind of silly, but we had one enemy. We knew what their military capabilities were. They knew generally what our capabilities were. And we had a standoff for 40 years. The present situation where you have these renegade governments on a global basis in this part of the world and that part of the world, they're a different kind of enemy. And I don't envy the present president, whoever it might be, having to combat that circumstance.

DOJ_NMG_0111330

What did [Donald H.] Rumsfeld think of Vietnam? Do you recall any input from him ?

Don was never vocal in his support or criticism. . . . Don never got off the track, as far as I remember. He was not a critic . He just followed good, what his boss thought was good policy.*

* *You could have been very bitter about [Vietnam], and you weren't at all.

Well, I'm not a bitter person. . . . There's no point in being bitter about it. Just change the policy.I

tried to justify what happened. I tried to justify what we were doing about it. But I never -- the Vietnam War, in my opinion, should not have been in the '76 campaign. That was an event that took place and it was over. There should not be a place where they said, "You were wrong, you're responsible." We had plenty of other problems that had to be solved. You know, we ended Vietnam and I think reasonably successfully, but we had a terrible economic circumstance. We had high inflation, high interest rates, the economy was sluggish. I tell you, it was a mess.

But no bitterness ?

No, I don't carry grudges.

You said it was the saddest day of your presidency when all the helicopters were --

I did, when they left the embassy in Saigon. Oh, to see those helicopters go out, come back, go out and come back. We saved the lives of not only our U.S. military personnel, our U.S. civilian personnel, but on my personal orders, saved the lives of South Vietnamese who had supported us, contrary to [Defense Secretary] Jim Schlesinger, who wanted to let everybody go to hell.

You saved some lives. You could have saved more if there would have been more time.

That's right.

I think at one point Kissinger said, "If we had another week we could have saved 12,000 more."

Oh, at least I think, . . . Well, if you see pictures of that mob in the area of the embassy, you know there were a lot of people that never made it, and if they didn't make it they probably lost their lives under the North Vietnamese.

Serving As Ford's No. 2, Rockefeller Never Took His Eye Off Top Job (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

Without even trying, Gerald R. Ford more or less stumbled into the presidency in 1974 in the wake of the Watergate scandal. But the man who became his vice president through the same historical quirk not only always wanted the top job, but defined his professional life by it.

Nelson A. Rockefeller made a brief foray into presidential politics in 1960 after barely a year as governor of New York. He began a campaign to run, which he quickly abandoned when Richard M. Nixon surged. Mr. Rockefeller unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination in 1964 and again in 1968. He coveted the vice presidency in 1973, when Spiro T. Agnew resigned. Instead, President Nixon named Mr. Ford.

After 15 years as governor, Mr. Rockefeller resigned later in 1973 to devote more time to his Commission on Critical Choices for Americans, which he created to set goals for the nation and to keep himself in the national limelight for a likely campaign to succeed Mr. Nixon.

Then, another seismic upheaval reshaped the political landscape. Mr. Nixon stepped down, and Mr. Ford recruited Mr. Rockefeller, who gambled on the vice presidency as his last best hope.

Among the prospective vice presidents Mr. Ford rejected was George H. W. Bush. Remembering the telephone call from Mr. Ford that August morning, Mr. Bush said modestly last week: "I went on, and thanks to him, had wonderful assignments in life."

Mr. Bush's later roles in government included as vice president and president. Mr. Rockefeller had to settle for a short-lived, appointive vice presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0111331

His younger brother, Laurance, once recalled a sermon by Harry Emerson Fosdick, whose brother managed John D. Rockefeller's philanthropy. It was titled "Life Is Making the Most of Second Best," and, Laurance said, "I believe life taught Nelson that sermon."

But as vice president, even with Mr. Ford intending to seek a full term in 1976, the 66-year-old Mr. Rockefeller harbored hopes that, somehow, he might finally fulfill his vision of becoming president.

"I'm a politician," he once explained. "That is my profession. Success in politics, real success, means only one thing in America."

Not long after Mr. Ford enlisted him, Mr. Rockefeller was asked whether he had accepted the vice presidency partly as a vehicle to the White House. After persistent questioning, he answered with the exasperation of a harried commuter racing to catch the last train: "What do you think I'm doing here?"

He was confirmed by the Senate, but only after he confronted what he said was the "myth" about his wealth (by today's standards, according to the holdings he disclosed to Congress, he would barely qualify as a billionaire).

"Would my family background somehow limit and blind me, so that I would not be able to see and serve the general good of all Americans?" he asked, then replied: "Poverty, too, can blind a man or a woman. Some never rise above the hungry resentments of early hardships."

The conventional wisdom was that the incandescent Mr. Rockefeller, known for declaring, "I never wanted to be vice president of anything," would quickly outshine Mr. Ford.

But Washington protocol doesn't give even larger-than-life vice presidents much latitude. Moreover, observers said that Mr. Rockefeller's ambitions to dominate domestic policy were sabotaged by Donald H. Rumsfeld, then the White House chief of staff, who recently resigned as President George W. Bush's defense secretary.

James M. Cannon, whom Mr. Rockefeller made executive director of the Domestic Council, said Mr. Rockefeller took the vice president's job "because it was his duty, but it was not a happy experience for him."

"He gave every indication he was not pleased by not being given a more important role."

And with all the political upheaval, one thing never changed. "Every movement needs a villain," said William Rusher, the publisher of National Review. "For the G.O.P. right, Nelson Rockefeller was it."

He failed to placate conservatives, but not for lack of trying. In 1975, he told the National Urban Coalition that as governor he had refused to criticize the Nixon administration's pursuit of the war in Vietnam because he did not want to jeopardize federal aid to New York.

He boasted that "we got the cheats off welfare" and "we cracked down on the dope pushers." In the South, he once favorably likened Mr. Ford to George Wallace, the Alabama governor who would seek the presidency again in 1976. "They are both dedicated Americans who believe in the basic values of this country," he said. "They happen to be of different parties and make slightly different appeals to people."

But within less than a year, Mr. Rockefeller was gone from the Republican ticket as Mr. Ford's running mate.

"He was unhappy — maybe there's a stronger word — that he was dumped from the ticket," Mr. Cannon recalled.

"Ford once said to me, 'I hope Nelson doesn't hold this against me,' " Richard M. Rosenbaum, a Rockefeller confidant and former Republican state chairman of New York, recalled the other day.

Mr. Rockefeller never complained publicly, though, both out of loyalty to Mr. Ford, whom he referred to as "the boss," and because some of his own supporters still harbored a slim hope that if the Republicans won in 1976, he might be rewarded with a cabinet post like secretary of state.

Short of a deadlock for the nomination between Mr. Ford and Ronald Reagan, though, forcing a move to a third alternative, the possibility of success by Nelson Rockefeller's definition appeared to be doomed.

A few days before the Super Tuesday primaries early in 1976, he debated into the night with Mr. Rosenbaum about whether his New York Republican delegation should endorse Mr. Ford. Mr. Rockefeller seemed uncertain, Mr. Rosenbaum recalled, as if he were also weighing the impact on his own political future. Finally, Mr. Rockefeller gave the go-ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0111332

Around that time, he repeated the lament that he made after the 1968 campaign that he had lost his ambition. (Bill Moyers replied at the time: "I believe Rocky when he says he's lost his ambition. I also believe he remembers where he put it.") But, this time, at least in political terms, he seemed to mean it.

"When you think about what went on after he left government service, he did some pretty interesting, some might say bizarre, things," Mr. Rosenbaum said.

He delivered an obscene gesture to protesters as he campaigned for Mr. Ford. In 1979, at age 70, he was found dead of a heart attack late one night in his Manhattan office where he was said to be working on an art book with a young woman on his staff.

Before that, he finally was able to rest his head in the White House, however briefly. On Jan. 19, 1977, his last night as vice president, Mr. Rockefeller, his wife, Happy, and their children were invited by Mr. Ford to stay over.

Moderate? Conservative? With Gerald Ford, Take Your Pick (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

LYNDON JOHNSON in 1973. Richard Nixon in 1994. Ronald Reagan in 2004.

The last three former presidents to die dominated the world stage. They bent history to their will, for better or worse, and became the subjects of a crowded shelf of biographies. For the writers of memorials and obituaries, they were easy.

Not so Gerald R. Ford, who served only 29 months, never won a national election, and was constricted by an overwhelmingly hostile Congress. He is remembered mainly for the pardon of his predecessor, an act that ultimately doomed his bid for re-election.

Yet the public ritual surrounding the death of a former president demands a period of public rumination, and partisans across the political spectrum have been finding substance to admire in Mr. Ford.

There are, of course, the common sentiments that he was a decent, humble, calming leader at a precarious time. But peering back at his modest and often overlooked legacy many have also found elements in concert with their own views, variously honoring him as an icon of moderate Republicanism, a conservative budget hawk, an accidental apostle of Reaganism, a critic of the Iraq war and a proponent of gay rights.

"You can pick and choose," said Richard Norton Smith, the historian and former director of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum. "The Ford presidency is a very good example of how history is argument without end, and the thing is, that we haven't had this argument until recently because we are so mesmerized by Nixon. Historians have always tended to look at the Ford presidency as a kind of coda, the un-expired Nixon term."

For those who never thought highly of him, the change in tone was striking. An online column last week in the left-leaning Nation magazine, which railed against Mr. Ford's pardon of former President Nixon, commended President Bush for being "appropriately respectful" toward Mr. Ford.

The column urged Mr. Bush to heed Mr. Ford's criticism of the Iraq war, made during a 2004 interview with Bob Woodward of The Washington Post reported after the former president's death. "I just don't think we should go hellfire damnation around the globe freeing people, unless it is directly related to our own national security," Mr. Ford was quoted as saying.

In television coverage of his death, the Iraq war comments soon received as much attention as anything he did in office. "He was atrocious at P.R. when he was president, but getting the Woodward interview released after his death was a pretty savvy P.R. move on Ford's part," said Franklin Foer, editor of The New Republic, who added that the magazine did not plan any Ford coverage because of a holiday printing schedule. "I don't exactly consider it the most momentous event in the history of the republic."

The conservative National Review has scorned Mr. Ford for 30 years as the wishy-washy establishment Republican who beat back Mr. Reagan's conservative 1976 primary challenge. Conservatives disdained Mr. Ford for what they considered his too tolerant approach to the Soviet Union and for naming Nelson Rockefeller as his vice president.

But on the National Review's Web site last week several conservatives stretched to admire their former bête noire. Some praised Mr. Ford for at least trying to veto 66 Democratic bills, even though the Democratic majority in Congress usually overrode them. Paul Kengor, a professor at Grove City College in Pennsylvania, credited Mr. Ford with "paving the way for Reagan" by "giving détente a chance, and thus an opportunity to show its true colors." And Lee Edwards, a scholar at the Heritage Foundation, thanked Mr. Ford for nominating Mr. Rockefeller because it infuriated conservatives into forming the New Right.

DOJ_NMG_0111333

"It's like congratulating the Soviets for the Marshall Plan," Richard Brookhiser, a senior editor at the National Review, said in an interview. "In fairness to Ford," he added, looking for praise, "I have never seen him on a list of the worst presidents."

Socially moderate Republicans, in contrast, have embraced President Ford in death as the champion of their vision of the party. "Jerry believed this party was about a right to be left alone," said former Senator Alan Simpson of Wyoming, a friend of Mr. Ford's, arguing that the Republicans' losses in the last election sent a message to return to smaller government and stop emphasizing social issues like abortion restrictions.

After Mr. Ford died, Charles Francis, a friend of President Bush who founded a group to welcome gay voters in the Republican Party, circulated a private letter from Mr. Ford supporting gay rights. Mr. Ford eventually decided to join the group and publicly supported legally recognizing gay unions. The Log Cabin Republicans, a group of gay Republicans, called Mr. Ford "a great man" who will be remembered "for acting as a force for tolerance."

There was a time, shortly after President Bush's election in 2000, when some of his critics murmured that he was bringing back the Ford White House, noting the return of three prominent veterans of the Ford administration: Vice President Dick Cheney, former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and former Treasury Secretary Paul H. O'Neill.

Six years ago, David Frum, a former Bush speech writer, leapt to the president's defense, arguing in The Weekly Standard that the administration's philosophy and personnel drew more heavily from the Reagan White House. "Ford was not a success in office," Mr. Frum wrote, repeating the columnist Nicholas von Hoffman's observation that Ford's destiny was "to vex generations of schoolchildren yet unborn with the question whether it was he or Martin Van Buren who fought the French and Indian War."

In an interview last week, however, Mr. Frum offered a more sympathetic appraisal, describing Mr. Ford as essentially a Reaganite in fiscal matters and noting that he appointed Alan Greenspan to head his Council of Economic Advisers. "It is very hard to be a great president when the opposition party has not only two-thirds of the votes in Congress but is on an ideological binge," Mr. Frum said.

The liberal American Prospect chose to highlight another influential Ford decision — his nomination of John Paul Stevens to the Supreme Court — when it posted an article on its Web site last week that its editor Harold Meyerson wrote last summer. Mr. Meyerson noted that it was Justice Stevens who wrote both the dissent in Bush v. Gore, the case that put Mr. Bush in the White House, and the majority opinion in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, the case that rejected the Bush administration's use of military tribunals or torture to handle military detainees.

"Ford is one lucky former president, that Stevens, in his mid-80s, has emerged as the leading voice and most effective force in defense of the American democratic system," Mr. Meyerson wrote. "Instead of just having a forgettable presidency and bequeathing the nation two of the most dangerous thugs ever to hold high office," he continued, referring to Mr. Cheney and Mr. Rumsfeld, Mr. Ford's legacy "is at least self-negating."

Historians say it is misleading to judge President Ford by any of the standards of contemporary politics since he operated in a very different context, before the rise of supply-side arguments about tax cuts, social issues like abortion or gay rights, or the rise of radical Islamic terrorism. What is now called "moderate" was then called "establishment" in the Republic Party.

Mr. Smith, the former director of the Ford library and now head of the Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library and Museum, said President Ford was an old school limited-government conservative: "He didn't want government in the classroom, he didn't want it in the board room, and he didn't want it in the bedroom."

In some ways, Mr. Brookhiser of the National Review said, the efforts to memorialize the Ford presidency recall the challenges caricaturists once faced drawing his plain, handsome, even-featured face. "He was the hardest president for cartoonists."

When Ford Lost, So Did Dems (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0111334

ONE OF THE funny things about politics is that people often have a very poor sense of which elections are important and which aren't. This fact hit me a few years ago when I was watching a "Saturday Night Live" episode from 1976. Jane Curtin was on as the host of "Weekend Update," and the joke was that SNL's feelings about the upcoming election could be summed up with a photo of Gerald Ford, defaced with horns and a mustache.

I was only 4 years old in 1976. Seeing this sketch more than 20 years after it first aired, what struck me was the overwhelming strangeness of it. Why would anybody work up a hatred of Ford? And when I thought about it further, it seemed to me that Ford's defeat in the 1976 presidential race may have been one of the worst things that ever happened to American liberalism.

Liberals, of course, detested Ford for his pardon of Richard Nixon, and indeed the pardon was a pretty rotten act. In the light of history, however, Ford comes through as a far more innocuous figure. By the standard of his day, he was a conservative. But by the standard of our times, he's a raging moderate.

In Ford's time, to be a conservative meant to be cautious and prudent. Ford opposed deficits, and he vetoed spending hikes and tax cuts alike. His recently released comments criticizing the Iraq war (made in a 2004 interview but embargoed until after his death) show how alien he found the current president's reckless foreign policy. In his post-presidential career, Ford emerged as a critic of the religious right and an advocate of political reforms, both of which placed him far to the left of today's GOP.

It was Ford's narrow loss to Jimmy Carter in 1976 that enabled the subsequent radicalization of the Republican Party. Carter was a mediocre president, and he came into office under terrible conditions — stagflation, an energy crisis, the wake of a losing war — under which no president could have succeeded. His inevitable failure paved the way for Americans to elect Ronald Reagan. And after Reagan, a new orthodoxy took hold in the Republican Party that celebrated deficit-financed tax cuts, ultra-nationalistic foreign policy and a cynical culture war.

If Ford had managed to win in 1976, it would have been Republicans who were saddled with the stagflation mess. And a Democrat probably would have won the presidency in 1980 and presided over the expansion that followed. (Stagflation was solved when the Arab oil embargo collapsed and the Federal Reserve induced a recession that crushed inflation.)

So we can now see that 1976 was a great year to let the other party win. With the passions of Watergate running high, the election seemed really important, but it probably had negative importance: Democrats lost by winning.

The same thing probably happened to Republicans two years ago. The 2004 elections seemed like a vital, titanic clash, one many people regarded as the most important of our lifetime. But imagine if John Kerry had won. He'd have presided over a mediocre economy and a war in Iraq for which conservatives would blame him. (Can anybody doubt they'd be saying that we were winning until Kerry screwed it up?) Democrats never would have taken back the House or the Senate in 2006. We'd be poised for another GOP sweep in 2008, and the Republicans would be far less chastised than they are today.

And the elections that people think don't matter often do. Moderates and liberals widely regarded the 2000 presidential campaign as a snoozer. Apathetic liberals held "shadow conventions" that year to highlight the stultifying timidity of the two major parties. The implicit premise of Ralph Nader's 2000 candidacy was that it was as good a year as any for liberals to make a protest statement and throw the election to a Republican. We now can see that the radicalism of George W. Bush, then half-concealed, along with the rallying effect of Sept. 11 made the 2000 election incredibly consequential.

So the 2000 election that so many people thought didn't matter turned out to be the most important election of our lifetime. And the next presidential election, which many said was the most important election of our lifetime, barely mattered at all, and may even have had negative importance — for the Republicans. I guess I ought to be thankful to Kerry for being such an awful candidate. If only Gerald Ford had been a slightly better politician….

Back In View, A First Lady With Her Own Legacy (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

PALM DESERT, Calif., Dec. 30 — It has been a while since America drew its face close to Betty Ford. But what the nation saw this week here in Southern California — an impossibly tiny face, lips pinched in grief and eyes blinking in the harsh midday sun — served as a poignant reminder of the woman whose reign as first lady, while brief and wholly unexpected, was among the most remarkable in modern history.

DOJ_NMG_0111335

Former President Gerald R. Ford's death on Tuesday at the age of 93 thrust Mrs. Ford back into a public spotlight that she had largely avoided in recent years.

On Friday, with her children and other family members clustered about her, Mrs. Ford watched as her husband's coffin was carried by a military honor guard into St. Margaret's Episcopal Church here for a private prayer service. It was the beginning of six days of national mourning.

Mrs. Ford has taken pains to keep her husband's death as private an affair as possible for a former president — limiting the prayer service here to only the immediate family, followed by a visitation from a small group of invited friends and then a public viewing.

She has spent the last three decades living in a golf community and tending to her treatment center for alcohol and drugs. But her husband's death has served as a catalyst for an American trip back through the 1970s.

Thrown into the role of first lady during a period of deep distrust in government, she fulfilled the role of honest arbiter of American family life and of the modern woman, speaking candidly on just about any subject she was asked about, both shocking and delighting the country.

She was a product and a symbol of the cultural and political times — doing the Bump along the corridors of the White House, donning a mood ring, chatting on her CB radio with the handle First Mama — a housewife who argued passionately for equal rights for women, a mother of four who mused about drugs, abortion and premarital sex aloud and without regret.

Her candor about her battle with breast cancer, which led to unprecedented awareness among American women about detecting the disease, and her later commitment to alcohol and substance abuse treatment, stemming from her own abuse history, set the stage for widespread acknowledgment and advocacy that is commonplace today.

Given her impact on these crucial health issues and her influence over the modern East Wing, Mrs. Ford's effect on American culture may be far wider and more lasting than that of her husband, who served a mere 896 days, much of it spent trying to restore the dignity of the office of the president.

"I think that's true," said Carl Sferrazza Anthony, a presidential family historian and expert on first ladies. "The impact of her influence on the general public extended beyond her tenure in the White House. It was a situation of somebody coming along in history who, in simply being themselves, ends up crystallizing something that the nation at large is feeling."

Born Elizabeth Anne Bloomer in Chicago in 1918 and raised in Grand Rapids, Mich., Mrs. Ford was passionate about dance. Not long after she graduated from high school, she studied with Martha Graham in New York City, becoming a member of the Martha Graham Auxiliary Group. In 1941, back in Grand Rapids, she became a fashion coordinator for a department store and formed her own dance group.

After a brief marriage to a furniture salesman, she met Mr. Ford in 1947 and married him the next year, two weeks before he was elected to his first term in Congress. Together they raised four children: Michael Gerald, John Gardner, Steven Meigs and Susan Elizabeth. Her husband's political career, including eight years as House minority leader, and its attending absences often left her lonely and depressed, and she looked forward to private life.

But instead of becoming the wife of a retired congressman, as she expected, in 1974 she found herself first lady when Mr. Ford was sworn in as the 38th president, after the resignation of Richard M. Nixon.

"I went to their house in Virginia," said Sheila Weidenfeld, who served as Mrs. Ford's press secretary. "She came down in her robe. I think it was such a shock when you find out your husband is president, and the next day you had to have a dinner for King Hussein."

There was no learning curve, Ms. Weidenfeld said, nor preparation. "I remember saying to Betty Ford, 'Well, what would you like me to do?' And she said, 'I don't know, what am I supposed to do?' "

Her role was defined in part less than two months into Mr. Ford's presidency, when she discovered that she had breast cancer and then discussed her mastectomy openly in hopes of giving other women the tools to detect the disease early and treat it courageously. According to a 1987 article in The Journal of the National Archives, Mrs. Ford received 55,800 cards, or "92 cubic feet of material," in response to her openness.

DOJ_NMG_0111336

The next year, Mrs. Ford took it upon herself to champion the Equal Rights Amendment. She personally phoned legislators, held a slide show in the White House for staff members and gave speeches across the country about women's rights.

She talked about her support of abortion rights and mulled the idea that her children might have smoked marijuana.

Perhaps most infamously, she told Morley Safer in a "60 Minutes" interview that she would provide "counsel" to her daughter, Susan, then 18, if Susan were involved in a sexual relationship, or, in Mr. Safer's words, "having an affair."

"Her husband threw a pillow at her, jokingly, and said, 'You just lost me 10,000 votes,' " Ms. Weidenfeld said. "And Donald Rumsfeld said, 'No, 20,000.' Susan asked her later, 'What's an affair?' "

Ms. Weidenfeld said the times called for candor, and Mrs. Ford was able to provide it. "When Ford said this will be an open presidency, we thought, 'O.K., let's let the first lady open up.' "

While Mrs. Ford drew hundreds of angry letters, public opinion ended up on her side, with "Betty's Husband for President" buttons decorating the campaign trail.

"One day we had finished an event on the floor and we were going back upstairs," recalled Maria Downs, her social secretary at the time. "And I said, 'You don't seem yourself,' and she said, 'I'm all right. I would give my life to have Jerry have my poll numbers.' "

Mrs. Ford remained an accessible first lady, even as her days became consumed with details like choosing centerpieces for state dinners. She consulted with her aides while sitting at the edge of the bathtub, dabbing on her makeup; gave a twist to the scarves of staff members to give them a fashionable edge; and chatted about their furniture choices and children.

Her staff was also forced to tiptoe around late appointments and to scramble schedules stemming from Mrs. Ford's addiction to pain killers, which began when she was prescribed medication in 1964 for a pinched nerve. "She had to cancel events or couldn't leave the house sometimes," said Ms. Weidenfeld, who said she once asked the first lady's doctor to "lay off the pills."

In 1978, Mrs. Ford's family intervened in her drug and alcohol abuse, opening a new chapter in her life as a founder of a clinic in California. She described her recovery process in a 1987 book, "Betty: A Glad Awakening."

Until recently, Mrs. Ford, who is 88, continued to be in charge of her center in Rancho Mirage, and she has remained on the board after handing the helm to her daughter in 2005.

She continues to support treatment centers, attend charity events and speak about substance abuse and breast cancer awareness. Most of all, she enjoyed her expansive and close family, and her time with her husband, whom she remained enamored with through 58 years of marriage.

"Gerald Ford's father abused his mother, and she was a very strong woman and he was unthreatened by strong women," Mr. Anthony, the historian, said of the first couple. "You take that kind of a husband and you look at Betty Ford and you see part of what made her an unusual first lady was the context of her marriage."

Mrs. Ford's expressions of personal opinions, which several people who worked in the White House at the time say were never discouraged by the president, "were personally held opinions not suited for a political agenda," Mr. Anthony said.

"Even Eleanor Roosevelt, who did speak her mind, was much more politically savvy in terms of knowing what buttons would be pushed," he said. "Betty Ford inherited that role, and she already knew that it was not right for her to say things she didn't mean. In that act, she shattered a precedent and set up a new paradigm for first ladies."

Would-Be Presidents With Cold Shoulders (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

THE campaign for president will dominate American politics in the coming year, and while Republicans and Democrats will no doubt be talking about very different things, they face a common strategic challenge: How do you deal with the folks back in Washington?

For Republican candidates, the problem is President Bush. They are in a different place from the one they were in just two years ago, when Mr. Bush was riding high and the big question was who, if anyone, would win the Bush mantle. It is hard to imagine, at least today, Republicans squabbling over who gets a moment on a stage with the president.

DOJ_NMG_0111337

The trick for Republican candidates is to distance themselves from Mr. Bush without offending Republican loyalists on guard for anyone showing disrespect to the president, or offending Mr. Bush's own considerable corps of advisers and contributors, any one of whom could prove useful in 2008. Talking about spending is one way to create that distance. Senator John McCain of Arizona, for one, has made a point of criticizing the deficits during Republican rule in Washington.

But will any of them aggressively distance themselves from Mr. Bush's Iraq policy? Could there be a spot in this cycle for an antiwar Republican? And could any echo the chord Barack Obama has struck on the Democratic side by promising an end to the brutal partisanship that has marked the Bush era, and campaign against Mr. Bush, however discreetly, on this ground?

Democrats have a different kind of problem as they try to figure out how closely to be associated with the new Democratic-controlled Congress. Democrats, led by Nancy Pelosi in the House and Harry Reid in the Senate, could take up bills — perhaps on taxes or spending in Iraq — that might not play so well for a presidential candidate.

Alternatively, Congressional Democrats might face a legislative breakdown and accomplish nothing at all — again not the kind of record a Democratic presidential candidate wants to be associated with. Complicating things is the fact that at least four of the prospective Democratic candidates are full-fledged members of Congress: Senators Obama of Illinois, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and John Kerry of Massachusetts.

This Clinton Machine Is a Tighter Ship (LAT)

By Stephen Braun

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has spent much of the last month behind closed doors, putting the final touches on a presidential campaign-in-waiting.

Her hectic schedule has been crammed with private lunches and phone conversations with elected officials and political operatives. She has sounded out Democratic Party officials from New York to Des Moines about her chances and hired a cadre of new campaign aides.

And she has made time for television interviews, re-releases of her books and delicately timed appearances with her high-wattage husband.

It is all part of a political organization that has been under construction since the turbulent Clinton White House years and was bolstered by two successful Senate campaigns. Awaiting only her go-ahead — with a decision expected in January — the machine that Hillary built has the heft and advance billing of an election-year juggernaut.

It is a high-stakes fusion of her political world and her husband's, two camps with markedly different styles and, at times, competing agendas and egos. The test, should she decide to run, will be getting the two cultures to work together.

"Her organization is much different than the old Clinton organization," said New York political consultant Hank Sheinkopf, who worked on President Clinton's 1996 reelection effort. "She has a whole loyal national network of her own. They're all hard, tough people. The trick she'll have is to find a way to blend them in and keep them together."

Bill Clinton ran a loose and leaky ship during his two White House terms, and many in his old brain trust who are expected to return to the fold for a Hillary Clinton presidential campaign now have careers to tend and outside interests to promote.

By contrast, "Hillaryland" is a disciplined structure of her own design, a tight-knit realm populated by discreet, fiercely devoted aides who have been with the former first lady since her East Wing days, along with newer additions who serve on her Senate staff. Some wonder if her circle is too buffered.

"The danger she faces," one longtime Clinton intimate said, "is the problem of insularity. You saw that at times in the Clinton White House. She tends to filter a lot through her most trusted people. That's an advantage when things are going well. But you can get closed off when things are falling apart."

Her machine would nonetheless be tested early. Recent polls in New Hampshire and Iowa show Clinton would have stiff competition from two potential Democratic rivals, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former vice presidential candidate John Edwards.

"The challenge she'll have in the primaries is building something that's lean and supple, an operation that can turn on a dime," said Democratic pollster Geoffrey D. Garin.

DOJ_NMG_0111338

Clinton's closest aide is, of course, her husband — "the best strategist of his generation," Sheinkopf says. But their dynamic would make for a unique campaign with its own risks and opportunities.

The former president will have to restrain the urge to grab the spotlight. "It's her campaign, not his," Sheinkopf said.

During recent appearances together, intimates say, the former president has had to work to rein in his impulse to play to the crowd. "You can see him champing at the bit," one said.

Hillary Clinton has warmed on the stump, but party leaders still worry that Bill Clinton's mastery of the stage muffles her presence by comparison. And a recent spate of news accounts of the Clintons' marriage and reversed political roles have dredged up unwelcome memories of the Monica S. Lewinsky affair and the impeachment crisis.

In her Senate run this year, the Clintons often deployed separately across New York, operating like complementary vaudeville troupers. While the senator concentrated on working-class communities upstate, pushing economic hardship issues to win over independents and suburban Republicans, the former president secured the Democratic base in New York, hobnobbing with East Side donors and barnstorming in Harlem and elsewhere in Manhattan. She easily won reelection, taking 67% of the vote.

Most Clinton loyalists insist the couple would be a magnetic duo. "He's the best campaign weapon any Democrat can have — and that includes his wife, who's superb in her own right," said John Catsimatidis, an influential New York supermarket chain owner who is a longtime Clinton donor.

After her husband, the senator depends most on her core staff. These aides dubbed their close-knit enclave Hillaryland after whimsical signs that sprouted inside the Little Rock transition office in 1992 to identify the camps working for Clinton, Vice President Al Gore and their spouses (the others were Clintonville, Goreville and Tipper Town). The self-mocking tag remained after the first lady's protectors circled the wagons during Whitewater, Travelgate and the impeachment.

Patti Solis Doyle, a Hillaryland stalwart who was Hillary Clinton's first hire as scheduler in 1992, is expected to be tapped as campaign manager. Doyle, 41, had key roles in both Senate campaigns, and most recently headed up Hillpac, the well-oiled fundraising arm that drummed up more than $50 million in donations for 2006.

Doyle has long been considered the senator's most reliable aide and confidant. She is among the few, one Hillarylander said, "who can talk tough to Hillary and get away with it." A selfless wunderkind from Chicago's hard-boiled political terrain who shuns publicity, Doyle won Clinton's lasting admiration by helping rejuvenate her flagging first election effort in 2000.

"Patti's there because she has the best working knowledge of Mrs. Clinton's history, her needs and her desires," said G. Neel Lattimore, a Children's Defense Fund communications strategist who was the first lady's press secretary. "She can get people in a room who are warring with each other to calm down and make the tough decisions."

Those skills might prove critical in blunting the sharp elbows sometimes thrown by the senator's troika of senior political strategists. Mark J. Penn, Mandy Grunwald and Harold M. Ickes all had integral stints during the Clinton administration and have since worked at close quarters in both of Hillary Clinton's Senate triumphs.

Directing overall strategy would fall to Penn, the centrist pollster who was a key player in Bill Clinton' 1996 reelection and now works as chief executive of the Burson-Marsteller public relations firm. Advertising decisions would be handled by Grunwald, who had a pivotal role shaping ads in Bill Clinton's first presidential run. Ickes, the acerbic son of Franklin Roosevelt's Interior secretary and a Clinton White House deputy chief of staff, would probably oversee the campaign's budget and relations with party officials and affiliated "527" committees, groups that can spend money on behalf of candidates or issues but cannot give it to their campaigns. Ickes also would delve into voter profiling, an interest he developed while running Catalist, a private database targeting firm.

Communications strategy in Clinton's Senate campaigns has been overseen by Howard Wolfson, a New York public relations veteran who is already handling campaign-related media for Clinton.

During Hillary Clinton's campaigns, these four aides have dominated a daily 7:30 a.m. conference call in which her political strategy was hammered out and her daily message crafted. "It's not for the faint of heart," one participant said. "Some of these guys hate each other's guts. But the principal finds it useful as long as it doesn't get too vicious."

There are dangers to blood-letting. Chaos within the presidential campaigns of Al Gore and Sen. John F. Kerry toppled campaign managers and left internal scars.

DOJ_NMG_0111339

"That won't happen with Patti because Hillary depends on her too much," one former trusted campaign aide said. "If there are casualties, they'd be lower down the food chain."

A slew of other Clinton familiars are expected to help out. High-profile Democratic consultant James Carville, who lauded the "power of Hillary" in a widely circulated article he and Penn wrote earlier this year, is expected to provide strategic advice. Howard G. Paster, who was Bill Clinton's chief congressional lobbyist and works with Penn as chairman of Burson-Marsteller's executive board, is said to be primed for a senior advisory role. Former Democratic National Committee chief and Clinton friend Terry McAuliffe is slated to line up top donors along with a new hire, campaign finance director Jonathan Mantz, a Democratic Party financial expert.

Hillary Clinton's heavy spending in the 2006 campaign — too heavy, some said — left her with a less-than-bountiful $14 million in the bank. But Ann Lewis, communications director for Hillpac, noted that more than $11 million of the $37 million outlay was used to build a massive national database — essential to mining millions more in small donations and profiling likely volunteers.

"The money we spent was well worth it," Lewis said.

Catsimatidis said he and other big donors on both coasts were already being approached to replenish the coffers. In New York, the effort revolves around venture capitalist Alan J. Patricof, Sen. Clinton's campaign chair and a longtime fundraiser for the couple. In California, key money players will probably be Susie Tompkins Buell, co-founder of the Esprit clothing company, billionaire Ron Burkle and entertainment chief Haim Saban, who recently hosted the Clintons at an annual Mideast policy forum he sponsors in Washington.

"She can raise whatever she needs," said Maurice Carroll, director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute.

For policy advice, Clinton would turn to John Podesta, who was her husband's White House chief of staff and now heads the Center for American Progress, a progressive think tank with strong connections to his former employers. "I talk to her from time to time on policy and issues," Podesta said. "There's no formal structure at this point."

Despite the center's "nonaligned" status, Sen. Clinton played a "formative" role in discussions that led to its creation, Podesta acknowledged recently.

New hires from Democratic party ranks also have been brought in, depriving rivals of some of the party's top talent. Phil Singer, communications director for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, would run Clinton's war room. Blogging whiz and former Kerry Internet aide Peter Daou would tackle Web-based opposition research. Karen Hicks, who was Howard Dean's New Hampshire primary field director, is set to run Clinton's early primaries. Burns Strider, who spearheaded religious outreach for the House Democratic caucus, has been hired to tap into the evangelical Christian movement.

Along with the professionals, Clinton aides expect a groundswell of women — political operatives, donors, volunteers — would flock to Hillary Clinton because she is a female presidential candidate.

"She wants people who work for her to want to be there out of a sense of mission, not just simply as professionals," said Lorraine Voles, Clinton's Senate communications director.

The mission, Voles said, "would be electing the first woman president. It's not the only thing that brings people in the door, but it's what would be on everyone's minds over the long run."

"That is," Voles added, "assuming she runs."

Schwarzenegger Looks Beyond California As Second Term Begins (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci

San Francisco Chronicle, December 31, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger -- whose eclectic resume as a bodybuilder, movie star and successful politician suggests a never-ending pursuit of the new challenge -- is preparing for the next one.

As he starts his second term, the Republican governor is intent on taking his message of bipartisan cooperation to the rest of the country as part of an ambitious effort aimed at shaping politics on both sides of the aisle.

Schwarzenegger wants to press Republicans and Democrats for more "action, action, action" -- with particular attention to appealing to the growing ranks of decline-to-state and independent voters increasingly turned off by partisan politics.

DOJ_NMG_0111340

For the California governor, the issues open to bipartisan solutions are as diverse as redistricting, health care and prison reform. But Schwarzenegger doesn't intend to stay within state boundaries as he addresses such matters, planning to make his case in states that will play center stage in presidential politics -- New Hampshire, Ohio and Iowa among them.

"He's always looking to build something: his body, his movie career, his business. And now he's looking to build on being the governor of California," said Karen Hanretty, a former state Republican Party spokeswoman and now a consultant and television commentator.

With an overwhelming victory last November that gave the GOP a bright spot in an otherwise dismal year across the nation, the governor may now be aiming to "supersize Arnold," Hanretty said -- trying "to elevate himself to the next level -- or maybe it's a question of elevating the stature of California."

No wonder Schwarzenegger, even as he was hobbled by a leg broken in a skiing accident, announced last week a "research and innovation initiative" to boost the economy in biotech, nanotech and "clean tech" areas.

Such moves, insiders said, keep California on the leading edge both politically and economically, and may help moderate the GOP's rigid conservatism demonstrated during the Bush presidency and the Republican control of Congress.

Schwarzenegger communications director Adam Mendelsohn said the governor's focus remains his home state.

"The governor is very passionate about public service and passionate about California," Mendelsohn said. "And nothing inspires the governor more than bringing the ideas of California to the forefront."

The governor, who formally begins his second term Friday, will shape his ambitious calender in 2007 with the same inner circle of advisers who handled his re-election campaign, including campaign manager Steve Schmidt and Matt David, who ran his campaign "war room," as well as Democratic chief of staff Susan Kennedy and Mendelsohn.

The question being asked by political observers watching the governor's attempt to expand his political profile: What's in it for him?

Schwarzenegger, in the past, has explained his political drives as a direct result of personal growth.

"In the beginning I was selfish: It was all about -- how do I build Arnold? How can I win the most Mr. Universe and Mr. Olympic contests? How can I get into the movies and get into business? I was thinking about myself," he once said. "As I grew up, got older, maybe wiser, I think your life is judged not by how much you have taken but by how much you give back."

But some skeptical Democrats say Schwarzenegger's motivation is about political ambition, noting he has hinted at a run for U.S. Senate in the future.

"I think it's about him; I don't think it's about his party," said Garry South, a former senior adviser to Schwarzenegger's predecessor, Democratic Gov. Gray Davis. "I have never gotten a sense Arnold stays up worrying about the future of the GOP."

Democratic strategist Chris Lehane, a former White House spokesman, said, "Arnold is always concerned, first and foremost, with the Arnold brand, and that is reinforced and amplified by exporting 'Arnoldism.'

"He tapped into something with the lesson from 2006: The American public recognizes that there are enormous issues facing the country and that (voters) reject the George W. Bush philosophy -- that one should govern to the base, by the base and for the base," Lehane said.

The challenge for the governor in trying to spread the gospel of "Arnoldism," Lehane said, is that "the Republican Party, no matter how you slice it, is still governed by its base. The Republican primary doesn't give you a ticket to play unless conservatives punch it first."

But Hanretty said the California governor has shown an uncanny knack for political timing.

Schwarzenegger's moves come during a noticeable "vacuum of leadership in the GOP."

"President Bush does not command respect from Republicans -- whether we're talking about grassroots or establishment Republicans," she said. With the party fresh from a midterm drubbing, "none of the Republican leadership is even very well known."

Clearly, "there is an opportunity right now for a Republican to stand out (on the national stage) ... because, who else is there?" she said.

But Bill Whalen, Hoover Institution research fellow, said the California governor is a unique political actor.

DOJ_NMG_0111341

"Arnold bipartisanship works in California because Arnold works for Arnold," Whalen said. "He's not necessarily working for anyone."

Still, political insiders on both sides of the aisle have speculated that the governor's "big picture" approach means that he will have more influence as the 2008 presidential race begins in earnest; that means he could act either as an endorser or an active campaigner who could help swing delegate-rich California.

But South scoffs at that idea.

"Look how powerful his own coattails were in 2006," when -- even as a landslide winner -- Democrats dominated statewide offices and didn't lose a legislative seat. And Schwarzenegger, who actively campaigned for some Assembly Republicans in 2004, was also unable to convince voters to follow his recommendations.

The lesson, South said: "Arnold's star power is not transferable to anybody. It is unique to himself. He has no coattails."

So on the national races, "he can have influence -- but the notion that he can power a GOP presidential candidate is silly," he said.

Mendelsohn, the governor's communications director, insisted his boss' plan for action in 2007 is simple.

"The governor believes that the more we do here in California, the more influence we'll have abroad."

Job Evaluation: Arnold Schwarzenegger (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

GOV. ARNOLD Schwarzenegger's year began with an apology and ended with a victory. In other words, it got better as it went along. His performance evaluation reflects his progress in several important areas.

Knowledge of job: Meets expectations. Employee was recently rehired to four-year term and appears to have settled into job. Has become more comfortable with company culture and the bounds of his authority following a shaky start. Has also come to develop a much better knowledge of the organization's goals, has embraced them as his own and has begun to lead.

Job effectiveness: Exceeds expectations. With colleagues in other branches of organization, produced landmark legislation to reduce greenhouse gases, placed on ballot and persuaded voters to approve unprecedented infrastructure bond measures, brokered low-cost prescription drug plan, opened debate on housing and healthcare issues.

Critical thinking skills: Exceeds expectations. Perceives political problems, navigates them to achieve policy objectives. Previous position involved rote learning and heavily rehearsed behavior; employee's ability to improvise and respond to conditions is a welcome surprise.

Works well with others: Exceeds expectations. Employee was hired after severely criticizing performance of predecessor in position and colleagues-to-be, but he abandoned adversarial approach and developed close working relationships with other branch leaders to produce substantive programs. Rapport with Democratic Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez has become exemplar for those holding his position. Has developed strategic dialogue with private enterprise, labor and other experts to solve some of organization's deepest problems. Has demonstrated outstanding teamwork and consensus-building skills. Exhibits little of the egocentricity for which he was known in previous positions.

Financial management: Below expectations. Produced competent budget. Failed to reduce structural budget deficit of over $5 billion. Persists in troublesome campaign finance practices, such as raising money from donors while bills affecting their interests await his signature or veto.

Areas for improvement: Must work harder to effect many of the financial controls for which he was first hired. Employee has committed to solving state's healthcare, prisons, budget deficit, redistricting and immigration problems — tasks that should be expected to keep him occupied through the first fiscal quarter.

Different Climate, Different Pawlenty (MINNST)

By Patricia Lopez

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 31, 2006

After a brush with political death, a reinvigorated Gov. Tim Pawlenty begins his second term this week facing huge DFL majorities in the Legislature and acknowledging that compromise is no longer optional.

DOJ_NMG_0111342

Promising a change in agenda and tactics for the legislative session, which will convene Wednesday, Pawlenty has already advocated universal health coverage for Minnesotans, proposed free college tuition for the state's top students, and thrown his weight behind expansions of mass transit and greater reliance on renewable fuels.

But he hasn't turned into Democratic-lite, Pawlenty added quickly in a recent interview. He remains committed to fiscal conservatism and wants to tie taxpayer money to results, shifting government from what he calls a "seniority culture to a performance culture."

But Pawlenty is pragmatic about the seismic shift November's election brought to the political landscape and the direction of his own party.

"There has to be a reconciliation of their perspective and my perspective," he said of the newly powerful DFL.

At 46, Pawlenty remains boyish, genial, optimistic. But he's less brash, less combative and just a tad grayer than he was in 2003. Back then, backed by a strong Republican House, he all but dared DFLers to cross him and bragged of getting "everything we wanted."

Four years' experience with budget crises, legislative gridlock, a state government shutdown and his near-loss in November have tempered Pawlenty's judgment and the sometimes wise-cracking style.

Confronted with nearly veto-proof DFL dominance in both legislative chambers, he is open about changing course and style. Dismissing opposing ideas as "profoundly stupid," as he once did, is out.

"Everybody grows and matures," Pawlenty said, relaxing in a wingback chair as dusk eased over his corner office at the Capitol. "I'm in a different place, a different stage of my life."

What's emerging is a conservative populist streak, an impatience with old-line, shrink-government Republican dogma.

Government has to be smarter, stronger, more daring about taking on entrenched interests -- including business interests -- to effect change, Pawlenty said.

Changing the brand

Charlie Weaver, Pawlenty's close friend, former chief of staff and now head of the Minnesota Business Partnership, said this kind of thinking isn't new for Pawlenty.

"He's never been as conservative as people have portrayed him," Weaver said. When Pawlenty was struggling to resolve a $4.5 billion projected deficit, Weaver said, "he'd say, 'I can't wait until the day when we dig ourselves out and we can do stuff.' The things he's talking about now reflect the kind of thinking he's noodled for years, how government can be better, smarter."

The public has tired, Pawlenty said, of a Republican message that says government is always the problem, never the solution.

"You can't just say 'no' to everything," he said. "Republicans have to have a positive vision for how you're going to improve schools, deal with the health care crisis, for how we're going to move energy policy. The challenge now is to figure out what is the Republican message that is empowering, that's populist, that's people-oriented."

Such talk leaves true conservative believers such as David Strom, head of the Minnesota Taxpayers League, feeling angry and betrayed.

Pawlenty has become, Strom said, "a Republican who's very bad for the brand. He's mushed it up. He's for all good things, whatever you think a good thing is. He's a triangulator who's positioning himself for VP."

That's VP as in vice president. Having survived the Democratic sweep of 2006, Pawlenty is back on pundits' short list of possible nationwide candidates, even though he demurs whenever the subject comes up, insisting that he intends to serve out his term. But his close alignment with Sen. John McCain, a top presidential contender, is unmistakable.

An unusual Republican

Larry Jacobs, head of the Center for the Study of Governance and Policy at the Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Minnesota, has dubbed Pawlenty's thinking "progressive Republicanism," and said it could prove a winner.

"He'll still be spending consistently less than what Democrats want, tapping the brakes," Jacobs said. "But he also sees some pretty serious flaws in the private market: pharmaceuticals, the oil industry, HMOs. That's a huge departure from Republican orthodoxy."

DOJ_NMG_0111343

National political observer Norm Ornstein calls Pawlenty "a very unusual kind of Republican." But, he said, "there's a hunger for a different type of Republican right now."

A South St. Paul boy with blue-collar, meatpacking, truckdriving family roots, Pawlenty said that regular visits to his old hometown have convinced him that government needs to be more aggressive, not less.

Freed from a no-new-taxes pledge that defined his first term, Pawlenty enters his fifth legislative session as governor with a $2 billion projected surplus and a more finely honed set of goals.

Known for bouncing out ideas one after another, he said he'll confine his energies to just a few big ideas this time: serious changes in education, health care and renewable fuels.

The ideal? Teachers would get paid for performance, not years on the job. Health care providers would get paid for results, not procedures. Government would break the oil industry's stranglehold on innovation and make renewable fuels a priority. A statewide smoking ban would pass.

"My critics say, 'Let the market work, Pawlenty. You shouldn't be getting involved,' " he said. "Oh, really? Has anybody reviewed the federal tax code for the tax breaks we give to oil companies? Are we doing a true private market now? The answer is no."

Similarly, he said, government must "get in and drive" health care reform. Details will come out in his proposed budget, scheduled for Jan. 23. Included, he said, will be tax relief but no tax rebate checks.

Obliged by law to submit a tax rebate proposal for the projected surplus, Pawlenty said he nevertheless will make clear that "my preference is for tax relief, not a rebate."

DFLers are skeptical, but are willing to give Pawlenty pragmatism the benefit of the doubt.

"For now I'm going to take the governor at his word," said Senate Majority Leader Larry Pogemiller, DFL-Minneapolis. As former Senate tax chairman, Pogemiller has sat across the table from Pawlenty in budget negotiations for years, going back to Pawlenty's days as House majority leader. He remembers well Pawlenty's earlier posture as a budget hawk.

"How he'll do all this without spending more money is a good question, but we want to work with him," Pogemiller said. "We're waiting for the details."

Most Americans Say Life Is Good -- At Home (WT/AP)

By Nancy Benac

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

The news from Iraq and national headlines may be grim, but in Greenville, N.C., John Given has a new baby and his first home. Life is good.

So, too, for Sandra Trowbridge in tiny Magnet Cove, Ark. The situation in Iraq makes her feel pessimistic about the state of the nation, but at home, at least, all is well. Even if nothing special has happened to her family, she says, "we still love each other," and that's enough.

And so it goes for most Americans. An Associated Press-AOL News poll finds that while most Americans said 2006 was a bad year for the country, three-fourths thought it had been a good one for them and their families.

"In a time of war, so little has been asked of us as citizens," said Mr. Given, who teaches ancient Greek at East Carolina University. "We haven't had to sacrifice anything. We've been allowed to live our lives very, very well."

Looking ahead, optimism reigns.

Seventy-two percent of Americans feel good about what 2007 will bring for the country, and an even larger 89 percent are optimistic about the new year for themselves and their families, according to the poll.

That fits with a long-term trend suggesting that Americans are generally an optimistic lot. Polling over recent decades is replete with optimism, and with a tendency for people to feel more positively about their own situations than that of the country overall.

Self-proclaimed optimists and pessimists think they understand why.

Krista Grueninger, communications director for Optimists International, a volunteer service organization based in St. Louis, says it's easier for people to be optimistic about their situation "because they feel they have more control over their own lives."

DOJ_NMG_0111344

"It kind of goes along with the American dream: If you really want something, you can go out and get it," she said.

Iowan Jack Duvall, who organized a tongue-in-cheek countervailing group called the Iowa City Benevolent & Loyal Order of Pessimists, says that when people look at the country, "it's easy to say, 'No, I'm not optimistic.' " But on a micro level, he says, "We insist on seeing our lives as having hope."

Pessimists aren't unhappy, he said, "they're just not disappointed as often as optimistic people are."

The current optimistic outlook among Americans does not extend to their assessments of the war in Iraq. Forty percent of those polled expect the situation there to get worse in 2007, and 31 percent see no change on the horizon. Just 27 percent expect the situation there to get better.

Eric Wolley, of Upper Marlboro, Md., paused to look ahead and back last week as he and his 8-year-old daughter, Iyana, took pictures outside the White House.

"For me, personally, financially, it was great," Mr. Wolley, a real estate agent, said of 2006. "Family and everybody's healthy, so everything's been going pretty good." But as for Iraq, he said, "I wish we could go in and get that figured out."

Among the one-quarter of Americans who felt pessimistic about what 2007 will bring for the country, Iraq was a recurrent theme, along with concern about poor political leadership.

"I don't really like the person running the show," one poll respondent said.

"Look at the servicemen that are dying over there," another said.

"I don't think our leaders are capable of fixing the problems," a third said.

Democrats were more likely than Republicans to have a negative view of the past year, and were less likely to feel optimistic looking forward.

The AP-AOL News poll of 1,000 adults was conducted by telephone Dec. 12-14 by Ipsos, an international public opinion research company. The margin of sampling error was plus or minus three percentage points.

January Effect May Take A Year Off (NYT)

By Condrad DeAenlle

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

JANUARY will begin in a few hours, but how about a January effect?

That term has been used to describe various phenomena in the month, including the relatively robust performance of shares of smaller companies or companies judged to be of poorer quality, based on factors like earnings consistency and dividend yield. It can also refer simply to strength in broad market averages, versus other months.

Henry H. McVey, a strategist at Morgan Stanley, has warned that the market rally investors are accustomed to enjoying as a year begins may already have come and gone. Action in the stock market “could be bumpy, including a pullback in January,” he said in a note to the bank’s clients.

“Returns have been positive for 6 straight months and 11 out of the last 12 months,” he noted. “Also, in recent years, it appears that fourth-quarter rallies have taken a lot of the steam out of the traditional January effect, and as such we would not be surprised to see a correction” in the first quarter.

Richard Bernstein, chief investment strategist at Merrill Lynch, finds an especially strong discrepancy in returns based on quality. Since 1987, stocks that Standard & Poor’s rates C and D have beaten returns of those rated A+ by 7.8 percentage points, on average, the first month each year.

Mr. Bernstein said in a research report that the performance of poor-quality stocks tends to diminish if they have displayed strength in the preceding year. Average returns were 20 points higher this year through Dec. 15 for C and D stocks than for those rated A+.

Mr. Bernstein added that while the January gap often narrows, it doesn’t vanish, so he suggests that investors willing to tolerate some risk look at these lower-rated companies. “Given the historical probability of C’s and D’s outperforming in the month of January, and the magnitude of that outperformance,” he said, “we think investors should seriously consider an overweight of low quality for the month of January to take advantage of this distinct seasonal pattern.”

DOJ_NMG_0111345

But he cautioned against letting those weaklings linger in portfolios. “As January progresses, we recommend investors sell lower-quality stocks into strength and again overweight higher-quality issues,” he said.

He says he is so convinced that C’s and D’s will spend the rest of the year living down to their ratings that he advises other investors to forget the January effect: “For medium- to longer-term investors, we suggest ignoring this possible trade and maintaining a strong overweight in higher-quality issues as our longer-term theme of focusing on quality remains intact.”

DATA WATCH The December employment report arrives Friday. A Bloomberg News poll of economists estimates that 115,000 net new jobs were created, a subdued showing after the 132,000 in November.

The Grown-Ups Step In (WP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

FINALLY, THE grown-ups have seen fit to mediate in the spitting match that passes for fraternal relations within Virginia's Republican Party. Northern Virginia's two Republican congressmen, Reps. Thomas M. Davis III and Frank R. Wolf, along with the new state party chairman, Ed Gillespie, and Robert F. McDonnell, the attorney general, are trying to broker an intraparty deal on state funding for transportation. No doubt they have been moved to action by well-founded fear -- fear that voters have grown tired and testy at the ongoing spectacle of the GOP's civil war and fear that the party as a whole will be punished at the ballot box next fall for its contemptible failure to address the state's transportation mess. Whatever the motive for the intervention, here's the only way the mess will be solved: with taxes.

It's been 20 years since Virginia (with a Democratic governor and a Democrat-controlled state legislature) tapped a new funding source for its overstressed roads and rails. Since then, the state's population and economy have boomed, and traffic has mounted in key areas. Meanwhile, the legislature has come under the control of Republicans divided into Senate moderates, who grasp that roads require an adequate, stable, long-term source of revenue, and House fundamentalists, whose anti-tax zealotry has blocked any reasonable funding plan.

Billions in new revenue are needed to deal just with Northern Virginia's road mess and to ensure that maintenance costs do not deplete the state's entire road-building budget within the next few years. But the House has managed to propose only short-term, small-potatoes, gimmicky fixes designed more to provide political cover than deal with a generational problem. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, has rightly rejected those and insisted on a long-term approach. The result: political gridlock to match that on Virginia's roads.

Now Republican leaders are looking at the ballot next November, and they don't like what they see. All 140 members of the state's General Assembly will be up for reelection, and plenty of voters may not take the trouble to sort the good Republicans from the bad -- that is, to distinguish between those who comprehend that new taxes are unavoidable and those whose allegiance is more to conservative Republican orthodoxy than to the everyday concerns of commuters. They're more likely just to vote against candidates with an R after their names and be done with it.

So party elders are knocking heads. So far, according to reporting by The Post's Michael D. Shear, there is little to show for their efforts.

No one likes higher taxes. But without them, the state's most populous and dynamic regions -- Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads -- will strangle on their own congestion. Let's hope the GOP grown-ups can sell a new year's resolution to the party's hard-liners -- preferably one that involves investing in the state's future before it's too late.

That Blasted Year (WP)

By Dave Barry

The Washington Post Magazine, December 30, 2006

IT WAS A MOMENTOUS YEAR, a year of events that will echo in the annals of history the way a dropped plate of calamari echoes in an Italian restaurant with a tile floor. Decades from now, our grandchildren will come to us and say, "Tell us, Grandpa or Grandma, as the case may be, what it was like to be alive in the year that Angelina Jolie, Tom Cruise, Brad Pitt, Britney Spears and Katie whats-hername all had babies, although not necessarily in those combinations." And we will smile wisely and emit a streamer of drool, because we will be very old and unable to hear them.

DOJ_NMG_0111346

And that will be a good thing, because there are many things about 2006 that we will not want to remember. This was the year in which the members of the United States Congress, who do not bother to read the actual bills they pass, spent weeks poring over instant messages sent by a pervert. This was the year in which the vice president of the United States shot a lawyer, which turned out to be totally legal in Texas. This was the year in which -- as clearly foretold in the Bible as a sign of the Apocalypse -- Howie Mandel wound up with a hit TV show.

Also, there were many pesky problems left over from 2005 that refused to go away in 2006, including Iraq, immigration, high gas prices, terrorism, global warming, avian flu, Iran, North Korea and Paris Hilton. Future generations are going to look back at this era and ask us how we could have allowed Paris Hilton to happen, and we are not going to have a good answer.[JANUARY]

. . . a month that dawns with petty partisan bickering in Washington, D.C., a place where many people view petty partisan bickering as honest, productive work -- like making furniture. The immediate cause of the bickering is the Republican ethics scandal involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, both of whom you can tell, just by looking at them, are guilty of something. The Democrats charge that the Republicans have created a Culture of Corruption and should be thrown out of office so the Democrats can return to power and run the scandal-free style of government for which they are so famous. The Republicans respond that the Democrats are soft on terrorism, soft on terrorism, soft on terrorism, soft on terrorism. Both sides issue news releases far into the night.

The other big focus of the bickering is the nomination of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. As always, the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings provide high-quality TV entertainment as the nation tunes in to see whether Sen. Edward M. Kennedy will be able to successfully remember the nominee's name. The bulk of the hearings are spent in the traditional manner, with Democrats trying to trick the nominee into revealing his views on abortion, and Republicans reminding the nominee that he does not have to reveal his views on abortion. The subsequent exchange of news releases is so intense that several government fax machines burst into flames.

In the War on Terror, Osama bin Laden, who may or may not be dead, nevertheless releases another audiotape, for the first time making it downloadable from iTunes. Bin Laden also starts a blog, in which he calls upon his followers to destroy the corrupt infidels and also to try to find out how a person, hypothetically, can get Chinese food delivered to a cave.

In the Middle East, Palestinian voters elect the militant Hamas party, which assumes control of government functions such as street repair, which Hamas decides to handle by firing rockets at potholes. Canada also holds elections, which are won by some Canadian, we assume.

In economic news, the big story is the retirement of Federal Reserve Board Chairman Alan Greenspan, who, after 19 years as the person most responsible for guiding the American economy, steps down, taking with him the thanks of a grateful nation and a suitcase containing $11 billion. But the financial news is not so good in . . .[FEBRUARY]

. . . when President Bush, delivering what is billed as a "major address on energy policy," reveals that the nation has an "addiction" to "foreign oil," which comes from "foreign countries" located "outside of the United States" that are getting this oil from "under the ground." To combat this problem, the president proposes the development of "new technology" in the form of "inventions" such as "a Lincoln Navigator that gets 827 miles per gallon," although he allows that this could take "time."

But this bold energy initiative does not get nearly as much attention as the administration's decision to allow a company owned by the United Arab Emirates to operate some U.S. seaports. This outrages Congress, which briefly ceases partisan bickering to demand that the White House return control of the ports, in the interest of national security, to Tony Soprano.

Speaking of guys who avoid the limelight: Vice President Dick Cheney, attempting to bring down a quail with a shotgun, shoots attorney Harry Whittington. Local authorities rule the shooting was an accident, noting that if the vice president were going to intentionally shoot somebody, it would be Nancy Pelosi. The quail is eventually tracked down and vaporized by an F-16.

Internationally, the big news comes from Denmark, center of a mounting furor over some cartoons, published the previous year in a Danish newspaper, that depict a prophet whom, in the interest of not offending anybody, we will refer to as Fohammed. This upsets several million of the prophet's followers, who request a formal apology from the newspaper, greater sensitivity to their religious beliefs and, where necessary, beheadings. Eventually everybody realizes that the whole darned thing was just a silly misunderstanding. That is all we are going to say about this.

DOJ_NMG_0111347

In sports, Super Bowl XVXXLMCMII takes place in Detroit, and by all accounts it's a big success for the Motor City, with huge crowds thronging to both of the restaurants. The Pittsburgh Steelers win a game featuring a controversial play in which an apparent Seattle Seahawk touchdown pass is called back after the Steeler defender -- in what is later ruled an accident -- is gunned down by Vice President Cheney.

But the big sporting event is the Winter Olympics, a glorious quadrennial celebration of world-class virtuoso athletic accomplishment in sports nobody has ever heard of. Surprise winners include Latvia in the 500-kilometer Modified Nordic Combined; the Republic of Irvingkahnistan in the 2,300-meter Slavic Personified; and U.S. skier Bode Miller in Most Nike Commercials Featuring a Competitor Who, in the Actual Competitions, Mainly Falls Down.[MARCH]

. . . the real-estate boom appears to be over, as the government reports that, so far in 2006, only one U.S. homeowner managed to sell his house, and he had to offer, as an incentive to the buyer, his wife. But the employment numbers remain strong, thanks to strong growth in the sector of people trying to get you to refinance your mortgage for, like, the sixth time. Meanwhile, as the average gasoline price creeps past $2.50, the Hummer company, having downsized from the massive Hummer to the somewhat smaller H2, and then to the even smaller H3, begins development of the H4, which the company says will be "a very rugged skateboard."

In the Academy Awards, the overwhelming favorite for best picture is "Brokeback Mountain," the story of two men who discover, while spending many isolated weeks together in the mountains, that they enjoy exchanging instant messages with Mark Foley. But, in a stunning upset, the Oscar for best picture instead goes to "Crash," a documentary about Bode Miller.

In other entertainment news, a book by two San Francisco Chronicle writers revives suspicions about possible steroid use by San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds, alleging, with extensive documentation, that as recently as 10 years ago, Bonds was a woman.

In other science news, thrilled NASA astronomers, in what they describe as a "smashing, surprising" discovery, announce that they have found evidence of pockets of water beneath the surface of Enceladus, one of the moons of Saturn, which strongly suggests -- as has long been suspected -- that astronomers do not get out much.

In foreign news, Israeli voters give a parliamentary majority to acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert because his name can be rearranged to spell "hot eel drum." Meanwhile in Paris, thousands of demonstrators take to the streets and shut down the city to demonstrate the fact that, hey, it's Paris. In the Middle East, tension mounts in response to mounting tension. We don't know specifically what is happening in Africa, but we know it is bad.[APRIL]

. . . Tom DeLay decides not to seek reelection to Congress, making the announcement via audio-tape from a cave somewhere in Pakistan. Republican leaders express relief over DeLay's decision and issue a statement pledging that there will be "no more Republican scandals, unless somebody finds out about Mark Foley."

Meanwhile in the Middle East, tension mounts still higher when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announces that Iran has successfully produced enriched uranium, although he claims that his nation plans to use it only for peaceful purposes, "such as cooking." In Iraq, there is good news and bad news for the Bush administration: The good news is that rival Iraqi leaders have finally agreed on a new prime minister. The bad news is that it is Nancy Pelosi.

Domestically, the national debate over illegal immigration heats up as thousands of demonstrators take to the streets of major U.S. cities, thus causing a total shutdown of Paris. Meanwhile the Mexican government, in what is widely viewed as a deliberate provocation, convenes in Milwaukee. But the big story is the price of gasoline, which continues its relentless climb toward an unprecedented $3 a gallon. Responding quickly, Congress, in a rare display of decisive bipartisan action, takes a recess, with both sides promising to resume bickering the instant they get back.[MAY]

. . . the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which has a budget of over $3 billion, predicts that the 2006 hurricane season will be worse than usual. This item will seem funnier later in the year. In related news, the voters of New Orleans reelect Ray Nagin as mayor, proving that Hurricane Katrina killed far more brain cells than was previously believed.

On the terrorism front, the Bush administration comes under heavy criticism following press reports that the National Security Agency has been collecting telephone records of millions of Americans. Responding to the outcry, President Bush assures the nation that "the government is not collecting personal information on any individual citizen," adding, "Warren H. Glompett of Boston, call your wife back immediately, because your dog has eaten your entire Viagra supply."

DOJ_NMG_0111348

In another controversial move, the president announces that he will use National Guard troops to stop illegal immigration. The initial troops are assigned to guard the border between Mexico and Arizona, with California, New Mexico and Texas being covered by Dick Cheney.

In Houston, former Enron executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling are convicted of fraud by a federal jury, which apparently is not persuaded by the defense's claim that Skilling and Lay could not have been responsible for the collapse of the $100 billion corporation because they were, quote, "both getting haircuts."

TRUE FACT: After the verdict, Lay says, "We believe God in fact is in control."

ANOTHER TRUE FACT: Less than two months later, Lay will die of heart failure.

In sports, Barbaro, the popular racehorse who won the Kentucky Derby, breaks his leg in the Preakness after a freak collision with Bode Miller. Barbaro is forced to retire, although his agent does not rule out future appearances on "Dancing With the Stars." Meanwhile the hottest show on TV is the much-hyped finale of "American Idol," which is won by crooner Taylor Hicks, who narrowly edges out Nancy Pelosi.[JUNE]

. . . the big sports story is the start of the World Cup tournament, with U.S. fans hopeful that our players have finally caught up with the rest of the world in soccer. The American team arrives in Italy brimming with confidence, only to be informed that the tournament is being held in Germany. Undaunted, the team boards a train for Geneva, with the coach promising that "we will score many touchdowns."

In politics, the debate over Iraq continues to heat up, with President Bush insisting that "we must stay the course, whatever it may or may not be," while the Democrats claim that they would bring the troops home "immediately," or "in about six months," or "maybe not for a long time," depending on which particular Democrat is speaking and what time of day it is. On a more positive note, U.S. troops kill Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who is identified by intelligence experts as "a person with a really terrorist-sounding name." In another hopeful development in Iraq, the Sunnis and the Shiites agree to try to come up with a simple way for Americans to remember which one is which.

On the legal front, the U.S. Supreme Court rules that the Bush administration cannot try suspected terrorists in ad hoc military tribunals, after the court learns that the administration is interpreting "ad hoc" to mean "under water."

Dan Rather, who stopped anchoring the evening news in 2005, announces his retirement from CBS after a career spanning 44 years and several galaxies. Explaining his decision, Rather cites a desire to "explore other options" and "not keep getting maced by the CBS security guard."

On a happier note, the United States marks the 50th anniversary of the interstate highway system -- an engineering marvel consisting of 47,000 miles of high-speed roads connecting 157,000 Waffle Houses. A formal ceremony is planned, but it has to be canceled when Dad refuses to stop.[JULY]

. . . the Tour de France bicycle race is once again tainted by suspicions of doping when the winner, American Floyd Landis, is clocked ascending the Alps at over 200 mph. Landis denies that he uses illegal drugs, attributing his performance to, quote, "gears."

In other sports highlights, Italy defeats France in a World Cup final match that is marred by a violent head-butting incident involving Bode Miller. The U.S. team fares poorly in the World Cup, failing to win a single match; the players blame this on their inability to adjust to the "no hands" rule.

But the month's big story occurs in the Middle East, where violence flares along the Israel-Lebanon border in response to the fact that, because of terrible planning, the two countries are located right next to each other. In another troubling international development, rogue state North Korea test-fires seven ballistic missiles, including two believed to be potentially capable of reaching U.S. soil. World tension goes back down when the missiles, upon reaching an altitude of 200 feet, explode and spell "HAPPY BIRTHDAY." American military analysts caution that these missiles "could easily be modified to spell something more threatening."

In other rocket news, the troubled U.S. space program suffers yet another setback when the launch of the shuttle Discovery is delayed for several days by Transportation Security Administration screeners, who insist that the astronauts remove their shoes before they go through the metal detector. Finally, however, Discovery blasts off and flies a flawless mission, highlighted by scientific experiments proving that when you let go of things in space, they float around, same as last year.[AUGUST]

DOJ_NMG_0111349

. . . when the International Astronomical Union rules that Pluto will no longer be classified as a major planet, on the grounds that it is "less than half the size of James Gandolfini." A top U.S. law firm immediately files a class-action lawsuit on behalf of Pluto, as well as "anybody else who has been hurt by this ruling or has ever experienced neck pain."

In sports, a French medical laboratory burns to the ground after the catastrophic explosion of Floyd Landis's urine sample.

Fidel Castro is rumored to be seriously ill after publication of photographs showing worms crawling out of his eye sockets. Cuban authorities insist that the aging leader is merely recovering from surgery and that, for the time being, government operations are in the capable hands of Nancy Pelosi.

As the situation in Lebanon deteriorates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warns that, if violence continues, the United States will have no choice but to dispatch Vice President Cheney to the region to hunt doves. Within minutes, a cease-fire breaks out, with both sides agreeing to resume fire at a mutually convenient future date.

Meanwhile, commercial air travel turns into a total nightmare. No, wait, it was already a total nightmare. But it turns into an even worse total nightmare after Britain uncovers a terrorist plot targeting international flights, which results in a whole new set of security rules, including a total ban on all gels and liquids, including spit, urine, heavy perspirers and lactating women. After days of chaos at the airports, the TSA issues a new directive stating that "passengers may carry small quantities of liquids on board, but only if they are inside clear, one-quart, sealable plastic bags." This leads to still more chaos, as many TSA employees interpret this to mean that the passengers must be inside the bags. Eventually the TSA issues a clarification stating that "if necessary, the bags can have air holes."

Elsewhere in the War on Terror, the Bush administration suffers a setback when a federal judge in Michigan rules that U.S. authorities cannot call up suspected terrorists and try to get them to switch long-distance carriers.

In crime news, a man in Thailand claims that he had something to do with the 1996 murder of JonBenet Ramsey. It quickly becomes clear that the man is an unstable creep whose story is totally unbelievable, so the cable TV shows drop it.

Ha-ha! Just kidding! The cable TV shows go into days of round-the-clock, All-JonBenet-All-the-Time Wallow Mode. Battalions of legal experts are called in, some of them so excited about the opportunity to revisit the JonBenet tragedy that additional janitors have to be brought to the studios to mop up puddles of expert weewee.

On the weather front, the until-now quiet hurricane season erupts in fearsome fury in the form of Tropical Storm Ernesto, which hurricane experts, using scientific computer models, predict could become a major storm and inflict devastation upon Texas, or possibly Florida or Connecticut. A state of near-panic sets in as millions of coastal residents jam gas stations, hardware stores and supermarkets, while many schools and businesses close. Tension mounts for days, until finally Ernesto slams into Florida with all the fury of a diseased fruit fly. Life slowly returns to normal for everyone except the ever-vigilant hurricane experts, who immediately begin scanning their scientific computer simulations for the next potentially deadly threat.[SEPTEMBER]

. . . Steve Irwin, of "Crocodile Hunter" fame, is fatally wounded while filming a new TV series-- in what biologists describe as a freak accident -- he collides with Bode Miller. Meanwhile, Americans -- already on edge because of concern over terrorism, avian flu, AIDS, nuclear escalation and global warming -- find themselves facing a deadly new menace: killer spinach. The lethal vegetable is removed from supermarket shelves by police SWAT teams; many units of innocent produce are harmed. Paris shuts down completely.

Speaking of vegetables, the U.S. Congress is rocked by yet another scandal with the publication of e-mails and instant messages sent to male pages by Congressman Mark Foley of Florida, in which he explicitly discusses acts of a sheepherding nature. As the scandal expands, House Republican leaders issue a statement claiming that they "are not aware of any so-called Congressman Mark Foley of Florida." Democrats cite Foley as another example of Republican corruption, declaring that they would never, ever, under any circumstances tolerate such behavior, unless it involved a consenting page.

In other political developments, the New York Times prints a leaked top-secret government report expressing doubts about the war in Iraq. The Bush administration holds a secret meeting to prepare a response, but within hours the Times prints leaked details of the meeting, including who went to the bathroom and why. The administration then attempts to take out the Times building with a missile, but the Times, using leaked launch codes, redirects the missile to The Washington Post. As the debate over Iraq heats up, President Bush pledges to "keep on continuing to stay the present course while at the same time not doing anything different." Democratic leaders declare that they have a "bold new plan" for Iraq, which they will reveal just as soon as the New York Times leaks it to them.

DOJ_NMG_0111350

Abroad, Pope Benedict XVI gets in big trouble when he gives a speech suggesting that the Muslim religion has historically been linked to violence. Ha-ha! What a crazy idea! The pope soon sees that he has made a big mistake and apologizes several times.

Rumors about Fidel Castro's health continue to swirl following publication of a photograph showing Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez shaking Castro's hand. The rest of Castro's body is nowhere to be seen.[OCTOBER]

. . . North Korea conducts an underground nuclear test, which is especially troubling because the ground in question is located in Wyoming. This goes virtually unnoticed in Washington, where everybody continues to be obsessed with the growing body of instant messages generated by Mark Foley, who, despite his busy schedule as a lawmaker, apparently found time to attempt to become sheepherding buddies with pretty much every young male in North America.

In other political developments, Sen. Barack Obama, looking back on a career in the U.S. Senate that spans nearly 20 months, allows as how he might be ready to move on to the presidency. Obamamania sweeps the nation as millions of voters find themselves deeply impressed by Obama's views and the fact that he was on "Oprah." In a gracious gesture from a potential 2008 rival, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton sends Obama a good-luck card, which is stapled to the head of a horse.

Opponents of illegal Mexican immigration had cheered when Congress authorized the construction of a 700-mile fence. Their cheers quickly fade when they learn that, because of wording inserted at the last minute by Sens. Robert Byrd and Ted Stevens, 650 miles of the fence will be constructed in West Virginia and Alaska.

Vice President Dick Cheney again becomes the center of controversy when, while being interviewed on a radio show, he defends the interrogation technique known as "water-boarding" as a legitimate anti-terrorism tool, not torture. At first the host disagrees, but after several "commercial breaks," Cheney brings him around.

A strong earthquake shocks Hawaii, causing Paris to shut down completely.

In sports, a football game between the University of Miami and Florida International University is marred by violence, prompting both schools to seriously consider banning players from carrying handguns onto the field. In baseball, the New York Yankees, despite being clearly the best and most expensive team the world has ever seen, fail to even get into the World Series, leaving Yankee fans to spend yet another bitter off-season wondering why their team can't simply be awarded the championship and not have to play these stupid games against clearly inferior teams from dirtball cities that don't even have subways.[NOVEMBER]

. . . when Kerry's "joke" causes widespread outrage, prompting Kerry, with typical humility, to insist that it was obviously humorous and that anybody who disagrees is an idiot. Kerry is finally subdued by Democratic strategists armed with duct tape, but not before many political analysts see a tightening of the race to control Congress.

As the campaign lumbers to the finish line, the Republicans desperately hope that the voters will not notice that they -- once the party of small government -- have turned into the party of war-bungling, corruption-tolerating, pork-spewing power-lusting toads, while the Democrats desperately hope that the voters will not notice that they are still, basically, the Democrats. The actual voters, of course, are paying no attention, having given up on politics months ago because every time they turn on the TV all they see are political ads accusing pretty much every candidate on either side of being, at minimum, a child molester.

Thus nobody really knows what will happen as the voters go to the polls. In Florida, nobody knows anything even after the voting is over, because -- prepare to be shocked -- many electronic balloting machines malfunction. Voters in one district report that their machines, instead of displaying the candidates for Congress, showed "Star Wars: Episode IV." (By an overwhelming margin, this district elects Jabba the Hutt.) Nationwide, however, it eventually becomes clear that the Democrats have gained control of both houses of Congress. President Bush handles the defeat with surprisingly good humor, possibly because his staff has not told him about it. For their part, future House and Senate majority leaders Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid issue a joint statement promising to "make every effort to find common ground with the president," adding, "We are clearly lying." Pelosi sets about the difficult task of trying to fill leadership posts with Democrats who have not been videotaped discussing bribes with federal undercover agents.

DOJ_NMG_0111351

The first major casualty of the GOP defeat is Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who, the day after the election, is invited to go quail-hunting with the vice president. He is never seen again. As Rumsfeld's replacement, the president nominates -- in what is widely seen as a change in direction on Iraq -- Barbra Streisand.

In other celebrity news, Michael Richards, a graduate of the Mel Gibson School of Standup, responds to a comedy-club heckler by unleashing a racist tirade so vile that even John Kerry realizes it is not funny. A chastened Richards apologizes for his behavior, citing, by way of explanation, the fact that he is a moron.

Speaking of which, O.J. Simpson is once again in the headlines when Fox TV announces that Simpson will be interviewed on a two-night special in conjunction with his new book, If I Did It, in which he will explain how, "hypothetically," he would have murdered Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman. This idea is so sick, so disgusting, so utterly depraved that it would undoubtedly get huge ratings. But Fox, faced with withering criticism, is forced to cancel the project, which is the brainchild of publisher Judith Regan, about whom you could write a "hypothetical" book titled If Judith Regan Had the Moral Standards of a Tapeworm.

On the economic front, the holiday shopping season officially kicks off with "Black Friday," and retailers are pleased with the numbers: 2,038 shoppers hospitalized, up 37 percent from last year.

In other good news, with only a few days left in the virtually storm-free 2006 hurricane season and still no storms in sight, U.S. weather experts, citing new data, predict that the season will end up having been very mild. This forecast turns out to be right on the money, but the experts waste no time on self-congratulation, as they immediately begin making scientific predictions for next year's hurricane season, which, they warn, could be a bad one.[DECEMBER]

. . . gets off to a troubling start , with the worsening situation in Iraq worsening faster than ever. The nation's hopes for a solution are pinned on the Iraq Study Group, a presidentially appointed blue-ribbon panel consisting of five Republicans, five Democrats and the Wizard of Oz. In accordance with longstanding Washington tradition, the panel first formally leaks its report to the New York Times, then delivers it to the president, who turns it over to White House personnel specially trained in reading things.

In essence, the study group recommends a three-pronged approach, consisting of: 1) a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops, but not on a fixed timetable; 2) intensified training of Iraqi troops; and 3) the physical relocation of Iraq, including buildings, to Greenland. Republican and Democratic leaders, after considering the report for the better part of a nanosecond, commence what is expected to be a minimum of two more years of bickering.

With the Iraq situation pretty much solved, the world's attention shifts to Iran and its suspected nuclear program, which becomes the subject of renewed concern after U.S. satellites detect a glowing 400-foot-high spider striding around Tehran. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad insists that it is "a peaceful spider" that will be used "only for mail delivery." Shortly thereafter, North Korea -- in what many observers see as a deliberate provocation -- detonates a nuclear device inside the Lincoln Memorial.

Finally responding to these new threats to international stability, the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council -- the United States, the United Kingdon, Russia, China and Google -- hold an emergency meeting in Paris, where, after heated debate, they vote to have a bottle of 1959 Chateau Margaux with their entree. Unfortunately, they cannot agree on a dessert wine, causing the city, which had just reopened, to shut down completely.

In other food news, New York City, having apparently solved all of its other problems, bans "trans fats." Hours later, police surround a Burger King in Brooklyn and fire 50 bullets into a man suspected of carrying a concealed Whopper. The medical examiner's office, after a thorough investigation, concludes that the man "definitely could have developed artery problems down the road."

Speaking of health problems, rumors that Fidel Castro is ailing gain new strength when, at an official state dinner in Havana, a waiter accidentally tips over the longtime Cuban leader's urn, spilling most of him on the floor.

In other deceased-Communist news, British police rule that the mysterious death of a former Russian spy in London was a murder, caused by the radioactive element polonium-210. New York immediately bans the element, forcing the closure of 70 percent of the city's Taco Bells.

DOJ_NMG_0111352

As the year, finally, nears its conclusion, Americans turn their attention to the holiday season, which they celebrate -- as generations have before them -- by frantically overbidding on eBay for the Sony PlayStation 3, of which Sony, anticipating the near-homicidal level of demand, manufactured an estimated 11 units. Millions of Americans also head "home for the holidays," making this one of the busiest air travel seasons ever. The always vigilant TSA responds by raising the Security Threat Level to "ultraviolet," which means that passengers may not board an airplane if they contain blood.

But despite the well-founded fear of terrorism, the seemingly unbreakable and escalating cycle of violence in the Middle East, the uncertain world economic future, the menace of global warming, the near-certainty that rogue states run by lunatics will soon have nuclear weapons, and the fact that America is confronting these dangers with a federal government sharply divided into two hostile parties unable to agree on anything except that the other side is scum, Americans face the new year with a remarkable lack of worry, and for a very good reason: They are busy drinking beer and watching football.

So, Happy New Year.

(Burp.)

Dave Barry can be reached at 20071@washpost.com.

Bush Has Quietly Tripled Aid To Africa (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

President Bush's legacy is sure to be defined by his wielding of U.S. military power in Afghanistan and Iraq, but there is another, much softer and less-noticed effort by his administration in foreign affairs: a dramatic increase in U.S. aid to Africa.

The president has tripled direct humanitarian and development aid to the world's most impoverished continent since taking office and recently vowed to double that increased amount by 2010 -- to nearly $9 billion.

The moves have surprised -- and pleased -- longtime supporters of assistance for Africa, who note that because Bush has received little support from African American voters, he has little obvious political incentive for his interest.

"I think the Bush administration deserves pretty high marks in terms of increasing aid to Africa," said Steve Radelet, a senior fellow at the Center for Global Development.

Bush has increased direct development and humanitarian aid to Africa to more than $4 billion a year from $1.4 billion in 2001, according to the Paris-based Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. And four African nations -- Sudan, Ethiopia, Egypt and Uganda -- rank among the world's top 10 recipients in aid from the United States.

Beyond increasing aid to Africa, Bush has met with nearly three dozen African heads of state during his six years in office. He visited Africa in his first term, and aides say he hopes to make a return visit next year.

Although some activists criticize Bush for not doing more to end the ongoing genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, others credit him for playing a role in ending deadly conflicts in Liberia, the Congo and other parts of Sudan. Meanwhile, Bush has overseen a steady rise in U.S. trade with Africa, which has doubled since 2001.

"He should be known for increasing -- doubling development assistance and tripling it to Africa after a period in which U.S. development assistance was essentially flat for decades," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a recent interview with the Associated Press. "He should be known for the largest single investment in AIDS and malaria, the biggest health investment of any government program ever."

To many longtime Africa supporters, all of this is surprising for a president who is often criticized as lacking curiosity about much of the world and who heads a political party traditionally skeptical of the efficacy of foreign aid.

But attacking African poverty has become a growing priority of some of the religious groups at the core of Bush's political base, and some lawmakers credit them with stoking the president's interest in the subject.

"The evangelical community raised the awareness of HIV and AIDS to the president," said Rep. Donald M. Payne (N.J.), the top-ranking Democrat on the House International Relations subcommittee on Africa. "When the Bush administration came in, HIV and AIDS were not an overwhelming priority. Now we have seen a total metamorphosis."

DOJ_NMG_0111353

Current and former White House aides and independent analysts say Bush's interest in Africa is rooted in the numerous humanitarian crises that continue to bedevil the continent, as well as in the growing importance of Africa in a world increasingly linked by economics and terrorist threats.

"I think there are two reinforcing trends here. One of them is the upside of foreign policy moralism," said Michael J. Gerson, a former Bush aide who was a persistent and persuasive advocate for Africa. "Another one is the growing strategic significance of Africa: the conflict with radical Islam; the problem of failed states and terrorism; and the growing importance of Africa on the resource side: oil."

Some advocates suspect that the Bush administration's interest in Africa is motivated more by business ambitions than altruism. Grants made by the Millennium Challenge Corp., a foreign aid program developed by Bush with the aim of rewarding poor countries that practice good governance, are also partially predicated on whether countries have open markets that allow widespread foreign investment.

"I know a lot of activist groups who believe that the president's stated commitment to Africa is, at best, a play on words," said Nii Akuetteh, executive director of Africa Action, a Washington-based advocacy organization. "First of all, much of the aid is emergency food or medical aid, rather than true development assistance. Then there are conditions that are attached where the emphasis is more on countries that open up their markets so American companies can go in and privatize things like water and electrical service or have access to certain resources."

Bush launched his $1.2 billion malaria initiative in June 2005 with the goal of reducing malaria-related deaths in 15 African countries by 50 percent. The disease kills more than 1 million people a year, most of them African children under age 5.

The malaria program complements the president's largest global health initiative, the $15 billion, five-year plan known as the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR). Under the program, about 800,000 Africans are receiving drugs that enable them to live longer with the disease and help to prevent mother-to-child transmission of the virus.

"We launched one of the most important initiatives in American history, as far as I'm concerned, and that is the Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief," Bush said at a recent conference on malaria.

PEPFAR, which often funds programs through religious organizations, has come under criticism for promoting faith-based ideology over science, emphasizing abstinence programs and giving inaccurate information about the effectiveness of condoms in preventing HIV transmission. Payne says such concerns have been allayed in recent years, and he and others credit PEPFAR with saving hundreds of thousands of lives.

The Bush administration's efforts in Africa have dovetailed with a rise in aid to Africa from private groups, including the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, as well as loan forgiveness from organizations such as the World Bank and stepped-up assistance from other countries, including Britain and France.

"I think [increasing aid to Africa] will be one of the things the president is most proud of when he leaves office," Gerson said. "It doesn't fit the preconception, the caricature that the president somehow has a preference for using the blunt instruments of force in international affairs when in fact on a variety of topics, the president has been a root-cause thinker in an unexpected way."

Somalia's Islamists Vow Never To Surrender (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Dec. 30 — A phalanx of Ethiopian tanks and armored personnel carriers chugged toward Kismayo, the last city occupied by Somalia's diminished Islamist movement, witnesses said Saturday, while the Islamists inside the city dug in and vowed never to surrender.

According to residents along Somalia's coast, the Ethiopian troops, with soldiers from Somalia's transitional government, were preparing to seize Kismayo, a port city near the Kenyan border.

Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, a high-ranking cleric, emerged from a mosque in the city on Saturday, surrounded by gunmen, and told his followers that the Islamist leadership was not finished.

DOJ_NMG_0111354

"The Islamic courts are still alive and ready to fight against the enemy of God," Sheik Ahmed told residents of Kismayo in a speech on Saturday. "We left Mogadishu in order to prevent bloodshed in the capital, but that does not mean we lost the holy war against our enemy."

Sheik Ahmed called on Somalis to begin an anti-Ethiopian insurgency. Already, several masked gunmen have surfaced on Mogadishu's streets, suggesting a guerrilla movement may have begun.

Diplomats in Kenya, though, said that they were talking to moderate representatives of the Islamic movement on Saturday, trying to persuade them to back down. The Islamists are essentially cornered, hemmed in by the Indian Ocean, a sealed Kenyan border and thousands of troops headed their way. Their only route of escape may be to flee into the thickly forested area south of Kismayo, which Western intelligence officers suspect has been used before as a terrorist hide-out.

In Mogadishu, the presence of Ethiopian soldiers continued to spark scattered violence, with supporters of the Ethiopians battling street by street against the remaining Islamist partisans. Gunshots rang out, men and women battled with sticks and rocks and the thick black smoke of burning barricades lifted into the air.

Just two days ago, in a stunning reversal of fortune, Somalia's transitional government, with the muscle of the Ethiopian military, reclaimed Mogadishu from the Islamist movement that had ruled large swaths of Somalia. Despite the Islamists' repeated vows to fight to the death, their forces evaporated and Mogadishu fell without a shot. Many Somalis said Saturday that they hoped the same thing would happen in Kismayo.

More than a thousand people have been killed in fighting across the country since Dec. 20, and Somalia's leaders now face the daunting task of trying to piece together a country that has not had a functioning central government for 15 years.

Sheikhdon Salad Elmi, the director of a large hospital in the Medina neighborhood of Mogadishu, said the prospects for stability depended on how long the Ethiopian troops stayed. "I think it's naïve for them to go right now," Dr. Elmi said. "We need them for security. But they are very visible and most people don't like them. The longer they stay, the more resentment that will come."

Somalia has fought, and lost, two wars with Ethiopia, but never before have Ethiopian troops occupied the capital. On Saturday, some supporters of the Ethiopians waved pictures of Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister. "It's very humiliating," Dr. Elmi said.

Ethiopian officials have said that they plan to withdraw troops in a matter of weeks but not before neutralizing the Islamists, who declared a holy war against Ethiopia, a country with a long Christian history and Somalia's larger and more powerful neighbor.

The Ethiopian military, with tacit American approval, unleashed a fierce attack against the Islamists last Sunday, bombarding their positions with jet fighters and pushing tanks deep into Somali territory.

Since then, the Islamists have been steadily on the run, their teenage troops no match for Ethiopia's well-equipped modern army.

Further Combat Looms In Somalia (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Dec. 30 -- Somali government troops heavily backed by Ethiopian tanks and soldiers pushed Saturday toward Somalia's port city of Kismaayo, the last stronghold of the Islamic Courts movement swept from power in recent days.

A major battle between the two sides seemed imminent, as Ethiopian jets blew over towns near Kismaayo, and leaders of the Islamic movement rallied fighters who had retreated to the area in the face of Ethiopia's vastly superior military force.

The Islamic Courts movement is "ready to fight against the enemy of Allah," Sharif Ahmed, a leader of the group, told residents of Kismaayo, according to the Associated Press.

Somalis are growing impatient with the presence of thousands of Ethiopian troops in their country, but Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who has backed the interim Somali government now in power, has said his military will not pull out until it has captured the most "extremist" leaders and "international jihadists" within the Courts movement.

DOJ_NMG_0111355

Meles has accused those leaders of supporting ethnic Somali separatist groups in Ethiopia, and both the United States and Ethiopia have accused the Islamic Courts fighters of sheltering terrorists, an allegation the movement has called propaganda.

The United States has denied giving Ethiopia the green light to invade Somalia but has steadfastly supported Ethiopia's right to self-defense, and Meles has characterized this war as defensive, not preemptive. Just days before the Ethiopian action, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for African affairs, Jendayi E. Frazer, accused the Islamic group of being "controlled" by an al-Qaeda cell, an allegation that regional analysts say was exaggerated and intended to justify Ethiopia's incursion.

The U.S. government, which has a substantial military presence up the coast in Djibouti, has said that four suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania could be among the 2,000 or so fighters who retreated in recent days to the Kismaayo area, which includes a vast forest ideal for hiding in and staging a guerrilla war.

The Islamic Courts movement came to power in June with the popular support of Somalis tired of the brutish rule of warlords who called themselves an "anti-terrorism coalition" and received financial backing from the CIA.

Somalis tend to adhere to a moderate version of Islam, and for many, supporting a movement that enforced Islamic law with varying degrees of severity was a pragmatic choice rather than a religious one.

It is perhaps a measure of that pragmatism that as the government asserted control of Mogadishu, the capital, on Friday, many of the Islamic fighters simply slipped off their uniforms, shaved their beards and went back to regular life, witnesses said.

Hundreds of Somalis greeted the formerly exiled Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi, seemingly willing to give the secular government a chance if it means restoring order to their country, which has not had a central government since the warlords overthrew President Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991.

Elsewhere in the city Friday, hundreds of Somalis protested against Ethiopian troops in Mogadishu. The rallies continued on a smaller scale Saturday, witnesses said.

More than religious fervor, Somalis seem motivated by nationalism. Analysts say the presence of the Ethiopian troops could jeopardize the government, which was cobbled together by negotiators in Kenya nearly two years ago and has struggled against its image as a group of outsiders.

"If it happens that the Islamic extremists win out, I think moderate Somalis will be supportive under the banner of Somali nationalism, not religious extremism," said David Shinn, a former U.S. ambassador to Ethiopia.

By Saturday, Ethiopian and Somali government troops had reached the town of Jilib, about 80 miles north of Kismaayo, and were pushing ahead, according to Somalia's ambassador to Ethiopia, Abdikarin Farah. "Obviously," he said, "they are advancing."

Somali Forces Pursue Islamists (WT)

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia (Agence France-Presse) -- Somali government forces marched on the last stronghold of the country's powerful Islamist movement yesterday, even as Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi called for dialogue with Islamist leaders.

Residents said fighter jets, thought to be Ethiopian, were flying over Kismayo, about 300 miles south of the capital, prompting fears of attacks on the city.

"Our troops are moving towards Kismayo," Mr. Gedi told reporters.

Islamist fighters had regrouped in Kismayo after government forces backed by Ethiopian troops forced them to abandon the capital Mogadishu on Thursday, following 10 days of heavy fighting.

Witnesses told Agence France-Presse that they had seen a convoy of military vehicles heading in the direction of Kismayo and others said planes were flying over the city.

"Military jets are flying over the town. We cannot see them [because it is night], but they are flying low-level, they have not dropped any bomb yet," Farahan Jiis, a resident, said.

"We can hear the terrible sound they are making," added Leila Sheikh Aden.

DOJ_NMG_0111356

Earlier yesterday, Mr. Gedi had called on his government's Islamist rivals to "join us" and enter into a dialogue. At the same time he warned of serious reprisals if the Islamists followed through on threats to wage a guerrilla campaign.

The appeal for talks came as Deputy Prime Minister Mohamed Hussein Aidid warned that the security situation in the capital, which has long been awash with arms, remained potentially volatile, with "around 2,000" Islamists thought to have remained behind when the city was taken.

"Some are hiding in houses and some are armed," Mr. Aidid said. "There are mines, lots of weapons and many foreign fighters in the city."

A day of violence and looting after the Islamists abandoned Mogadishu triggered fears of a return to the bleak days when the capital was a battleground for feuding clan chiefs.

Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed held talks with clan elders yesterday in Afgoye, west of Mogadishu, and later announced the nomination of a new mayor for the capital and the reinstatement of the city's police chief.

Somalia's transitional administration, which has international recognition, was set up in October 2004 in a bid to impose the rule of law in a nation where political institutions had become powerless.

Mr. Gedi's arrival in Mogadishu on Friday marked the first time the weak interim government has been in a position to exercise authority in the capital, which was under Islamist control for six months.

The city has witnessed several angry protests in the past two days against the presence of Ethiopian troops, with demonstrators hurling stones and burning tires in the streets.

Somalia fought wars against Ethiopia in 1964 and in 1977-78.

In Kismayo, senior Islamist leader Sheik Shariff Sheik Ahmed vowed that the movement would continue to wage war against the Ethiopian troops.

"I want to tell you that the Islamic courts are still alive and ready to fight against the enemy of Allah," Sheik Ahmed told residents in the port town.

Somalia Government Steps Gingerly Toward Its Capital (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA — Leaders from Somalia's capital gathered Saturday where matters of importance are often debated and settled here: under the shade of a thorny aqab tree.

This one was at a bombed-out military barracks on the edge of Mogadishu, chosen because the guest of honor, President Abdullahi Yusuf, refuses to enter a notoriously dangerous city that until last week had been under the control of an Islamist alliance. "I will come to Mogadishu once everything is in place," he said.

Though most Islamist fighters fled Thursday when troops from Ethiopia and Somalia's transitional government advanced, so far the government is moving cautiously in finishing the pacification and occupation of the capital. Most government soldiers remain on the city outskirts. Only one government agency, the Interior Ministry, has moved back in.

The security vacuum has led to sporadic looting and rioting. Local leaders warned that the transitional government might lose control of the capital if it did not act quickly to solidify its victory.

"People are already hiding their guns underground," said Ibrahim Shawey, the former mayor of Mogadishu. "I urge the government to use force [to disarm the city], rather than negotiate."

Part of the delay is strategic, officials said, with government forces needed elsewhere in the country. On Saturday, thousands of Ethiopian-led troops were heading south to the last Islamist holdout in Kismayo, about 280 miles from Mogadishu. Town leaders there briefly drove the Islamists out last week, but the region was overwhelmed again by hard-line fighters after they fled the capital.

Leaders of the Islamic Courts Union, supported by an extremist faction known as Shabab and some suspected foreign fighters, are threatening to make a last stand against Ethiopian soldiers in the region.

"Islamic Court officials will not surrender," said the alliance's chairman, Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed. "We will defend ourselves and defeat the enemy." He issued similar threats in Mogadishu, only to abandon the capital without a fight.

DOJ_NMG_0111357

Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi said Saturday that a battle was possible if the Islamists refused to give up or flee. "If remnants try to attack, bloodshed will take place," he said.

But the possible final showdown was sapping needed troops inside Mogadishu. Pacifying the capital will not be easy, Interior Minister Hussein Aidid said.

An estimated 2,000 armed opponents, including some Islamist fighters, are believed to be hiding in the city, and it is feared that Islamists may have left behind mines or booby traps.

Although the Islamic Courts Union collected the guns of militias and citizens at the beginning of its six-month reign, it redistributed them shortly before leaving the city. As a result, Mogadishu is once again awash in guns, particularly among two clans with a history of animosity toward the transitional government.

Many say they will keep their weapons. "I'll never give up my gun, either to the government or to the Ethiopians," said Iman Adan, 31, who worked at a high school before joining the Islamic Courts. "I'm ready to fight or die."

Government officials won't say how many troops are providing security inside the city.

Yusuf, who took a great deal of ribbing Saturday for his reluctance to enter Mogadishu, vowed to immediately implement a disarmament program, by force if necessary. Gedi predicted the guns would be collected within three weeks.

But both men said Mogadishu's leaders must share the responsibility by supporting the government, including the deployment of Ethiopian troops, and by controlling their children. In recent days, much of the anti-Ethiopia looting and rioting has involved teenagers.

"You must welcome the president not only by mouth, but by heart," said Gedi, who was targeted by assassins twice last year during visits to the capital. "In the past, you were welcoming me, but not working with me."

Peacekeepers Rebuff Chad Protection Force Proposal (AFP)

AFP, December 31, 2006

United Nations (UN) peacekeepers have rebuffed a call from the Security Council for a force to protect refugees in Chad, a report said.

The suggested force, which would also have policed the border with Sudan, was snubbed in a rare challenge to the security council, the Financial Times said, citing a UN peacekeeping department report which has yet to be released.

"Conditions for an effective UN peacekeeping operation do not seem to be in place at this time," it quoted the report as saying.

"Unless all the parties were to agree to a ceasefire and engage in a dialogue...a UN force would be operating in the midst of continuing hostilities and have no clear exit strategy."

The force was proposed in August in a resolution dealing with the regional consequences of the Darfur conflict.

The security council has also expressed concerns about attempts by rebel groups to seize power in Chad.

The report reflects peacekeepers' concern that they are being asked to do too much around the world, the FT said.

In October, Jean-Marie Guehenno, a senior UN peacekeeping official, described an "unprecedented" surge in the number and size of missions, for example in Lebanon and Sudan.

Castro Message Says He Could Recover (AP)

By Anita Snow, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 31, 2006

A statement attributed to Fidel Castro on the eve of the revolution's 48th anniversary assured Cubans Saturday that the ailing leader could still recover from his prolonged illness.

The message was read by a newscaster on state television and radio. Castro traditionally sends a message to Cuban citizens every New Year's Eve to mark the anniversary of the Jan. 1, 1959, revolution that brought him to power.

"I am grateful to you for your affection and support," read the message. "Regarding my recovery, I have always warned that it could be a prolonged process, but it is far from being a lost battle.

"I collaborate as a disciplined patient, attended by the...team of our doctors."

DOJ_NMG_0111358

Castro purportedly said he was still "in the loop" when it came to matters of state. "I have had exchanges with our closest comrades always when cooperation has been necessary on vitally important issues."

Earlier Saturday, Cuba's Communist Party daily reported that Castro telephoned the Chinese ambassador in Havana to wish President Hu Jintao a happy new year.

The government's release of the message and the news about his call to the Chinese ambassador seemed aimed at ensuring the world that he is recovering, five months after he underwent emergency intestinal surgery.

Because Castro's medical condition is shrouded in secrecy, it has been the subject of speculation and rumor.

Castro, 80, has not been seen in public since shortly before July 31 when he announced he was temporarily stepping aside while he recovered from his operation.

He has provisionally ceded power to his brother Raul, the 75-year-old defense minister.

Saturday's story said Castro called Chinese Ambassador Zhao Rongxian on Thursday evening and they discussed relations between their countries. The ambassador also transmitted his president's wishes for Castro's speedy recovery.

The island's official media has not commented on a Spanish surgeon's declarations earlier this week that Castro did not have cancer and was slowly recovering from a serious operation.

Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, chief surgeon at Madrid's Gregorio Maranon Hospital, said he flew to Havana on Dec. 21 to see Castro and consult with the Cuban leader's medical team on how his treatment was progressing.

Castro's medical condition is a state secret, but Cuban authorities deny he suffers from terminal cancer, as U.S. intelligence officials have claimed. Cuban officials have nonetheless stopped insisting Castro will return to power.

Garcia Sabrido said Castro could resume the presidency if his recovery is "absolute."

Some doctors believe Castro may suffer from diverticular disease, which can cause bleeding in the lower intestine, especially in people over 60. In severe cases, emergency surgery may be required.

Castro Issues New Year's Message (BBC)

BBC.com, December 31, 2006

In his New Year message, ailing Cuban President Fidel Castro has said he is recovering slowly from his surgery.

"Concerning my recovery I always said it would be a long process," he said in the written message, read out by announcers on state-controlled media.

"But it is far from being a lost battle," he added.

The 80-year-old leader handed over control of the country to his brother Raul in July, when he underwent urgent intestinal surgery.

President Castro traditionally sends a message broadcast by state TV and radio to Cubans on New Year's Eve to mark the anniversary of the 1 January 1959 revolution that brought him to power.

"I have not stopped being in the loop on main events and information.

"I have had exchanges with our closest comrades always when co-operation has been necessary on vitally important issues," the statement read.

The president also thanked the Cuban people for their courage during his recuperation.

Speculation about President Castro's medical condition has been rife.

Although Mr Castro's health is a state secret, Cuban officials have said that he is not suffering from cancer or any terminal illness, and that he is recuperating.

After Fidel, Business As Usual? (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

President Bush's hard-line attitude toward Cuba has prompted businesses to pull back from exploring opportunities in the communist nation.

That is not expected to change even as ailing, longtime dictator Fidel Castro lies in a hospital bed and his brother Raul runs the country.

DOJ_NMG_0111359

Other factors hindering the potential of doing business there include the island's small population and poor investment climate, but Mr. Bush's strong stance is the overarching issue, according to government officials, businesses and longtime observers and analysts.

The Cuban economic embargo, imposed in the early 1960s, allows cash sales only for food, medicine and medical equipment and restricts travel to the island.

During the Clinton administration, U.S. companies visited Cuba on trade missions and considered trade, investment and other business opportunities.

The Bush administration, however, has adopted a tougher approach, including a tightening last year of payment requirements on food exports to Cuba. That, business officials say, has played a major part in discouraging U.S. companies from exploring the Cuban market.

"If you look at the way the administration has tried to restrict food sales to Cuba, even though Congress passed a law permitting them, and at the roadblocks they've placed in the path of people and companies trying to visit Cuba, companies don't have to stare too hard at the tea leaves to get the message," National Foreign Trade Council President William A. Reinsch said.

"They just give up on trying to plan for business there. There has clearly been a chilling effect on opening doors to Cuba, and the result is that we will be unprepared when restrictions are finally lifted, which everybody knows will happen eventually," he said.

Bush backs embargo

The Bush administration has left little doubt where it stands on the embargo.

Mr. Bush said in 2002 that without political and economic reform, trade with Cuba "will merely enrich Fidel Castro and his cronies" and that the bar on U.S. financing for Cuban farm purchases would continue, saying that it "would just be a foreign-aid program in disguise, which would benefit the current regime."

Whenever the United States has shown interest in easing relations with Mr. Castro, "somehow it's always failed," Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in a recent interview.

"You look back at history over the last 47 years and anytime that it looks like we're getting too friendly, they go to Angola, they shoot a plane down, they open up their jails ... and they let out a lot of very nasty people, not political prisoners," he said.

The administration believes that outside investment will not lead to political liberalization or democratization, stressed Caleb Charles McCarry, the administration's Cuba transition coordinator.

"Investing in the current economic and political structure in Cuba simply supports the regime, and does not support the aspirations of the Cuban people for genuine change that leads to political and economic freedom," he said.

Under current law, Cuba would have to establish a transition government that takes a number of steps toward democracy and "does not include" Mr. Castro or his brother Raul for the embargo to be lifted.

Raul Castro is now running the country while the Cuban leader is in the hospital, leading some observers to speculate that the post-Fidel Castro era has begun. Mr. Castro has not been seen in public since July.

However, even if Fidel Castro leaves office in the next five years, the Economist Intelligence Unit in London said in an October report that it "does not anticipate any sudden, radical alterations in the political system."

In addition, unless relations with Washington improve, the report said, Havana "will continue to limit dissent on the grounds of national security."

The report predicted continued hostile U.S.-Cuban relations and sanctions, regardless of Fidel Castro's presence, saying the sort of fundamental change in the relationship that could lead to liberalization "would require strong political will on both sides to overcome resistance based on ideology and vested interests, and there are no signs yet of any shift in the entrenched positions."

Hill could ease embargo

The election of Democratic House and Senate majorities for the next Congress could lead to efforts to ease the embargo. But without radical change in Cuba or a softened administration stance, those moves would be limited.

Earlier this month, a delegation of 10 members of Congress from both sides of the aisle visited Havana, the largest U.S. legislative mission to Cuba under Mr. Castro to date.

DOJ_NMG_0111360

Raul Castro invited the U.S. to talk about the two countries' relations, including topics such as the embargo, immigration, drug trafficking, capture of fugitives, the environment and oil exploration.

Rep. Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican who has sponsored legislation to allow U.S. companies to work with Cuba to exploit oil reserves off its northern coast, said his bill would be more likely to get out of committee in the next Congress and predicted more proposals around the edges of the embargo, in such areas as banking regulation.

He is the Republican chairman of the Cuba Working Group, a bipartisan group of members of Congress who are pushing for changes in U.S. policy toward Cuba.

Rep. Bill Delahunt, Massachusetts Democrat and the probable chairman of the International Relations oversight and investigations subcommittee, plans hearings on U.S. democracy assistance for Cuba. Mr. Delahunt, who is the Democratic head of the Cuba Working Group, said Congress initially will focus on travel restrictions, although he criticized current overall Cuba policy.

"You'd have to be oblivious to the past 50 years not to conclude that this just hasn't worked. And now, we don't understand, I don't think, what's happening in Cuba, what the reality is in Cuba, and I think it hurts us if we want to have influence in Cuba as Fidel Castro passes from the scene," he said.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who is expected to head the Ways and Means Committee, will continue to oppose the embargo through a Treasury appropriations amendment to bar funding of the enforcement of the embargo, according to his staff.

But any push to lift the embargo in the new Congress would not get to the floor for a vote, said Sen. Larry E. Craig, an Idaho Republican who sponsored the oil legislation in the Senate.

He cited both a reluctance in the Senate to take dramatic action until there is a change in Havana and strong backing for the embargo by the Bush administration.

Congress can have some influence on foreign-policy issues, he said, "but if the executive is hard over on an issue, and they are, clearly, on this issue, then it will be very difficult to do anything over the next two years."

Doing business tough

One U.S. official said the administration is not using its embargo enforcement to try to discourage American companies from considering the Cuban market, but to ensure a transition to "real democracy," including "real economic reform."

Mr. Reinsch, however, described the situation more ambiguously.

"We don't think -- or can't prove at any rate -- that the administration has overtly told companies to stay out of Cuba notwithstanding the laws permitting them to engage in certain activities there," he said.

"We do think that their actions have been deliberate and have sent clear signals to the business community that doing business with Cuba won't be worth the effort."

Others clearly say the administration's stance has tamped down business enthusiasm for Cuba.

In 1994, members of the U.S.-Cuba Trade and Economic Council came from a variety of industries, including pharmaceuticals, financial services, tourism, food, agriculture and retail, although legal trade was limited to health care products, said John S. Kavulich II, the group's senior policy adviser. By 2002 and 2003, he said, membership was largely in the food and agriculture industries.

Many businesses that have shown interest in Cuba would not comment for this article.

Cuba has bought more than $1.3 billion in U.S. farm products since late 2001, according to the Congressional Research Service, but even companies allowed to export to Cuba see the embargo as a hindrance.

The U.S. rice industry exports 150,000 to 200,000 metric tons to Cuba a year, but that should be more like 500,000, said Stuart E. Proctor Jr., president of the USA Rice Federation. Cuban officials have said the U.S. would be Cuba's top rice supplier if it weren't for the embargo, he said.

Mr. Proctor said U.S. regulations have made shipping rice to Cuba more difficult, raising questions for Cuban officials about America as a rice supplier.

"You've got to be a reliable supplier, and we're not, in the eyes of the Cubans," he said.

Investment possibilities

DOJ_NMG_0111361

Observers instead stress the potential for investment, where opportunities for U.S. companies remain, although companies coming from countries ranging from Israel to China to Britain are already working there.

Investors from other countries have moved into such industries as nickel mining, telecommunications, infrastructure and citrus production, Lexington Institute Cuba analyst Philip Peters said, although he added that Cuba is looking for partners in other areas.

Potential opportunities for American companies include energy, agriculture, tourism, biotechnology and information technology, Mr. Peters said.

The best initial opportunities will be those that generate hard currency, such as nickel mining, where there is still room for new foreign companies, as well as oil and hotels catering to foreigners, he said.

Some foreign oil companies have signed agreements with Cuba for oil and gas exploration along Cuba's northern coast, including Repsol of Spain, Sherritt International of Canada and Sinopac of China.

Executives from energy-related U.S. companies such as Exxon Mobil Corp., Caterpillar Inc. and Valero Energy Corp. met with Cuban officials in Mexico City earlier this year to discuss Cuban oil reserves, but are barred from exploring those reserves.

The U.S. Geological Survey has estimated there are between 1 trillion and 9.3 trillion barrels of undiscovered oil and between 1.9 trillion and 22 trillion cubic feet of undiscovered natural gas off Cuba's northern coast.

If the United States maintains its embargo, India, Spain and Canada could end up drilling for oil 51 miles off the U.S. coast, according to Kirby Jones, president of the U.S.-Cuba Trade Association.

"If you're a Floridian looking with binoculars away from Key West, if you're going to see an oil platform, I think you'd feel more comfortable if it was a U.S. platform than a Chinese platform," Mr. Flake said.

Mr. Jones says the post-Castro era already has arrived, describing the country as a sophisticated, growing business environment with 350 joint ventures operating and 500 to 600 foreign companies maintaining offices. He said that even in areas that are still open to Americans, opportunities become fewer each day.

Cuba, he said, is much different than it was in 1994, when the first joint venture was set up. Foreign partners already are operating in all the sectors of the Cuban economy where they are allowed -- those aside from defense, health care and education -- and he said many of them have invested hundreds of millions of dollars in the past 12 years.

Other hindrances

The U.S. embargo is not the only obstacle to business, though. Observers note that Cuba only has about 11 million people and they have limited access to hard currency. Vietnam, by contrast, has a population of more than 84 million and is not an island.

One agriculture industry official said his company's attention to the Cuban market "would not be enormous" if the embargo were lifted but the political situation didn't change. The official said U.S. companies in the agricultural sector would be interested in Cuban possibilities without the embargo, but that there would be no rush into Cuba as long as the economy is state-driven.

Another agriculture executive said there are appealing aspects to Cuba, including its proximity and the fact that it pays cash, but added it will always be a small part of the market, even without the U.S. embargo.

Outside of agriculture, opportunities for U.S. exports may be limited as well.

"There's reason to believe that over time the Cuban economy is going to do well and produce a consumer class for American goods, but not in the short term," according to lawyer Robert Muse, who has substantial experience in U.S. laws relating to Cuba.

"When the embargo's lifted, some U.S. companies will seek to export to Cuba, but it's going to be targeted exports. It's going to be luxury goods for the hotel trade, for example," he said.

Joint ventures aren't as numerous as they used to be for investors. Cuban authorities have cut back on the number of small foreign companies active in Cuba since 2003, but are interested in larger companies for major projects in such areas as mining and energy, according to the Economist Intelligence Unit.

In opening to outside investment, Mr. Muse said Mr. Castro "made a tactical accommodation with capitalism" during the 1990s, when the Soviet bloc trading arrangements expired and "Cuba needed serious foreign investment, it needed to, in the expression they used in Cuba at the time, reinsert itself into the world economy."

DOJ_NMG_0111362

It also needed some limited reform to alleviate serious shortages of food, consumer goods and services, according to the CIA's World Factbook.

"But that situation has bettered itself over time," Mr. Muse said, adding that Cuba is now more economically stable "and there's been a direct correlation between the lack of new investment going into Cuba and its financial health," he said.

Cuba has increased ties with China and Venezuela, which has helped Cuba's economy. "These relationships seem set to become more important" and will overshadow Cuban relations with Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development countries, according to the Economist Intelligence Unit.

Cuban authorities would not comment for this article, but others pointed to Cuban government policies as a barrier to investment.

The Economist Intelligence Unit described Cuba as "one of the world's least attractive foreign investment destinations" from 2001 through 2005. The situation is likely to improve only slightly through 2011 because of state domination of Cuba's economy and limited opportunities for private business, the report said.

Outside investment also has been hindered by outstanding claims on expropriated property and by U.S. sanctions, which increase costs of such activities as shipping and restrict the export market for Cuban products, the report said.

Cuba's inhospitable investment environment may mean that there are still opportunities for U.S. firms, should relations ease between the two countries.

Mr. Muse said Mr. Castro's "genuine distaste for international capitalism and the profit motive" probably has left much of the investment market relatively open, adding that "very little is foreclosed from American companies at the moment."

However, he added that in areas where there is room for only one foreign investor, primarily in raw materials, American companies could lose out.

Spain Suspends Plan For Talks With ETA (AP)

By Mar Roman, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 31, 2006

A powerful car bomb exploded at Madrid's international airport Saturday and Spain's government, blaming the Basque group ETA, suspended plans for peace talks with the separatists.

The blast left two people missing and 26 injured, most with damage to their ears from the shock wave.

Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero said the government would halt talks with ETA over the bombing. The group had agreed to stop attacks in its cease-fire declaration earlier this year that was seen as the greatest hope in a decade of a peaceful end to the conflict.

"The condition for dialogue was and is the unequivocal desire to abandon violence," said Zapatero, who cut short a family holiday after the bombing. "The very grave attack today by the terrorist band ETA is radically contrary to that desire."

Zapatero had insisted as recently as Friday that he was optimistic the cease-fire would lead to a permanent peace.

ETA did not claim responsibility for the bombing, but a man who placed a warning call before the attack said he was a representative of the group. Following previous attacks, the group has sometimes waited weeks to claim responsibility.

ETA and its political supporters have been warning for months that the peace process was faltering. They have complained that the government has made no gesture to reciprocate its call for a cease-fire, such as meeting a long-standing ETA demand for its prisoners to be moved to the Basque region of northwestern Spain from other parts of the country.

The group has also said that continued arrests of suspected members and court rulings against the movement have broken a government promise to relieve pressure on the pro-independence group. It is also angry that the government has refused to allow talks among Basque political parties on the region's future until ETA's outlawed political wing Batasuna renounces violence.

The head of ETA's political wing, Arnaldo Otegi, said Saturday after the attack that he did not consider the peace process dead.

"Not only is it not broken, but it more necessary than ever," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0111363

"What happened in Madrid, if it's confirmed ETA is behind it, doesn't take us back to the scenario that existed before March 24," he added, referring to the day ETA declared its cease-fire.

Otegi blamed the government for the recent breakdown in peace talks, saying it has not made any gestures to the separatist group.

The attack early Saturday, which occurred inside a multistory parking garage at the airport, halted some air traffic on one of the year's busiest travel days.

More than 1,000 pounds of explosives had been packed inside the car used in the bombing, Spanish media reported. The explosion sent a massive column of smoke into the air and collapsed part of the building, sending rubble crashing onto parked cars.

Two Ecuadorean men believed to have been sleeping inside two separate parked cars were missing in the rubble, officials said.

More than 800 people have died since the ETA took up arms in the late 1960s, but none since May 2003. The group had continued a series of low-level bombings until just before it declared the cease-fire in March.

The opposition Popular Party, which has strongly opposed Zapatero's stance on negotiations with ETA, urged the government to break contact with the group and work to defeat it.

"This attack means that ETA is a criminal organization that doesn't want peace" said Popular Party leader Mariano Rajoy.

—

Associated Press Writer Harold Heckle contributed to this report.

Madrid Blast Leaves 2 Missing, 26 Injured (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

MADRID, Dec. 30 -- A powerful car bomb exploded in a parking lot at Madrid's international airport Saturday, leaving two people missing and 26 injured. Spain's government blamed the Basque group ETA and suspended plans for peace talks with the separatists.

The blast halted all air traffic on one of the year's busiest travel days and brought a fiery end to a nine-month-old ETA cease-fire and plans for talks that had spurred the greatest hopes in a decade of a peaceful end to the conflict.

"The condition for dialogue was and is the unequivocal desire to abandon violence," said Prime Minister JosÃ© Luis RodrÃ-guez Zapatero, who cut short a family vacation after the bombing. "The very grave attack today by the terrorist band ETA is radically contrary to that desire."

ETA did not assert responsibility for the bombing, but a man who placed a warning call before the attack said he was a representative of the group. Following previous attacks, the group has sometimes waited weeks to assert responsibility.

ETA and its political supporters have been warning for months that the peace process was faltering. They have complained that the government has made no gesture to reciprocate the group's call for a cease-fire, such as meeting a long-standing ETA demand for its prisoners to be moved to the Basque region of northwestern Spain from other parts of the country.

The group has also said that continued arrests of suspected members and court rulings against the movement have broken a government promise to relieve pressure on the pro-independence group. It is also angry that the government has refused to allow talks among Basque political parties on the region's future until ETA's outlawed political wing Batasuna renounces violence.

The head of ETA's political wing, Arnaldo Otegi, said Saturday after the attack that he did not consider the peace process dead.

"Not only is it not broken but it is more necessary than ever," he said.

"What happened in Madrid, if it's confirmed ETA is behind it, doesn't take us back to the scenario that existed before March 24," he added, referring to the day ETA's cease-fire took effect.

Two Ecuadoran men believed to have been sleeping inside a parked car were missing in the rubble, officials said.

More than 800 people have died since ETA took up arms in the 1960s, but none since May 2003. The group had continued a series of low-level bombings until just before it declared the cease-fire.

Spain Breaks Off ETA Talks After Madrid Airport Bomb (BLOOM)

By Sharon Smyth And Ben Sills

Bloomberg, December 31, 2006

Dec. 30 - Spain's government broke off talks with Basque terrorist group ETA after concluding it planted a truck bomb in Madrid's Barajas airport today that destroyed a four-story parking structure and left two people presumed dead.

``All initiatives for dialogue with ETA are suspended while ETA acts violently," Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero said hours afterward at a televised press conference in Madrid. ``The attack is incompatible with the cease-fire."

The bombing ruptured a ``permanent" cease-fire the separatist group announced in March that had persuaded Spain's Socialist Party-led government to begin talks in July. ETA had not killed in an attack in more than three-and-a-half years.

The reversal for Zapatero may weaken his chances for re- election in 2008. Opposition leader Mariano Rajoy has repeatedly denounced the terms of the ETA detente for being too favorable to a group that assassinated 800 people over the last 40 years.

Just yesterday the prime minister had said he expected progress in peace talks with ETA in the new year.

Zapatero, 46, was swept into office in an election upset three days after the March 2004 Islamic terrorist bombings of Madrid commuter trains that killed 191 people. He has since made the Basque peace process his first policy priority.

Today, he froze the talks, without entirely shutting the door, saying ``all initiatives aimed at moving forward this dialogue" are suspended.

Condition for Talks

``With violence there is no dialogue of any sort," the prime minister said. ``The essential condition" for talks was ``an unmistakable willingness to end violence. Until that condition is fulfilled, there will be no moves towards dialogue."

The government hasn't publicly described any progress made so far in negotiations.

Bomb disposal experts, not waiting for the device to detonate, triggered the explosion of the powerful truck bomb in a parking lot at Madrid airport's Terminal 4 at around 9 a.m. local time today. The decision followed three warning phone calls to authorities, the last of which claimed to be from ETA.

The terminal, a 6.1 billion euro ($8.1 billion) structure that opened only in February, had 575 flights scheduled today, and authorities suspended all for several hours while they cleared the site. Services at the other three terminals were unaffected, said the airport's operator AENA.

440 Pounds of Explosives

Terminal 4 is the base of Iberia Lineas Aereas de Espana SA, Spain's largest airline, and OneWorld alliance partners such as British Airways Plc. The massive building designed by Richard Rogers Partnership won the U.K.'s top architecture prize.

About 200 kilograms (440 pounds) of explosives were used in the blast, the largest charge employed by ETA in an attack in 15 years, Efe newswire reported, citing initial calculations of unidentified security officials. It damaged the terminal's arrivals lounge and destroyed several floors of the parking structure.

Two people are missing in the rubble, including a man who stayed in his car while his girlfriend went to meet a relative in the terminal.

Twenty-six people were treated for light injuries at the scene and five were later hospitalized, television station Antena 3 de Television reported.

``The information that we have leaves us with no shadow of a doubt that ETA is responsible," said Spanish Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba at a Madrid press conference. The explosives were ``extremely powerful," he said.

Batasuna Blames Government

Leaders of Batasuna, the separatist political party banned because of its links to ETA, have said that the peace process is blocked because the government has not delivered concessions that Batasuna say it was promised.

The leader of Batasuna, Arnaldo Otegi, today refrained from condemning the attack, and criticized the government for dragging its feet in negotiations.

``The process of resolving the Basque political conflict is not broken," Otegi said in a televised press conference. ``In no way does this return us to the situation before March 24," when ETA's cease-fire began.

DOJ_NMG_0111365

Bomb disposal experts were called in after three phone calls were made, the last of which claimed to be from ETA, warning about the bomb and giving the color, make and license plate number of the truck containing it, Rubalcaba said.

``This confirms what we already knew, that ETA is a criminal organization that doesn't want peace or the freedom of the Spanish people," opposition leader Mariano Rajoy said. Rajoy has demanded that the government break off all contact with the organization, according to a written statement.

ETA has been campaigning since the late 1960s for an independent state comprising the Basque-speaking provinces of northern Spain and southern France.

New Year Rings In EU Membership For Bulgaria, Romania (AFP)

AFP, December 31, 2006

Bulgaria and Romania have braced for a double New Year's celebration, with both countries set to become the newest members of the European Union at the stroke of midnight.

But with enlargement fatigue gripping large parts of the bloc, the EU's latest and poorest members are likely to be greeted more with a shrug than open arms.

And in Brussels, EU headquarters will be keeping a close eye on whether the two nations abide by their pledges to crack down on corruption and organised crime.

In Bulgaria, thousands of revellers were expected to flock to a gigantic rock and pop concert on Alexander Battenberg square in the capital, Sofia.

The show will be interrupted for speeches by President Georgi Parvanov, Prime Minister Sergei Stanichev and European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso. But the partying is expected to continue long into the night.

A pyramid of light will illuminate the sky above Sofia, its five rays emanating from the city's Orthodox cathedral, its Armenian church, a synagogue, a church and a mosque.

The latest Eurobarometer poll published in December shows that at the eve of accession 63 percent of all Bulgarians and 69 percent of all Romanians think their eastern European states will largely benefit from EU membership.

This is above the European norm where the average approval of membership ranges around 54 percent.

Together with Greece, the two newcomers will be the only Balkan nations in Europe's rich club, and will play a key role as representatives of a region ravaged by the wars in the former Yugoslavia.

Political analyst Ivan Krastev of the Sofia-based Centre for Liberal Strategies told AFP that "with the accession of Bulgaria and Romania the region will receive a clear message that enlargement is not dead".

The two newcomers "will bolster the voices in Europe calling for the enlargement to continue and include countries like Macedonia and Serbia," he said.

"Otherwise the EU risks ending up with a ghetto on its borders," Krastev said.

And for Niculai Idu, from the European Institute of Romania think tank, "joining the EU will be a guarantee that Romania will continue to evolve in terms of democracy and a market economy."

EU leaders agreed December 15 in Brussels to put the lid on further enlargement of the bloc.

The decision has major repercussions for EU hopefuls in the Balkans such as Croatia, which is at the front of the queue and expected to join by 2010.

Bulgaria and Romania will be Europe's poorest members with gross domestic product per capita barely reaching one third of the European average, Eurostat statistics show.

The two will contribute only one percent to the EU's gross domestic product.

The gap between Bulgaria and Romania and the current EU members has raised fears of a sharp rise in prices after January 1 in the newcomers where average monthly salaries are about 200 euros (260 dollars).

Perhaps due to people fearing instant inflation, Bulgaria this month saw a 30 percent rise in purchases compared to the usual end of year holiday spending spree.

Romanian hypermarkets also reported higher sales towards the end of the year with French Carrefour posting a 45 percent rise in 2006 compared to 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0111366

Bulgaria and Romania will be subjected to unprecedented monitoring by Brussels, due to lagging reforms.

The fight against crime and rampant corruption, management of the European funds and food safety will be particularly placed under Brussels' magnifying glass.

Bulgaria will also have to carry out reforms to make its judiciary more efficient, with several notorious criminals managing to avoid imprisonment.

If progress is slow, the enthusiasm of the two newcomers risks being clouded by restrictions, including partial suspension of agricultural subsidies and non-recognition of the decisions of their courts in Europe.

Another problem is allowing borders to fall totally.

Fearing a flood of cheap labor, Spain, Britain, Denmark, Hungary, Ireland, France and Greece have announced restrictions on workers from the two incoming states.

A New Parliament, But Still All Putin? (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

RUSSIA heads into 2007 facing the question of whether President Vladimir V. Putin's centralization of power can ensure the smooth — and more important, credible — election of a new Parliament, now scheduled for December.

Elections, even in a "democracy" as managed as Russia's, have a way of surprising, as Ukraine showed after a fraudulent presidential election in 2004 led to mass protests. Mr. Putin is popular enough to ensure that whoever he supports will fare well, but corruption remains deeply rooted, as do poverty and crime and violence, any of which could be a catalyst for an electoral nyet.

The Kremlin is taking no chances. With Mr. Putin's blessing, the existing Parliament, or Duma, spent much of 2006 preparing for the elections by tightening laws. It abolished minimum turnout requirements and the option of voting "against all." New election rules also barred candidates from criticizing the authorities in office or even encouraging a vote against an opponent.

New laws against extremism have already been used to raid a political group led by the chess champion Garry Kasparov. When Mr. Kasparov led a rally of a few thousand protesters in Moscow this month, the police outnumbered them four to one.

Critics said the restrictions would stifle what opposition remains, including what's left of the Communist Party and the old liberal democrats. The Duma is already dominated by United Russia, a party with little identity except as a reflection of Mr. Putin's legislative will.

Liliya Shevtsova of the Moscow Carnegie Center said the Kremlin risked eliminating competition. "To have just one party with a constitutional majority," she said, "it starts to look like the Soviet Communist Party."

So in October, the Kremlin created an "opposition" party, cobbled from smaller parties. It is called Just Russia, and it, too, supports Mr. Putin. For the party's leader, Sergei M. Mironov, this is a familiar path. He ran in the 2004 election "against" Mr. Putin by urging voters to re-elect Mr. Putin.

With a Kremlin endorsement and coverage on state television, Just Russia could provide a foil for United Russia, and provide at least a modicum of interest to the stilted politics of Mr. Putin's second term, marked more than anything by an absence even of debate, let alone real competition.

Mr. Kasparov says the Kremlin has obscured the seeds of discontent. And they are growing, he says, especially beyond the glow of Moscow's riches.

A big question looming is who will replace Mr. Putin in 2008? The maneuvering expected in 2007 reflects a concern over whether the system he created could survive without him. "The big day is approaching," Mr. Kasparov said. "Uncertainty kills the system."

Politics, Economics And Time Bury Memories Of The Kazakh Gulag (NYT)

By Ilan Greenberg

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0111367

KARAGANDA, Kazakhstan — Maria Sadina hunched over fading pictures of her parents, ethnic Germans who were deported in 1941 from the Volga region in Russia to one of Karaganda's many gulag camps.

Ms. Sadina's father was imprisoned for praising the quality of a German-made tractor, and for a decade he worked as a slave laborer in the nearby coal mines. Her mother was sent to the Karaganda gulag simply for her German heritage.

They had married and reared their daughter, Ms. Sadina, in a two-room brick house so low to the ground that visitors must bend over to avoid hitting the ceiling. Ms. Sadina, now a grandmother, continues to live in the same house, the walls now appearing to crumble, tending the same garden her parents once harvested to survive.

She pointed to the neighbors' homes through her kitchen window. "These people are all children of the gulag," she said. "Nobody talks about it anymore. Nobody even wants to look at their pictures anymore."

The gulags once spread over the Kazakhstan steppe like a thick wreath. Eleven sprawling camps with names like Alzhir, a Russian acronym for the Akmolinsk Camp for Wives of Traitors of the Motherland, housed hundreds of thousands of prisoners and their families. The camps, built shortly after the creation of the Soviet Union, were partly emptied to provide soldiers and workers during World War II and were eventually closed, although not dismantled, after Stalin died in 1953.

In Kazakhstan today, a large percentage of people have parents or grandparents whose life trajectories were savagely rewired by deportation and imprisonment in the camps. But memories of the gulags are dying, fading like Ms. Sadina's photos.

"For younger generations the gulag is uninteresting," said Arest Savchak, a 61-year-old teacher whose parents and grandparents were exiled to Karaganda as political prisoners for the crime of supporting Ukrainian nationalism. "After the collapse of the Soviet Union, when we entered market economy, the values and the views of people have changed. Unless the gulag can be linked to the present time, it is meaningless."

For many Karaganda youngsters, the oppression the gulags stand for does not register. "This was just a village for miners," said Sasha Talabaev, 12, who was riding a bicycle through the heart of what was one of the gulags. Some of the reasons for a quick and collective forgetting are obvious. The memories, after all, are painful. And since the fall of the Soviet Union and Kazakhstan's independence in 1991, there are more pleasant things to focus on.

Growing affluence is one of them. The economy is growing at about 10 percent a year, and with the aid of oil, the country has developed a sophisticated middle class and has nurtured to maturation a regional banking center. Its once dour towns have metastasized into modern cities.

But there are political aspects to a sidestepping of Kazakhstan's recent history, too, often born out of the government's determination to stay friendly with Russia.

To sustain support for a pro-Russia foreign policy, "the Kazakhstan state has gone to great lengths to construct an ideology for its nation-state that glosses over its colonial and neo-colonial history with Russia," Sean R. Roberts, a researcher in Central Asia affairs at Georgetown University, wrote on Dec. 19 in his Web log about the region.

Although those efforts have not added up to a blanket ban on public remembrances of the gulags, the government has instead chosen to ignore the issue. And it has used its control of the education system to keep texts from dwelling on the topic.

In a more pointed example of control, the government forbade large-scale remembrances of a violent uprising in Almaty, the capital, that took place in December 1986. As many as 40,000 ethnic Kazakhs poured into Almaty's central square then to protest Mikhail S. Gorbachev's firing of the chief of the Kazakh Soviet state. Soviet security forces are estimated to have killed at least 200 protesters on the square.

The rebellion was a watershed for Kazakh identity. It resonated too strongly for the government to ignore this year, so in October, President Nursultan A. Nazarbayev quietly dedicated a statue to commemorate the event. But the gesture received little coverage in the Kazakh press, which is closely monitored and controlled by the government.

Opposition leaders and several thousand nationalists hoped to use the statue as a gathering point for an antigovernment rally on the anniversary, but the government moved swiftly to crush preparations for it.

With Kazakh nationalism having become mostly the purview of the anti-Russia opposition here, the government has had to use other avenues to promote a coherent national identity. That is no small challenge in this country of 17 million people who span 80 different ethnicities and nearly as many religions — a direct legacy of the Soviet Union's use of Kazakhstan as a holding pen for prisoners, dissidents and people who did not fit in the Russian mainstream.

DOJ_NMG_0111368

Popular culture has been one tool of choice, especially through the government-financed movie studio KazakhFilm, which has a near monopoly on the country's film industry. This year the studio released its biggest hit yet, a historical piece called "Nomad" that delved into distant history, telling the little-known story of an ancient battle to give an uplifting view of Kazakh identity. The film, a $34.5 million production, broke box-office records in Kazakhstan, grossing more than $1 million here and also doing well in Russia.

Despite the huge expense of such historical movies, KazakhFilm plans more. But the company's chief executive, Talgat Temenov, says that none will be set in the 20th century.

"The Kazakh people have a tragic history, but with a movie like 'Nomad,' people can feel a sense of pride," he said. "Film is an art and should not be a political tool, but at the same time we need to respect what history can do to people's psychology."

Steven A. Barnes, an assistant professor of history at George Mason University who has studied the gulags in Karaganda, insists that history's relevance to society is exactly why remembering Kazakhstan's painful gulag past is so important.

"In the post-Soviet space, the trip from remembering to forgetting has been remarkably swift," he said. "Perhaps such public forgetting would seem less problematic if not for the fact that it enables strong, authoritarian rule that clamps down on basic human rights like freedom of speech and the right of assembly."

Chinese Focus On Navy Leaves Big Political Wake (LAT)

By Mark Magnier, Mitchell Landsberg

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

BEIJING — President Hu Jintao's call last week for a strong Chinese navy won't threaten U.S. military dominance any time soon. But in China, where symbolism often is as important as substance, the address was seen by analysts as serving two functions: to help build a policy consensus and signal his near-complete grip on the political field before a key party congress next fall.

"This is very significant," said Ni Lexiong, a professor at the Shanghai Institute of Political Science and Law. "Though this does not mean immediate budget increases, it is a strong signal that lays out our future direction."

State media gave prominent play Thursday to comments by Hu a day earlier at a Communist Party meeting on the need for a powerful navy prepared "at any time" for military struggle.

"We should make sound preparations for military struggles and ensure that the forces can effectively carry out missions at any time," Hu reportedly said.

China's navy has been the country's weakest link under a military structure that has emphasized a homegrown manpower advantage for its army and borrowed Soviet technology for its air force. But even as it restructures, China is keen to bolster its weak third arm.

The aim is to prevent Taiwan from declaring independence and to safeguard the seaborne trade, oil and other resources needed to power China's booming economy. China has considered Taiwan a part of its territory since a split between the Nationalists and Communists in 1949 after protracted civil war.

China's growing military profile has raised eyebrows at the Pentagon, which fears an erosion of its military dominance in the Pacific and beyond.

"Previously, China did not have the capability to maintain anything but symbolic naval presence on the approaches to the mainland," the Defense Department said in its 2006 report "Military Power of the People's Republic of China." "The PLA [People's Liberation Army] navy, however, appears interested in expanding its presence through the Straits of Malacca and into the Indian Ocean."

Of significance in China's one-party state with its emphasis on political theater, analysts said, was Hu's choice of venues. Rather than addressing an audience from all major service branches, he chose a meeting of naval specialists, a signal that the navy can expect special treatment in the bureaucratic battle for attention and resources.

Also significant was the timing. The military has been an area of political weakness for Hu. The president's resume doesn't boast the years of military service many of his predecessors had. Nor did it help that ex-President Jiang Zemin held on to his last military post until late 2005, more than two years into Hu's administration.

DOJ_NMG_0111369

But the notably careful leader's confident military tone Wednesday and his appearance in military green immediately after a purge of a key Jiang loyalist in Shanghai suggests he faces no significant opposition across the Chinese political spectrum.

China has made no secret of its desire for a credible "blue water" navy, and its blistering economy, $1 trillion in foreign reserves and growing confidence place it in an increasingly strong position to fund its objective.

"It may be time for them to get their fair share," said Ralph A. Cossa, president of the Honolulu-based Pacific Forum CSIS, a think tank. "A lot of other sectors of modernization took priority."

In an 83-page defense white paper released Friday, China said it also would strengthen its air force to enhance its airstrike, missile defense and early-warning systems.

In March, China announced a 14% increase in overall military spending to $35 billion, the latest in a string of double-digit increases. Some U.S. defense analysts say the actual figure may be two or three times higher.

Beijing faces significant challenges before it can pose a military threat to the U.S., some analysts say. Politically it is also wary of any step that might appear too provocative to Washington under its "peaceful rise" strategy, given the importance of U.S. trade for domestic stability and development.

China's military spending, even at a higher figure, is still a fraction of U.S. levels. China's dream of acquiring a working aircraft carrier is years, perhaps decades, off. And it faces enormous challenges in revamping a labor-intensive, technologically challenged military into a modern, flexible fighting force.

In his comments Wednesday, Hu called for "strict management of the navy according to law."

Some analysts read this as a veiled reference to corruption in the ranks. This month, a military court handed down a life sentence to Vice Adm. Wang Shouye on embezzlement charges, according to Hong Kong's pro-mainland Wen Wei Po newspaper. He reportedly is the most senior Chinese military officer ever jailed for corruption.

"It's not only a reference to the vice admiral, but the corruption, irregularities and general lack of discipline," said Andrew Yang, a military analyst with Taiwan's Chinese Council of Advanced Policy Studies. Hu "plans to emphasize discipline and rule of law."

Beyond China's aircraft carrier plans, U.S. military planners are watching closely any steps Beijing takes to expand its deep-water anti-submarine capability, to develop large numbers of nuclear attack submarines or to increase open-water training.

Washington has also called on China repeatedly to be more forthcoming on its military budgets, plans and capabilities.

China first voiced a desire for an indigenous aircraft carrier in the late 1970s, according to Pentagon reports, before buying, in 1985, the carrier Melbourne from Australia. The hull was scrapped, but not before engineers studied the ship and built a replica of the flight deck for pilot training, the Defense Department said.

After the fall of the Berlin Wall, the Chinese purchased two Soviet carriers — the Minsk in 1998 and the Kiev in 2000 — which they turned into floating military theme parks after carefully studying their designs.

Some analysts say the Chinese could have an operational carrier by 2015; others say it probably won't be before 2020. A working carrier would require a huge increase in its military budget, analysts said, as well as overcoming significant technological hurdles and significantly upgrading the skill of its navy personnel.

"They're still far behind for the foreseeable future for the United States, and also for India," Yang said.

The Buzz On Japan's New Premier: Too Old-school (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

TOKYO — Political honeymoons end sooner or later for almost every leader, but the danger for new Japanese Prime Minster Shinzo Abe is not just that his popularity is sliding three months into the job. It's that he's already being mocked.

Consider the view of Brutus magazine, a style bible for Tokyo men who care about being ahead of every trend, whether it's fad food or how to look cool at the gym. "Beautiful Country?" asked the cover of the magazine's December edition, invoking the political mantra Abe has used to sell his nationalist vision of a resurgent Japan.

Out of touch, Brutus scolded Abe.

DOJ_NMG_0111370

"Right now what the entire world is crazy about is cool Japan," the magazine cover line told Abe, referring to the elements of Japanese culture, from anime to architecture, that are now part of global chic.

The Brutus view sums up a developing perception here: that Japan's youngest postwar prime minister may be an out-of-touch young fogey, more nostalgic for an old Japan than eager to usher in a new one.

Critics contend that his government's focus on nationalist obsessions such as passing laws to enforce patriotism among schoolchildren is a distraction from the core economic and social issues that present far graver challenges to Japan.

They also argue that Abe's government lacks discipline and coherence. Since North Korea's nuclear weapons test Oct. 9, some senior government officials have repeatedly called for a debate on whether Japan needs its own nuclear option, in defiance of Abe's desire to shut down the chatter.

Suspicions that Abe lacks toughness — and control over his party — are contributing to his sudden slip in polls. A Jiji Press poll in mid-December put Abe's approval rating at 42%, a 9-percentage-point fall in a month.

He had been off to a positive start. Within days of taking office, Abe held summit meetings with the leaders of China and South Korea, ending the top-level diplomatic freeze sparked by the visits of his predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi, to Yasukuni Shrine, where Japanese war criminals are among the honored souls of the country's war dead.

But the prime minister has stumbled on the domestic front. Despite the markets' buzz about the long-last arrival of a Japanese recovery, the economy has yet to truly catch fire, largely because domestic consumption remains sluggish.

That hurts Abe, who is counting on consumer-led growth to help resolve Japan's massive public debt. The prime minister is eager to avoid any high-profile tax hikes ahead of crucial Upper House elections in July, which are being seen as a referendum on his leadership.

That leaves little room to maneuver. Abe is committed to continuing Koizumi's belt-tightening reforms that have cut public spending, notably transfers of cash to the towns and regions that form the Liberal Democratic Party base.

Koizumi used his populist skills to free himself from the calcified hand of the political machine that has ruled postwar Japan from its backrooms. His ability to build a public consensus for his policies gave him an independence that allowed him to hack away at the party's habit of showering its supportive constituencies with public money.

Koizumi was even able to chase the hard core of anti-reformers out of the party by successfully calling a death-or-glory election in which he ran his own reformist candidates against LDP "rebels" who opposed a key economic reform.

But Abe shocked many here by welcoming that old guard back into the party this fall. The move made him appear beholden to the LDP's old back-room chieftains and seem deaf to voters' call for a more modern approach to politics.

"When Abe brought the rebels back into the party, people got the impression he was retreating from the reform agenda," political analyst Takao Toshikawa said.

Even Abe's 2007 budget shows how he is being pulled between imperatives to slash the size of government and the political need to satisfy politicians clamoring for public funds.

Abe billed his first budget as a cost-cutting exercise that would eliminate annual budget deficits by 2011 or earlier, pledging to cut the number of bonds issued by 15.2% and lowering spending on public works projects by 3.5%.

Even so, rising welfare and medical costs associated with Japan's rapidly aging population meant the budget's overall spending rose by 4%. And in its less-noted supplemental budget for 2006, the Abe government chose to spend much of the $38.6-billion windfall from higher-than-expected tax revenue on public works projects, although some were labeled "disaster prevention programs."

"Koizumi reduced spending on public works and cut the allocation of taxes to local governments, but with local economies weakening, there has been mounting pressure within the LDP to restore some of the old subsidies," said Hiromichi Shirakawa, chief economist at Credit Suisse in Tokyo. "These extra tax revenues were funneled back into what you could call 'old Japan.' "

Amid Political Upheaval, Israeli Economy Stays Healthy (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0111371

JERUSALEM, Dec. 26 — For Israel, it has been a typically tumultuous year: Ariel Sharon, then the prime minister, collapsed into a coma on Jan. 4, the radical Islamic group Hamas won Palestinian elections later that month, and Israel fought a monthlong war in Lebanon this summer.

But despite the political turmoil and spasms of violence, Israel, it seems, has figured out how to keep its economy charging forward.

It was the country's third straight year of strong growth, with the economy expanding nearly 5 percent. The stock market has been hitting record highs; unemployment is at a 10-year low. Israel's central bank is lowering interest rates to 4.5 percent on Jan. 1, putting them well below rates in the United States, an almost unprecedented development. The Israeli shekel is trading at 4.2 to the dollar, its strongest level in five years.

Further, Warren E. Buffett, the billionaire investor, paid $4 billion for an Israeli company, and Donald Trump is developing a 70-story luxury residential tower on the outskirts of Tel Aviv.

"Israelis look at the economy, and they've essentially been through these disturbances in the past, and they know the economy is pretty robust and it tends to come back," said Stanley Fischer, the governor of the Bank of Israel. "Things that happen here have a smaller impact on markets than I think they would abroad."

While the Israeli economy has been thriving, the Palestinian economy has moved in the opposite direction, contracting by an estimated 10 to 15 percent this year, according to the Palestine Monetary Authority.

For Israel, the business that best illustrates the economy's resilience this year is the company Mr. Buffett bought, Iscar Metalworking Company, a global leader in the manufacture of precision metal-cutting tools.

In May, Mr. Buffet bought 80 percent of the company, which has its headquarters on an isolated hilltop in northern Israel that offers a panoramic view of the nearby border with Lebanon.

Barely two months later, a cross-border raid by Hezbollah guerrillas ignited 34 days of fighting that pushed Israeli troops into Lebanon and drew heavy rocket barrages against northern Israel.

One rocket slammed into the Tefen Industrial Park, where Iscar is situated, causing minor damage to a building belonging to another company. Many more rockets crashed nearby during the weeks of war.

Many Iscar workers moved their families away from the border region, but the company maintained production, with only occasional slowdowns.

"It took us a brief time to adjust, but we didn't miss a single shipment," said Eitan Wertheimer, Iscar's chairman. "For our customers around the world, there was no war."

The northern city of Haifa came under almost daily rocket attacks, and ships stopped entering Haifa's port, the country's largest. Some exporters shipped their goods by air at much higher expense in order to meet deadlines.

The Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, which has been setting records throughout the year, seemingly shrugged off the war; it was slightly higher at the end of the conflict in August than before it started in July.

At the beginning of the year, Israel's economy was forecast to grow at around 5.5 percent, and will come in at about 4.8 percent, according to Mr. Fischer, who attributed the dip to the war.

The Palestinian economy, meanwhile, has been devastated. During the peace talks of the 1990s, the Israelis and Palestinians increased cooperation, and by 2000, both sides were growing rapidly and nearly 150,000 Palestinians entered Israel daily. Most were workers who accounted for a large slice of the Palestinian economy.

When the Palestinian uprising began in September of that year, both sides took an immediate economic hit, but for the Palestinians, the downward spiral has yet to end.

Israeli security forces greatly increased the web of restrictions in the Palestinian areas to prevent attacks, and the measures have also imposed great hardships on Palestinian economic life. The Palestinians grew increasingly dependent on aid as their access to Israel's economy dwindled. The problems worsened into crisis this year after Hamas came to power, and Israel began withholding Palestinian tax revenues and Western countries cut off direct aid to the Palestinian government.

The Palestinian per capita gross domestic product, which was about $1,800 annually at the beginning of the uprising, plummeted to $1,200 last year and continues to fall.

DOJ_NMG_0111372

For Israelis, per capita gross domestic product has risen over the last six years from a little over $15,000 a year to around $18,000, according to government figures.

Israel turned the corner on a two-year recession in 2003, and for the past three years the economy has expanded at 4.4 percent to 5.2 percent annually, with a similar forecast for next year. The growth comes from technology, service and other modern industries, and trade mostly with the United States, Europe and East Asia.

Plagued by hyperinflation in the 1980s, Israel has an inflation rate hovering around zero percent this year, and it has been averaging less than 1 percent annually for the past five years.

The economic tide is not lifting every Israeli boat, however. Despite the economic growth, the number of Israelis living below the poverty level has been edging up, from 18 percent in 2002 to more than 20 percent last year, according to the government's National Insurance Institute.

Critics say this is because Israelis who are struggling economically have seen their benefits fall sharply, while they remain unemployed. The unemployment rate is at its lowest level in a decade, but still relatively high at 8.4 percent.

Benjamin Netanyahu, who as finance minister pushed aggressive open-market policies from 2003 to 2005, was also widely criticized for cutting social programs in a country where couples often have many children and depend heavily on such subsidies.

"The basic problem is that economic growth has been very uneven," said Shlomo Swirski, the academic director of Adva, a research institute that focuses on the poor.

Job growth, he said, has been concentrated in sectors that require a high level of education. Economic growth has been greatest in Tel Aviv and surrounding areas, the economic hub of the country, while the less developed Galilee in the north and Negev Desert in the south have seen much less progress, Mr. Swirski added.

"We're looking at growth that is highly concentrated geographically, economically and socially," he said.

Economists note that many of the poor come from two groups, Israeli Arabs and ultra-Orthodox Jews, that have large families and low participation rates in the work force. Among Israeli Arabs, few women have formal jobs. Among the ultra-Orthodox, many men do not work.

"We still see a strong debate over income distribution," said David Levhari, an economics professor at Hebrew University. "But overall, I think we're looking at an economy that should continue to do pretty well."

Analysis: Annan To Leave Office Sunday, But Won't Leave U.N. Behind (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — Kofi Annan steps down as U.N. secretary-general at midnight Sunday, leaving behind a global organization far more aggressively engaged in peacekeeping and fighting poverty — but struggling to restore its tarnished reputation.

Taking office six years after the collapse of the Soviet Union, Annan helped preside over a decade that saw the world unite against terrorism after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, then divide deeply over the U.S.-led war against Iraq which toppled Saddam Hussein.

At a Millennium Summit in September 2000, he spurred world leaders to adopt a blueprint to wage a global war on poverty and bring the United Nations into the 21st century.

Five years later, he called a follow-up summit to mark the U.N.'s 60th anniversary. Hoping to complete the bold changes, he sought to promote development, ensure international security and end human rights abuses. History's largest gathering of world leaders took a first step, but it fell far short.

Unlike the upbeat atmosphere at the dawn of the new millennium, the World Summit in 2005 took place after a year of almost daily attacks on the United Nations over allegations of corruption in the U.N. oil-for-food program in Iraq, bribery by U.N. purchasing officials, and widespread sexual abuse by U.N. peacekeepers.

World leaders agreed to create an internal ethics office but they did not give Annan the authority to make sweeping management changes. The major overhaul of the U.N.'s outdated management practices and operating procedures will be left to Annan's successor, Ban Ki-moon, who takes over on Jan. 1.

DOJ_NMG_0111373

In what was considered a major summit achievement, world leaders pledged to protect civilians from genocide, war crimes and ethnic cleansing — but before stepping down earlier this month U.N. humanitarian chief, Jan Egeland accused leaders of failure to translate their pledge into action, especially in Sudan's Darfur region, Iraq and the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

The 2005 summit also approved a fund to promote democracy and a new Peacebuilding Commission to help countries make the difficult transition from war to peace, and it renewed a commitment to achieve the Millennium Development Goals including cutting extreme poverty by half and achieving universal primary education by 2015.

A new Human Rights Council was highly touted as a replacement for the discredited Human Rights Commission — but in its first year, the council disappointed Annan and human rights activists by following the commission's tradition of focusing its attacks on Israel and ignoring abuses elsewhere.

At a farewell news conference earlier this month, Annan said he considered his top achievements the promotion of human rights, fighting to close the gap between extreme poverty and immense wealth, and the U.N.'s campaign to fight AIDS and other infectious diseases.

"His greatest accomplishment was to set a framework that moved the U.N. from one century to the next — the response to mass atrocities, the central role of democracy, the importance of human rights, and a priority to development," said Lee Feinstein, a fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations.

Under Annan, U.N. peacekeeping has expanded with nearly 80,000 U.N. troops and international police currently deployed from Africa and the Mideast to Kosovo, Haiti and East Timor.

Annan's first five-year term culminated in 2001 with the Nobel Peace Prize — shared with the United Nations — for "their work for a better organized and more peaceful world." Annan himself was lauded for "bringing new life to the organization."

But Annan's second five-year term was not without shadows. An investigation led by former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker blamed shoddy U.N. management and the world's most powerful nations for allowing corruption in the $64 billion oil-for-food program in Iraq to go on for years. Volcker's final report in October 2005 accused more than 2,200 companies from some 40 countries of colluding with Saddam Hussein's regime to bilk the humanitarian program in Iraq of $1.8 billion.

Annan was besieged with questions about his son's involvement with a company that won an oil-for-food contract, and U.S. Sen. Norm Coleman, a Minnesota Republican, called for his resignation.

Annan told reporters that one of his worst moments was the way oil-for-food "was exploited to undermine the organization."

Feinstein said that "Annan was perhaps the most pro-American secretary-general who nonetheless was never accepted by U.N. critics in the Congress."

"His greatest failings were clearly the failure to rein in the U.N. Secretariat and streamline management more broadly," Feinstein said.

Professor Edward Luck, director of the Center on International Organization at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs, said he thinks "historians are going to give Kofi Annan relatively high marks."

"He's certainly someone who aimed high and sometimes failed to achieve what his rhetoric promised," Luck said. "But he certainly did succeed in restoring the individual to the center of the U.N.'s agenda, both in terms of human security and human rights and the responsibility to protect."

Annan, 68, said he will maintain all those U.N. concerns — and many more — in his new life, likely to be divided between Switzerland and his native Ghana.

"You can take the man out of the U.N.," Annan told one recent farewell party, "but you can't take the U.N. out of the man."

Annan Focused On Human Element (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Kofi Annan says that he will keep working until midnight tonight, when his 10-year tenure as the world's top diplomat officially ends. But he has already begun reflecting on his achievements, frustrations and failures as a leader who embodies the world's ideals, and as a man who often could not escape his limitations to make those ideals a reality.

DOJ_NMG_0111374

Although it is sometimes debated whether Annan, 68, was more "secretary" or "general," he was mostly an idealist. He would like to be remembered, he said this month, as the leader who pushed the world to agree to intervene to stop genocides, and to try to cut poverty in half. He sought to make the U.N. about people, not just geopolitics.

But he was often overwhelmed by the details of managing a gargantuan organization that kept the peace in 18 countries and once ran the entire economy of Iraq. His management lapses were blamed for the subversion of the $64-billion oil-for-food program in Iraq, as well as a wave of corruption scandals and sexual exploitation by peacekeepers under his watch.

Recognizing the need to update the 60-year-old institution, Annan proposed sweeping reforms that would make the U.N. better able to deal with the new threats and challenges of the 21st century. But he was stymied by a group of developing countries, which saw the changes as a loss of power, and by the U.S., which had its own vision of how to revamp the world body.

At a Security Council luncheon six weeks after he launched his reform plan, Annan jokingly apologized for not yet having finished the reorganization. Russian Ambassador Sergei V. Lavrov piped up and said, "Mr. Secretary-General, what are you complaining about? You have had more time than God!" Annan responded, "You are right, but God started with one great advantage — with a clean canvas, and without a Security Council and a General Assembly."

Annan, the son of a chieftain from Ghana, was christened "Anthony" but was known by the name Kofi, which means "born on Friday." He joined the bottom ranks of the U.N. in 1962 and didn't plan to stay longer than four years, he said. But he quietly rose through the institution to head the peacekeeping department. In December 1996, the Clinton administration pushed him as its candidate to replace Boutros-Boutros Ghali, the outspoken Egyptian secretary-general it deemed a liability to U.S. interests.

Annan was chosen because he was an African who knew the U.N. system, and had proved that he was pragmatic and effective and could work with the United States when he oversaw peacekeepers in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Haiti. But most important, he did not have a political agenda or an overweening ego that could put him in conflict with the U.S. By the end of Annan's decade, however, he grew to be a quiet but compelling challenger to Washington.

First, a honeymoon

Annan's first five years in the wood-paneled office at the top of the shimmering U.N. headquarters were a honeymoon of sorts. Annan's manner is gentle, and nonconfrontational, and he is so soft-spoken that he can hardly be heard without a microphone. When perturbed, his voice gets lower, not louder. When anxious, he clenches his jaw and twists his large gold ring. That demeanor gave him a kind of regal aloofness, and a gracious yet distant charm that served him well as a nonpartisan mediator, but sometimes made him seem to lack fire.

He and his Swedish wife, Nane, the elegant niece of Holocaust hero Raoul Wallenberg, traveled around the U.S. and the world, giving a human face to an otherwise impersonal institution and imparting Annan's belief that every person has equal rights, and that a government's duty is to protect them.

Annan introduced the doctrine of "humanitarian intervention" — that borders should not shield governments that cannot or will not protect their own people. The idea was born in part of his feelings of impotence and guilt as the head of peacekeeping during massacres in the Bosnian town of Srebrenica and in Rwanda that the U.N. did little to stop. Although some countries initially resisted, in 2005, 191 leaders endorsed "the responsibility to protect," something Annan considers one of his top achievements.

For championing human rights and development, and "for bringing new life to the organization," Annan and the U.N. won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2001. He became known as "a diplomatic rock star," and the spotlight seemed to shine on the U.N. as a central stage in world affairs.

But the second half of his tenure would be much darker.

Sept. 11

The Sept. 11 attacks made the Bush administration more determined to strengthen national security — but, Annan later argued, at the expense of multilateralism and human rights. In 2002, President Bush challenged the Security Council to confront Iraq or stand aside, and while the U.S. attempted for six months to gain the U.N.'s stamp of legitimacy for its long-planned invasion, it ended up going into Iraq without it.

Annan cited the failure to stop the Iraq war as the worst moment of his career.

DOJ_NMG_0111375

"I really did everything I could to try to see if we could stop it," he said, including desperate rounds of phone calls and meetings with every leader he could reach, with every proposal he could think of. In April 2003, weeks after the invasion began, Annan literally lost his voice.

He seemed to lose his nerve as well, taking weeks off with what was described as "a very bad cold," but what aides described later as a sort of depression or "paralysis of despair. " He returned, somewhat diminished but determined to make the U.N. the kind of institution that the U.S., or any other country, would find indispensable.

Washington went into Iraq without the U.N.'s blessing, but it also had to do without significant U.N. help in rebuilding the country, an essential piece of postwar planning that the administration had assumed the world body would take on. Annan did send a team of his best and brightest, including his close friend and diplomatic icon, Sergio Vieira de Mello. Another one of the most painful moments of his career came in August 2003, when the bombing of the U.N.'s headquarters in Baghdad killed 22 people — many of whom he had personally asked to go. De Mello was among those slain.

Those deaths "hit me as much as the loss of my twin sister," Annan said this month. His sister, Efua, died in 1991 after an illness.

Annan's career and the image of the U.N. would sustain another heavy blow in 2003 when revelations surfaced of payoffs and subversion of the oil-for-food program. Saddam Hussein had constructed a massive kickback scheme to siphon billions from the U.N.-run aid program; Security Council members, including the U.S., quietly allowed the diversions, considering it the cost of keeping weapons materials out of Hussein's hands.

An 18-month investigation led by former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul A. Volcker found that Annan was responsible for grave mismanagement, and charged several staff members with conflict of interest, but found "no evidence" of wrongdoing by Annan.

Yet the inquiry left questions unanswered about Annan's meetings with executives from Cotecna, a Swiss firm that employed his son Kojo and that won a $10-million contract three months after the company officials' last meeting with the secretary-general.

'Best place on Earth'

Annan will leave office with many of his reforms unfinished, with no magic words to help his successor, Ban Ki-moon, reconcile the divisions between the rich and poor nations, between Washington and its opponents, between ideals and reality.

Though Annan acknowledged that "SG" often seemed to stand for "scapegoat," he also said "it is the best place on Earth to be."

In his valedictory speech to the General Assembly in September, he said: "Together we have pushed some big rocks to the top of the mountain, even if others have slipped from our grasp and rolled back.... And while I look forward to resting my shoulder from those stubborn rocks in the next phase of my life, I know I shall miss the mountain."

North Korea's Pass (WP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

NEARLY 12 WEEKS have passed since the North Korean dictatorship conducted what it said was a nuclear bomb test -- and made explicit the grave threat it poses to global security. At the time the regime of Kim Jong Il appeared to be calculating that it would not suffer severe consequences for its provocation and that the world would eventually accept it as a nuclear power, as India and Pakistan have been accepted. Sadly, that logic is beginning to look justified.

True, the U.N. Security Council passed a resolution on Oct. 14, five days after the test, that condemned the action and applied some sanctions. But China blocked the tougher sanctions proposals, and both Beijing and South Korea have resisted U.S. pressure to enforce the measures rigorously. Three weeks after the test the North agreed under apparent pressure from China to return to the "six-party" negotiations on its nuclear program. But when the talks finally took place earlier this month it turned out the only subject North Korea's representatives were authorized to discuss was unrelated U.S. banking sanctions. The talks ended without result, and no new session has been scheduled.

North Korea's ability to sustain its defiant posture is remarkable because, in contrast to the cases of India or Pakistan, the outside world has the ability to cripple the regime if it chooses. China provides 90 percent of North Korea's oil and most of its food; it also enforces inhumane border controls that prevent brutally repressed and frequently starving North Koreans from fleeing their country. South Korea provides most of the foreign investment in the North. If the two countries were to decide that stopping North Korea from producing more nuclear weapons was more important than preserving its dictatorship, they could remove the lifelines they provide Kim Jong Il. So far, they haven't.

DOJ_NMG_0111376

The leverage of the United States is limited. Critics who insist that the Bush administration should conduct bilateral negotiations with Pyongyang not only ignore the extensive one-on-one talks that Ambassador Christopher R. Hill has held with North Korean officials, they also presume that it's possible to change North Korean behavior without the collaboration of its prime benefactors. Some argue that the administration should give up the financial sanctions that froze North Korean accounts in a Macao bank last year and that are now the focus of Pyongyang's demands. Yet it's hard to see why abandoning the scant nonmilitary leverage the United States does possess -- and easing the pressure on North Korea's dollar counterfeiting and drug trafficking -- would make the regime more likely to negotiate seriously about its weapons.

In fact the best option the Bush administration now has is to work with such allies as Japan to raise the economic pressure on North Korea as much as is possible. Diplomacy is best focused not on Pyongyang, but on Beijing -- which needs to be convinced that the stability it says it seeks in Asia, and in its relations with the United States, depends on its willingness to bring real pressure to bear on North Korea. The aim need not be to bring down the regime, only to convince it that its existence will be imperiled rather than secured by nuclear weapons.

While You Were At War... (WP)

By Richard A. Clarke

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

In every administration, there are usually only about a dozen barons who can really initiate and manage meaningful changes in national security policy. For most of 2006, some of these critical slots in the Bush administration have been vacant, such as the deputy secretary of state (empty since Robert B. Zoellick left for investment bank Goldman Sachs) and the deputy director of national intelligence (with Gen. Michael V. Hayden now CIA director). And with the nation involved in a messy war spiraling toward a bad conclusion, the key deputies and Cabinet members and advisers are all focusing on one issue, at the expense of all others: Iraq.

National Security Council veteran Rand Beers has called this the "7-year-old's soccer syndrome" -- just like little kids playing soccer, everyone forgets their particular positions and responsibilities and runs like a herd after the ball.

In the end, there are only 12 seats at the conference table in the White House Situation Room, and the key players' schedules mean that they can seldom meet there together in person or on secure video conference for more than about 10 hours each week. When issues don't receive first-tier consideration, they can slip by for months. I learned this firsthand: In the early days of the Bush administration, I called for an urgent meeting to discuss the threat al-Qaeda posed to the United States. The Cabinet-level meeting eventually took place -- but not until Sept. 4, 2001.

Without the distraction of the Iraq war, the administration would have spent this past year -- indeed, every year since Sept. 11, 2001 -- focused on al-Qaeda. But beyond al-Qaeda and the broader struggle for peaceful coexistence with (and within) Islam, seven key "fires in the in-box" national security issues remain unattended, deteriorating and threatening, all while Washington's grown-up 7-year-olds play herd ball with Iraq.

Global warming: When the possibility of invading Iraq surfaced in 2001, senior Bush administration officials hadn't thought much about global warming, except to wonder whether it was caused by human activity or by sunspots. Today, the world's scientists and many national leaders worry that the world has passed the point of no return on global warming. If it has, then human damage to the ecosphere will cause more major cities to flood and make the planet significantly less conducive to human habitation -- all over the lifetime of a child now in kindergarten. British Prime Minister Tony Blair keeps trying to convince President Bush of the magnitude of the problem, but in every session between the two leaders Iraq squeezes out the time to discuss the pending planetary disaster.

Russian revanchism: When Russian President Vladimir Putin and Bush leave office in rapid succession in 2008 and 2009, it seems likely that Russia will be less of a democracy and less inclined to cooperate with Washington than it was six years ago, when Bush stared into the eyes and looked into the heart of the Russian leader. Given her extensive background in Soviet studies, Condoleezza Rice would have been a natural to work on key U.S.-Russian issues, first as national security adviser and now as secretary of state. But the focus on Iraq has precluded such efforts, even as the troubling issues multiply: Russian governors are no longer elected, but appointed; dissidents die mysteriously and probably at the hands of the new KGB; opposition media are suppressed; and corporate leaders are jailed or hounded out of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0111377

Meanwhile, Moscow plays petro-politics by dramatically raising the cost of energy to former Soviet republics that do not toe the Kremlin's line, and by threatening to turn off the pipeline to European nations that don't cooperate. If Bush hoped that turning a blind eye to all this would help win Russian cooperation in Iraq and Iran, the strategy failed.

Latin America's leftist lurch: In the years before the Iraq war, U.S. presidents were welcomed at summits throughout Latin America and the Caribbean. Indeed, the attacks of Sept. 11 found then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell in South America, visiting one area of the world where U.S. policies had worked. Friendly, democratic governments were in power in every nation in the hemisphere except Cuba. Formerly debt-ridden economies were implementing pro-market reforms, and the United States was welcomed as a partner. Washington seemed confident that if and when Fidel Castro died (there was always some doubt), even Cuba might join the democracy/free market club.

Today, Castro has been replaced, but not just by another Cuban dictator. The leader of the hemisphere's new anti-Yankee alliance is Hugo ChÃ¡vez, the democratically elected president of Venezuela. ChÃ¡vez's anti-U.S. campaign is supported by Cuban intelligence and Venezuelan oil money. By 2006, Venezuela and Cuba were not alone in their opposition to Washington; kindred spirits have been elected in Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua. Having begun his administration pledging new cooperation with Mexico, Bush backtracked after Sept. 11, focusing instead on tightening immigration and border controls.

Africa at war: The genocide spilling from the Darfur region of Sudan into neighboring Chad has captured attention in the United States mainly because of (belated) media coverage and an aggressive advocacy campaign by concerned groups, but the prospects of Washington dealing with the problem seem slim. Darfur, however, is only one of a pox of conflicts that, together with HIV/AIDS, are depopulating parts of Africa and robbing it of potential wealth from mineral, oil and gas deposits. Wars have also raged in Chad, Congo, Liberia, Sierra Leone and Somalia. Were it not for the Iraq war, Washington may have acted to stop what the Bush administration admits is genocide in Darfur, or taken steps to prevent the chaos sweeping Somalia after a group affiliated with al-Qaeda took over the country and left Ethiopia no choice but to invade in hopes of preventing a more disastrous war. Unfortunately, even designating a small presence of U.S. Special Forces to lead a U.N.-approved peacekeeping force in Darfur appears beyond the capability of the badly stretched American military.

Arms control freeze: Once atop several administrations' national security agendas, international arms control has received little White House attention since the Bush administration decided early on to walk away from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty. National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley has extensive government experience working on arms control and he began to focus on this turf in early 2001, when he was number two at the National Security Council. But after 9/11, Hadley has had little opportunity to advance international efforts to control biological weapons, nuclear testing and proliferation, or the threat of nuclear or radioactive terrorist weapons. For a long time, the White House outsourced dealing with Iran's nuclear weapons to the Europeans, just as the onus of stopping North Korea's nuclear development was placed on Asian nations. The sustained senior-level attention that is needed to stop two nuclear weapons programs at the same time has simply not been available -- because of Iraq.

Transnational crime: In a nationally televised address in 1989, President George H.W. Bush held aloft a bag of cocaine that had been sold near the White House and declared a "War on Drugs." That initiative was later enlarged to target the international criminal cartels engaged in human trafficking, gun and contraband smuggling, money laundering and cyber fraud. The momentum from these efforts produced international treaties to combat hidden global crime conglomerates, but the White House leadership necessary to coordinate dozens of U.S. agencies and mobilize other nations has dissipated. Moreover, the world's international crime cartels received a major shot in the arm with the occupation of Afghanistan by NATO forces. From relatively low levels of heroin production in 2001, Afghanistan's economy is now dependent upon the widespread cultivation of heroin that is flooding black markets in Europe and Asia. With most of the U.S. Army either in Iraq, heading to Iraq or returning from Iraq, insufficient U.S. forces were available to prevent the once-liberated Afghanistan from morphing into a narco-state.

DOJ_NMG_0111378

The Pakistani-Afghan border: Afghanistan increasingly receives the attention of senior U.S. policymakers, not because of the narcotics problem, but mainly because the once-defeated Taliban again threaten Afghan and coalition forces. However, if there is a solution, it lies on the other side of the Khyber Pass where a sanctuary has emerged, a Taliban-like state within a state in western Pakistan. Dealing with that problem is more than Washington has been willing or able to handle, for it involves the complex issue of who governs nuclear-armed Pakistan and how.

Thus far, Washington has accepted Gen. Pervez Musharraf's half-hearted measures for dealing with the nuclear proliferation network of A.Q. Khan, addressing the terrorist involvement of Pakistani intelligence and controlling the Taliban/al-Qaeda bases in Waziristan. Getting Pakistan to do more would require a major sustained effort by senior U.S. officials, including addressing the longstanding tensions with India. Because of Iraq, Washington's national security gurus do not have the hours in their days to manage that -- nor the troops needed to secure Afghanistan.

As the president contemplates sending even more U.S. forces into the Iraqi sinkhole, he should consider not only the thousands of fatalities, the tens of thousands of casualties and the hundreds of billions of dollars already lost. He must also weigh the opportunity cost of taking his national security barons off all the other critical problems they should be addressing -- problems whose windows of opportunity are slamming shut, unheard over the wail of Baghdad sirens.

Richard A. Clarke, former national coordinator for counterterrorism, is chairman of Good Harbor Consulting and author of "Against All Enemies" (Free Press) and "Breakpoint" (Putnam).

Lebanon's Wartime Memory Lapse (WP)

By Lynn Maalouf

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

On a bridge overlooking downtown, a large poster of Maarouf Saad flutters in the winter night's breeze. Beneath the bridge, army tanks line a square, as they do other streets and crossroads around the capital. Except for the flamboyantly restored Ottoman-era buildings in the background, the atmosphere is disturbingly reminiscent of the time 30 years ago when Saad was killed -- and Lebanon became engulfed in a 15-year civil war.

Today, as the Lebanese people once again find themselves divided along political and sectarian lines, the question reverberates around the country: Are we about to be drawn into another civil war?

In February 1975, Saad, a former member of parliament and an advocate of Arab nationalism, was leading a fishermen's protest in the southern city of Sidon when he was fatally shot -- many believe by the army. His killing exposed the depth of the divide running across Lebanese society, separating a leftist, Arab nationalist, pro-Palestinian, largely Muslim community and the pro-Western Christian Maronites who were effectively running the state.

The war that erupted barely two months after Saad's death killed 100,000 people -- 90 percent of them civilians -- and left another 100,000 disabled. About one-fifth of the prewar population was displaced.

Yet the lessons from that war were never learned. In 1989, an inter-Lebanese treaty signed in the Saudi summer resort of Taef ended the fighting. There was no victor, no vanquished. No reconciliation process was initiated. An amnesty law passed by the very people who had been fighting one another only weeks earlier exonerated them of war crimes.

As a result, the same warlords still color today's politics, including Druze leader Walid Jumblatt, Speaker of Parliament Nabih Berri, the Christian leader Samir Geagea and Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah. Meanwhile, the amnesty stifled the rights of victims -- there was no compensation for damages, no truth commissions, no interest in the fate of the roughly 17,000 who had disappeared.

Lebanon slipped into a state of amnesia. Today, having turned the page on its civil war without achieving closure, it is a country in danger of repeating the past.

On a sunny day last month, a handful of workers were painting the wooden shutters of a two-story white stone house in Beirut's southern suburbs. It is the home of Lokman and Monika Slim and their organization, Umam Documentation and Research, which aims to deal with the civil war's aftermath and with war memories.

Not far away, just off Resistance and Liberation Street, a tall concrete building was half-demolished by Israeli jets last summer. Shrapnel destroyed not only parts of the Slims' house, but also wiped out some of the couple's most valued items: war archives that they had collected over the past five years, including leaflets, books, magazines, newspapers, photographs and audio-visual materials.

DOJ_NMG_0111379

"It's as if we will never have enough time to build archives in this country," says Monika, a tall, blond German and a former reporter who helped her husband found Umam in 2004.

In the absence of documented history, Lebanese cling to conflicting narratives of the war and to their selective memories, passing them on to the younger generation. Jad Chaaya, a weary-looking 23-year-old, is a member of the Lebanese Forces, a Christian party allied with the government. After the assassination of Prime Minister Rafik Hariri on Feb. 14, 2005, Chaaya spent 90 days in a tent in downtown Beirut with other protesters, demanding an investigation into Hariri's killing and the withdrawal of Syrian troops from Lebanon.

It was part of the Intifada of Independence, in which groups that had fought one another in the civil war camped side by side, voicing the same demands. Many hailed it as the beginning of national reconciliation.

But Chaaya has a different reading of that time. "All that Lebanese Forces people who were in that tent wanted was the release of Samir Geagea," he says. Geagea, the head of the Lebanese Forces, was imprisoned for 11 years on assassination charges before being released in July 2005, following the Syrian withdrawal. "In the end, each sect is just interested in its own cause," Chaaya says.

He is too young to remember the 1975 war. What he knows is that his family was forced to flee their house overnight in 1976 after Palestinian gunmen attacked their town of Damour. He says he inherited his sense of "Christian insecurity" from his father, and that is why he thinks Geagea is the only one who can protect his community today.

"I don't really know much about the war," Chaaya says. "They haven't been able to put a history book together. So who am I to know?"

In his home one street off the former Green Line, which split the capital into East and West Beirut during the civil war, Antoine Messarra remembers being part of a government-appointed committee in charge of setting up a new history program. "These history books, had they really been created, they would have created a unifying memory for all Lebanese," says the law and history professor, not without some bitterness.

In 2000, the Council of Ministers approved the history program, but the minister of education at the time stopped it because it did not suit the Syrian occupying authorities, Messarra says. Today, most history books stop at 1943 and cover only one region of the country.

"The people of my generation have a vivid memory of the war," Messarra says. "They have experienced it in their flesh. The generation that was born out of the conflict has no such memory." In the street outside sits a row of army tanks that have marked nighttime checkpoints for the past several weeks. In early December, street brawls erupted in various residential neighborhoods between pro- and anti-government supporters, resulting in the death of a young man.

"We never described to [the young generation] what barricades are," Messarra says, "the suffering that came from these barricades. A lot of people died at barricades. We should have transmitted that trauma to them."

Back in Ghobeiry, Lokman Slim scrolls through a poem in which a sheik from the Shiite group Amal curses Hezbollah during a notorious 1989 battle when the two groups fought each other. Today, Amal and Hezbollah stand together in opposition to the government.

"Did we ever get over the civil war?" Slim asks. He turns off his computer and steps into the garden, facing a tree known as fitna -- coincidentally, the Arabic word for strife. In the street, an elderly man pushes a vegetable cart alongside a wall covered with the pictures of young people killed during last summer's war.

"The Lebanese," Slim says, "never made any effort to build peace."

Lynn Maalouf is a special correspondent for The Washington Post in Beirut.

DOJ_NMG_0111380

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, DECEMBER 31, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Deputy Leader Of Al-Qaeda Delivers Angry Holiday Greeting (AP) ... 3
For Guantánamo Review Boards, Limits Abound (NYT) ... 3

Homeland Response:

Localities Operate Intelligence Centers To Pool Terror Data (WP) ... 7
The 2006 Bill Of Wrongs (WP) ... 9
New Orleans Levee-risk Study Faulted (LAT) ... 10

War News:

Hussein Video Grips Iraq; Attacks Go On (NYT) ... 12
On The Gallows, Curses For U.S. And "Traitors" (NYT) ... 14
TV Faced Dilemma On Hanging Coverage (LAT) ... 15
For Saddam's Page In History, A Final Link On YouTube (WP) ... 16
Feared And Pitiless; Fearful And Pitiable (NYT) ... 17
In Hussein's Last Minutes, Jeers And A Cry For Calm (WP) ... 19
Shi'ite-Sunni Rift Laid Bare By Hanging (WT/AP) ... 21
Hussein Divides Iraq In His Death As He Did In Life (NYT) ... 22
Elation Gives Way To Dread Of Daily Life (WP) ... 23
Hussein's Case Won't Bolster International Human Rights Law, Experts Fear (NYT) ... 25
Saddam Had Feisty Exchange At The Gallows (AP) ... 26
Saddam Is Buried In Home Village (BBC) ... 28
Conflicts Shaped Two Presidencies (WP) ... 29
A Bitter Family Saga Is At An End (BBC) ... 30
Around The World, Unease And Criticism Of Penalty (NYT) ... 32
Europeans Denounce Hussein's Execution (LAT) ... 33
Many Who Fled Dictator Feel Jubilation, Relief (WP) ... 34
Saddam Hanging Brings Joy, Gloom To Houston Iraqis (HC) ... 35
For Arab Critics, Hussein's Execution Symbolizes The Victory Of Vengeance Over Justice (NYT) ... 36
No Arab Euphoria At Saddam Death (BBC) ... 37
Kurdish Survivors' Feelings Conflicted (LAT) ... 38
Timing Of Execution Could Fuel Divisions (NSDY) ... 39
After Saddam, Attacks Go On (MINNST) ... 40
Division That Caught A Dictator Takes His Execution In Stride (NYT) ... 42
An Overnight Death Watch, And Then Images Of The Hangman's Noose (NYT) ... 43
What The Dictators Can't Stop (WP) ... 44
Keeping Faith With A Bloody Tradition (LAT) ... 45
Bombs Kills 68, Wounds Dozens In Iraq (AP) ... 46
Car Bombs Target Shiites In Iraq (CNN) ... 47
Shi'ite Hostages' Kin Fear Revenge Slayings (WT) ... 48
Saddam Exchanged Taunts Before Hanging (AP) ... 49
U.S. Deaths In Iraq Mark Increased Presence (WP) ... 50
After Duty In Iraq, They're Back On The Beat (LAT) ... 53
U.S. General Predicts Increased Fighting In Afghanistan (AP) ... 54
1,373 Miles Into The Heart Of Afghanistan (LAT) ... 55
Don't Grow The Army (WP) ... 59

Criminal Law:

Sugar Land Program To Snag Internet Predators Recognized (HC) ... 61
The Year In Death (WP) ... 62
Pratfalls And Prophecies In 2006 (WP) ... 63

Civil Rights:

Groundbreaking Changes Due At Prisons (WILNJ) ... 64
Rights Groups To Seek Action On Profiling, Elections (FREEP) 67
The Kennedy Factor On The Roberts Court (NYT) ... 67
A Retreat On Rationing Free Speech? (WP) ... 68

Antitrust:

States Scramble To Scrutinize Airline Takeover (SLT) ... 69

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

His Omnipresence May Show His Clout, But Now Bruno Is On The Defensive (NYT) ... 70
Bumbling Against Terror (PPG) ... 71
Our Bumbling FBI (TOLB) ... 72

Congress-Administration:

Ethics Panel Concludes Conyers Inquiry With A Warning But No Punishment (RC) ... 73
Conyers Accepts Responsibility For Possible Ethics Violations (HILL) ... 74
Job Evaluation: George W. Bush (LAT) ... 76
Ten Suggestions For Rescuing The Bush Legacy (NYT) ... 76
A New Year For School Reform (NYT) ... 77
Playing The Angles (WP) ... 78
And Now, A Word From Chile... (NYT) ... 79

Other News:

A Solemn Homecoming (WP) ... 79
Ford's Final Visit To Capitol (WT) ... 81

Cheney Hails Ford's Pardon Of Nixon (AP)..... 82
Ford, In Final Journey, Returns To Washington (NYT) 83
Nation Honors Ford At Capitol Rotunda (AP) 84
Thousands Wait For Cortege To Be A Part Of U.S. History (WT)86
"Good Man, Faithful Servant" Honored (LAT) 86
State Funeral Honors Ford (DETN) 88
Solemn Tribute For President Ford (NSDY)..... 90
President Ford Eulogized In U.S. Capitol As "Healer" (BLOOM) 91
"Everyman" Ford Honored In Rotunda (RC)..... 92
At The Capitol, VIP Roll Call Has Many No-Shows (WP) 93
"No Point In Being Bitter" (WP)..... 95
Serving As Ford's No. 2, Rockefeller Never Took His Eye Off Top Job (NYT) 96
Moderate? Conservative? With Gerald Ford, Take Your Pick (NYT) 98
When Ford Lost, So Did Dems (LAT)..... 99
Back In View, A First Lady With Her Own Legacy (NYT)..... 100
Would-Be Presidents With Cold Shoulders (NYT) 102
This Clinton Machine Is a Tighter Ship (LAT) 102
Schwarzenegger Looks Beyond California As Second Term Begins (SFC) 104
Job Evaluation: Arnold Schwarzenegger (LAT)..... 106
Different Climate, Different Pawlenty (MINNST)..... 106
Most Americans Say Life Is Good -- At Home (WT/AP)..... 108
January Effect May Take A Year Off (NYT) 108
The Grown-Ups Step In (WP)..... 109
That Blasted Year (WP) 110
Bush Has Quietly Tripled Aid To Africa (WP) 115
Somalia's Islamists Vow Never To Surrender (NYT)..... 116
Further Combat Looms In Somalia (WP) 117
Somali Forces Pursue Islamists (WT) 118
Somalia Government Steps Gingerly Toward Its Capital (LAT) 119
Peacekeepers Rebuff Chad Protection Force Proposal (AFP) . 120
Castro Message Says He Could Recover (AP)..... 120
Castro Issues New Year's Message (BBC)..... 121
After Fidel, Business As Usual? (WT) 121
Spain Suspends Plan For Talks With ETA (AP)..... 124
Madrid Blast Leaves 2 Missing, 26 Injured (WP/AP)..... 125
Spain Breaks Off ETA Talks After Madrid Airport Bomb (BLOOM)..... 125
New Year Rings In EU Membership For Bulgaria, Romania (AFP)..... 126
A New Parliament, But Still All Putin? (NYT) 127
Politics, Economics And Time Bury Memories Of The Kazakh Gulag (NYT)..... 128
Chinese Focus On Navy Leaves Big Political Wake (LAT) 129
The Buzz On Japan's New Premier: Too Old-school (LAT)..... 131
Amid Political Upheaval, Israeli Economy Stays Healthy (NYT) 131
Analysis: Annan To Leave Office Sunday, But Won't Leave U.N. Behind (AP)..... 133
Annan Focused On Human Element (LAT)..... 134
North Korea's Pass (WP)..... 136
While You Were At War... (WP)..... 136
Lebanon's Wartime Memory Lapse (WP)..... 138

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0111382

TERRORISM NEWS:

Deputy Leader Of Al-Qaeda Delivers Angry Holiday Greeting (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

CAIRO (AP) — The deputy leader of al-Qaeda on Saturday accused moderate Arab leaders of being traitors for cooperating with the United States in an audiotaped greeting marking the most important Islamic holiday.

Ayman al-Zawahri's wished the Palestinian people a happy Eid al-Adha but lashed out at Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas and his Fatah movement.

"Those who had sold Palestine, the secular traitors, can not be your brothers. Do not recognize their legitimacy. ... And don't sit with them ... and do not sign with them the documents that will make you lose Palestine," said al-Zawahri in the 15-minute audiotape posted on a website commonly used by Islamic insurgents.

Al-Zawahri did not mention Saddam Hussein's execution in the tape, suggesting it was made before the ousted leader's hanging on Saturday.

The tape could not immediately be verified, but a banner posted on the website said it came from al-Qaeda's media production house, al-Sahab.

The No. 2 al-Qaeda leader denounced U.S. ally Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in an apparent reference to recent arrests and detentions of several members of the outlawed Muslim Brotherhood.

"I greet my brothers inside the prisons of Mubarak, the traitor," he said.

Al-Zawahri also extended his Eid greeting to Iraq, praising the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, and urged Muslims in Somalia, Chechnya, Indonesia, the Philippines and Algeria to keep on fighting the "infidels and crusaders."

For Guantánamo Review Boards, Limits Abound (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

GUANTÁNAMO BAY, Cuba — At one end of a converted trailer in the American military detention center here, a graying Pakistani businessman sat shackled before a review board of uniformed officers, pleading for his freedom.

The prisoner had seen just a brief summary of what officials said was a thick dossier of intelligence linking him to Al Qaeda. He had not seen his own legal papers since they were taken away in an unrelated investigation. He has lawyers working on his behalf in Washington, London and Pakistan, but here his only assistance came from an Army lieutenant colonel, who stumbled as he read the prisoner's handwritten statement.

As the hearing concluded, the detainee, who cannot be identified publicly under military rules, had a question. He is a citizen of Pakistan, he noted. He was arrested on a business trip to Thailand. On what authority or charges was he even being held?

"That question," a Marine colonel presiding over the panel answered, "is outside the limits of what this board is permitted to consider."

Under a law passed by Congress and signed by President Bush in October, this double-wide trailer may be as close to a courtroom as most Guantánamo prisoners ever get. The law prohibits them from challenging their detention or treatment by writs of habeas corpus in the federal courts. Instead, they may only petition a single federal appeals court to examine whether the review boards followed the military's own procedures in reviewing their status as "enemy combatants."

But an examination of the Guantánamo review boards by The New York Times suggests that they have often fallen short, not only as a source of due process for the hundreds of men held here, but also as a forum to resolve questions about what the detainees have done and the threats they may pose.

Some limitations have long been evident. The prisoners have no right to a lawyer, or to see classified evidence, or even to know the identity of their accusers. What has been less visible, however, is what many officials describe as a continuing shortage of information about many detainees, including some who have been held on sketchy or disputed intelligence.

Behind the hearings that journalists are allowed to observe is a system that has at times been as long on government infighting and diplomatic maneuvering as it has been short on hard evidence. The result, current and former officials acknowledged, is that some detainees have been held for years on less compelling information, while a growing number of others for whom there was thought to be stronger evidence of militant activities have been released under secret arrangements between Washington and their home governments.

DOJ_NMG_0111383

Military officials emphasize that the boards are an administrative forum and were never intended to replicate judicial standards of fairness. But they say the hearings offer prisoners a viable opportunity to rebut the government's evidence.

"At the end of the day, it's about giving the detainee the flexibility and freedom to present his case," said Capt. Philip L. Waddingham, a former Navy pilot who oversees the operations of the panels at Guantánamo.

Administration officials also emphasize that the reviews are more rigorous than the battlefield tribunals that have traditionally been used to determine the status of wartime prisoners under the 1949 Geneva Conventions.

But the Geneva tribunals were established to answer questions about the identities of soldiers and spies from regular armies. Sorting through the identities and past actions of suspected participants in a shadowy global terrorist network, military officials said, has proved far more complex.

To date, 377 Guantánamo detainees, nearly half of the 773 who have been held there, have been released or transferred to other governments. Of those, about 150 have been repatriated through the review process since mid-2004, officials said.

The administration's push to reduce the Guantánamo population is more evident in another statistic. The final arbiter of prisoner releases, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England, has overruled the panels' recommendations in more than 15 percent of the 237 cases he has decided so far this year, officials said. In virtually all of those, the boards had recommended continued detention.

Still, a recent study of the review process found that detainees arguing their innocence were routinely denied witnesses they tried to call, even when the witnesses were other prisoners at Guantánamo. Lawyers for the detainees complain that the government has made almost no effort to have the panels consider information they have gathered and has often blocked their attempts to learn the accusations against their clients.

"We have tried again and again to have a say in the process," said Barbara Olshansky, a lawyer who has coordinated much of the work of the detainees' lawyers for the Center for Constitutional Rights. "But we learned pretty early on that these were kangaroo courts."

Many of the detainees appear to have given up on the reviews as a way to win their freedom. In the latest round of annual hearings, which were completed this month, only 18 percent of the prisoners chose to attend.

Evolution of the Hearings

The review system at Guantánamo began operating in July 2004, more than two years after most detainees were imprisoned there. Officials said it was intended in part to deflect criticism that the prison had become a legal black hole. They also hoped it would resolve what had become a contentious struggle among national security agencies over which prisoners to hold and which to free.

Even before Mr. Bush decided in February 2002 that the United States would not observe the Geneva Conventions in fighting terrorism, Donald H. Rumsfeld, then the defense secretary, dismissed the idea of Geneva-style hearings for the detainees, maintaining that they would never be entitled to the prisoner-of-war status that such tribunals could grant them in other conflicts.

"There is no ambiguity in this case," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

Yet intelligence officers at Guantánamo found ambiguity everywhere. Many of the detainees had been captured by Afghan militias, Pakistani border guards and other surrogates, and some had been turned in for bounties, intelligence officials said. Information about their identities and actions was often vague and secondhand. Physical evidence, if any existed, was sometimes lost before reaching Cuba.

Still, the detainees who were held on the weakest information tended not to be a priority for either intelligence officers or the military's criminal investigators.

"It wasn't the job of the intelligence community to verify their guilt or innocence," said Col. Brittain P. Mallow, a retired Army investigator who led a task force that gathered evidence for war crimes tribunals that are expected to prosecute about 50 to 70 of the remaining 396 detainees.

Faced with growing international criticism, the Bush administration moved in May 2004 to set up a kind of annual parole system, called Administrative Review Boards, to weigh each detainee's continuing threat and intelligence value. But before those hearings began, the Supreme Court called that June for a one-time review of all Guantánamo detainees using the sort of panels called for by Army regulations — and by the Geneva Conventions.

Those first panels, called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, or C.S.R.T.'s in military parlance, required three military officers to decide cases by majority vote, based on a "preponderance of the evidence." The boards were allowed to consider a wide range of intelligence, including statements obtained by coercion.

Midlevel officers were assigned to help the detainees prepare for their hearings. Military lawyers were not permitted to serve in that role, however, because of concern that limitations on that assistance might open the lawyers to charges of violating professional ethics rules.

DOJ_NMG_0111384

Lawyers at the Defense and Justice Departments had another worry: that detainees found to be "not enemy combatants" might sue the government for wrongful imprisonment. Partly for that reason, officials said, the review office was instructed to use the phrase "no longer enemy combatants."

By the time the C.S.R.T. reviews got under way, intelligence agencies had confirmed that half a dozen detainees released from Guantánamo were fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan. Such risks were raised frequently in government debates.

"It was sort of a mantra in the system: 'You have got to make sure that you don't release any of the wrong people,' " recalled Charles W. Moore Jr., a now-retired vice admiral who set up the review apparatus under Mr. England.

Reviewing Decisions

The early results of the hearings, in which officials said a surprising number of detainees were found not to be enemy combatants, only heightened the unease.

Internal critics, including the Defense Intelligence Agency, the Central Intelligence Agency and the Special Operations branch of the Pentagon, complained heatedly that the boards did not properly understand the intelligence they were assessing, said current and former officials who participated in the debates.

The critics were later allowed to provide further training to the panels. In the first round of annual reviews after the C.S.R.T.'s, officers with military intelligence backgrounds also took over the role, previously assigned to lawyers, of vetting evidence and presenting the government's case.

While some officials perceived an undue influence over the panels from intelligence agencies and their allies, others said those critics were mostly beaten back.

"The intelligence community wanted to derail the C.S.R.T. process and dictate the decisions, and that didn't happen," said one former senior official, who, like several others, would discuss the policy deliberations only on the condition of anonymity.

According to documents and interviews, the Pentagon office in charge of the reviews ordered the repetition of some C.S.R.T. boards that recommended the release of detainees. Defense Department officials would not discuss those cases in detail.

The largest number of repeated hearings appears to have involved some of the 22 Muslim detainees from western China who were part of the Uighur (pronounced WEE-gur) ethnic minority.

The Uighurs' sworn enemy was not the United States but the Communist government of China, which had long oppressed their people. The military accused the detainees of belonging to a separatist group that the Chinese authorities had persuaded Washington to list as a terrorist organization, but some experts on the region disputed that characterization of the group and the detainees denied any link to it.

The State Department, fearful that the men would be tortured if they were sent back to China, had already begun trying to place the Uighurs as refugees in Europe when their cases came for review at Guantánamo, officials said.

"We were shocked that they even sent those guys before the C.S.R.T.'s," said one former national security official who worked on the matter. "They had already been identified for release."

Because the Uighurs told very similar stories, Pentagon officials were confounded when at least five of them were determined not to be enemy combatants and the rest properly held, officials said.

At least several of the Uighurs, including some found not to be enemy combatants, had their cases reviewed again, officials said. They described the impetus for doing so as "quality control." But available documents show that at least one of the detainees, whose case was reviewed again, was finally found to be an enemy combatant.

Five Uighur detainees were finally sent to Albania as refugees in May.

Some Aren't Revisited

Yet other cases in which questions arose were not revisited. One of those involved a Sudanese man, Adel Hassan Hamad, who was seized in Pakistan in 2002.

According to the unclassified summary of allegations in his first hearing, Mr. Hamad, who is now about 48, had worked for two nongovernmental organizations, or N.G.O.'s, with ties to Al Qaeda and had come into contact "with persons who had positions of responsibility in Al Qaeda." But the military presented no unclassified information that Mr. Hamad was anything but a hospital administrator and former teacher, or that he knew of his employers' purported ties.

As with all such cases, it is not possible to judge independently the evidence against Mr. Hamad because part of it is secret. But while two panel members found him to be rightfully detained, a third officer, an Army lawyer whose name was blacked out in the declassified document, objected strongly.

Even if the unclassified allegations were true — and Mr. Hamad said he knew nothing about Qaeda links — "a mere association with Al Qaeda does not qualify as a basis for enemy combatant status," the lawyer wrote in a formal dissent. The officer, who also studied the secret evidence, said the military was declaring Mr. Hamad an enemy combatant because some parts of the organization he worked for had allegedly supported "terrorist ideals and causes."

DOJ_NMG_0111385

"To reach such a conclusion would provide for unconscionable results," he wrote. It might mean, he added, that "all physicians, nurses and aid workers employed by the alleged terrorist-connected N.G.O.'s would also be declared enemy combatants."

The panel's 2-to-1 decision was reviewed by two other military lawyers, each of whom tersely upheld its "legal sufficiency." One of them, Cmdr. James R. Crisfield Jr. of the Navy, described the Army officer's dissent as "articulate and thoughtful," but emphasized the review panels' modest standard of proof.

"Given the low evidentiary hurdle posed by a preponderance-of-evidence standard and the rebuttable presumption of genuineness and accuracy that attaches to government evidence, I believe that the test is satisfied in this case," Commander Crisfield wrote.

Despite the limited evidence against Mr. Hamad, documents from his first annual review show little further substance to the military's accusations. They noted that a brother of the Sept. 11 plotter Khalid Shaikh Mohammed was once a manager at one of the charities where Mr. Hamad worked. But the military was now asserting only that the group "may be affiliated with Osama bin Laden and Al Qaeda operations."

Two federal public defenders in Portland, Ore., who took Mr. Hamad's case last year said they had located about a dozen witnesses who corroborated parts of his account. Although much of that information has been filed as part of a habeas case in federal court, there is no sign yet that it has made any difference for Mr. Hamad.

"I don't think there was any substantive attempt by the military to find witnesses who could get to the bottom of this," said one of the lawyers, Patrick J. Ehlers. "There were hundreds of other people out there who worked for these groups. None of those people were arrested, and none of them were questioned."

Constraints on the System

Several officials who helped establish the review panels said they tried to create mechanisms that would let detainees present witnesses and evidence and allow the panels to gather new information.

But some officials said those ambitions, however sincere, had often been undone by the speed of most reviews — often conducted in just hours — and the low priority assigned to the collection of information on the detainees by intelligence agencies and foreign governments. This year, three panels at Guantánamo handled as many as 13 or 14 cases a week, they said.

"There are real time constraints and real resource constraints," one retired military officer said. "They usually ended up without anything new, so the boards were just dusting off old files and trying to have a fair and impartial body look at that old information."

Captain Waddingham, the chief of the review office at Guantánamo, said the boards followed the recommendations of military intelligence officials 95 percent of the time. But both he and the overall head of the review program, Frank Sweigart, insisted that the panels were able to get new information when they needed it.

"We are always looking for supporting facts, and if we can't find them, we ask for them," Mr. Sweigart, a retired Navy captain, said in an interview. "There really is a lot of information out there for a number of them — especially for the detainees who are there today."

But other current and former officials described a system that was frequently inefficient in collecting information that might determine a prisoner's fate.

Some officials said military and civilian intelligence agencies gave little priority to requests for information from the panels, particularly when they involved time-consuming inquiries overseas. And though officials including Mr. England, the deputy defense secretary, have urged foreign governments to develop and pass on their own information about detainees from their countries, few of them did.

Officials said some governments, including those of Kuwait and Bahrain, had provided extensive files on their detainees. Partly out of diplomatic considerations, they said, the State Department pressed Mr. England to move up review hearings for at least several detainees from those two countries and, ultimately, to overrule review panel decisions and repatriate them.

On Nov. 3 last year, the Pentagon sent two Kuwaitis and three Bahrainis home from Guantánamo on Mr. England's approval, despite what two officials said had been negative rulings by the review panels in at least some of those cases.

But other releases are harder to explain. In one such case, lawyers for Nazar Chaman Gul, an Afghan prisoner, said they were mystified to learn of the repatriation on Dec. 16 of another Afghan, Mohammad Akhtiar, after his annual review.

Mr. Akhtiar had been accused of launching a rocket attack on an American military base in Afghanistan in early 2003. Declassified transcripts of Mr. Gul's hearings suggest that a major piece of incriminating evidence against him was that he was captured with Mr. Akhtiar at his home. (Another problem seemed to be that he was confused with another Afghan with the same name, who is also being held at Guantánamo.)

"Gul's greatest sin seemed to be his association with Mohammad Akhtiar," said a lawyer for Mr. Gul, Amy Baggio. "Unfathomably, Akhtiar is now home with his family while Nazar Gul is going on his fourth year in custody."

DOJ_NMG_0111386

Lawyers say that detainees who have tried to use the review system to challenge the accusations against them have often been frustrated. According to a recent study of 102 unclassified C.S.R.T. files by the Seton Hall University law school, the military denied all requests by the detainees for witnesses who were not also being held at Guantánamo and denied requests for detainee witnesses 74 percent of the time.

Although a growing number of lawyers have begun to conduct their own investigations into accusations against their clients, a former military intelligence officer who has presided over dozens of review boards was dismissive of those contributions.

"As far as what the habeas lawyers have to say, for the most part it wouldn't factor in because they have made themselves not credible," said the officer, a Marine colonel who suggested that the lawyers took detainees' claims of innocence at face value.

The lawyers respond that the obstacles to their input in the process raise questions about the military's desire to learn everything it can about the detainees. More than a week after the hearing for the Pakistani businessman accused of ties to Al Qaeda, a Washington lawyer who had been trying to help him told a reporter that he had not even known the session had taken place.

"There is no hint of any kind of due process in this," said the lawyer, Gaillard T. Hunt. "He's got no right to an investigation. But substantively, it really doesn't matter, because they can always just say they have this classified information that he can't see."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Localities Operate Intelligence Centers To Pool Terror Data (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan, Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Frustrated by poor federal cooperation, U.S. states and cities are building their own network of intelligence centers led by police to help detect and disrupt terrorist plots.

The new "fusion centers" are now operating in 37 states, including Virginia and Maryland, and another covers the Washington area, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The centers, which have received $380 million in federal support since the 2001 terrorist attacks, pool and analyze information from local, state and federal law enforcement officials.

The emerging "network of networks" marks a new era of opportunity for law enforcement, according to U.S. officials and homeland security experts. Police are hungry for federal intelligence in an age of homegrown terrorism and more sophisticated crime. For their part, federal law enforcement officials could benefit from a potential army of tipsters -- the 700,000 local and state police officers across the country, as well as private security guards and others being courted by the centers.

But the emerging model of "intelligence-led policing" faces risks on all sides. The centers are popping up with little federal leadership and training, raising fears of overzealousness such as that associated with police "red squads" that spied on civil rights and peace activists decades ago. The centers also face practical obstacles that could limit their effectiveness, including a shortage of money, skilled analysts, and proven relationships with the FBI and Homeland Security.

Still, the centers are emerging as a key element in a sometimes chaotic new domestic intelligence infrastructure, which also includes homeland security units in local police forces and 103 FBI-led terrorism task forces, triple the number that existed before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Fusion centers are becoming "part of the landscape for local government," said the incoming D.C. police chief, Cathy Lanier. But she warned that police are navigating a new patchwork of state and federal privacy laws that govern the sharing, collection and storage of information. "We're in a very precarious position right now," she said. "If we lose community support, that is going to be a big deal for local law enforcement."

Traditionally, police had little to do with counterterrorism. But after the 2001 attacks, it became obvious that al-Qaeda members had been preparing not only in far-off Afghan training camps but also in places such as a Gold's Gym in Greenbelt and flight schools in Florida. An unwitting Maryland state trooper stopped one of the future hijackers for speeding on Interstate 95.

"Police officers, deputies and troopers . . . they're going to be the ones that encounter a lot of these [suspicious] things on the road," said Virginia State Police Sgt. Lee Miller, who oversees the state's year-old fusion center in Richmond. "What we're trying to do is provide them the information they need to identify these different things."

The fusion centers range from small conference facilities to high-tech nerve centers with expensive communications networks. Some do investigations, while others focus on information-sharing -- passing tips to the FBI and scanning federal intelligence for developments of interest to local departments. Some have explored the use of controversial data-mining software in keeping with their respective state laws.

DOJ_NMG_0111387

Maryland's three-year-old fusion center outside Baltimore offers a glimpse of the new intelligence world. Hidden behind a bolted door with no nameplate in a quiet office park, the Maryland Coordination and Analysis Center houses members of 23 local, state and federal agencies.

Harvey Eisenberg, an assistant U.S. attorney who helps oversee the center, said police and other government employees are being trained to phone its 24-hour "watch section" when they spot suspicious activity. Calls to the terrorism hotline advertised on the Capital Beltway (800-492-TIPS) are also answered by officers in the watch section.

"You need to educate cops, firefighters, health officials, transportation officials, sanitation workers, to understand the nature of the threat," Eisenberg said. "And not to become super-spies. . . . Constitutionally, they see something, they can report it."

Officials say an incident on the Chesapeake Bay Bridge in 2004 shows the center's effectiveness. State transportation police stopped an SUV after a veiled passenger was seen videotaping the bridge in a suspicious manner. The officers called the fusion center, which discovered that the driver was an unindicted co-conspirator in a Chicago case involving Hamas, a U.S.-designated terrorist group.

Eisenberg contacted a prosecutor in Chicago, who quickly obtained an arrest warrant for the driver as a material witness in the Hamas case.

"The 9/11 commission's major criticism was that people didn't talk to each other," said Dennis R. Schrader, Maryland's director of homeland security. "Well, this is an example of how you had state, local and federal all working together. . . . It's really pretty unbelievable."

To some, though, the incident raised questions about what constitutes dangerous behavior.

The driver, Ismail Elbarasse, a U.S. citizen of Palestinian origin living in Annandale, was quickly released on bond, and the material-witness warrant eventually expired. He was not charged with a crime. His family said the veiled woman, Elbarasse's wife, was simply taping the bay while returning from the beach.

"It was regarded in the community as just a case of overreaction to seeing somebody in a head scarf videotaping," said Ibrahim Hooper of the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Civil liberties advocates worry that the fledgling fusion centers could stray into monitoring people engaged in lawful activities, as some members of new police homeland security units have done. A Georgia homeland security officer, for example, was discovered photographing a protest by vegans at a HoneyBaked Ham store in 2003. Privacy advocates are also concerned about the vast amount of information some fusion centers collect -- and the sometimes vague limits on its use and storage.

"In Phoenix, we're talking about something like 250,000 police reports a year: names, addresses, contact information, business cards, tickets, all the kinds of information that is gathered and that can be of tremendous value at a national analytical level," said John L. Buchanan, Phoenix assistant police chief. He added, however, that "we've really got to be cognizant of the risk" of abuse.

"Fusion center" is a military coinage embraced by civilian homeland security authorities after Sept. 11, 2001. But turf fights involving the FBI, the Department of Homeland Security and national intelligence agencies, as well as local jurisdictions, have delayed the centers' development two years after Congress passed laws to change intelligence.

To streamline the unwieldy domestic intelligence structure, White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend laid out a new U.S. road map for intelligence collection on Nov. 27. It urges that fusion centers be incorporated in a national Information Sharing Environment (ISE).

To support the centers' growing role, and to address complaints from states that they cannot pay for them alone, the White House is debating whether to increase funding for them in 2008 and to lift a ban on paying for personnel.

Federal officials emphasize that the centers will be led from the grass roots. Charles E. Allen, chief intelligence officer for the Homeland Security Department, said the centers will be "all hazards, all crime, all threats," targeted not just at terrorism but also at transnational gangs, immigrant smuggling and other threats.

Thomas E. McNamara, ISE manager under the director of national intelligence, said the centers will be state-driven and "primarily analytical."

Amid such assurances, it remains unclear just how much fusing of information is going on day to day.

Existing efforts are insufficient and to blame for "mixed and at times competing messages" from U.S. officials and limited contributions from state and local leaders, Townsend wrote.

For example, New York City leaders warned of "a specific threat" to the city's transit systems in October 2005, which federal officials simultaneously deemed "noncredible." Meanwhile, U.S. officials say information flowing from local and state agencies is often of limited use.

An April report by the National Governors Association found that dissatisfaction with federal information-sharing was growing among state homeland security directors, with 60 percent unhappy about the specificity of intelligence. In congressional hearings, state officials have complained about a lack of federal security clearances and about overlapping, outdated intelligence databases.

DOJ_NMG_0111388

In response, U.S. officials are vowing to speed background checks and to send Homeland Security intelligence officers to work at 18 state and local fusion centers in 2007 and 35 by 2008.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, would go further. He proposed a new law enforcement assistance program to make intelligence-led policing the 21st-century version of community-oriented policing, into which the federal government has poured $11.3 billion since 1994 to pay for 120,000 local officers.

"The federal government is not reaching out well enough to the intelligence needs of the cop on the beat," Thompson said. "We shouldn't need more blood spilled before we take action necessary to make Americans safer."

The 2006 Bill Of Wrongs (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

I must confess that I love all those year-end lists of greatest movies and albums and lip glosses and tractors of the past 12 months -- it's reassuring that all human information can be wrestled into bundles of 10. In that spirit, herewith are my top 10 civil liberties nightmares of 2006.

10) Attempt to Get Death Penalty for Zacarias Moussaoui: Long after it was clear that the hapless Frenchman was neither the "20th hijacker" nor a key plotter in the attacks of 9/11, the government pressed to execute him as a "conspirator" in those attacks. Moussaoui's alleged participation? By failing to confess to what he may have known about the plot, which could have led the government to disrupt it, Moussaoui directly caused the deaths of thousands of people. This massive over-reading of the federal conspiracy laws would be laughable were the stakes not so high. Fortunately, a jury rejected the notion that Moussaoui could be executed for the crime of merely wishing there had been a real connection between himself and 9/11.

9) Guantanamo Bay: After the Supreme Court struck down the military tribunals planned to try hundreds of detainees on the U.S. base in Cuba, and after President Bush agreed that it may be a good idea to close down the prison, the worst public relations fiasco since the Japanese internment camps lives on. Prisoners once deemed "among the most dangerous, best-trained, vicious killers on the face of the Earth" are either quietly released or still awaiting trial. The lucky 75 to be tried there will be cheered to hear that the Pentagon has just announced plans to build a $125 million legal complex for the hearings. The government has now officially put more thought into the design of Guantanamo's court bathrooms than the charges against its prisoners.

8) Bashing the Media: Whether the Bush administration is reclassifying previously declassified documents, sidestepping the Freedom of Information Act, threatening journalists for leaks on dubious legal grounds or, most recently, using its subpoena power to try to wring secret documents from the American Civil Liberties Union, the administration has continued its "secrets at any price" campaign. Is this a constitutional crisis? Probably not. Infuriating? Definitely.

7) Slagging the Courts: It starts with the president's complaints about "activist judges" and evolves to congressional threats to appoint an inspector general to oversee federal judges. As public distrust of the bench is fueled, the stripping of courts' authority to hear whole classes of cases -- most recently any habeas corpus claims from Guantanamo detainees -- almost seems reasonable. Each tiny incursion into the independence of the judiciary seems justified. Until you realize that the courts are often the only places that will defend our shrinking civil liberties. This leads to . . .

6) The State Secrets Doctrine: The Bush administration's argument in court is that judges should dismiss entire lawsuits over many of the outrages detailed on this very list. Why? Because the outrageously illegal things are themselves matters of top-secret national security. The administration has raised this claim in relation to secret wiretapping and extraordinary renditions. A government privilege once used to sidestep civil claims has mushroomed into broad immunity for the administration's sometimes criminal behavior.

5) Government Snooping: Take your pick. There's the continued defense of the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program wherein the president breezily authorized spying on the phone calls of innocent citizens, in violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. The FBI's Talon database shows that the government has been spying on non-terrorist groups including Quakers, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, and Veterans for Peace. And that's just the stuff we know about.

4) Extraordinary Rendition: So when does it start to become "ordinary" rendition? This government program has us shipping unindicted terrorism suspects abroad for interrogation/torture. Khalid El-Masri, a German citizen, was sent off to Afghanistan for such treatment and then released without charges, based on some government confusion about the small matter of his name. Canadian citizen Maher Arar claims he was tortured in Syria for a year, then released without charges. Although Arar was cleared by a Canadian commission, the government denies wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0111389

3) Abuse of Jose Padilla: First, he was "exploring a plan to build and explode a radiological dispersion device, or 'dirty bomb,' in the United States," according to then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft. Then, he was planning to blow up apartments and, later, was part of a vague terrorism conspiracy to commit jihad in Bosnia and Chechnya. Always, he was a U.S. citizen. After 3 1/2 years in which he was denied the most basic legal rights, it has emerged that Padilla was either outright tortured or near-tortured and, according to experts, is too mentally damaged now to stand trial. The Bush administration supported his motion for a mental competency assessment, in hopes that such a motion would help prevent his torture claims from going to trial. As Yale Law School's Jack Balkin put it: "You can't believe Padilla when he says we tortured him because he's crazy from all the things we did to him."

2) The Military Commissions Act of 2006: This was the "compromise" legislation that gave Bush even more power than he initially had to detain and try so-called enemy combatants. He was effectively handed the authority to define for himself the parameters of interrogation and torture.

1) Hubris : Whenever the courts push back against the administration's unsupportable constitutional ideas -- ideas about "inherent powers" and a "unitary executive" or the "quaint" Geneva Conventions or the limitless presidential powers during wartime -- the Bush response is to repeat the same chorus louder: Every detainee is the worst of the worst, every action taken is legal, necessary and secret. No mistakes, no nuance, no regrets.

Did I miss anything? Let me know. In the meantime, here's wishing you a happy and freer New Year.

New Orleans Levee-risk Study Faulted (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

When the Army Corps of Engineers admitted in June that design flaws in the New Orleans levee system had caused most of the flooding during Hurricane Katrina, it seemingly left little to argue about.

But the fight wasn't over. The Corps is now engaged in an effort to predict how New Orleans would fare in the next big hurricane, and is once again being second-guessed by some of the nation's top civil engineers.

The National Research Council complains that the Corps' official investigation into the levee failures reaches premature conclusions, glosses over problems, and fails in its most important task: giving the public the information it needs to make informed decisions about living in New Orleans.

The Corps' analysis will play a major role in determining the city's future — including whether more than 200,000 former residents could rebuild abandoned neighborhoods and whether insurers can provide coverage at an affordable rate.

The stakes are high, not only for the integrity of the levees around New Orleans but for similar levees that protect millions of Americans who live along vulnerable coastlines and rivers across the nation. Many were built on the same mucky foundations and with the same flawed engineering assumptions as the notorious failed 17th Street levee in New Orleans.

The suspect levees stretch from Florida's Lake Okeechobee to the rivers of California's Central Valley and the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta, which has 2,300 miles of levees that protect cities and farmland.

The Corps' investigation is essential to understanding California's situation, said Les Harter, the levee chief at the California Department of Water Resources.

"The floodwalls in New Orleans were 15 years old, and they failed," Harter said. "Our levees are 100 years old. We estimate we have one-half the level of protection that New Orleans had."

The Corps is about six months behind schedule in issuing an all-important "risk analysis," a massive body of work that is intended to tell the public how likely New Orleans is to flood again from a big hurricane.

The analysis is supposed to explain in precise detail how well specific sections of the city are protected against hurricanes, using evidence that hurricanes have intensified in recent years. The analysis would produce detailed maps.

Though the risk analysis has not been completed, the Corps did lay out the methodology it planned to use. Since then, the Corps' work has been scrutinized by two key groups, the National Research Council and the American Society of Civil Engineers.

Its methodology has prompted much of the criticism, along with the Corps' failure to say how confident it is in its assessment or to put the future risk in a historical context that New Orleans residents can understand, according to Richard Luettich, a member of the NRC review team and a professor at the University of North Carolina.

The research council, a quasi-federal organization that brings together the nation's top experts on various public policy issues, urged the Corps in an October report to incorporate the views of other federal agencies with expertise in hurricane assessment and flood protection, something it had failed to do.

The Corps says it has since done so.

DOJ_NMG_0111390

Some of the criticism is "misleading," said Ed Link, a University of Maryland professor who is leading the Corps' investigation.

Link, who spent much of his career in the Corps, acknowledged that the risk analysis is well behind schedule and said his team had underestimated the difficulty. But he said the Corps always intended to give the public the information that the NRC says is missing.

Originally, the Corps planned to run 2,000 hurricane scenarios through supercomputers, using a simplified mathematical model to predict how those storms would affect New Orleans. The NRC told the Corps it should use a more sophisticated model that had been developed to analyze Hurricane Katrina.

The sophisticated model, applied to 2,000 possible hurricanes, would have taken too long. So the Corps has reduced the number of hurricane scenarios to 150 and hopes to complete that work by February.

"I think we are going to get better results," Link said.

Wayne Clough, chairman of the NRC review panel and president of the Georgia Institute of Technology, said he is waiting to see if the Corps will satisfy his panel's concerns.

"It is challenging for them," Clough said. "They have good people, and they are taking suggestions."

Perhaps the sharpest criticism has come from academicians led by two UC Berkeley engineering professors, Raymond Seed and Robert Bea. Since the early days after Katrina, Seed and Bea have dogged the Corps with their own technical investigation, financed with grants from the National Science Foundation.

Bea, a pioneer in engineering risk analysis for the petroleum industry and a member of the National Academy of Engineering, thinks the Corps is failing to account for the biggest risk of all: the potential for human error in the design, construction and maintenance of levees.

The Center for Catastrophic Risk Management, which Bea formed at Berkeley, has been developing ways to quantify the risk of human error in engineered systems. Bea says every major disaster involves human error, so it cannot be ignored.

"There are no natural disasters," he said. "There are only natural hazards and human hubris. When you combine hazard with hubris, then you get a disaster."

Link rejects Bea's approach: "We have characterized past human error. How we guess at future behavior, I don't know. There is not a body of knowledge and science in that area that would allow us to do that."

Seed, meanwhile, has sharply criticized the Corps' investigation for failing to put enough blame on water seepage under the foundation walls. Levee foundations across the nation, particularly in California, are more vulnerable to seepage than the Corps realizes, and its flawed New Orleans investigation will result in a dangerous complacency, Seed contends.

Link said, however, that analysis of the nearby soils does not support Seed's contention. The soil is not porous enough to make seepage a serious problem, he added.

While the Corps has struggled with its risk analysis, a private company recently published its own New Orleans risk assessment, with some potentially troubling findings for the city's future. The analysis was done by Risk Management Solutions of Newark, Calif., which provides catastrophic risk analysis for the insurance industry.

The report found evidence that growing hurricane intensities, the tendency of land along the Gulf Coast to sink, and rising sea levels have raised the long-term threat to New Orleans.

In an examination of some neighborhoods, it found that the highest-risk areas could require insurance premiums of $14,000 per year, said Patricia Grossi, one of the report's authors.

The massive risks to the insurance industry were underscored in a court ruling late last month, in which federal Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. ruled that insurers might have to pay for much of Katrina's damage to homes. The insurers had thought they specifically excluded flood damage from coverage. But Duval said the policies excluded only natural floods, not those attributed to human error because the levees failed.

"An insured may reasonably expect overtopping of a levee, but on the other hand an insured may not reasonably expect that levees designed and certified by the United States Corps of Engineers would fail as a result of negligent design and construction as has been alleged," Duval wrote.

The ruling came as part of a massive consolidated civil case that names the Army Corps and insurers as defendants.

The ruling could provide coverage for about $20 billion of damage to homes caused by Katrina, said Joseph Bruno, an attorney for the plaintiffs.

Even now, the Corps is attempting to improve the levee system so that by 2010 it might fail on average only once every 100 years, a standard that seems weak to many experts.

"Is it acceptable to have the worst natural disaster in U.S. history occur over and over again?" asked David Daniel, president of the University of Texas at Dallas and the leader of the American Society of Civil Engineers team that is reviewing the Corps' Katrina investigation. "I don't think it is."

DOJ_NMG_0111391

"Until the banking and insurance industries believe the risks are tolerable, you are not going to see much building going on in New Orleans," Daniel said. "They understand risk as well as anybody."

WAR NEWS:

Hussein Video Grips Iraq; Attacks Go On (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 — After nearly three decades of living with the brutal repression of Saddam Hussein and the violent aftermath of his overthrow by American troops, Iraq responded with a mixture of rejoicing, violence and muted reflection on Saturday to the news that their former dictator had been hanged in one of the grimmest of his own execution chambers.

This nation of 27 million people spent much of the day crowding around television sets to watch mesmerizing replays of a videotape that showed the 69-year-old Mr. Hussein being led to the gallows at dawn by five masked executioners, and having a noose fashioned from a thick rope of yellow hemp lowered around his neck. In the final moments shown on the videotape, he seemed almost unnaturally calm and cooperative.

The message seemed to be that he had lived his final moments with unflinching dignity and courage, reinforcing the legend of himself as the Arab world's strongman that he cultivated while in power. But the videotape, released by the government, offered only a partial sense of how Mr. Hussein went to his death, according to accounts given later by some of the 25 people who attended the execution, including senior officials of the new Shiite-led government.

In their telling, the ousted ruler, a Sunni, spent much of his last half-hour, after arriving at the execution block at the Khadimiyah prison in northern Baghdad, in querulous and at times irascible exchanges with the Shiite guards and executioners assigned to hang him and with some of the Shiite witnesses.

His bitter defiance, in the last moments of his life, was focused on his old enemies: the United States, Iran and their "spies," a word commonly used at the height of his tyranny to justify the merciless persecution of his domestic opponents.

The death sentence was to be carried out within 30 days of the rejection of his appeal, but the hanging was completed by the end of the fifth day, which took some officials in Washington by surprise and left some American legal officials, who have worked with the Iraqi court, uncomfortable.

Within hours of the execution, at least 75 people were killed in nine bombing attacks of the kind that Sunni insurgents commonly carry out against Shiites. In the mainly Shiite districts of Hurriyah and Sayidah in Baghdad, separate sequences in which car bombs detonated in close succession caused at least 39 deaths. Two other car bombings hit Baghdad before nightfall, one outside a children's hospital in the Iskan neighborhood, and another that killed two people outside a mosque in the mainly Sunni district of Adhamiya, the Interior Ministry said.

Another vehicle bomb detonated in a popular fish market in the Shiite holy town of Kufa, 100 miles south of Baghdad, killing 34 people and wounding 38 others, the ministry said. In the Kufa attack, an angry mob set on the suspected bomber and beat him to death, the police said. Five more victims died in a suicide bombing in the northern city of Tal Afar, another center of violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

The United States military command announced six more combat deaths, bringing the number of American troops killed in December to 109, the deadliest month for American deaths since November 2004, according to [a news agency].

With bombing attacks a long-established feature of the struggle for power across Iraq, it was impossible to say whether the Saturday bombings were connected to the execution.

But statements by remnants of the ousted Baath Party, the political vehicle Mr. Hussein rode to power, had promised retaliation, in the form of a new wave of bombings, if the death sentence passed by an Iraqi court eight weeks ago was carried out.

American military commanders took the threat seriously enough to put troops in volatile areas on high alert. On Saturday, a statement on the party's Web site urged Iraqis to strike at the United States and Iran to avenge Mr. Hussein, but cautioned that they must avoid full civil war, Agence France-Presse reported.

From accounts given by witnesses, the hanging had strong sectarian overtones. Within minutes of arriving at the execution block from the American detention center near the airport, where he spent more than 1,000 days in solitary confinement, Mr. Hussein, who may have been the only Sunni present, argued with the guards and executioners.

The men who guided him to the gallows were drawn from the country's Shiite south, identifiable by their darker skins and accents. The Shiites of southern Iraq harbor a strong hatred for Mr. Hussein for his repression of uprisings there, a repression that killed tens of thousands of Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0111392

The execution block scenes offered a grim echo of the sectarian struggle now convulsing Iraq, as Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads engage in a implacable cycle of revenge that has killed as many as 3,700 civilians a month this year, and prompted many Iraqis to say that the killings ushered in by the overthrow of Mr. Hussein are becoming as brutal, and numerous, as anything he inflicted.

Even the decision to hasten Mr. Hussein to the gallows took on a sectarian edge, as Iraq's new Shiite leaders presented the hanging as a message to Sunnis that their days as Iraq's rulers are gone forever.

The message was clear in a statement issued by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, whose "national unity" government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds has splintered into ethnic factions, with the Shiite religious groups that swept last December's elections increasingly assertive of their majority rights.

The statement, which he signed before a battery of Iraqi television cameras, amounted to a warning to the Sunnis that their hopes of ever regaining power are lost. "Saddam's execution puts an end to all their pathetic gambles on a return to dictatorship," he said, referring to the former Baathists at the core of the Sunni insurgency. "I urge followers of the ousted regime to reconsider their stance, because the door is still open to anyone who has no innocent blood on his hands to help in rebuilding Iraq."

At his death, Mr. Hussein had ceased to be much of a major rallying point, even among diehard Sunnis, whose battles in the past three years have been less about restoring Mr. Hussein to power — a chimerical goal, considering that the former leader was America's most closely-guarded prisoner in Iraq — than about reversing the political transition from Sunni to Shiite rule.

Mr. Maliki short-circuited a bitter internal debate within the government over how quickly to send Mr. Hussein to the gallows by signing an order for the execution on Friday night, voiding a procedure that would have required the three-man presidency council — composed of a Kurd, a Sunni and Shiite — to all vote for the hanging.

Mr. Hussein and two of his associates were sentenced to death on Nov. 5 for their roles in the persecution of the Shiite town of Dujail, where an alleged assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein in 1982 was followed by the execution of 148 Shiite men and teenage boys. After the three men's convictions, Mr. Maliki led the push for a hanging before the end of the year.

After the sentencing, American officials were confident that appeals might delay the hanging until the spring. But Mr. Maliki pressed for a speeded appeal process, and secured a confirmation of the death sentences within three weeks.

A senior Bush administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Saturday that the Kurds had called for a delay, so the former Iraqi dictator could be prosecuted for crimes against them. But the official said there was no desire from the United States to seek a delay in the execution.

Administration officials said President Bush had gone to sleep before Mr. Hussein's hanging, but had been told it was imminent. He awoke Saturday at 4:40 a.m. Central Time, said a White House spokesman, David Almacy, and at 5:55 a.m. received a 10-minute telephone briefing about the execution from his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley. The president and Mr. Hadley discussed the execution and the worldwide reaction to it.

"The president remarked that he was pleased with the culmination of the Iraqi judicial process, and justice was done," Mr. Almacy said.

During the 1980s, the United States had supported Iraq under Mr. Hussein in its war with Iran.

Among Shiites elsewhere in Iraq, there were sporadic eruptions of joy at the hanging, marked by dancing in the streets and the firing of automatic weapons into the air, as the early morning radio and television bulletins carried word that Mr. Hussein was dead. But the more general mood, even among Shiites, was one of subdued reflection, as if millions of Iraqis had exhausted their emotional and psychological reserves during the long years of violence.

Apart from the bombings, the most palpable Sunni reaction to the hanging took the form of scattered protests, some of them violent, that swept through Tikrit, Mr. Hussein's hometown, and across Anbar Province, west of Baghdad, the principal heartland of the Sunni insurgency.

In one major insurgent stronghold, Ramadi, American troops were reported to have fired in the air to scatter demonstrators, who were marching through the streets hoisting portraits of Mr. Hussein and firing automatic weapons into the air. In Falluja, 30 miles west of Baghdad, witnesses said crowds of angry men took to the streets within 90 minutes of the hanging, attacking a police station and a courthouse and setting them ablaze.

Among those Iraqis who watched and re-watched the government's video of the hanging, there seemed to be a widespread view that Mr. Hussein accepted his fate, at the end, with a composure and courage at odds with the psychotic figure he cut during his 24 years in power. In that time, he ordered the killings of thousands of his fellow citizens, many of whom ended up in mass graves scattered across Iraq's oil-rich deserts.

Throughout Saturday, Iraqi government officials put out conflicting signals as to what they planned to do with Mr. Hussein's body. An official in the governor's office in Salahaddin, Mr. Hussein's home province, said in a telephone interview that a delegation led by the governor, Hamad Shegata, and including and the head of Mr. Hussein's Albu-Nasir tribe, Sheikh Ali Al-Nida, had traveled to Baghdad during the day to arrange the handover of the body for burial in Awja, near Tikrit, his hometown.

DOJ_NMG_0111393

Late on Saturday, a [news agency] report quoting one of Mr. Hussein's defense lawyers in Amman, Jordan, and a Muslim cleric in Tikrit, said Sheikh Nida had taken possession of the body and returned north with it to Awja. Muslim tradition requires that burials be completed before dusk on the day of death.

But a political adviser to Prime Minister Maliki, Bassam al-Husseini, said there were no plans to hand over the body until the risk of violence over Mr. Hussein's hanging subsided, a period that he said could run for weeks or months.

In the meantime, he said, the body would be kept in "a secret place," where it would be secure against desecration by his enemies. "If we bury him in Tikrit, people will dig him up and tear the body apart," he said.

On The Gallows, Curses For U.S. And "Traitors" (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 — Saddam Hussein never bowed his head, until his neck snapped.

His last words were equally defiant.

"Down with the traitors, the Americans, the spies and the Persians."

The final hour of Iraq's former ruler began about 5 a.m., when American troops escorted him from Camp Cropper, near the Baghdad airport, to Camp Justice, another American base at the heart of the city.

There, he was handed over to a newly trained unit of the Iraqi National Police, with whom he would later exchange curses. Iraq took full custody of Mr. Hussein at 5:30 a.m.

Two American helicopters flew 14 witnesses from the Green Zone to the execution site — a former headquarters of the Istikhbarat, the deposed government's much feared military intelligence outfit, now inside the American base.

Mr. Hussein was escorted into the room where the gallows, with its red railing, stood, greeted at the door by three masked executioners known as ashmawi. Several of the witnesses present — including Munkith al-Faroun, the deputy prosecutor for the court; Munir Haddad, the deputy chief judge for the Iraqi High Tribunal; and Sami al-Askari, a member of Parliament — described in detail how the execution unfolded and independently recounted what was said.

To protect himself from the bitter cold before dawn during the short trip, Mr. Hussein wore a 1940s-style wool cap, a scarf and a long black coat over a white collared shirt.

His executioners wore black ski masks, but Mr. Hussein could still see their deep brown skin and hear their dialects, distinct to the Shiite southern part of the country, where he had so brutally repressed two separate uprisings.

The small room had a foul odor. It was cold, had bad lighting and a sad, melancholic atmosphere. With the witnesses and 11 other people — including guards and the video crew — it was cramped.

Mr. Hussein's eyes darted about, trying to take in just who was going to put an end to him.

The executioners took his hat and his scarf.

Mr. Hussein, whose hands were bound in front of him, was taken to the judge's room next door. He followed each order he was given.

He sat down and the verdict, finding him guilty of crimes against humanity, was read aloud.

"Long live the nation!" Mr. Hussein shouted. "Long live the people! Long live the Palestinians!"

He continued shouting until the verdict was read in full, and then he composed himself again.

When he rose to be led back to the execution room at 6 a.m., he looked strong, confident and calm. Whatever apprehension he may have had only minutes earlier had faded.

The general prosecutor asked Mr. Hussein to whom he wanted to give his Koran. He said Bandar, the son of Awad al-Bandar, the former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court who was also to be executed soon.

The room was quiet as everyone began to pray, including Mr. Hussein. "Peace be upon Mohammed and his holy family."

Two guards added, "Supporting his son Moktada, Moktada, Moktada."

Mr. Hussein seemed a bit stunned, swinging his head in their direction.

They were talking about Moktada al-Sadr, the firebrand cleric whose militia is now committing some of the worst violence in the sectarian fighting; he is the son of a revered Shiite cleric, Muhammad Sadiq al-Sadr, whom many believe Mr. Hussein ordered murdered.

"Moktada?" he spat out, mixing sarcasm and disbelief.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, asked Mr. Hussein if he had any remorse or fear.

"No," he said bluntly. "I am a militant and I have no fear for myself. I have spent my life in jihad and fighting aggression. Anyone who takes this route should not be afraid."

DOJ_NMG_0111394

Mr. Rubaie, standing shoulder to shoulder with Mr. Hussein, asked him about the killing of the elder Mr. Sadr.

They were standing so close to each other that others could not hear the exchange.

One of the guards, though, became angry. “You have destroyed us,” the masked man yelled. “You have killed us. You have made us live in destitution.”

Mr. Hussein was scornful: “I have saved you from destitution and misery and destroyed your enemies, the Persians and Americans.”

The guard cursed him. “God damn you.”

Mr. Hussein replied, “God damn you.”

Two witnesses, apparently uninvolved in selecting the guards, exchanged a quiet joke, saying they gathered that the goal of disbanding the militias had yet to be accomplished.

The deputy prosecutor, Mr. Faroun, berated the guards, saying, “I will not accept any offense directed at him.”

Mr. Hussein was led up to the gallows without a struggle. His hands were unbound, put behind his back, then fastened again. He showed no remorse. He held his head high.

The executioners offered him a hood. He refused. They explained that the thick rope could cut through his neck and offered to use the scarf he had worn earlier to keep that from happening. Mr. Hussein accepted.

He stood on the high platform, with a deep hole beneath it.

He said a last prayer. Then, with his eyes wide open, no stutter or choke in his throat, he said his final words cursing the Americans and the Persians.

At 6:10 a.m., the trapdoor swung open. He seemed to fall a good distance, but he died swiftly. After just a minute, his body was still. His eyes still were open but he was dead. Despite the scarf, the rope cut a gash into his neck.

His body stayed hanging for another nine minutes as those in attendance broke out in prayer, praising the Prophet, at the death of a dictator.

TV Faced Dilemma On Hanging Coverage (LAT)

By Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

NEW YORK — American television channels and networks were initially spared the thorny decision of whether to air graphic footage of Saddam Hussein's execution after the Iraqi government declined to release video of the moments of his actual hanging early Saturday in Baghdad.

But hours later, a video of the hanging, which was apparently shot on a cellphone, surfaced on Arabic television channels and websites such as Google, underscoring how quickly controversial images rocket through cyberspace, whether or not there have been attempts to control them.

The jerky images show the noose being placed around Hussein's neck and angry shouts exchanged between him and those in attendance. Hussein can be seen falling through the trapdoor as it opens, but the actual hanging is not visible. Moments later, the camera pans in and shows his face.

For most of Saturday, American TV relied on a tape made available earlier that showed only the moments leading up to the hanging.

CNN and Fox News also aired a grainy video of his body, his head twisted at a sharp angle as his shrouded corpse lay on a stretcher.

ABC, CBS and NBC decided to show a still photo from that footage, apparently made with a cellphone camera.

Both videos were originally shown by Iraqi television stations, which aired them several hours after the execution.

As of Saturday evening here, no American broadcast network or cable channel had aired the more explicit parts of the newer video, although Fox News ran a truncated version it said had been taken from Al Jazeera, ending after the noose is placed around Hussein's neck. CBS News and CNN decided to air portions of the video before the trapdoor was released. ABC News said it would not use any of the newer video.

The origins of the newer video were not immediately clear, but its existence, and ready availability on the Internet, spotlighted the challenge that faces news organizations as Internet sites continue to supplant the traditional media as a source of information.

The possibility that video of the actual execution would be available had triggered intense discussions for the last two days among top executives at all the networks.

"It's a very delicate issue because it could be gruesome material, but at the same time, he was a gruesome leader," said David Rhodes, Fox News' vice president of news, before the cellphone video of the hanging surfaced.

DOJ_NMG_0111395

A cameraman from the Iraqi prime minister's office apparently filmed the entire execution, but the government did not release the footage of the actual hanging. TV executives said they continued to receive conflicting reports about whether the Iraqi government would eventually release video of the actual execution, but added that the additional element was not necessary to convey the significance of the event.

"I think that looking at his face prior to him being executed, it sends a pretty powerful message," said Bob Murphy, senior vice president at ABC News. "And then showing the conclusion of him afterward — that's a pretty complete story."

For Saddam's Page In History, A Final Link On YouTube (WP)

By Philip Kennicott

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

When ABC broke into its Friday newsmagazine, "20/20," to announce that Saddam Hussein was finally dead, at the end of a rope, in the pre-dawn darkness of Baghdad, it interrupted a report on "viral video."

Viral video is the dizzying Web phenomenon in which news clips, homemade videos, naughty celebrities caught on cellphone cameras, and the best snippets culled from our endless, 500-channel, 24-hour Television Burlesque, are posted, downloaded and e-mailed from Manhattan to Bangalore and back again in the blink of an eye. ABC gathered a few lightweight social commentators to give gravitas to what was really just a shameless excuse to replay footage of horrendous car accidents, Jerry Springer-like brawls and people getting gunned down in Iraq.

And now we bring you news of Saddam Hussein's execution, video to follow. We hope. And it did follow. Americans woke up on the next to last day of a dismal year of chaos, civil war and general mayhem to find, with a few easy clicks of a mouse, what they were assured was "the final chapter" of the Iraqi dictator's sorry life. ABC got lucky to have it all go down while "20/20" was telling us about viral video, because here it was: The first great Shakespearean death scene of the YouTube generation.

Except that when the video arrived, no matter how many times you watched it, the images seemed to be neutral, gray, bizarre. Hussein offered nothing to his enemies, no meltdown or tears or panic. He looked ashen, dazed and exhausted, and he submitted to the placing of the noose with the affectless detachment of someone who has determined to get through an ordeal by checking out emotionally from the whole scene. Although video of his actual death wasn't immediately circulated, it seems Hussein approached his end bravely, so long as one understands that bravery is not a virtue in itself (like loyalty, bravery is only good if it is bravery in service of something good). But it was an awkward scene and everyone involved, including Hussein, seemed to want it over quickly.

It was odd to see him being touched and manipulated, especially as the news networks began showing footage of him from his days in power, in which there always seemed to be a space around him. Hussein's generals and other toadies kept their distance, reinforcing his prestige, and also his volatility. He was a big man, whose eyes were always moving, warily, which made him bristle with aggression even when laughing. But here he was in a small, cramped space, with too many people working to get him into position for the hanging.

His personal space had already been once and forever triumphantly violated with the dissemination of images of a wild-haired and filthy Hussein submitting to medical inspection after his capture. But it was odd to see that space violated again, one last time, especially as the news of the execution flowed seamlessly into the career retrospective and the endless commentary.

People who are important enough to live their lives in the constant glare of the camera don't really have "final chapters," because when it's all over, their images are endlessly reprocessed and remixed into a kind of permanent simultaneity, like the jumble of birth, death, miracles and martyrdom one finds on a complex altarpiece. The idea that Hussein had lived his "final chapter" was an excuse to play the whole drama over again, from beginning to end. And yet no matter how many times one watched it, from the black-and-white footage of a young thug on the rise, to the swaggering, khaki-green era we remember from the first Gulf War, to his years as a prisoner, disheveled at first, then somber in his black suits, no matter how many times the life was reenacted, a sense of finality never emerged.

For the obvious reason: Hussein's legacy is being lived out every day in Iraq and will continue to haunt his people for an indefinite bloody future. For as long as he was alive, Hussein was useful for an important American argument about the war. He was a bad guy; we captured him; he would face justice. This miniature narrative, contained within the broader one of a war gone terribly wrong, is losing its force. And with Hussein dead it will likely become almost entirely inert. Another video clip, easily found on the Web, showed Hussein dead, wrapped in a white cloth, with his face clearly visible. The camera lingered over the image for a strangely long time, as if to say, yes, he's still dead.

Saddam Hussein Is Still Dead is not a rallying cry. But the images of his execution and his body seem to point to a new era in the way images are used politically, what might be called a post-propaganda era. So many images that were supposed to have such profound impact on public perception -- the now infamous "Mission Accomplished" photo op or Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's bloody head tastefully framed for the cameras -- have failed to connect with the reality of either public opinion, or the facts on the ground. This image means progress, we're told, but there isn't any progress. This image is a final chapter, but the blood still flows. For a public media campaign to work, at least some of the politically calculated captions placed on images must, in the end, turn out to be true.

DOJ_NMG_0111396

The current administration has attempted to construct a classic media argument in support of the war at a time when "the media" are dissolving and re-forming into something new, something in which the images we wish to see are more important than the images we are forced to see. Even before the execution video arrived, television people were publicly clucking about what they would or wouldn't show. It will be tasteful, they assured us. But their efforts at gatekeeping are now almost entirely irrelevant. The public will find exactly as much of the death of Hussein as it wants, and people will watch for as long as it holds any novelty or fascination. Taste is a collective worry, but in this new world of viral videos, you can construct your own war, personally tailored to your personal bloodlust. Saddam Hussein is dead, the video is out there. Enjoy.

Feared And Pitiless; Fearful And Pitiable (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

NOBODY who experienced Iraq under the tyranny of Saddam Hussein could imagine, at the height of the terror he imposed on his countrymen, ever pitying him. Pitiless himself, he sent hundreds of thousands of his countrymen to miserable deaths, in the wars he started against Iran and Kuwait, in the torture chambers of his secret police, or on the gallows that became an industry at Abu Ghraib and other charnel houses across Iraq. Iraqis who were caught in his spider's web of evil, and survived, tell of countless tortures, of the psychopathic pleasure the former dictator appeared to take from inflicting suffering and death.

Yet there was a moment when I pitied him, and it came back to me after the nine Iraqi appeal judges upheld the death sentence against Saddam last week, setting off the countdown to his execution. As I write this, flying hurriedly back to Baghdad from an interrupted Christmas break, Saddam makes his own trip to the gallows with an indecent haste, without the mercy of family farewells and other spare acts of compassion that lend at least a pretense of civility to executions under law in kinder jurisdictions. From all we know of the preparations, Saddam's death was to be a miserable and lonely one, as stark and undignified as Iraq's new rulers can devise.

Many Iraqis, perhaps most, will spare no sympathies for him. However much he may have suffered in the end, they will say, it could never be enough to atone for a long dark night he imposed on his people. Still, there was that moment, on July 1, 2004, when Saddam became, for me, if only briefly, an object of compassion.

He had been brought to a makeshift courtroom in the grounds of a former presidential palace in Baghdad that became, as Camp Victory, the American military headquarters in Iraq. It was the first time he had appeared in public since his capture six months earlier in a coffin-like subterranean bolt-hole near his hometown of Tikrit when he emerged unkempt yet proclaiming himself to American soldiers who hauled him from his hiding place to be "Saddam Hussein, president of Iraq," and ready to negotiate with his captors.

We know, from accounts given by his Iraqi and American interrogators, that the old Saddam quickly reasserted himself, heaping contempt on the new generation of Iraqi leaders who were taken out to a detention center near Baghdad International Airport the next day to verify for themselves, and for the world, that the man the Americans had seized was indeed their former tormentor.

So when the day arrived for his first court appearance, starting the process that led over the next 30 months to his two trials for crimes against humanity, there seemed little doubt to me which Saddam would show up to face the charges — Saddam the indignant, Saddam the self-proclaimed champion of Iraqi and Pan-Arab nationalism, Saddam the self-anointed figurehead of the insurgency that was already, then, beginning to look like a nightmare for the invaders.

His American captors had flown Saddam and 11 of his top henchmen to Camp Victory by helicopter, and led them hooded and shackled at the waist and ankles to the threshold of the mosque annex that served as a courtroom. Only at the door to the court were the hoods and shackles removed, clattering to the floor a moment or two before the door opened to show Defendant No. 1, Saddam Hussein al-Majid, standing clasped at the elbow between two Iraqi guards.

From 20 feet away on an observer's bench, seated beside the late Peter Jennings of ABC News and Christiane Amanpour of CNN, I caught my first glimpse of the man who had become in my years of visiting Iraq under his rule, a figure of mythic brutality, a man so feared that the mention of his name would set the hard, unsmiling men assigned to visiting reporters as "minders" to shaking with fear, and on one occasion, in my experience, to abject weeping.

But this was not that Saddam. The man who stepped into the court had the demeanor of a condemned man, his eyes swiveling left, then right, his gait unsteady, his curious, lisping voice raised to a tenor that resonated fear. Quickly, he fixed his gaze on the handful of foreigners in the court, and I had my own moment of anxiety when it came to my mind that he was intent on remembering the faces of the non-Iraqis that were there to witness his humiliation, perhaps to get word through to his lawyers, and then on to the insurgents, that we were to be punished for our intrusion. It was only later, after I learned what he had been told before being taken from his cell to the court, that I understood that our presence meant something else to him entirely, that with foreigners present, he was not going to be summarily hanged or shot.

DOJ_NMG_0111397

THE Americans who were his jailers in the first days after his capture — aboard an American aircraft carrier and then at a converted detention center known as Camp Cropper at the edge of Baghdad's airport — had chosen, on that summer day, to give Saddam a taste of the fear that he exhilarated in imposing on others. All he was told was that he was being taken "to face Iraqi justice." Small wonder, as the architect of a quarter-century of repression, that he should fear that he was about to suffer the torture and grisly death that he had inflicted on so many others.

At that instant, I felt sorry for him, as a man in distress and perhaps, too, as a once almighty figure reduced to ignominy. But the expression of that pity to the Iraqis present marked the distance between those, like me, who had taken the measure of Saddam's terror as a visitor, shielded from the worst of it by the minders and the claustrophobic world of closely guarded hotels and supervised Information Ministry trips, and Iraqis who lived through it with no shield.

That I could feel pity for him struck the Iraqis with whom I talked as evidence of a profound moral corruption. I came to understand how a Westerner used to the civilities of democracy and due process — even a reporter who thought he grasped the depths of Saddam's depravity — fell short of the Iraqis' sense, forged by years of brutality, of the power of his unmitigated evil.

After that initial encounter with Saddam, I saw him many times walking within 10 feet of my feet in the glass-walled press gallery in the courtroom at the former Baath Party headquarters, chosen as a venue for his trials by the Regime Crimes Liaison Office, the unit created by the United States Justice Department, to help Iraqi judges and lawyers create what became the Iraqi High Tribunal, the special court designated to try high-ranking members of the old regime. But the Saddam who dominated that courtroom was another figure — haughty, defiant, often beside himself with anger, but, above all, remorseless. If the death penalty held any fear for him, when it was handed down in November, for the killing of 148 men and teenage boys during a systematic persecution of the Shiite town of Dujail in 1982, he never showed it.

Almost the only chink in his prideful armor showed when he demanded at the Dujail trial that he be shot by firing squad, the privilege as he told it, due to him as the — still legitimate, as he claimed — commander in chief of Iraq's armed forces. That plea was quickly denied by the chief judge. It was a point never again raised by Saddam, who took, at the end, to proclaiming his eagerness to die as a "martyr" for Iraq, and his belief that this would earn his passage to paradise. But the plea to be spared hanging suggested that fear — of humiliation, if not of death — was a close companion during the 1,000-odd days he spent in solitary confinement in Camp Cropper.

Of other strains of humanity there was little sign. During the Dujail trial, and just as much during the Anfal trial that followed, at which Saddam and six other defendants were accused of murdering as many as 180,000 Kurds in the late 1980's, he showed no hint of remorse as survivors of the torture chambers and the desert internment camps and, in the case of the Anfal campaign, the chemical weapons attacks and the mass graves, told their pitiful stories. Head to one side, hand pressed to his head, fingers splayed, writing detailed notes on yellow legal pads, Saddam listened impassively to the accounts of women hung upside down to be beaten, of sons holding wet cloths to their faces and finding the twisted bodies of mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers heaped in an agony of death from mustard-gas attacks, and of young men who scrambled back to life from beneath the bloodied bodies of fellow villagers in remote pits scraped from the desert wadis of Iraq.

LIKE some ghastly accountant with an obsession for detail but no morsel of pity, Saddam limited his questions to peripheral issues: What were the precise geographic coordinates of the mass graves? How could a boy no more than 10 at the time recall so precisely the details of a chemical attack? Why should anyone credit the testimony of a man — brother to seven others who were executed after the alleged attack at Dujail — who admitted he belonged to Dawa, an Iran-backed religious party?

Not once did he avail himself of what seemed like the expedient response of a man who had pleaded not guilty to involvement in any of these crimes: an expression of sorrow for the victims, albeit coupled with renewed denials of his responsibility.

Like many another dictator before him, Saddam so sealed himself off from his own people, in his scores of palaces, and on his carefully staged, video-recorded walkabouts among crowds of ululating citizens, that he seemed never to grasp, even in the extremities of his last weeks, how hated he was by his people. In the courtroom, he insisted, repeatedly, that he remained Iraq's lawful president and thus immune to prosecution, even as the judges responded by calling him "ex-president" and ordering him to sit down. He was sustained in this make-believe world by his former acolytes, who would stand in the dark as he entered, greeting him with expressions of undying fealty.

Among the most insistent of these courtiers were two men who were scheduled to die with him on the gallows after their appeals in the Dujail case were denied, his half-brother, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad al-Bandar, chief judge of the revolutionary court who passed the death sentences on the men and boys from Dujail, in a court hearing that lasted only hours with the dock too crowded for many of the condemned even to enter the court, and with no legal representation. This miserable precedent appeared to make no impact on Saddam and his fellow defendants, who protested at every opportunity during their own trials at the denial of what they claimed were their proper rights and comforts. The quality of the prison food — including American military rations known as meals-ready-to-eat — was one such issue; the quality of the cigarettes given to them another.

DOJ_NMG_0111398

Saddam, prideful to the last, left much of the caviling over prison conditions to his erstwhile minions. And shortly before he was sentenced to death, he demonstrated, inadvertently, that in the shrunken world of his captivity he remained the leader who dare not be defied. An American official who worked closely with the Iraqi court told of watching on a closed-circuit relay as Saddam and other defendants in the Dujail trial waited one day in a holding room off the courtroom floor. At the time, Saddam had declared a hunger strike on his own and his associates' behalf in protest of the Dujail case continuing after the walkout of the defense lawyers, who had been replaced by counsel appointed by the court.

At one end of the room, visible on the surveillance cameras, was a table laid with food, including cellophane-wrapped oatmeal biscuits of the kind available in every American military canteen in Iraq. Thinking his fellow defendants were distracted, one of the accused, Taha Yassin Ramadan, a former vice president renowned even among Saddam's henchman for his brutality, slipped two pockets of biscuits into his pocket, only for Saddam to march on him demanding to know who gave him permission to eat. Mr. Ramadan, the American official said, denied he had taken anything from the table. "Empty your pockets, you betrayer!" Saddam demanded. Whereupon Mr. Ramadan lamely admitted his guilt and, with the sheepish deference born of two decades in Saddam's inner circle, returned the biscuits to his basket.

In Hussein's Last Minutes, Jeers And A Cry For Calm (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 -- In the predawn hours Saturday, ousted president of Iraq Saddam Hussein stood calmly at the gallows, a thick yellow noose around his neck, ready to die with an orderliness that now eludes Iraq. Three executioners, men in black ski masks and leather jackets, stood behind him. Hussein said, "Ya Allah," preparing himself for the platform he stood on to open up.

Suddenly, witnesses recalled, the room erupted in Shiite religious chants as the Shiite Muslims in the audience seized the moment they had long sought. One man yelled, "Moqtada, Moqtada, Moqtada," unveiling his loyalty to radical anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Hussein smiled, the witnesses said, and asked sarcastically, "Moqtada?"

In his final moments, shortly after the dawn call to prayer, Hussein, a Sunni Arab, came face to face with today's Iraq, which he had never met, having spent the past three years in U.S. custody. Since his capture, the Shiites his government violently repressed have come to power. They were the last people Hussein saw before his death.

"Go to hell," a voice yelled in response to Hussein's remark, according to a grainy videotape taken by a cellphone that was flashed on television networks Saturday night.

"Long live Muhammad Bakr Sadr," yelled another voice. Bakr Sadr was the uncle of Moqtada al-Sadr and founder of the Dawa party, of which Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is a senior leader.

Then, Munqith al-Faroun, who prosecuted Hussein, yelled: "The man is facing execution. Please don't."

The room quieted.

According to accounts from five witnesses, as well as Iraqi and U.S. officials, Hussein, as he neared death, wore ironed black pants, an ivory white shirt and a black, luxurious topcoat. His shoes were polished to a shine. He dyed his hair black and trimmed his silver beard. He waited with dignity.

Hussein began to recite an Islamic prayer.'Come . . . at 3:30'

On Friday night, Maliki's office informed 14 men that they might get a phone call, officials said. Since Tuesday, when Iraq's highest court had upheld Hussein's death sentence, it was clear that his execution would arrive soon. The Maliki government had wanted to execute Hussein early Friday, U.S. and Iraqi officials said in interviews. But legal issues, security concerns and Iraq's political divide postponed the plan.

Shiite leaders, and some moderate Sunni Arabs, wanted to hang Hussein swiftly, fearing that any delay could inflame violence and deepen the nation's sectarian rifts. The Kurds wanted to execute Hussein at the end of the ongoing genocide trial, in which Hussein was charged with orchestrating the killings of tens of thousands of northern Kurds, many with chemical weapons. Other politicians worried about turning Hussein into a martyr if they executed him during the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha.

DOJ_NMG_0111399

"Up to the last moment, the matter was being debated," said Mariam Rayis, a Maliki adviser.

But by late Friday, Hussein's execution papers were signed. Munir Haddad, a judge on Iraq's appeals court, received the call at 1:30 a.m. Saturday. A voice said, "Come to the prime minister's office at 3:30 in order to carry out the execution," Haddad recalled.

He arrived, along with Faroun, and joined the rest of the group of 14. They included the acting minister of justice, national security officials, members of parliament and several top Maliki advisers. About 5 a.m., they stepped into two U.S. military helicopters, seven in each. They flew 15 minutes to an Iraqi army base overlooking the Tigris River in Baghdad's Khadimiya neighborhood, Haddad said. It once housed Hussein's military intelligence service, where his opponents were executed.

About the same time, U.S. military officials took Hussein from his prison cell at Camp Cropper, near the Baghdad airport, and flew him to the Green Zone, the fortified enclave that houses the U.S. Embassy and senior Iraqi officials. There, they handed Hussein over to the Iraqis, U.S. officials said. The Iraqis then drove Hussein in an armored convoy to Khadimiya.The Hangmen Assemble

When the helicopters landed, Haddad, Faroun and the acting justice minister were rushed into a small, spare room with a desk, several chairs and a refrigerator. Ten minutes later, Hussein walked in. He wore a wool hat and sat down on a chair before Haddad, who was behind the desk. Hussein's hands were locked in front of him with plastic handcuffs.

"He seemed normal, not confused nor afraid," Haddad recalled.

Haddad, following Iraqi law, started to read to Hussein the verdict and the ruling by the appeals court. But as he read, Hussein shouted: "We are in Heaven, and our enemies are in Hell" and "Long live the people, long live jihad, and long live the nation."

Then he directed his anger at two enemies he went to war with during three decades of rule.

"Down with the Persians and the Americans," Hussein said.

But Haddad kept going.

"He tried to raise his voice, but my voice was higher than his," Haddad said.

At the end of the reading, Hussein's hangmen arrived. Hussein met privately with a Sunni cleric for a few minutes.A Defense of His Reign

They took Hussein to a large room with no windows and a staircase leading to a tall, red gallows with a large pit at the bottom.

"It was very cold," Haddad said. "It had the stench of death."

Haddad and Faroun walked with Hussein and his hangmen to the steps of the gallows. Then one of the masked men, Haddad recalled, turned to Hussein and said:

"You have destroyed Iraq, impoverished its people and made us all like beggars while Iraq is one of the richest countries in the world."

Hussein replied: "I did not destroy Iraq. I made Iraq into a rich, powerful country."

Faroun stepped in and ordered the hangman to back away.

Hussein carried a dark green Koran in his clasped hands, witnesses said. At the steps to the gallows, he turned to Faroun and asked him to give the book to the son of his co-defendant Awad Haman Bander. Bander, like Hussein, was sentenced to death for the killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the northern town of Dujail.

"What if I don't see him?" Faroun asked.

"Keep it until you meet with any of my family members," Faroun recalled Hussein saying.

Hussein took his hat off. The hangmen uncuffed his hands, then placed them behind his back and recuffed them. They also tied his legs together, witnesses said.

One Iraqi official asked him whether he was afraid, Haddad recalled.

"I am not afraid. I have chosen this path," Hussein replied.

Then the hangmen slowly helped him up the stairs.'He Is Finished'

The chief hangman offered Hussein a black hood and asked him to place it over his head, but he refused. The man explained that his death would be more painful. Hussein again refused, witness said. So the hangman folded the hood and wrapped it around Hussein's neck, like a neck warmer.

"He was shivering, and his face was pale," said one witness, who asked not to be identified because he feared for his safety. "I think up to the moment when they put the rope around his neck, he was not believing what was happening."

Faroun saw a different Hussein: "He was holding tight. He was not scared."

Hussein stepped onto the platform, helped by the hangmen.

DOJ_NMG_0111400

As the Shiites chanted and proclaimed their loyalties to Sadr, who heads the Mahdi Army militia, which the United States is pressuring the Maliki government to dismantle, an Iraqi official turned to Haddad. "Now how are we going to disband the militia when we have such things?" the official asked.

After the outbursts, as Hussein recited his Islamic prayer for the second time, the chief hangman asked for silence. Then the floor of the gallows was opened.

"He died in a tenth of a second," Faroun said. "He did not move a leg or foot."

Hussein's body hung for about five minutes, witnesses said.

"Some of the people were shouting, 'May God pray on Muhammad and the descendants of Muhammad,' " Haddad said. "After that, the body was brought down, they placed a white cover and then laid him on the ground."

A doctor examined him and then turned to the 14 witnesses. "He is finished," he said, according to those who were there.

Hussein's body was loaded onto one of the helicopters and flown to the Green Zone, where an ambulance transported his body to an unknown destination.

Hussein's death was announced on Iraqi television at 6:10 a.m. One Iraqi witness immediately phoned Rayis and said: "The punishment has been carried out."

"I cried at the moment out of joy," she recalled.

Shi'ite-Sunni Rift Laid Bare By Hanging (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- As Iraqis awoke yesterday to television images of Saddam Hussein's neck twisted by a hangman's noose, Shi'ites cheered, Sunnis vowed revenge and at least 80 persons died from bombings and death squads -- not far from the daily average.

In Baghdad's Shi'ite neighborhood of Sadr City, victims of Saddam's three decades of autocratic rule took to the streets celebrating, dancing, beating drums and hanging Saddam in effigy.

Celebratory gunfire erupted in other Shi'ite neighborhoods across the country.

Outside the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, west of the capital, loyalists marched with Saddam pictures and waved Iraqi flags.

Defying curfews, hundreds took to the streets vowing revenge in Samarra, north of Baghdad, and gunmen paraded and fired into the air in support of Saddam in Tikrit, his hometown.

"He's gone, but our problems continue. We brought problems on ourselves after Saddam because we began fighting Shi'ite on Sunni and Sunni on Shi'ite," said Haider Hamed, 34, a candy store owner in east Baghdad whose uncle was killed in one of Saddam's many brutal purges.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of three Marines and three soldiers, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops in Iraq, with 109 service members killed.

There was no immediate sign of a feared Sunni uprising in retaliation for Saddam's execution.

But the London Sunday Telegraph reported that 400 to 500 Shi'ites had been kidnapped in the past two months and messages to relatives said they would be killed if Saddam died.

The responses within Iraq to Saddam's death echoed the larger reaction across the Middle East, with his enemies rejoicing and his defenders proclaiming him a martyr.

Iranians and Kuwaitis welcomed the death of the leader who led wars against each of their countries.

Some Arab governments denounced the timing of the 69-year-old former president's hanging just before the start of the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar, Eid al-Adha.

Libya announced a three-day official mourning period and canceled all celebrations for Eid.

In Baghdad, 12 bodies bearing signs of torture were found in various parts of the city, police said.

Two car bombs detonated one after another in a religiously mixed neighborhood of northwest Baghdad, killing 37 civilians and wounding 76, police said.

Thirty-one persons died and 58 were injured when a bomb planted on a minibus exploded in a fish market in Kufa, a mostly Shi'ite town south of Baghdad, said Issa Mohammed, director of the morgue in the neighboring town of Najaf.

The man blamed for parking the vehicle in Kufa, about 100 miles south of the Iraqi capital, was cornered and killed by a mob as he walked away from the explosion, police and witnesses said.

Shoppers had crowded into the market to buy supplies for the four-day Eid al-Adha

The new deaths announced by the U.S. military included three Marines and a soldier killed in combat in Iraq's volatile western Anbar province, and two soldiers killed by roadside bombs in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0111401

The total U.S. death toll in Iraq teetered on the brink of 3,000 at a crucial time, as President Bush seeks to craft a new Iraq policy in the new year. Mr. Bush issued a statement from his ranch in Crawford, Texas, warning of more challenges ahead for American troops.

"Many difficult choices and further sacrifices lie ahead," he said in the statement released Friday night. "Yet the safety and security of the American people require that we not relent in ensuring that Iraq's young democracy continues to progress."

Saddam was hanged early yesterdayafter his conviction last month for crimes against humanity in connection with the 1982 executions of 148 Shi'ites following a failed assassination attempt.

Saddam was buried shortly before sunrise today in a family plot next to the graves of his two sons, witnesses said.

Those who saw the ceremony said only a few people were present for the burial in Ouja, a small town outside Tikrit, Saddam's power base 80 miles north of Baghdad.

Hussein Divides Iraq In His Death As He Did In Life (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 — Saddam Hussein was dead, but his legacy was more alive than ever.

As Iraqis across the country awoke to the news that the former dictator had been hanged, the bitter remains of his rule defined their responses.

For Shiites, long oppressed, it was a moment of intense release.

“This chapter of Iraqi history is over,” said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser, speaking on national television early Saturday. “Let us forget it and live with each other.”

Sunni Arabs were skeptical. After three years of grinding violence and abuses by the Shiite government security forces, trust has all but fallen away, and few feel genuinely represented by the government. Most, in fact, are afraid of it.

“I’m not part of their world,” said Yusra Abdul Aziz, a teacher in the Sunni Arab enclave of Mansour. “They are not speaking about Iraq. They are speaking about themselves.”

Their reactions showed just how far Iraqis have drifted apart in the three years since Mr. Hussein’s capture. And while he has long faded from relevance in the life of every day Iraq, in many ways, the country is living the legacy that he built.

The new Iraq appears capable of inflicting only more of the abuse it suffered for so long, perpetuating it with overwhelming brutality. People disappear in the night. Bodies with drill holes surface in trash heaps. Government forces moonlight as killing squads.

As vicious as he was, Mr. Hussein also held the country firmly together. Beyond military control, there was a subtle social glue: Iraqis of all sects loved to hate Saddam together. Now that he is gone, Shiites are afraid to joke with Sunnis about him, and Sunnis feel they are being blamed for his crimes.

Ahmed Hillu, a 32-year-old tailor, whose suits hung on the walls of his narrow shop in Sadr City like a mute chorus, recalled watching from a hiding spot in an empty area in northeastern Baghdad as elite members of Mr. Hussein’s government gunned down large groups of Shiite opposition members. He was 6 at the time.

That area, an old dam called Qasr Attash, is now one of the most common body-dumping grounds for Shiite militias.

Mr. Hussein spared almost no one in his murderous ways, but Shiites were particularly abused as a group. That systematic mistreatment seems to have left lasting scars that carry through to the current day, infusing neophyte leaders with an uncompromising and emotional approach to running things.

“When they put the rope on his neck, did he remember how many innocent people he killed?” said Husam Abdul Hussein Jasim, a watch store owner in Sadr City, whose wall was swinging with synchronized pendulums. “He’s like a Satan.”

Mr. Hillu, sitting behind a counter piled high with a television, plastic flowers and cellphone cards, said: “He didn’t represent anything for me. He was just a death grip imposed on our neck.”

Even though their oppressor had been hanged, Shiites in northeastern Baghdad were giving no parties. Blocks had none of their usual bustle. Even the office of the cleric Moktada al-Sadr was closed.

The response was markedly different than the reaction after the November verdict sentencing Mr. Hussein to death, when Silly String and sweets were plied in equal measure.

For some Iraqis, previous humiliations were enough to feel justice had been done. Smeisam, a teacher in the largely Shiite area of Binouk, said her mother, whose parents had been murdered by the government, said the moment of revenge came sweetly for her when she saw the footage of American soldiers pulling Mr. Hussein out of the spider hole near Tikrit in December 2003.

“It was when I saw him hidden just like a mouse,” she said by telephone, while assembling ingredients for dolma, rice-stuffed grape leaves, for her family’s holiday dinner.

DOJ_NMG_0111402

Her husband, Mukaram, was completely unsentimental.

"Truly I feel nothing," he said. "He executed so many people. Now it is his turn. For me he died when he was arrested, so he was not important at all."

Indeed, the violence left behind has taken on a life of its own. In Kufa, a Shiite holy city south of Baghdad, a bomb in a fish market killed 34 people on Saturday, Iraqi authorities said, and a mob on the scene killed a man suspected to be the bomber. In the Hurriya district of Baghdad, a series of car bombs killed 36 people.

Depressing new realities did not dampen the Shiites' joy, but they were still subdued in expressing it. Mr. Hillu, who lost two brothers to Mr. Hussein, said he brought boxes of cookies and chocolate to his neighbors in the morning, when he learned about the execution. A stranger brought free orange juice into his and other shops along his block.

Mr. Hussein's execution took place early on a day that for Sunni Arabs was the beginning of the Id al-Adha holiday. (Shiites will begin celebrating on Sunday.) Mr. Hillu said the death "adds some more taste."

If Shiites saw the hanging as a gift, most Sunnis were revolted that, in what appeared to be a violation of Iraqi law, the execution was scheduled on a holiday of forgiveness.

"Actually, I felt angry," Ms. Abdul Aziz said. "It's not a proper time. I assure you, those who are feeling that this is a good time and a good judgment, they are not Iraqis."

Others, namely Kurds, opposed the quick hanging. Now, Mr. Hussein will not testify in other important genocide cases, especially the trial over the Anfal military campaign against the Kurds, in which he is accused of unleashing mass killings and chemical attacks that killed tens of thousands of villagers.

"The truth of what happened in al-Anfal has been buried," said Abu Abdul Rahman, a 38-year-old Kurdish taxi driver. "What happened in al-Anfal? Who took part in it?"

Others were less bothered by the speed of his execution.

"I think it's too strong to say that I'm cheated," said Bakhtiyar Amin, a Kurd who is a former Iraqi minister of human rights. "He deserves what he got."

The suffering Mr. Hussein inflicted was almost inconceivable, and it caused entire population shifts — of equal intensity but in opposite directions to moves taking place today.

At a bakery down the block from Mr. Hillu's tailor shop, two Shiites, a man and his uncle, told their story of fighting against Mr. Hussein in the ill-fated Shiite uprising of 1991. In the southern city of Nasiriya, where they lived, they fought for 37 days, said Ali Muhammad, bouncing his nephew on his knee as workers holding large trays of cookies moved gracefully through the shop.

After it was over, 10 members of their family had been killed. Another eight, all members of the opposition Shiite Dawa Party, had been murdered by Mr. Hussein's henchmen. The family fled to Baghdad and began working in a bakery in Sadr City, then called Saddam City. Now families follow some of the same patterns, only this time in reverse.

The bakery smelled of sesame. Almost everyone was smiling.

"I feel like my mother delivered me for the first time," said Abdel Ali Jasim, Mr. Muhammad's 46-year-old uncle. "It's my birthday."

But that area is Shiite, insulated from the outside by Shiite militias that are much more effective than government forces, and are sometimes a part of them, too. Life there flows somewhat more easily than in Sunni areas.

Still, car bombs regularly intercede, shattering the calm. In response, Iraqis of both sects attempt to draw circles around the chaos in their own minds. As a result, they tend to generalize about the other, coming up with conspiracy theories, to make the violence easier to explain and accept.

"If we got rid of the terrorists, there would be no country better than Iraq," Mr. Jasim said. "It's the non-Iraqis that are against the Shiites."

Ms. Abdul Aziz, who refuses to state her sect, saying only that she is a Muslim, lives closer to the center of the war. Her area, Mansour, is one of the most heavily contested by the Shiite and Sunni militias now.

In September, her son Omar was shot and wounded, they think because of his name, which is Sunni. Her other son was detained by the police. She was able to secure his release because she spoke English and an American soldier agreed to help her find him. She has since moved one of them to Syria.

Mr. Hussein may be gone, but the fear that succeeded him is what defines her life today.

"Where can I live, if Baghdad is divided?" she said in English. "In the Shiite sector or Sunni sector?"

"I have to run away. It's not a place to live in anymore."

Elation Gives Way To Dread Of Daily Life (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0111403

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 -- Former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein had been dead no more than 11 hours, but to Um Noor, he might as well have died three years ago.

"We've forgotten about him," Noor said late Saturday afternoon, as she stood in the jeans store she owns in central Baghdad.

Like many Iraqis, Noor once feared Hussein, who rose to power 24 years ago by ruthlessly wiping out his enemies. When U.S. troops ousted him in 2003, many Iraqis believed their days of living in fear were over.

But three years later, Iraqis are still a terrorized people. Now, instead of Hussein, they fear the car bombs that maim and kill every day, the kidnappers who snatch people off the streets in broad daylight, the mortar shells that fall on residential neighborhoods. And they fear each other, as Shiite Muslims fight Sunni Arabs in what is spiraling into a civil war.

Despite an infusion of billions of dollars in reconstruction funds from the United States, they are watching their quality of life deteriorate. They spend hours each day with no electricity. They wait in long lines for fuel. And they pay higher prices for food while their salaries remain the same.

"Everything is worse," Noor said. "What did we gain from him being gone?"

The initial jubilation among many Iraqis following Hussein's execution Saturday morning gave way to the realization that his death would not bring an end to the daily violence that Iraqis now endure or improve the services they could once count on.

Noor, a petite 36-year-old, struggles to pay the $300 a month it costs to rent the space for her store in the Karrada district of Baghdad. By the time she buys fuel for the generator to light her shop, there is little money left to provide for her two daughters. She has fewer customers now, she said, because people cannot afford to buy jeans with rhinestones and bows that sell for $20 or more a pair.

"With all that we are facing, I have to face this," she said, eyeing her front door nervously. She was there alone and it was getting dark, almost time for her to lock up. She used to keep her shop open until midnight. Now she leaves by 6 p.m. to avoid Baghdad by night. "I'm a woman alone," she said.

Sameer Dawoud, 62, has owned an art gallery in Baghdad since 1984. People bought art back then. Now, they don't want to brave the streets to browse the works hanging on his walls. The frames on his paintings of the Tigris River and Arabian horses are dusty. Several nearby art galleries have been shuttered.

Dawoud said he does not expect Hussein's death to end the violence that keeps his customers away. "Whoever is playing on the field, he will continue playing," he said.

Many Iraqis said Hussein became irrelevant long ago, when U.S. troops found him hiding in a hole near his home town of Tikrit in December 2003. He emerged looking dirty and bewildered, erasing the image most Iraqis had of him as a figure bent on domination.

His persona diminished even more as he stood trial for the retaliatory killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail in the 1980s. In ill-fitting suits, he was no longer scary-looking. As many Iraqis assumed he would be convicted, interest in his trial faded. They had new enemies: insurgents, militias, death squads, Americans, each other.

The sectarian divisions that had always existed in Iraqi society had begun tearing it apart. Hussein, a Sunni, and his Baath Party often oppressed Shiites and Kurds. In the new Iraq, Shiites, who make up the majority of the population, now wield more power, and Sunnis are waging a relentless insurgency.

Reaction to Hussein's execution early Saturday, the day Sunnis consider the beginning of the holy Eid al-Adha celebration, reflected that deep divide.

"There's no Eid," said Sami Mahmoud, 35, a store owner in Karrada. "This is a day for the Persians and not for the Arabs. God have mercy on his soul."

Shiites, many of whom lost relatives during the Hussein era or were imprisoned for political dissent, called his execution an early gift. Their Eid celebration begins Sunday.

Hussein Abu Ali, 35, a civil servant, stayed up all night with his brothers and sisters, waiting for news of the execution. Hussein had banished them from Iraq when he was a child, he said. They moved to Iran and were allowed back in only after 2003.

The family cheered at the television images of masked men wrapping a noose around Hussein's neck.

"Now the head of the snake has been cut," Ali said.

Despite the tension, there was relative calm Saturday and no curfew, which the government often imposes in particularly violent times.

Shiites celebrated peacefully in the southern city of Najaf, albeit with gunshots in the air. There were minor clashes in Tikrit, as residents carried pictures of Hussein and banners that read: "You Shiites, you shall leave this city, and every home and every street."

Car bombs killed at least 45 people.

DOJ_NMG_0111404

Just three hours after Hussein's death, an olive green minibus exploded in a crowded market in the Shiite southern city of Kufa, killing 34 civilians and wounding 58, said Munthir al-Ithary, the director of the Najaf Health Department. A mob beat and stoned the perpetrator after a shopkeeper spotted him trying to flee, said Kufa's mayor, Yusif al-Janaby.

In the Hurriyah neighborhood of Baghdad, two car bombs exploded within moments of each other, one near a market, the other near the bus terminal. They killed 11 people and wounded six, said an Interior Ministry official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

There's one thing Iraqis agree on, whatever their sect: Their day-to-day problems will probably not get better anytime soon.

"I believe that a return of peace and security is not feasible, and the Americans and the Iraqi government must try hard to find solutions for the catastrophic situation," said Sherzad Omar Fekky, an instructor at the University of Kirkuk.

Zahara Jasim, 24, sat inside a women's clothing store in Karrada rubbing her hands together by a space heater to stay warm. She said she was happy to see Hussein die. She blames him for the death of her father, who fought in the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s.

But she doesn't blame him for her current problems. That, she said, is the Americans' fault.

"They haven't done anything," she said. "There's no oil. There's no kerosene. There's no electricity. If they really wanted to make things work, they would."

Adnan Mizher, 34, a former army officer from Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, said his brother was executed by Hussein's government. Still, he said, life was better under Hussein. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, he said, has done nothing for Iraqis.

"Today, there are killings, murder, kidnappings and displacement of people on sectarian grounds," he said. "Life under Saddam was much better than now. The hell of Saddam is better than the paradise that Maliki promised us."

Hussein's Case Won't Bolster International Human Rights Law, Experts Fear (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

PARIS, Dec. 30 — Saddam Hussein is one of the few modern leaders to have been tried and executed for his crimes and other abuses of power. Most dictators of the past century have died of natural causes at home or in comfortable exile — or at the hands of assassins.

But with trials of former leaders becoming more common in the past decade, there are other distinguishing features in the Hussein case: he was the first former leader to be tried by a domestic court for crimes against humanity — a crime enshrined in international law — and put to death for it.

His dawn hanging on Saturday further stands out because the new international legal institutions, like the International Criminal Court and the temporary tribunals that are trying war crimes cases in the former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and Sierra Leone, do not impose the death penalty.

Despite this application of international law against Mr. Hussein, experts say, his conviction for crimes against humanity has not significantly reinforced efforts to apply concepts of international human rights law around the world. They argue that the trial has been too widely perceived, both in Iraq and abroad, as a chaotic and politicized process with many serious flaws carried out by inexperienced judges.

Although domestic courts are now trying cases that include violations of international human rights law, the credibility of the Baghdad tribunal was also questioned by some because it was organized by the United States. European countries that had been asked for help said they could not participate because they had abolished the death sentence.

Rights groups and some international lawyers have deplored the execution as hasty. Some said the execution, based on a comparatively small case involving the killing of 148 civilians, cut short Mr. Hussein's second and far weightier trial for genocide, the gravest charge.

"Such a rapid execution before the conclusion of the genocide trial is a serious legal setback and harms the credibility of the court," said Antoine Garapon, director of the Institute for Advanced Legal Studies in Paris. He and some other lawyers argued that even if others were to stand trial for genocide against the Kurds in 1988, the person deemed most responsible would never face judgment.

Many Kurds, in fact, say they have mixed feelings about his execution because it denies them the satisfaction of seeing Mr. Hussein face further evidence of genocide presented at the Kurdish trial, which was only a few weeks away from a conclusion.

"To execute such a criminal, a man who reveled in his atrocities, is an act of justice," Najmaldin Karim, president of the Washington Kurdish Institute and a former refugee from Mr. Hussein's repression, wrote in an Op-Ed article published Saturday in The New York Times. "Sadly, however, we have not had full justice. Saddam Hussein did not confront the full horror of his crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0111405

Mr. Hussein is the second notorious dictator to escape a verdict on genocide charges. The other is Slobodan Milosevic, the former president of Serbia, who died of a heart attack in March in a United Nations cell during his trial at the war crimes tribunal in The Hague.

The best-known precedents for Mr. Hussein's execution are the post-World War II trials carried out by the victorious Allied powers: the hangings of the military and political leaders of Nazi Germany and the war crimes trials in Tokyo of Japan's wartime leadership.

At that time, as now, debates raged over whether the trials conducted by victorious forces were morally wrong or whether they were politically and psychologically indispensable. Some argued that those trials of the late 1940s did more harm than good and should never have taken place. Winston Churchill, Britain's wartime leader, had always urged that the Nazi leaders be executed, without trial.

But since then, the Nuremberg trials, more so than the widely criticized Tokyo trials, have come to be regarded as the crucial precedents for trials involving grave human rights violations, specifically for the creation of the first international tribunal, dealing with war crimes in the former Yugoslavia. "The Yugoslavia tribunal brought alive and gave meaning to criminal offenses that had been on the books for years, and led eventually to charges of crimes against humanity against Saddam Hussein," said Richard Dicker, director of Human Rights Watch's international justice program.

Benjamin B. Ferencz, a former prosecutor at Nuremberg, said on his Web site on Saturday: "Whether a remorseless mass killer should be sentenced to death is a difficult question. There can never be a balance between the lives of a few mass murderers and the lives of their countless victims. Humanitarian law has moved away from imposing death as a penalty. It should be left to Iraqi judges to decide what is most appropriate to bring peace and reconciliation to their war-ravaged country."

In only a few other cases in the past half century has a political leader been tried and put to death under his country's own laws. In 1979, the former Pakistani prime minister, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, overthrown in a military coup, was executed for the murder of a political opponent after a much-criticized trial.

In December 1989, the ousted Romanian dictator, Nicolae Ceausescu, was executed after an anti-Communist uprising. But the rushed and secret trial preceding his killing by firing squad was widely seen as summary justice. Benito Mussolini was simply shot by Italian partisans in 1945 while trying to flee to Switzerland. Anastasio Somoza of Nicaragua was blown up in his car by Argentine guerrillas in 1980 while in exile in Paraguay. Laurent Kabila, the former Congo leader, was shot and killed by a palace guard.

Only occasionally have former dictators been brought to trial in circumstances widely recognized as fair. During trials of former members of Argentine military juntas in 1985, five of the nine defendants were given long sentences in a civilian court but were pardoned a few years later. The former Rwandan prime minister, Jean Kambanda, pleaded guilty to genocide and was sentenced to life in prison by the United Nations war-crimes tribunal for Rwanda.

Manuel Noriega of Panama was sentenced to 40 years in prison for drug trafficking by an American court but was never judged for human rights or other abuses.

More often, political leaders have escaped into exile and resisted extradition attempts. Jean-Claude Duvalier, the former president of Haiti, fled to France. Idi Amin of Uganda died in peace in Saudi Arabia. Pol Pot died in bed before the new Cambodian war crimes tribunal began its work. Fulgencio Batista fled Cuba and lived the rest of his life in Portugal, and Mobutu Sese Seko fled Zaire, now Congo, and died in Morocco.

Saddam Had Feisty Exchange At The Gallows (AP)

AP, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD (AP) — Iraqis awoke to television images of a noose being slipped over Saddam Hussein's neck and his white-shrouded body, the pre-dawn work of black-hooded hangmen. They went to bed as new video emerged showing Saddam exchanging taunts with onlookers before the gallows floor dropped away and the former dictator swung from the rope.

Saddam was buried shortly before dawn Sunday in a family plot in the cemetery in Ouja, the town of his birth. Few were present for the internment near Tikrit, 130 kilometers (80 miles) north of Baghdad.

Saddam was captured in an underground hide-out near Ouja on Dec. 13, 2003, eight months after he fled Baghdad ahead of advancing American troops.

The former Iraqi leader was buried near the graves of his sons Uday and Qusay in the main town cemetery. The sons and a grandson were killed in a gunbattle with the American forces in Mosul in July 2003.

In Baghdad's Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City on Saturday, victims of his three decades of autocratic rule took to the streets on Saturday to celebrate, dancing, beating drums and hanging Saddam in effigy. Celebratory gunfire erupted across other Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad and other predominantly Shiite regions of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0111406

There was no sign of a feared Sunni uprising in retaliation for the execution, and the bloodshed from civil warfare was not far off the daily average — 92 from bombings and death squads.

Outside the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, west of the capital, loyalists marched with Saddam pictures and waved Iraqi flags. Defying curfews, hundreds took to the streets vowing revenge in Samarra, north of Baghdad, and gunmen paraded and fired into the air in support of Saddam in Tikrit, his hometown.

Still, authorities imposed curfews sparingly in contrast to the several-day lockdown put in place after Saddam was sentenced to death Nov. 5.

By several accounts, Saddam was calm but scornful of his captors, engaging in a give-and-take with the crowd gathered to watch him die and insisting he was Iraq's savior, not its tyrant and scourge.

"He said we are going to heaven and our enemies will rot in hell and he also called for forgiveness and love among Iraqis but also stressed that the Iraqis should fight the Americans and the Persians," Munir Haddad, an appeals court judge who witnessed the hanging, told the British Broadcasting Corp.

Another witness, national security adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie, told The New York Times that one of the guards shouted at Saddam: "You have destroyed us. You have killed us. You have made us live in destitution."

"I have saved you from destitution and misery and destroyed your enemies, the Persian and Americans," Saddam responded, al-Rubaie told the Times.

"God damn you," the guard said.

"God damn you," responded Saddam.

New video, first broadcast by Al-Jazeera satellite television early Sunday, had sound of someone in the group praising the founder of the Shiite Dawa Party, who was executed in 1980 along with his sister by Saddam.

Saddam appeared to smile at those taunting him from below the gallows. He said they were not showing manhood.

Then Saddam began reciting the "Shahada," a Muslim prayer that says there is no god but God and Muhammad is his messenger, according to an unabridged copy of the same tape, apparently shot with a camera phone and posted on a website.

Saddam made it to midway through his second recitation of the verse. His last word was Muhammad.

The floor dropped out of the gallows.

"The tyrant has fallen," someone in the group of onlookers shouted. The video showed a close-up of Saddam's face as he swung from the rope.

Then came another voice: "Let him swing for three minutes."

The responses within Iraq to Saddam's death echoed the larger reaction across the Middle East, with his enemies rejoicing and his defenders proclaiming him a martyr. While Iranians and Kuwaitis welcomed the death of the leader who led wars against each of their countries, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the execution prevented exposure of the secrets and crimes the former dictator committed during his brutal rule.

Some Arab governments denounced the timing the 69-year-old former president's hanging just before the start of the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar, Eid al-Adha. Libya announced a three-day official mourning period and canceled all celebrations for Eid.

Within Iraq and across the world, the airwaves were alive with pictures of Saddam in death, a bruise on his cheek, his neck elongated and twisted impossibly to the right — grisly proof that the man who had tormented and killed so many during a bloody quarter-century rule was truly dead.

But some Iraqis — like 34-year-old Haider Hamed, a candy store owner in east Baghdad — wondered what would really change with the execution of Saddam, who was just four months shy of his 70th birthday.

"He's gone, but our problems continue," said the Shiite Muslim, whose uncle was killed in one of Saddam's many brutal purges. "We brought problems on ourselves after Saddam because we began fighting Shiite on Sunni and Sunni on Shiite."

At least 80 Iraqis died in bombings and other attacks Saturday, and police said 12 more tortured bodies were found dumped in Baghdad. The U.S. military announced six more servicemembers — three soldiers and three Marines — were killed.

The execution took place on the penultimate day of the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops, with the toll reaching 109. At least 2,998 members of the U.S. military have died in Iraq since the war began in March 2003, according to an AP count.

Um Abdullah, a Sunni and teacher in Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, said she would wear black to mourn the city's favorite son.

"Saddam will be a hero in our eyes," she said. "I have five kids and I will teach them to take revenge on Americans."

Police blocked the entrances to Tikrit and said nobody was allowed to leave or enter the city for four days. Despite the security precaution, gunmen took into the streets, carrying pictures of Saddam, shooting into the air and calling for vengeance.

Security forces also set up roadblocks at the entrance to another Sunni stronghold, Samarra, and a curfew was imposed after about 500 went into the streets to protest the execution.

DOJ_NMG_0111407

Among minority Sunnis there was deep anger, born not only of Saddam's execution but of the loss of their decades-long political and economic dominance that began with Saddam's ouster in the U.S. invasion nearly four years ago.

"The president, the leader, Saddam Hussein is a martyr and God will put him along with other martyrs," said Yahya al-Attawi, who led prayer at a towering Sunni mosque constructed by Saddam in Tikrit.

There were cheers at the cafeteria of a U.S. outpost in Baghdad as soldiers having breakfast learned Saddam had been hanged.

But members of the Army's 2nd Battalion, 17th Field Artillery Regiment, on patrol in an overwhelmingly Shiite neighborhood in eastern Baghdad, said the execution wouldn't get them home any faster — and therefore didn't make much difference.

"Nothing really changes," said Capt. Dave Eastburn, 30. "The militias run everything now, not Saddam."

Staff Sgt. David Earp, who also fought in 1991's Operation Desert Storm, said the execution worried him.

"In my opinion, something big is going to happen," said Earp, of Colorado. "There will be a response. Probably not today because they know we are looking for one, but soon."

Saddam Is Buried In Home Village (BBC)

BBC.com, December 31, 2006

Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, hanged for crimes against humanity on Saturday, has been buried in the village where he was born 69 years ago.

In a sparsely attended ceremony in Awja, in the Tikrit region north of the capital, the former Iraqi leader was laid to rest in a family plot.

His sons Uday and Qusay, killed by US troops in 2003, are also buried there.

Earlier, his family said he would be buried in Ramadi - a Sunni insurgent stronghold - citing security concerns.

Just hours after his execution, Saddam Hussein's body was reportedly flown to Awja aboard a US aircraft and handed to clan leaders for burial.

"Saddam Hussein has been buried today at 0400 (0100 GMT) in a place that was constructed during his regime in the centre of Awja," said relative Musa Faraj, quoted by AFP news agency.

The BBC's John Simpson in Baghdad says the Iraqi government will not be worried that Saddam's grave may turn into a place of political pilgrimage.

Ministers here think that his practical influence in Iraq has been entirely finished by his execution, our correspondent says.

'Frightened and terrified'

The former president was sentenced to death by an Iraqi court on 5 November over the killings of 148 Shias from the town of Dujail in the 1980s.

Images of Saddam Hussein being taken to the gallows in a Baghdad building his intelligence services once used for executions were broadcast on state TV on Saturday. However the moment of his execution was not shown.

The hanging took place just days after he lost an appeal and hours after he was handed over from US custody.

Saddam Hussein's execution has closed a dark chapter in Iraq's history, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said.

In a statement, the prime minister said: "Justice, in the name of the people, has carried out the death sentence against the criminal Saddam, who faced his fate like all tyrants, frightened and terrified during a hard day which he did not expect."

US President George W Bush hailed the execution as "an important milestone" on the road to building an Iraqi democracy, but warned it would not end the deadly violence there.

'Very broken'

A small group of Iraqis - including a representative of the prime minister - witnessed the execution at 0600 (0300GMT) on Saturday in a concrete-lined chamber in Khadimiya.

Iraqi National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie told the BBC the former leader went to the gallows quietly: "He was saying some few slogans. He was very, very, very, broken."

However, new images of the execution apparently shot on a mobile phone and aired on some Arab television channels and internet sites, show a more defiant Saddam.

Unlike the official Iraqi videotape of his final moments, the new pictures are accompanied by the sound of Saddam Hussein responding to taunts from those present.

One of the onlookers is heard telling the former Iraqi leader that he destroyed Iraq and was going straight to hell.

Saddam Hussein appeared to smile at those taunting him from below the gallows. He said they were not showing manhood.

He is then heard citing verses from the Koran before the trapdoor opened.

Tikrit curfew

DOJ_NMG_0111408

Hours after Saddam was executed, the bloodshed continued As news of Saddam Hussein's demise spread, there were jubilant scenes in the Baghdad Shia stronghold of Sadr City, with people dancing in the streets and sounding their car horns. Similar scenes were witnessed in the Basra and Najaf.

But in Tikrit, where a curfew was imposed, the news sparked protests from supporters. Protests were also reported in Samarra and Ramadi.

Hours after the execution, at least 31 people died when a car bomb exploded at a market in the southern town of Kufa. Angry crowds killed a man who police said got out of the vehicle shortly before the bomb exploded.

Later in the day, at least 37 people died and 76 were injured in at least two blasts in the Hurriya district of Baghdad.

Conflicts Shaped Two Presidencies (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

The day after he ordered a cease-fire and brought the Persian Gulf War to a close, President George H.W. Bush ruminated about the status quo he had left behind in Iraq. "Still no feeling of euphoria," he dictated to his diary Feb. 28, 1991. Saddam Hussein, he recognized, remained a threat. "He's got to go," Bush concluded.

It took nearly 16 years, but he's finally gone. And with Hussein's execution in Baghdad, so is the chief nemesis of the Bush family, a man who bedeviled father-and-son presidents and in different ways dominated both of their administrations. The long, tortured arc of the Bush-Hussein relationship that shaped recent U.S. history finally came to a close with the snap of a noose.

If there is a feeling of euphoria, or satisfaction, or perhaps just relief, neither Bush is expressing it publicly this weekend. President Bush went to bed Friday night without waiting for the execution and left it to an aide to release a statement praising the Iraqi people for "bringing Saddam Hussein to justice." His father remained silent. But Hussein's death removed only the man. The forces unleashed by the epic struggle remain as powerful and crippling as ever for two countries.

The timing of the execution, coming as the president searches for a new strategy to turn around a war he says the United States is not winning, could serve as a reminder of its origins. Bush has frequently cited Hussein's tyranny to justify his decision to invade Iraq. Within days, though, the death toll of U.S. troops will surely pass 3,000, a grim milestone that will trigger further national introspection. The cost of overthrowing Hussein and ending his reign of terror continues to mount, and few in Washington hold out faith that that will change anytime soon.

"The sacrifice has been worth it," Bush said at a year-end news conference nine days before the execution. A few moments later, he added: "I haven't questioned whether or not it was right to take Saddam Hussein out." He stopped himself. "I mean, I've questioned it -- I've come to the conclusion that it was the right decision."

Bush and other architects of the war have long maintained that it was nothing personal. "I personally never thought of it that way, nor did I think the president saw it that way," said Douglas J. Feith, the former undersecretary of defense who was a key player in going to war. "When Saddam was talked about, he was talked about as a threat to the United States, not as a personal problem of the Bush family."

Ron Kaufman, a White House aide to the first President Bush, said his ex-boss does not dwell on Hussein. "I'm sure like most Americans, he'll be glad the guy's gone," he said. "The world will be a better place now, a safer place. But I don't think he'll spend any more time thinking about it than you or I."

Yet the history of animosity between the Bushes and Hussein is hard to ignore. The relationship actually began as one of pragmatic friendship in the 1980s, when Hussein was at war with the main U.S. enemy in the region, Iran, and George H.W. Bush was vice president in an administration that offered him help. A 1992 New Yorker article suggested that Bush, through Arab intermediaries, advised Hussein to intensify the bombing of Iran.

Hussein soon became too much to handle. "People came to understand him as someone who was much less stable and someone who could not be trusted," said Craig Fuller, chief of staff to the elder Bush when he was vice president. Hussein's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990 proved a strategic miscalculation that put him and the Bushes forever on opposite sides.

The elder Bush wrongly assumed that Iraqis would overthrow Hussein, and his decision not to march to Baghdad after freeing Kuwait would haunt him and his son. An unbowed Hussein defied the international community, and in April 1993, when Bush went to Kuwait for a hero's welcome, a group of Iraqis crossed the border in what was called a thwarted attempt to kill him. President Bill Clinton launched 23 Tomahawk missiles against Iraqi targets in retaliation.

Among those on that trip who could have been killed were Barbara Bush and Laura Bush. George W. Bush had stayed in Texas, where he was running the Texas Rangers baseball team and preparing to run for governor. Some later questioned the seriousness of the assassination attempt or its connections to Baghdad. But the incident clearly was a searing moment for the Bush family.

DOJ_NMG_0111409

By the time the younger Bush ran for president, he appeared determined not to repeat the mistake he believed his father made with Hussein. "No one envisioned him still standing," the candidate told BBC in November 1999. "It's time to finish the task."

At a debate a couple of weeks later, Bush was more explicit. "If I found that in any way, shape, or form that he was developing weapons of mass destruction, I'd take him out," he said.

At Bush's first National Security Council meeting after taking office, he seemed to some aides to be ready to go. "From the very beginning, there was a conviction that Saddam Hussein was a bad person and that he needed to go," Paul O'Neill, Bush's first treasury secretary, later told CBS News. In Ron Suskind's book, "The Price of Loyalty," O'Neill was quoted as saying that Bush told aides to prepare to remove Hussein: "That was the tone of it, the president saying . . . 'Go find me a way to do this.' "

Others on the inside came to a similar conclusion. In a memo in March 2002, Peter Ricketts, a top British official, sounded skeptical of U.S. motivations: "For Iraq, 'regime change' does not stack up. It sounds like a grudge between Bush and Saddam."

That impression was fueled by both father and son that fall. "I hate Saddam Hussein, and I don't hate a lot of people," George H.W. Bush told CNN. "I don't hate easily, but I think he is -- as I say, his word is no good, and he is a brute. He has used poison gas on his own people. So, there's nothing redeeming about this man, and I have nothing but hatred in my heart for him."

Six days after that aired, his son mused about Hussein at a Texas fundraiser. "There's no doubt his hatred is mainly directed at us," he said. "There's no doubt he can't stand us. After all, this is the guy that tried to kill my dad at one time."

Bush later talked with then-Sen. Peter Fitzgerald (R-Ill.) aboard Air Force One about assassinating Hussein, saying he would repeal the executive order banning assassination of foreign leaders if intelligence gave him a clear shot. "The fact that he tried to kill my father and my wife shows the nature of the man," Bush told interviewers in March 2003. "And he not only tried to kill my father and wife, he's killed thousands of his own citizens." But he denied a vendetta. "Nah, no," he said. "I'm doing my job as the president, based upon the threats that face this country."

When Bush launched the invasion weeks later, he ordered it to start earlier than planned with a missile strike targeting Hussein. The Iraqi leader survived, but U.S. troops quickly toppled his government. Soldiers went to the Al Rashid Hotel and destroyed a mosaic, of the elder Bush's face over the slogan "Bush Is Criminal," that Hussein had laid in the lobby entrance so every guest would step on it.

Eight months later, other soldiers found Hussein in a "spider hole." "President Bush sends his regards," one soldier told the disheveled Iraqi leader.

Then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld delivered the news in Washington. "Mr. President, the first reports are not always accurate," he started cautiously.

"This sounds like it's going to be good news," Bush interrupted.

Rumsfeld said reports indicate "that we got Saddam Hussein."

"Well, that is good news."

Aides said the president made a point of not personalizing it. "I never heard him take any particular relish in Saddam's capture or the fate that obviously awaited him," said Matthew Scully, a former White House speechwriter who helped prepare Bush's remarks about Hussein's capture. "I remember vividly that the president's reaction that day was kind of businesslike. He always saw Saddam as part of the larger picture."

Still, in his White House study, the president keeps a memento -- the pistol taken from Hussein when he was captured. If there ever was a duel, it is now over.

A Bitter Family Saga Is At An End (BBC)

By Matt Frei

BBC.com, December 30, 2006

When Saddam Hussein looked in disbelief at the over-sized noose that was fitted by masked volunteers around his neck, the man who helped to put it there by invading Iraq and toppling the dictator was soundly asleep at his ranch in Texas.

It was only nine o'clock in the evening in Crawford but George Bush was already embedded in the land of nod, with orders not to be woken until the morning.

The blithe indifference of deep slumber was the final snub to the dead man who once described himself as "Salahadin II", "the Redeemer of all the Arabs" and "the Lion of Baghdad".

Some might think that George Bush can't afford to sleep soundly these days with his approval ratings in the cellar and his policy towards Iraq in inertia.

But while the world stirred to comment, cyberspace buzzed with applause or condemnation and Cable television hyperventilated, George Bush soldiered on in sleep. He arose only at 4.40am, we are told, which is his usual time of rising.

DOJ_NMG_0111410

One hour later he had a 10-minute conversation with his National Security adviser Stephen Hadley about the events in Baghdad.

Saddam Hussein tried to get George HW Bush assassinated Shortly thereafter the White House issued a pre-prepared written statement: "Today Saddam Hussein was executed after receiving a fair trial - the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime."

The statement, which will not be complemented by a presidential turn for the cameras, betrayed no hint of gloating or crowing. It went on to say that "bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq".

On one level, the hanging of Saddam Hussein is the end of a dramatic family saga that has pitted the Bushes of Texas against the Husseins of Tikrit.

Failed alliance

It is a saga that started with a tacit alliance.

When George HW Bush was vice president, Saddam Hussein was still seen as a potential partner thanks to his status as the enemy of America's enemy, Iran.

It was in 1983 that Donald Rumsfeld was dispatched to Baghdad as a friend of the Reagan administration to shake the hand of Saddam Hussein and offer America's help against the ayatollahs during the Iran Iraq War.

Alliance finally turned into animosity when Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait and President Bush cobbled together an international alliance of Western and Arab states to remove him from Kuwait but not from power.

"The butcher of Baghdad" began to call President Bush "the viper" and George junior, "the son of the viper".

It was at that time that the famous Al Rashid hotel in Baghdad received an elaborate mosaic of President Bush "the criminal", which patrons were forced to stomp across on entering the lobby.

Two years later Saddam Hussein tried to get President Bush assassinated.

The White House has always maintained that personal grudges had nothing to do with the invasion of Iraq.

And yet in September 2002, as preparations for war were well under way, George Bush the younger told a Houston fundraiser: "This is after all the man who tried to kill my dad."

Mafia rule

The personal side of this bitter family saga is over.

But even from his unmarked grave, Saddam Hussein will continue to haunt the Bush administration and define the legacy of the 43rd president of the United States.

Saddam had always promised to lure, fight and defeat the Americans in the cities of Iraq.

No-one thought at the time that this would happen after he had already been deposed.

But his prophetic threat is becoming reality, triggering a multi-headed insurgence that no longer fights on his behalf, and a vortex of sectarian violence that makes a conventional civil war look organised and coherent.

The former Iraqi leader is likely to haunt the Bush administration

The brutal bloodletting, ethnic cleansing and vicious fragmentation, in which American troops now find themselves embroiled, is also a legacy of Saddam's regime.

A quarter of a century of his mafia rule, in which tribal loyalties were lavishly rewarded and anything less was severely punished helped to rot the cohesion of a young and artificial country.

The extent to which Iraq is disintegrating has taken many Iraqis by surprise. It was grossly under-estimated by the officials who planned the occupation.

President Bush and his advisers have always liked to compare the birth pangs of Iraqi democracy to the emergence of a free Germany after the World War II.

Bloodletting

But what they were dealing with was not Germany 1945 but Germany in 1648 emerging from the feudal bloodbath of the 30 years war.

Another example would have been Yugoslavia in the 1990s.

So not even the few beleaguered optimists in the Bush camp, including the president himself, believe that the execution of Saddam Hussein will stem the bloodletting and allow America to plan for a graceful exit.

The sectarian violence in Iraq has reached its own alarming momentum, in which Saddam Hussein had been reduced to a walk-on part.

Nearly 3,000 US servicemen and women have already been killed

The White House may boast about the new rule of law but for many ordinary Iraqis justice comes in the form of death squads, torture gangs and rogue police road blocks.

These days the wrong identity card can get you executed. This is not the kind of justice that George Bush had in mind.

DOJ_NMG_0111411

So now the noose has done its deed the Pentagon is, if anything, expecting a spike in the sectarian violence.

The US State Department has put its embassies on a security alert "to prepare for demonstrations and possible attacks".

And the American public, which had long expected the execution of Saddam Hussein is waiting with growing impatience to see how exactly the president will execute his heralded "new Iraq strategy".

More troops? More money? More hope? For American soldiers December 2006 proved to be the bloodiest month of a bloody year.

Sometime in the next 10 days 3,000 US servicemen and women will have been killed by a war that was declared "accomplished" in May 2003.

Saddam Hussein is dead. His legacy lives on.

Around The World, Unease And Criticism Of Penalty (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 30 — With gradations of unease rather than outrage inspired by the hanging of Saddam Hussein, Western politicians sought a cautious balance on Saturday between revulsion at his record, support for his executioners and concern at the use of a capital penalty they largely shun in their own countries.

But religious leaders — Christian and Muslim — used stronger and more critical language in response to the news of Mr. Hussein's execution, which greeted most Western Europeans on their breakfast time news shows and in some newspaper headlines two days before the New Year.

Perhaps the most delicately choreographed response came from Britain, whose prime minister, Tony Blair, took a lead as America's closest ally in toppling Mr. Hussein while his Labor Party prides itself on opposing the death penalty.

In a statement issued an hour after the execution, Margaret Beckett, the foreign secretary, said: "I welcome the fact that Saddam Hussein has been tried by an Iraqi court for at least some of the appalling crimes he committed against the Iraqi people. He has now been held to account."

However, she said, "the British government does not support the use of the death penalty, in Iraq or anywhere else. We advocate an end to the death penalty worldwide, regardless of the individual or the crime. We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation."

Mr. Blair himself — who faced wide public opposition to the Iraq war, which has shaped his political legacy — refrained from commenting as he vacationed at the Miami waterfront home of Robin Gibb, a singer in the BeeGees. A spokesman for him said Ms. Beckett's statement had been issued on behalf of the entire government, including Mr. Blair.

The execution also revived the ideological divide between supporters and opponents of the 2003 invasion. Sir Menzies Campbell, leader of the opposition Liberal Democrats, which opposed the war, said: "Saddam Hussein's death does not vindicate in any way the ill-conceived and disastrous decision to invade Iraq. His execution does not make an illegal war legal any more than it will put an end to the violence and destruction."

Generally, said the columnist Tim Hames in The Times of London, the response to the execution would be different in Britain and Continental Europe from the reaction in the United States. "Even those of us who supported the invasion in 2003, and continue to do so today," he wrote, "will harbor within their ranks, like me, those who find the notion of this crime offensive."

"Mainstream middle-class sentiment in Europe now regards the death penalty as being as ethically tainted as the crimes that produced the sentence," he added.

Erkki Tuomioja, the foreign minister of Finland, which holds the rotating presidency of the European Union, said, "The European Union has a very consistent stand on opposing the death penalty and it should not have been applied in this case either — even though there is no doubt about Saddam Hussein's guilt over serious violations against human rights."

In an editorial, The Guardian newspaper in London took an even more unequivocal position, saying, "The death penalty is an unacceptably cruel and unusual punishment, even in Iraq."

The Vatican went so far as to call the execution "tragic" — echoing expressions of revulsion by Muslim leaders, both in the West and in the broader Islamic world.

"A capital punishment is always tragic news, a reason for sadness, even if it deals with a person who was guilty of grave crimes," said the Rev. Federico Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman. "The killing of the guilty party is not the way to reconstruct justice and reconcile society. On the contrary, there is a risk that it will feed a spirit of vendetta and sow new violence."

Muslim leaders in Britain offered a similar prognosis. Muhammad Abdul Bari, the secretary general of the Muslim Council of Britain, said in a statement, "No one can deny that Saddam should have faced justice for his crimes against the people of Iraq and also his invasion of Iran and Kuwait."

DOJ_NMG_0111412

"However," he added, "the fact that his trial took place while Iraq is still under occupation by foreign forces may mean that his execution, on the blessed day of Id al-Adha, will be regarded as an insensitive and provocative act by the U.S.-backed Iraqi government and that far from contributing to a so-called healing process, it may serve to further intensify the sectarian divisions in Iraq."

In Russia, the Foreign Ministry strongly criticized the execution, expressing regret that Iraqi officials disregarded international appeals not to carry it out. A spokesman, Mikhail L. Kamynin, expressed concern that Mr. Hussein's execution would worsen already deathly tensions consuming Iraq.

"The situation in Iraq is developing negatively," Mr. Kamynin said in a statement. "The country is sinking into violence and is effectively on the brink of a wide-scale civil conflict."

Mr. Hussein's execution, he went on, "may further aggravate the military-political situation and increase ethnic and religious tensions."

President Vladimir V. Putin made no statement, but other political leaders reacted even more harshly than the Foreign Ministry did. A small group of protesters from the Liberal Democratic Party picketed outside the Iraqi Embassy in Moscow, while the party's leader, Vladimir V. Zhirinovsky, a vocal supporter of Mr. Hussein and his rule, called the execution "the crime of the 21st century."

Mr. Zhirinovsky's party was accused of profiting from the sale of Iraqi oil during the United Nations sanctions program. His remarks were shown on state television.

Gennadi A. Zyuganov, the Communist Party leader, suggested in remarks to Ekho Moskvy, a Moscow radio station, that the United States would be associated with the execution, even if Iraqis oversaw his trial and death sentence. "Unfortunately, Texan law prevailed," he said, "the rule of the strong, the evil and the unprincipled."

Other nations, like India, voiced regret. The Indian foreign minister Pranab Mukherjee said: "We had already expressed the hope that the execution would not be carried out. We are disappointed that it has been. We hope that this unfortunate event will not affect the process of reconciliation, restoration of peace and normalcy in Iraq."

In Israel, an old enemy of Mr. Hussein's, leaders reacted calmly but with satisfaction at the execution.

Shimon Peres, the deputy prime minister, told Israeli public radio: "Saddam Hussein brought about his own demise. This was a man who caused a great deal of harm to his people and who was a major threat to Israel."

Ephraim Sneh, the deputy defense minister, noted that Mr. Hussein had fired 39 Scud missiles "into the heart of Israel" during the Persian Gulf war in 1991. Mr. Hussein, he said, was "a man who paid some $20,000 to the families of suicide bombers in Israel during the most intense time of the intifada and who was preparing a nuclear weapon to use against us."

In 1981, Israeli warplanes destroyed the Osirak nuclear reactor near Baghdad just before it was to go on line, after intelligence showed that Mr. Hussein was striving to build a nuclear weapon.

Israel also strongly supported the American-led invasion in 2003 that overthrew Mr. Hussein, who was considered a major threat to begin a tank invasion against Israel and had rejected the idea of peace with Israel.

Mr. Sneh also warned that the execution could lead to "a reinforcement of the Iranian influence in Iraq and a spilling over into Jordan and Israel of Iraqi terrorism."

The radical Islamic Hamas movement, however, condemned the execution as a "political assassination" that "violates all international laws," according to a spokesman, Fawzi Barhum, speaking to Agence France-Presse in Gaza. Hamas, which was supported by Mr. Hussein, does not accept Israel's right to exist and has a legislative majority in the Palestinian legislature.

"Saddam Hussein was a prisoner of war," Mr. Barhum said. He called the trial "unjust" and said the timing of the execution, a half-day before the start of the Muslim feast of Id al-Adha, was insulting. "The hanging took place on the day of the Id and this is a message to the Arab street — the Americans have launched threats to all the Arabs," he said.

Europeans Denounce Hussein's Execution (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson, Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

ROME — The death penalty is anathema across Europe, and opposition to the execution of Saddam Hussein was nearly unanimous among its leaders Saturday. At the same time, however, many were torn between those strongly held beliefs and revulsion for the former Iraqi dictator's record of atrocities.

Some of the strongest criticism came from the Vatican. The Roman Catholic Church teaches that all human life must be respected from conception until its "natural end."

The execution "is tragic news … that risks feeding the spirit of revenge and sowing new violence," said Pope Benedict XVI's spokesman, Father Federico Lombardi.

DOJ_NMG_0111413

"Even though this is a person guilty of grave crimes," Lombardi told Vatican Radio on Saturday morning, the execution "is a motive for sadness."

"The killing of a guilty party is not the way to build justice nor to reconcile society."

The Vatican's top official for justice issues, Cardinal Renato Martino, said that Hussein was responsible for thousands of deaths but that executing him amounted to punishing "one crime with another crime." Speaking before the hanging, he said, "The death penalty is not a natural death, and no one, not even the state, can kill."

Several European leaders, spanning the political spectrum, questioned whether justice was served by Hussein's execution and said it could bring further bloodshed.

"We've already seen in the first hours the consequences, with a predictable increase in tension and violence," Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi said from his home in Bologna.

Spain's center-left government and right-wing opposition, which rarely agree, condemned the hanging of Hussein as well as the late dictator's litany of abuses.

"The death penalty is not justice, it is vengeance, and so it was in this case," Gustavo de Aristegui, a senior official with the opposition Popular Party, told the Spanish news agency EFE. "But nobody will miss Saddam Hussein."

In Britain, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett reiterated her nation's opposition to the death penalty but applauded the process of bringing the former Iraqi leader to trial.

"I welcome the fact that Saddam Hussein has been tried by an Iraqi court for at least some of the appalling crimes he committed against the Iraqi people. He has now been held to account," Beckett said.

"The British government does not support the use of the death penalty, in Iraq or anywhere else," she said. "We advocate an end to the death penalty worldwide, regardless of the individual or the crime. We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation."

But Menzies Campbell, leader of the opposition Liberal Democratic Party, said: "Saddam's death does not vindicate in any way the ill-conceived and disastrous decision to invade Iraq. His execution does not make an illegal war legal any more than it will put an end to the violence and destruction.

"Britain's interests will best be served by the withdrawal of our forces sooner rather than later."

France, which was a strong opponent of the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, said Hussein's judgment and sentence were a matter for the Iraqi people.

In a statement, the Foreign Ministry said: "France, which advocates like all its European partners the universal abolition of the death penalty, takes note of Saddam Hussein's execution. That decision belongs to the Iraqi people and to the Iraqi sovereign authorities. France calls on all Iraqis to look forward and to work for reconciliation and national unity. More than ever the aim must be a return to the full sovereignty and stability of Iraq."

European politicians who are friendly to Washington stressed — carefully — their unease with the Hussein execution.

"We respect the decision, but it is known that the German government is opposed to capital punishment," German Chancellor Angela Merkel said.

"But on a day like this my thoughts are mostly on the many innocent victims of Saddam Hussein," she said.

Only in Poland, where a conservative government has remained an enthusiastic ally of the Bush administration, was there unequivocal support for the execution.

"Justice has been meted out to a criminal who murdered thousands of people in Iraq," President Lech Kaczynski's spokesman said, according to news agencies.

"This should serve as a warning to all those who would like to follow in Saddam Hussein's footsteps."

Many Who Fled Dictator Feel Jubilation, Relief (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Ibrahim Mizouri's death vigil for Saddam Hussein began at six o'clock Friday night.

Forced to flee Iraq in the 1970s when Hussein's Baath Party rose to power, Mizouri sat at his home in Annandale, eager to hear the story of the dictator's final moments. For him, Hussein's hanging was an emotional catharsis, the final act in a drama that has affected Mizouri's life as it has thousands of Iraqis who have washed up on U.S. shores, seeking safety from a dictator known for his ruthlessness.

"I was glued to the TV channel, CNN and Fox, just changing when they have the commercials, to 4 o'clock in the morning," Mizouri said. "When I saw the pictures, I said then, 'It's enough.' "

Among Iraqi Americans, the emotions that accompanied Hussein's execution were complex, ranging from jubilant to relieved to disappointed.

DOJ_NMG_0111414

In Dearborn, Mich., home to one of the largest concentrations of Middle Easterners in the United States, cheering crowds thanked God for Hussein's death, saying the dictator had finally met justice after killing thousands of Iraqi citizens with bombs, bullets and chemical weapons.

"This is our celebration of the death of Saddam," Imam Husham Al-Husainy, director of the Karbalaa Islamic Educational Center mosque in Dearborn, said while standing on top of a car, the Associated Press reported. "The gift of our New Year is the murder of Saddam Hussein. If you want to share the Iraqi people's happiness for the death of Saddam, raise your voice and your hands."

Others, such as Mizouri, were relieved, saying that only Hussein's death could ensure that the dictator would not return to power.

"Everybody's happy because we know for sure, 100 percent, that he's not going to come back," Mizouri said. "Honestly, this should have happened the very first day."

Some said they felt that Hussein's trial for the killing of 148 Shiites in the town of Dujail in 1982 had been lacking the majesty and importance commensurate with the scale of his crimes, particularly the 1987-88 Anfal campaign that killed tens of thousands of Kurds in the north and the 1991 massacre of thousands of Shiites in the south. But they added that the execution was necessary in order to move on.

"I think this is something that definitely needed to be done," said Safa Alkateb, a business executive from McLean. "I think it's really the best that you can do in the country right now. I think, given the situation, it's very, very difficult to do something better."

Najmaldim Karim, a neurosurgeon and president of the Washington Kurdish Institute, said he was disappointed by the news and thought the execution had been rushed before Hussein could account for his repression of Shiites and Kurds.

"I think it will give the impression that this was vengeance," Karim said. "It was definitely a great injustice to the survivors and the families. . . . I think there are a lot of questions that we probably will never know."

Like many Iraqi Americans, Karim thought the execution would not make a difference in the daily suffering of those still in Iraq, living amid constant sectarian violence and instability.

"In the short run, it probably will increase the violence," Karim said. "In the long run, it will lead to more animosity among the Sunnis because they will see this as vengeance. I think it will polarize them even more, personally."

Ali Attar, a doctor from McLean, was more optimistic and happy to see Hussein gone. Attar was forced to leave Iraq in 1980 because of his father's political activity.

"I am very happy to see this day," Attar said. "Although my father passed away 15 years ago, I am sure that in his grave he feels very happy that justice is served. The message of the new Iraq is different than the old Iraq. He got a trial I believe he would never give to any of his opponents."

Saddam Hanging Brings Joy, Gloom To Houston Iraqis (HC)

By Sarah Viren, Susan Carroll

Houston Chronicle, December 31, 2006

Dr. Mahdi Al-Bassam learned of Saddam Hussein's execution from news accounts.

But the Iraqi-born Sugar Land cardiologist heard a key detail about the historic death from an Iraqi government friend, who saw the execution.

"He said there was fear in his eyes, but there was no remorse," Al-Bassam said. "Even in the end."

Al-Bassam fled Iraq in 1967 and settled in the Houston area in 1971. He had uncles and cousins killed under the former dictator's regime. Saddam, he said, "brutalized the entire nation," and most of the Iraqis he spoke to back home Saturday were elated by the news of his death.

"He raped the country of its riches, and he left them starving with a $200 billion debt to the world community," he said. "He literally — not figuratively — starved his own people. To me, that's unforgivable."

The execution, announced in the United States late Friday night and near dawn in Baghdad, was greeted by cheers and celebratory gunshots in some Iraqi neighborhoods and mourning in others.

On Saturday, at Droubi's Bakery and Deli in Southwest Houston, where Iraqis are common customers, owner A.J. Droubi said there had been a lot of execution talk as people trickled in for bags of pita, jars of olives or flaky sweets.

"Some were happy," he said. "Some were not."

Intisar Alhellou, a Syrian immigrant working behind the bakery counter, counted herself in the unhappy lot. Like Al-Bassam, she made many calls back home about the execution. Those she talked to, she said, were distraught that it occurred on Eid Al-Adha, a Muslim holiday she compared to Christmas.

"Everyone is sad for what is happening, everybody in the Middle East," she said. "If they had waited, it might be different."

DOJ_NMG_0111415

Even Al-Bassam, who called Saddam "an animal," had misgivings about the execution.

"Most of the Iraqi people want to see him gone, and I understand that," Al-Bassam said. "But he has done so much harm in this world, I think he should have been made to live, and acknowledge what he did and suffer what he has done."

He said he wanted Saddam tried for more crimes, including the killing of thousands of Kurds, draining the southern marshes and the many killings whose victims are still being found in mass graves. He's infuriated by broadcasts on some Arab TV stations that portray him as a hero or martyr.

"They say the execution is politically motivated," he said. "I think a lot of that would have been reduced and nullified if all the atrocities had been put on display."

In Houston, he said, there are few Iraqi immigrants to share this story. In the late 1990s, many Iraqis immigrated to the United States and the local population was close to 15,000, he said. But after the fall of Saddam's regime, most went back. He estimates the local Iraqi population near 3,000.

He worries that many non-Iraqis have already forgotten the horrors of Saddam Hussein.

"I think the world did not get to listen to the evidence of these tremendous atrocities," he said. "But in the end, he would have been sentenced to death for all of them. He would have been (hanged) the same way sooner or later."

For Arab Critics, Hussein's Execution Symbolizes The Victory Of Vengeance Over Justice (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 30 — As daylight broke over the Arab world and news of Saddam Hussein's hanging spread over the airwaves and the Internet, the execution proved just as profound for what it did not change as for what it did.

Hezbollah's supporters in Beirut woke up on Saturday morning ready for another day of protests aimed at bringing down the United States-backed government of Fouad Siniora. Even in Iran, where the Foreign Ministry called the execution a "jubilation" for the thousands who lost family members in the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s, officials pledged to continue pursuing their nuclear ambitions and denounced the United Nations Security Council's efforts to curb them, Iran's official news agency, IRNA, reported.

Throughout the Arab world, opposition movements are still on the run, many pro-democracy activists are either imprisoned or have simply given up, and the very targets of the American campaign to transform the Middle East, like Hezbollah, Iran and Syria, are more emboldened than ever.

Almost four years after United States troops entered Iraq with a broader foreign policy goal of ushering in a "new" Middle East, one built on democracy and rule of law, the execution of Mr. Hussein on one of the holiest days in Islam marked the unceremonious demise of that strategy, many Arab analysts said.

"If you compare the results to the objectives the U.S. claimed to realize, whether it was democracy or control of the region, their policies have evidently failed," said Nawaf Kabbara, professor of political science at Balamand University in Beirut. "They were not able to spread democracy, control anything or make any serious breakthrough. It is a failure on all levels."

For those Arabs who celebrated America's embrace of the rule of law, the quick execution, coming before the conclusion of other trials against Mr. Hussein for crimes against humanity, left a bitter taste of stolen justice. Even Mr. Hussein's staunchest enemies expressed a sense of bitterness at the end.

"It is evident that they were not after justice," said Hilal Khashan, a political science professor at the American University of Beirut. "It was a political decision, because as soon as they got a sentence on him they executed him. What mattered was his death rather than finding justice."

For those distrustful or disdainful of American intentions, the notion that the execution fell on Id al-Adha, one of the most sacred holidays of the year, seemed to symbolize the triumph of vengeance over justice.

"It looks like they just wanted to take revenge in a vulgar way; that was their gift to the Shia for the feast," said Khalid al-Dakhil, assistant professor of political sociology at King Saud University in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, referring to Shiites, who were oppressed under Mr. Hussein and now control Iraq.

"Bush and al-Maliki thought they could benefit from this, but this is going to backfire," he added, referring to President Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq. "Saddam's execution is going to feed sectarianism and contribute to more bloodshed."

Id al-Adha, the feast of the sacrifice, is ultimately a commemoration of the Prophet Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son Ishmael for God; instead he slaughtered a goat, and Muslims today slaughter goats, sheep and even camels to re-enact the event. As the blood of slaughtered sheep stained the streets of many Arab cities on Saturday, however, many found it hard to ignore the analogy of Mr. Hussein himself as a sacrificial lamb.

DOJ_NMG_0111416

"Executing the martyr Saddam Hussein on the first day of Adha in one of the holiest months of the year is meant to defy the feeling of Muslims, to invoke sectarian strife and to confirm that Bush's policy as vindictive and aggressive," said a statement by the union of the Islamist-dominated professional associations union in Amman, Jordan.

"The phony slogans about freedom and democracy are fake," the statement continued. "The professional associations mourn the death of the hero, the martyr Saddam Hussein, and stress that the day of liberating Iraq is near."

Even those who believed Mr. Hussein was guilty expressed doubts about his trial, and about whether Iraq's rebuilt justice system was really the kind of civil institution that could support a true democracy.

"Saddam Hussein was guilty a thousand times over, but still the Americans and the Iraqi government managed to run a shabby trial," said Jihad al-Khazen, a columnist and former editor of the pan-Arab newspapers Al Hayat and Asharq al Awsat. "If they organized a fair trial with international observers that could have served as a model for other countries. Instead they messed it up, and I think Saddam in the eyes of many people will now be seen as another martyr."

Many in the region seemed to view the execution as a harbinger of further sectarian conflict. This was the first time in modern history that a Sunni dictator had been executed by a Shiite, some analysts noted, a symbolic step that was widely expected to incur Sunni retribution throughout the region. American embassies throughout the region warned citizens on Saturday to avoid protests and be prepared for unrest.

No Arab Euphoria At Saddam Death (BBC)

By Ian Pannell

BBC.com, December 30, 2006

Although the news of Saddam Hussein's execution was widely anticipated in the region, it has been greeted with a mixture of surprise and anger in some quarters - and notable silence in others.

Some Palestinians are mourning Saddam Hussein's demise

For many ordinary people in the Arab world, Saddam Hussein was admired if not particularly loved.

He was an active and strident supporter of the Palestinian cause and many regarded him as a strong leader who dared to defy both America and Israel. Images of the former leader having the noose pulled around his neck will shock many.

Libya has declared three days of national mourning.

Lawmakers and members of the militant Palestinian group, Hamas, have condemned the execution, with one calling it "a political assassination" that "violated international laws".

There is little reason to think the execution will change much in a region that heads into 2007 in a precarious state.

Opposition to the US-led invasion of Iraq was almost unanimous in the region. So perhaps it was no surprise that his trial was also regarded as unfair, as an exercise in 'victor's justice'.

Many Arab governments and people saw the legal process as instigated and controlled by Washington.

Despite the insistence that the trial, verdict and now execution was a purely Iraqi affair, few in the Middle East will believe that.

'Victory for Iraqis'

Saudi Arabia said it was surprised and dismayed at the timing of the execution on the first day of the Muslim festival of Eid al-adha. There was also criticism at how quickly the trial was over amid accusations it had been politicised.

But for those who crossed swords with Saddam, his execution is welcome news.

Iran fought a long and bloody war with Iraq that killed hundreds of thousands of people on both sides. The country's deputy foreign minister called it a "victory for Iraqis". Hamid Reza Asefi predicted it would lead to more violence in the short-term, but would ultimately benefit the country.

Official reaction in Kuwait has been muted

But the response from Kuwait, a country Saddam invaded in 1990, was more muted. The state-owned news agency reported the only official reaction which was that this was "a matter for Iraqis".

Most other governments in the region have remained completely silent. To be fair, this is the first day of Eid al-Adha, the most important holiday in the Islamic calendar. Even so, it seems many have chosen not to step onto what is widely regarded as extremely delicate territory.

There are real worries that the instability in Iraq will be made worse by Saddam's execution.

Sectarian tensions across the Middle East have risen since the US-led occupation and the fear is that this news could make that even worse.

However, while it is possible that the troubles of the region could be affected by a single event - the execution of Saddam Hussein is unlikely to be it.

DOJ_NMG_0111417

There is violence and instability in Iraq, continuing tension between Israelis and Palestinians, a peace process that (at best) is at a stand-still and an ongoing political crisis in Lebanon.

The optimism many felt this time last year that real political change may finally start to trickle through the Middle East has all but vanished.

The execution of Saddam Hussein may prompt some reflection and probably plenty of analysis, but there is little reason to think it will change much in a region that heads into 2007 in a precarious state.

Kurdish Survivors' Feelings Conflicted (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD — Sarchanar Mahmoud struggled to articulate the swell of emotions that washed over her when news of Saddam Hussein's death flashed across her television screen.

"There was an indescribable silence and conflicting feelings that I can't explain," said the pale, veiled woman, who still lives in the remote mountain town in northern Iraq where half her family died in a 1988 poison gas attack. "After this we came to and started talking."

Family members felt joy that they were finally rid of the fearsome dictator who had cast a long shadow over their lives. But there also was a sense of disappointment that Hussein would never face justice for what he had done to them.

In Hussein's final hours, calls for a stay of execution came from an unexpected source: survivors of some of the worst atrocities of his blood-soaked regime.

"We are happy that this tyrant's end has come," said Mahmoud, a 31-year-old court investigator in the Kurdish town of Halabja, where the gas attack took place. But "not in this sudden manner. We wished that the remaining cases would be settled first."

Hundreds of thousands were believed to have been tortured in Hussein's notorious jails, disappeared into mass graves or died in his wars and chemical attacks. But when Hussein was hanged at dawn in the capital on Saturday, it was for just one case: the killing of at least 148 men and boys in retribution for a 1982 assassination attempt in the Shiite Muslim town of Dujayl.

Officials with the special court convened to pass judgment on the former Iraqi president's decades-long regime say an ongoing trial dealing with a much wider case, the so-called Anfal campaign against Iraq's ethnic Kurdish minority that resulted in as many as 100,000 deaths, is due to resume Jan. 8. But without the chief defendant, many fear that interest will dwindle and that countless victims of other atrocities will never receive their day in court.

Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, said the rush to execute Hussein days after an Iraqi appeals panel upheld the sentence "signifies justice denied for countless victims who endured unspeakable suffering during his regime."

"It will doubtless have a devastating impact on other related trials, as the key witness who could most compellingly shed light on the chain of command will have been silenced," he said in a statement.

Hussein had sat impassively through hours of dramatic witness accounts, detailed forensic presentations and startling reenactment in the Anfal case, but was executed before taking the stand in his defense.

Mahmoud was 13 when Iraqi warplanes attacked the town where she lived with eight family members in a two-room home belonging to an elder brother.

For three days, she recalled, the members of the family cowered in the basement. When they emerged, they stepped into pandemonium.

"We went out to the streets and found the people shouting and screaming that there was chemical bombing going on and that we had to leave," she said. Homes were smashed and bloodied bodies lay in the streets.

The family was separated in the panic. Mahmoud, her mother and two younger siblings fled to a sister's home in a nearby village. There they were advised to douse themselves in water and climb onto the roof to avoid the heavy gas that gave them painful headaches and stomachaches and made them vomit.

"We remained on the roof until dawn, wet, frightened, with the airplanes hovering over our heads," she said. "Each time we kids heard a plane, we'd close our eyes thinking that if we did so, they wouldn't find us."

They eventually fled to neighboring Iran, where Mahmoud learned from other refugees that the elder brother whom they had lived with had died with his wife and three children in the gas attack.

The Halabja warfare featured prominently in Hussein's second trial, where he faced charges of genocide for his Anfal, or "spoils of war," campaign against Kurds living in the northern reaches of Iraq.

Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker, had urged the government to delay executing Hussein and top members of his regime at least until the conclusion of the Anfal trial. He wanted them to identify those responsible for the chemical weapons unleashed on Kurdish villagers, including the foreign companies and countries that supplied the parts to make them.

DOJ_NMG_0111418

"A lot of secrets will go to the grave with Saddam and his group," he predicted. "If these trials continue without those people, what is the use?"

Under Iraqi law, all pending charges against Hussein will be dropped, and he will not be tried posthumously. But this does not affect charges against six others: Ali Hassan Majid, the northern military commander at the time; Sultan Hashim Ahmad Jabburi Tai, the campaign's military commander; Sabir Abdul Aziz Douri, director of military intelligence; Hussein Rashid Mohammed, another senior military officer; Taher Tawfiq Ani, governor of Nineveh province; and Farhan Mutlaq Jubouri, head of military intelligence in the region.

Raed Juhi, an investigative judge and spokesman for the Iraqi High Tribunal, said the Anfal trial and other cases, about a dozen in all, would continue.

The next scheduled to begin concerns the brutal crackdown that took place when Shiite Muslims and Kurdish fighters rebelled at the end of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, anticipating that the U.S. would support them.

Some survivors of the sweeping arrests and killings doubt the case will now make it to trial.

"Who is going to be tried now that there is no Saddam?" asked Mohammed Mousawi, a 58-year-old retired teacher in the southern Shiite city of Najaf.

Mousawi's brother went out to buy bread one day 15 years ago and never returned. Three other relatives disappeared about the same time. "We have no idea what happened to them," he said. "I suspect they are in one of the mass graves."

Human rights groups that have monitored Hussein's cases before the Iraqi High Tribunal say there is ample reason to fear that Iraq's government leaders might abandon the process.

"My sense from the start is that the whole undertaking seemed unnecessary to them, a waste of time and resources," said Richard Dicker, director of the International Justice Program at New York-based Human Rights Watch.

He cited the replacement of judges who appeared too lenient or sympathetic to Hussein, and a failure to provide sufficient security to defense attorneys, two of whom were killed.

The cursory way in which the court dispensed with Hussein's appeal and the speed with which he was sent to the gallows raised concern about political interference in the judicial system.

"It looks like the trial is buckling to the political process," said Hanny Megally, who heads the International Center for Transitional Justice's Middle East and North Africa program.

"The fear is that after [the next trial], which focuses on Shia, they may say: 'Look, this is expensive, this is taking a long time, let's call it a day.'

"On the other side of the coin," he said, "maybe without the big shot in the courtroom, people will start to focus more on the violations and the complaints and those stories will come out more."

For some in the ongoing Kurdish case, it was enough to see Hussein hang.

Aisha, a 51-year-old Kurdish villager who gave only one name, will never forget the day she recently faced the late dictator in court and told him about her husband, who disappeared when their village was razed during the Anfal campaign.

"I thought that I would be able to face neither him nor this whole experience," she recalled from a small home in Irbil, "yet I found myself very strong and I faced him fiercely."

It does not matter to Aisha that Hussein was executed for crimes from the previous trial.

"We got our revenge against a criminal today," she said.

Timing Of Execution Could Fuel Divisions (NSDY)

By Mohamad Bazzi

Newsday, December 31, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- The timing and drama surrounding Saddam Hussein's execution makes it likely that he will become a martyr for Sunni nationalists fighting U.S. forces and the new Iraqi government.

By executing Hussein at the start of Eid Al-Adha, the holiest of Muslim holidays, the Shia-dominated Iraqi government made a strategic blunder: It further angered the Sunni minority that formed the core of his regime and now is driving the insurgency.

As news of Hussein's hanging spread Saturday across the Sunni-dominated Middle East, many Arabs criticized the timing -- even those who despised the dictator. Relations between Sunnis and Shias are already strained by the regional ascendance of Shia-led Iran, its growing influence on the Iraqi leadership and its involvement in other countries with large Shia communities, especially Lebanon.

"Holding this execution at the start of Eid is only going to make relations worse between Sunnis and Shias," said Nazem Jassour, an Iraqi political analyst. "There was no good reason why the execution could not be delayed until after Eid ... It's going to be perceived by Iraqi Sunnis as one more example of how the Shia government is trying to humiliate them." The Iraqi government did not explain why it decided to execute Hussein so quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0111419

There were always serious risks to bringing Hussein to justice while Iraq faces a raging insurgency. Some Iraqis warned that any trial -- especially one that Sunnis perceived as being unfair and dominated by U.S. and Iraqi officials -- would further inflame sectarian tensions. In death, Hussein could be an even more potent symbol than Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, particularly for the nationalist strain of the insurgency. Al-Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. air strike in June, but members of his al-Qaida in Iraq still are carrying out suicide bombings against civilians and security forces.

Hussein's supporters were quick to declare him a martyr, and some vowed revenge against Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who signed the death warrant.

"The president, the leader, Saddam Hussein is a martyr and God will place him in paradise along with other martyrs," Sheik Yahya al-Attawi said at a prayer service in a Sunni mosque built by Hussein in his home region of Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad. "Do not grieve or complain because he has died the death of a holy warrior."

Many Arab rulers, including Hussein, usually pardon prisoners on the eve of Eid and delay any execution until well after the holiday. Exiled members of Hussein's Baath Party appeared on Arab satellite channel throughout the day and accused the Shia-led government -- especially al-Maliki's Dawa Party -- of being U.S. and Iranian puppets.

"Iraq will be ruled again by honorable people, not like it is today, by a group of spies who work for Bush," an Iraqi Baath member who goes by the nom de guerre Abu Mohammad told the Al-Arabiya channel.

It has never been clear how much influence Hussein had on the course of the insurgency, and whether he was coordinating it in a concrete way beyond sending out audiotapes to Arab media. After his arrest three years ago, the insurgency gained momentum.

While insurgents include former Baath loyalists and ex-members of the Iraqi army and intelligence services, others are Islamic militants from Iraq or neighboring Arab countries. Those militants have little allegiance to Hussein and are motivated by a desire to destroy the Shias and drive foreign troops out of a storied Arab land.

In a statement issued after Hussein's execution, al-Maliki tried to reach out to Sunnis involved in attacks on U.S. troops but not in killing Iraqi civilians. "We strongly reject considering Saddam as a representative of any sect in Iraq because the tyrant only represented his evil soul," al-Maliki said. "The door is still open for those whose hands are not tainted with the blood of innocent people to take part in the political process and work on rebuilding Iraq."

But most attempts at national reconciliation have failed, and Sunnis are likely to reject new overtures by al-Maliki because of the way he handled Hussein's execution.

The Sunni-Shia struggle in Iraq is largely political. Sunnis had dominated the country since its independence in 1932, despite making up only a fifth of Iraq's population. Hussein's regime brutally repressed the Shias, who constitute 60 percent of the country's 25 million people.

Since early 2004, insurgents have targeted Shia mosques, wedding parties and religious ceremonies across Iraq. They also have relentlessly attacked the Shia-dominated police and army. Iraq's most revered Shia cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, long has urged his followers not to retaliate against Sunnis. But as attacks on Shia civilians mounted, Shia militias and vigilantes began to fight back last year with tit-for-tat killings.

Hussein's influence reached beyond Iraq -- especially to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. In more than 30 years as Iraq's ruler, he showed mastery at the politics of symbolism in the Arab world, and few symbols are as potent to Arabs as the Palestinians killed or injured while fighting Israel.

After the second Palestinian uprising in 2000, Hussein began distributing payments of up to $25,000 to the family of each suicide bomber and $10,000 for each Palestinian killed in clashes with Israeli forces. In all, Hussein sent about $35 million until he was ousted by the U.S. invasion in 2003.

The Iraqi checks reinforced the mix of hard-line nationalists and Islamic militants who oppose negotiations with Israel. The payments also helped Hussein restore his prestige among Arabs as the one true pan-Arab leader who refused to make concessions to Israel and the West.

Signs of Hussein's popularity could be found throughout the Palestinian territories. Mourners in funeral processions often waved Iraqi flags and posters of Hussein. Young men shouted his name while throwing stones at Israeli soldiers, chanting "Oh Saddam, Oh Saddam, come and blow up Tel Aviv."

As Hussein stood on the gallows, among his last words reportedly were: "Palestine is Arab" -- a message to Arab masses that he was dying a martyr for the most persistent Arab cause.

After Saddam, Attacks Go On (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0111420

BAGHDAD - After nearly three decades living with the brutal repression of Saddam Hussein and the violent aftermath of his overthrow, most of Iraq responded with relative calm Saturday to his execution, played out again and again on television.

To many Iraqis, it was a mere footnote to the narrative that has been playing out on the streets. Saddam was dead, but car bombs still reaped their daily toll: At least 80 were killed.

His death would do little, they said, to rid Iraq's new problems: sectarianism, ethnic cleansing and the lack of services.

"Everybody knows who will be sad and who will be happy," shrugged Ahmed Saleh, a 40-year-old Shiite whose sect is supposed to wish the Sunni despot good riddance. But he could hardly care as he sat with a Sunni friend Saturday. "Nothing will change."

Capt. Dave Eastburn, 30, of Columbus, Ohio, agreed. "Nothing really changes," he said. "The militias run everything now, not Saddam."

Government leaders sought to tell a different story, saying Saddam's trip to the gallows should become a turning point in Iraq's strife. Referring to leaders of the Sunni insurgency, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said in a statement, "Saddam's execution puts an end to all their pathetic gambles on a return to dictatorship."

President Bush said the execution was a milestone on Iraq's road to democracy, but cautioned that it would not halt the bloodshed and political discord splitting the country. "Many difficult choices and further sacrifices lie ahead," he said in a somber statement released Friday night.

Other world leaders, however, used the occasion to express concerns about the death penalty and about the general course of events in Iraq.

In Italy, former Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, who had staunchly backed the U.S.-led war in Iraq and sent Italian troops to fight, called the hanging "a step backward in Iraq's difficult road toward full democracy."The civilization in the name of which my country decided to send Italian soldiers into Iraq envisioned overcoming the death penalty, even for a bloody dictator like Saddam," he said.

Some Arab governments denounced the timing the 69-year-old former president's hanging just before the start of the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar, Eid al-Adha. Libya announced a three-day official mourning period and canceled all celebrations for Eid.

Violence, like any other day

Despite concerns about a spike in unrest, Saturday's violence was not unusually high for Iraq, nor did it appear to be in retaliation for the execution.

The military reported the deaths of six more American troops, making December the deadliest month this year for U.S. forces in Iraq. At least 2,998 members of the U.S. military have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

The new U.S. deaths included three Marines who died Thursday of wounds from fighting in western Anbar Province. A soldier also died in combat Friday in Anbar, and two others were killed by roadside bombs in separate incidents in Baghdad Friday, the military said.

In Baghdad on Saturday, 12 bodies bearing signs of torture were found in various parts of the city, police said.

Two car bombs detonated one after another in a religiously mixed neighborhood of northwest Baghdad, killing 37 civilians and wounding 76, police said.

Another 31 people died and 58 were injured when a bomb planted on a minibus exploded in a fish market in a mostly Shiite town south of Baghdad, said Issa Mohammed, director of the morgue in the neighboring town of Najaf.

A muted response

Across the country, the bitter remains of Saddam's rule defined Iraqis' responses to his death.

For Shiites, long oppressed, it was a moment of intense release.

"This chapter of Iraqi history is over," said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, speaking on national television early Saturday. "Let us forget it and live with each other."

Sunni Arabs were skeptical. After three years of grinding violence and abuses by the Shiite government security forces, trust has all but fallen away, and few feel genuinely represented by the government. Most, in fact, are afraid of it.

"I'm not part of their world," said Yusra Abdul Aziz, a teacher in the Sunni Arab enclave of Mansour. "They are not speaking about Iraq. They are speaking about themselves."

Throughout the nation, larger crowds could be found in the more homogeneous cities. In the Shiite holy city of Najaf, police and residents danced side by side, chanting and singing in the streets. In Tikrit, a mostly Sunni city, angry crowds blocked main roads. But in communities immersed in civil strife, there was little response. In Baghdad, residents largely celebrated inside their homes or among friends at coffee shops.

DOJ_NMG_0111421

Kurds opposed the quick hanging, the sentence resulting from just one case against Saddam: the killing of at least 148 men and boys in retribution for a 1982 assassination attempt in the Shiite town of Dujail. Now Saddam will not testify in the trial over the Anfal military campaign against the Kurds, in which he is accused of unleashing chemical attacks that killed tens of thousands of villagers.

"The truth of what happened in al-Anfal has been buried," said Abu Abdul Rahman, a 38-year-old Kurdish taxi driver.

Division That Caught A Dictator Takes His Execution In Stride (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

KILLEEN, Tex., Dec. 30 — They went to war to oust him, tracked him to his spider hole and battled the insurgency he left behind. But on Friday night, as Saddam Hussein faced the gallows in Baghdad, the soldiers of Fort Hood had better things to do than to count down a dictator's final minutes.

Three years and two weeks after troops of the Fourth Infantry Division celebrated their capture of Mr. Hussein by printing up T-shirts with his shaggy likeness and the boast, "We got him," the bars, restaurants and shopping malls of this central Texas city that supports the vast Army post were packed with troops and their families doing, it seemed, everything but following the death watch in Iraq.

Televisions flickered overhead to the clink of beer bottles, but the whoops of excitement were for football-game end runs and touchdown passes.

But around 9 p.m. local time, when news of the execution filtered out and some channels were switched to the news, Chad Story, an Army pilot, sat with his wife, Angela, in the Outback Steakhouse, and called it "great news."

"I just found out two seconds ago," he said, acknowledging that he had not realized how imminent the death had been.

But he said he did not expect much to change in Iraq. "They'll be no effect on the war, unfortunately," he added. Asked if he supported continued American involvement, he hesitated.

"Say yes," Mrs. Story prompted, "it's your job."

As word spread, soldiers in sweatshirts and turned-around ball caps seemed surprised that the sentence would be carried out so quickly, wondering aloud whether it would be shown on television.

Fort Hood, which is the largest active duty armored installation in the country — covering 340 square miles in central Texas halfway between Austin and Waco, and stretching 26 miles east to west with a population of 71,000, including 42,000 troops — was closed to news media interviews over the holidays, an Army spokesman said. But soldiers, many either just back from Iraq or about to go, were everywhere in and around Killeen.

Travis Fowler, a motor transportation specialist with two tours in Iraq, was at the A-1 Classic Tattoo parlor, watching his friend, Randy Rayburn, commemorate his graduation from basic training with his first tattoo, an inked tribute to his native Oklahoma. The proprietor, a heavily tattooed giant who said he went by the name Cowboy, bars television from his premises.

"It breaks my heart," Cowboy said. "I got a lot of tattoos that are not coming back."

At a Hooters restaurant, Pvt. James Jones, a combat engineer with orders to go to Iraq early in 2007, sat with his father, James, a Korea veteran; his mother, Tina; and other family members, aware, they said, that history was being made.

"He's caused misery for generations," Private Jones said. "I wish it would hurry up and happen."

He said it was lucky Mr. Hussein was not facing American justice. "Here you can appeal it for 20 years," he said.

Across the room, Christopher Patin, a paratrooper bound for Afghanistan, said he had been in Iraq when news of Mr. Hussein's capture crackled over the radio, stoking hopes that the war would be over soon. "It didn't work out as we planned," he said.

Still, he said he applauded the pending execution. "Justice will be served," he said.

Across Highway 190, which divides Killeen into parallel commercial strips, a 24-hour Wal-Mart was crowded with soldiers and their families, many thronging the television section with sets tuned not to news channels but to sports.

Specialist Kenneth Kirkland, back last month from fueling helicopters in Iraq, roamed the aisles with his wife, Traciee, who is a manager at Subway and was still wearing her employee nametag.

Fearful of what she called "so much horrific news," Mrs. Kirkland said, "I quit listening to the news when my husband was over there."

But now, she said, she was following events closely. "My God," she said, "they're finally going to kill him."

At a table in Boston's Restaurant, Jerome Kyler, a building contractor who was visiting Killeen for the funeral of his father-in-law, a retired military officer, said the execution would shorten the war.

"He wasn't really a leader; he just had a lot of followers," Mr. Kyler said.

DOJ_NMG_0111422

A relative, Anthony T. Craig Jr., a crane operator for the city of Killeen, was not so sure. "There's somebody following in his footsteps," Mr. Craig said.

Celebration in Michigan

DEARBORN, Mich., Dec. 30 — In this Detroit suburb that is home to the largest Iraqi community outside the Middle East, hundreds of people celebrated Mr. Hussein's death long into the early hours of Saturday morning, praising God as affording them revenge against the man whose regime killed many of their relatives. They expressed hope that the hanging would quell some of the violence in their homeland.

"The best gift for our happy new year is the murder of Saddam Hussein," Imam Husham al-Husainy, director of the Karbalaa Islamic Education Center, shouted from atop a parked car after news reports confirmed the execution.

Warren Avenue, a thoroughfare lined with Middle Eastern shops and eateries, was jammed with sport-utility vehicles and minivans, their drivers honking incessantly while passengers waved Iraqi and American flags through the windows.

Many gathered outside the Karbalaa center early in the evening had lost uncles, fathers and brothers to Mr. Hussein's Baathist regime.

Mr. Hussein's death, they said, keeps future generations of Iraqis from suffering as their families did.

"It's the biggest happy day in my whole life," 19-year-old Ahmed Alaboudi said. "We lost millions of people because of Saddam. But now our home is going to calm down, and everything is going to be O.K."

Many in the crowd of about 200 said there would be fewer insurgents with Mr. Hussein gone.

"They have nothing to fight for," said Diaa Tamimi, 38, who was arrested three times in Iraq because his uncle did not like Mr. Hussein. "Now I think they'll give up."

Mr. Husainy, the imam, said: "The world without Saddam is a much safer place. Even if he is behind bars, he still gives hope and support to his followers and to the terrorists."

The celebration — confined mostly to one parking lot — was smaller and more subdued than the demonstrations throughout Dearborn when Mr. Hussein was captured.

Reaction From Times Square

In Times Square, the news began appearing on the enormous television screens around 10:30 p.m. on Friday, but few of the tourists snapping pictures immediately noticed.

Pak Mark, 45, from White Plains, said: "I actually don't think he should die. He's a head of state. There's a lot of other people who have done a lot worse. There's a lot of atrocity that's done all over the world. Why only him?"

Pat Robertson, 52, who was visiting from Oxford, Miss., spent a year in Baghdad screening Iraqi police recruits. Ms. Robertson said the execution was a victory for fledgling democracy. "They did it themselves," she said. "I'm so proud of them."

Andy Sierra, 20, of Brooklyn, noted that Osama bin Laden was still at large.

"The U.S. should stop worrying about this whole execution and find bin Laden," Mr. Sierra said. "That's all we're hearing about: Saddam getting executed. Another group of soldiers are getting murdered every day and we're still worried about the same thing. We're not worrying about what else is out there."

An Overnight Death Watch, And Then Images Of The Hangman's Noose (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

Of course American television was going to show Saddam Hussein's execution. In a medium that feeds on immediacy, it was just a question of not having to wait too long to see it. And the coverage of the Iraqi dictator's last moments turned out to be an enervating, overnight death watch.

When the first images of the hanging began trickling onto CNN and other cable news shows just before 4 a.m., the death looked oddly casual. Mr. Hussein, who refused a hood, wore a black overcoat and a calm, bland expression that made him look almost like a visiting dignitary on a factory tour.

Some news reports said the condemned man shouted "Allah-u akbar," Arabic for "God is great," on the gallows, but the camera showed Mr. Hussein being escorted by masked men into a shabby room, seemingly listening in a considering way as one of the guards gestured to his own neck as if to explain how the process works. The man slipped a black scarf around Mr. Hussein's neck, then the noose, and then the camera stopped.

It took another few hours for Fox, MSNBC and CNN to transmit Iraqi television's record of the aftermath: grainy, jumpy shots, possibly taken by a cellphone camera, of Mr. Hussein's body, lying wrapped in a sheet, his face uncovered and his neck, as a Fox anchor put it, "horribly twisted."

DOJ_NMG_0111423

Throughout the night, cable news anchors repeatedly assured viewers that for deep-rooted cultural reasons, the Iraqi public would need to see a videotape of Saddam Hussein's execution — as if implying that left to their own devices, the anchors would prefer to just flash a photocopy of the death certificate.

For its own cultural reasons, American television needed to paint morbid curiosity and the competitiveness of live television as a duty executed soberly and reluctantly. "This need to show pictures, some of which are very gruesome, frankly, must be important" for the Iraqi government, the CNN overnight anchor, Stephen Frazier, told Ryan Chilcote, as the close-ups of Mr. Hussein's body crossed the screen. Mr. Frazier then asked the reporter to explain the "apparent bruising" on the dead man's face.

The Saturday morning shows were more subdued, trying to finesse the jarring contrast between scenes of American well-wishers lined up outside a church in Palm Desert, Calif., to pay their respects to former President Gerald R. Ford, and Iraqis dancing in the streets of Sadr City in Iraq — and Dearborn, Mich. — to celebrate Mr. Hussein's inglorious execution.

The networks mostly chose not to begin the day with the most lurid shots. On ABC's "Good Morning America," Terry McCarthy, a Baghdad-based reporter, said the network was not showing Iraqi images of Mr. Hussein's body because "we think they are a little too graphic to show on television."

The news that Mr. Hussein was indeed dead came late on Friday night, and anticlimactically after hour upon hour of creepy music, blood-colored graphics and montages of Mr. Hussein's most infamous moments, particularly his spider hole capture in 2003, when an American military camera recorded a hairy, befuddled Mr. Hussein being prodded and poked like a vagrant being searched for lice.

As the deadline loomed, and commentators filled time with pronouncements like "the clock is ticking on Saddam Hussein," even on-air personalities looked restless. After devoting his entire hour on CNN to the impending hanging, Larry King asked, "Is there something ghoulish about this?" Mr. King looked a little let down when he had to sign off before the execution, promising viewers, "It is really imminent now."

Shortly after 10 p.m., anchors announced that Iraqi news organizations were declaring Mr. Hussein dead, but there were no live images or sound bites to bolster those bulletins. Baghdad was still asleep, so reporters who stayed up all night to record the moment could not deliver an instant reaction.

CNN got around it by showing tape of Iraqi-Americans holding a rowdy outdoor demonstration in Dearborn, Mich. Iraqi state television apparently also felt the need to punctuate execution images with celebratory scenes: CNN reported that Iraqi state television was also showing images of Iraqi-Americans cheering in Dearborn. Those turned out to be images taken from the CNN signal.

Before the first pictures arrived, some anchors fretted on air about whether they could be shown. CNN's Anderson Cooper seemed most worried about the content, telling viewers that a decision over how much to show would be made "at the highest levels" of CNN. But Iraqi television did not show Mr. Hussein's death throes on Friday, so the ethical quandry was somewhat muted.

Fox was much less squeamish, pumping up the Friday night vigil with graphics that promised "The end is near!" and "Date with Death" and urging viewers to stay tuned to Fox News.

All the networks tried to prepare viewers with long biographies of Mr. Hussein and his many crimes. CNN put together a report on the history of toppled leaders' executions, from Mussolini in 1945 to the deposed Afghan president, Najibullah, who was hanged from a Kabul traffic post by the Taliban in 1996. CNN even interviewed a forensic scientist who used a plastic medical school dummy, a rope wrapped around its neck, to explain that asphyxiation can be painless and quick.

But when the pictures arrived, there was no getting around the raw barbarity of the moment. On New York's ABC "Eyewitness News," the morning anchor, Michelle Charlesworth, turned to Jim Dolan and said, "Remind us of what kind of monster this man was."

What The Dictators Can't Stop (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Dictators die harder than most of us. Having wielded unlimited power in life, they seem to be sustained by a stubborn belief in their ability to stare down death, too. In his final moments yesterday, Saddam Hussein refused the offer of a hood to cover his eyes.

Such defiance lends a particularly morbid quality to the last days of dictators such as Hussein and the now-infirm Fidel Castro. They follow in the reluctant footsteps of Spain's Francisco Franco and of many other tyrants-in-extremis before el rais Saddam and el jefe Fidel were confronted, respectively, with a hangman's rope and the withering ravages of disease.

DOJ_NMG_0111424

Survival is the dictator's primary occupation -- as well as his justification for ruthlessness. "His main contribution to life, finally, is fear; but fear such as thunder, cancer or madness may provoke," author William Kennedy wrote of the fictional caudillo that Gabriel GarcÃ-a MÃ¡rquez created in "The Autumn of the Patriarch." Facing death, the dictator is "the embodiment of egocentric evil unleashed," Kennedy continued in a masterful 1976 book review for the New York Times.

The year before, GarcÃ-a MÃ¡rquez was in Madrid, as was I, for Franco's 40 days and nights of dying, inch by inch. Moreover, meetings I had with Hussein around the same time and later with Castro instantly gave me the impression that neither intended to go into the night quietly -- or at all. They could not and would not let others pretend to command their people, nor would they allow history to tamper with the image they willed for themselves.

When he ruled Iraq, Hussein left nothing to chance. A visitor who might greet him had to wash his or her hands with a mysterious blue liquid and pass through a maze of metal detectors in his vast palace. Among the scores of guards and aides, only one was trusted to know which room Hussein would use to greet the visitor.

For years after that encounter, I published open letters to Hussein urging him to get out of the dictator business or at least to quit slaughtering his nation's Kurds, Shiites and Sunni dissidents. I can stop. The approach of the hangman's rope finally focused his mind on my point.

Or so it seemed in the farewell letter that Hussein's lawyers claim the deposed tyrant wrote. Released one day after Iraq's highest court upheld his death sentence last week, the letter urges Iraqis "not to hate, because hatred does not leave space for a person to be fair. . . ." Even U.S. troops should not be hated.

The lawyers would have us remember Hussein as a pious, forgiving ruler concerned about his people's welfare. They saw this as a useful legal tactic. But I doubt it is the way Hussein wanted us to remember him. On the witness stand in his two trials, he remained generally fierce and defiant, refusing to be anything other than a man whom others must fear or else.

Those who would blame all of Iraq's current evils on the American occupation are already busy airbrushing Hussein's image. But we cannot let death obscure his role in creating the inferno that is Iraq today. He leaves behind a country successfully recast in his own ferocious image to a degree far greater than I had imagined.

Before 2003, I believed that Iraqis were largely a people held hostage by Hussein, his murderous clan and the Baathist machine. But far more Iraqis turned out to be like Hussein -- ready to use torture and assassination in the pursuit of wealth and power -- than the world's best intelligence agencies had predicted, as David Kay's official analysis of the CIA failure to understand pre-invasion Iraq details. These Iraqis are Saddam Hussein's enduring legacy.

I suspect that Hussein preferred to go out in a grim finale that will be portrayed by his disciples as victor's justice than to waste away, in solitude and yet under the public's watchful gaze, as Castro is doing in Havana.

Cuba's situation after Castro will not be as traumatic or bloody as Iraq, in large part because Castro did not feel it necessary to rule as harshly and sadistically as did Hussein. As GarcÃ-a MÃ¡rquez, Castro's friend, has written: "The Latin American reality is totally Rabelaisian." It misshapes Latin dictators in ways different than do the blood feuds of the Middle East.

But both dedicated their lives to what GarcÃ-a MÃ¡rquez calls "the solitary vice of power." Their deaths will lighten their crimes and responsibilities not a whit.

Keeping Faith With A Bloody Tradition (LAT)

By Christopher Hitchens

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

I WAS SITTING with President Jalal Talabani of Iraq earlier this month when Iraqi television was broadcasting the trial of Saddam Hussein. The hearings had shifted into their second phase, concerning the mass murder of Iraq's Kurdish minority in the 1980s, and video footage of gassing and shooting had been played in court, to ram home the anguished statements of numberless survivors.

There was something both satisfying and unsettling about the juxtaposition. It is fitting that Iraq's first-ever elected president is a Kurd, but I couldn't help noticing that he didn't much want to be drawn out on the subject. The party that he leads — the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan — is an affiliate of the Socialist International, which opposes the death penalty. In the grimmest days of the "Anfal" — Saddam Hussein's Koran-inspired name for the genocide — one of the Kurds' best friends was Danielle Mitterrand, wife of the late president of France, whose most lasting monument will be his abolition of the guillotine. It was she who had proposed to the Iraqi opposition that it should become the first Middle Eastern government to do away with capital punishment.

This did not happen, of course. Instead, the death penalty remains on the books in Iraq, and the execution of Hussein took place at dawn on Saturday. (It is probably not a coincidence that the verdict of the Iraqi appeals court against Hussein specifically stated that nobody — including the president of the country — had the right to commute the sentence of death).

DOJ_NMG_0111425

It's too bad. There are a number of things that should cause qualms about both the trial and the sentence of Hussein. For instance, both were caught up in the sectarianism that now dominates everything in Iraq. To some, it is enough that Hussein was convicted of massacring the inhabitants of a Shiite village, Dujail, in 1982, and his hanging need not have anything specifically to do with his much larger and even crueler crimes against Kurdistan, Kuwait, Iran and the Iraqi people more generally.

Further, it's unclear what benefits his execution brings. I have heard of Shiite politicians who say that Hussein's death will help repress the Sunni insurgency by depriving it of a figurehead and rallying point and by destroying the chance of a Baathist restoration. This seems to me the most extreme foolishness and stupidity. There was no chance in any case of Hussein returning to power, and it seems just as likely, if not more so, that his execution will actually inflame violence rather than calm it. (While speaking of "execution," many of these same Shiite leaders are linked to death squads that murder their fellow Iraqis every single day and night.)

Almost every transfer of power in Baghdad for the last half a century has been accompanied by the killing of the previous incumbents. British-backed Prime Minister Nuri Said was dragged through the streets and torn to shreds in 1958; his remains were then dug up and run over by cars. I remember as a boy seeing one of his replacements, the pro-communist Abdul Karim Qassim, on television, his head lolling after the attentions of a Baathist firing squad.

The most lurid of all these moments, in this most bitter and harsh society, came with the sadistic video that Hussein himself made of the purge of his party after his seizure of power. Nobody who has seen that footage — of terrified men dragged by goons from the room, while the survivors weep with fear and relief and Hussein indulges in a luxurious cigar — is likely to forget it. And this atrocity was only the curtain raiser to further orgies of mass murder and torture of which we have unimpeachable evidence from the regime's own archives.

"After such knowledge," as T.S. Eliot asked in "Gerontion," "what forgiveness?"

Jonathan Randal, a former Washington Post correspondent, repeated this question in the title of one of the best books on the subject of the Kurds. For many Iraqis, nothing could possibly begin to cancel the recent past except an act of exemplary vengeance. And — to argue against myself further — for many other Iraqis, there could be no security or peace of mind while Hussein continued to breathe. It was rather the same with Nicolae Ceausescu in Romania, where citizens could not get the oppressor out of their minds and where a new start was not thinkable to many until he was certified as dead.

This, in essence, also was the psychological underlay of the Nuremburg war crimes trials: The beasts had to die, and to be seen to have died. One could not bear to live on the same planet as them, and the memory of their victims would be profaned if they were long outlived by their murderers.

It is for this combination of fear, insecurity and agony that some favored the execution of Hussein in public, or at least on television. Without this assurance (or perhaps, even with it) many citizens would have difficulty believing that the tyrant was actually gone. This moves us almost into the realm of exorcism — as if there were not enough "faith-based" horror in Iraq as things already stand.

But Iraq is not going to be free of beasts just because Hussein has gone through the trapdoor. And some of the beasts who still roam the country will be the ones applauding the loudest.

(In this connection, it might have been better for a certain Ginger Cruz, an official at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, to have kept quiet instead of loudly seconding a verdict that doesn't call for any comment from her. The Embassy should be concentrating on the job of combing the torturers and assassins out of the Iraqi police force that American taxpayers are subsidizing.)

Commenting on the killing of Nuri Said in 1958, that great student of Mesopotamia, Freya Stark, reflected on "the savagery for which Iraq in her long history has ever been notorious … the pendulum swing of murder, ancient and long familiar, which has made the pattern from the day when the first Ali was stabbed in Kufa, and probably long before. Even the massacre of the Prophet's family is no novelty on that soil."

It would have been no offense to justice if Hussein had been sentenced to spend the rest of his days in prison without the possibility of parole, but it would represent a break with that sanguinary tradition. And it might be no bad thing if Americans, especially those who supported the breaking of his death grip on Iraqi society, found ways of conveying their distaste for this rushed and vindictive — and partial — version of a process of reckoning that ought to have been sober, meticulous and untainted.

Bombs Kills 68, Wounds Dozens In Iraq (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD (AP) — Bombings killed at least 68 people in Iraq on Saturday, including one planted on a minibus that exploded in a fish market in a mostly Shiite town south of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0111426

The attacks came hours after Saddam Hussein was hanged in Baghdad for ordering the killings of 148 Shiites in the city of Dujail in 1982. Despite concerns about a spike in unrest, Saturday's violence was not unusually high and there was no indication it was related to the execution.

The U.S. military also announced the deaths of three Marines and three soldiers, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops in Iraq, with 109 service members killed.

The bombing at the fish market in Kufa, a Shiite town about 100 miles south of the Iraqi capital, killed 31 people and wounded 58, said Issa Mohammed, director of the morgue in the neighboring town of Najaf. The man blamed for parking the vehicle was cornered and killed by a mob as he walked away from the explosion, police and witnesses said.

Shoppers had crowded into the market to buy supplies for the four-day Eid al-Adha festival, the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar for Shiites.

Television footage showed hundreds of men in traditional Arab headdresses swarming around the minibus' charred frame, toppled on its side in the street. Ambulances and fire trucks pulled up to the site, and a coffin was loaded on top of a car.

In northwest Baghdad, two parked cars exploded one after another, killing 37 civilians and wounding 76 in a mixed neighborhood of the Iraqi capital, police said.

The Marines died Thursday of wounds from fighting in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said. A soldier also died in combat Friday in Anbar, and two others were killed by roadside bombs in Baghdad, the military said.

Their deaths pushed the December death toll past the 105 U.S. service members killed in Iraq in October. At least 2,998 members of the U.S. military have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Saddam was hanged early Saturday, after his conviction last month for crimes against humanity in connection with the Dujail killings. Curfews were enforced in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit and in Samarra, both in the predominantly Sunni Salahuddin province north of Baghdad.

Mostly peaceful demonstrations broke out in several towns across Iraq, with hundreds of people marching in the streets carrying Iraqi flags and banners. Despite the curfew, gunmen in Tikrit paraded with his picture and fired their weapons into the air, calling for vengeance.

Police said Iraqi troops arrested 39 suspects with "quantities of weapons" in Balaz Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad.

On Friday, a suicide bomber killed at least nine people near a Shiite mosque in Baghdad, and 32 tortured bodies were found across the country.

December was also shaping up to be one of the worst months for Iraqi civilian deaths since the AP began keeping track in May 2005.

Through Thursday, at least 2,139 Iraqis have been killed in war-related or sectarian violence, an average rate of about 76 people a day, according to the AP count. That compares to at least 2,184 killed in November at an average of about 70 a day, the worst month for Iraqi civilians deaths since May 2005. In October, AP counted at least 1,216 civilians killed.

The AP count includes civilians, government officials and police and security forces, and is considered a minimum based on AP reporting. The actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported.

Car Bombs Target Shiites In Iraq (CNN)

CNN.com, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Car bombs and a suicide bomber left at least 75 people dead and more than 100 wounded Saturday, the day former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was executed for crimes committed during his rule.

At least 66 people were killed in car bomb attacks on markets in a Shiite area of Baghdad and the southern Shiite town of Kufa.

Residents have been shopping for the Eid al-Adha Muslim holiday, which started Saturday for Sunnis and will start Sunday for Shiites.

The first attack targeted a local market in the historic town of Kufa, killing at least 30 civilians and wounding 45 others, an Iraqi Interior Ministry official said.

The second struck a busy market in Baghdad's northwestern district of Hurriyah, killing at least 36 people and wounding another 77, an Interior Ministry official said.

Three car bombs went off nearly simultaneously in that attack, two on a side street near a shopping area, and a third nearby, he said.

In three additional incidents, a car bomb killed a person and wounded four others near an amusement park south of Baghdad; another killed two people in western Baghdad; and a suicide bomber killed at least six in Tal Afar.

Kufa is part of the key southern province of Najaf. U.S. troops handed security control of the area to Iraqi troops and police last week. The transfer is considered the most significant so far because of Najaf's religious importance.

DOJ_NMG_0111427

U.S. troops have remained in the province but are not in charge of conducting active patrols and are, according to U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, only to be involved in operations when called on by authorities.

Two years ago, the U.S. military and Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mehdi Army militia fought in and around Najaf and Kufa.

Saturday's attacks followed the execution of former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein, a Sunni.

Some predicted the execution would exacerbate violence between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq. Sunnis were a minority ethnic group that enjoyed protection and power during the Hussein regime. They battle, often violently with the majority Shiites, who were persecuted then and now dominate the Iraqi government.

In addition Saturday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of three more American soldiers. The casualties raised the number of American personnel killed in Iraq this month to 109, making December the deadliest month of 2006.

A roadside bomb went off near a Multi-National Division-Baghdad patrol Friday, killing a soldier and wounding three others in southwest Baghdad, the U.S. military said in a written statement. The soldier was accompanying a top military leader to outlying areas to meet with troops at the time of the blast, the military said.

The death was the third U.S. casualty announced Saturday.

A roadside bomb also killed a U.S. soldier on combat security patrol in northwest Baghdad Friday, and another U.S. soldier was killed in combat in Anbar province, the military said.

The U.S. troop death toll for this year has reached 818 -- 2,991 since the war began.

Seven American civilian contractors of the military also have died in the conflict.

On Friday, the British Ministry of Defense announced its 127th death in the war. A roadside bomb killed a soldier, who belonged to the Duke of Lancaster's Regiment, 2nd Battalion, while on patrol in the southern Iraqi city of Basra.

Also Friday, a suicide bomber targeted a Shiite cleric north of Baghdad, killing him, his brother and seven others, authorities in Iraq said. The killings took place in the Diyala provincial town of Khalis.

The bomber had waited near the house of Sheik Kadhim Hameed Qassim, the sheik of Khalis Shiite Mosque, and self-detonated when the cleric, his security and family members arrived after Friday prayers, Diyala officials said.

The province, northeast of Baghdad, has seen much violence.

In addition to the 10 killed, including the suicide bomber, 15 others were wounded, the Iraqi Interior Ministry said.Other developments

Coalition forces killed six insurgents during a series of raids in Baghdad and northwest of the capital Friday, the U.S. military reported. Seventeen people were detained.

Two Iranian diplomats were released Friday after being detained in Iraq by the U.S. military for more than a week, according to IRNA, Iran's official news agency. The pair were seized during a raid in Baghdad on December 21, U.S. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told reporters Wednesday.

Al Qaeda's No. 2 man, Ayman al-Zawahiri, discussed Iraq and Afghanistan and condemned Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas during an address to Muslims two days before the start of Eid al-Adha, an Islamic festival. An audiotape released on Islamist Web sites Friday marked the ninth released by al Qaeda in the last six months.

Shi'ite Hostages' Kin Fear Revenge Slayings (WT)

By Aqeel Hussein

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The families of hundreds of Shi'ite men snatched off the streets by Sunni extremists are waiting to hear their fate after kidnappers threatened to kill them if the execution of Saddam Hussein went ahead.

As many as 450 men are thought to have been seized by Sunni militants during the past two months as hostages against the execution.

Iraqi security forces said the families of the men, most of whom worked for Shi'ite political parties, had been told they would be killed if Saddam was executed.

Col. Mahdi al Salamy, from the Interior Ministry, said hundreds of people had been reported missing over the past two months.

"We have many situations of Shi'ite people being disappeared and their bodies never being found," he said.

He said between 400 and 450 Shi'ite men were thought to have been kidnapped.

"We received many messages from families telling us that their sons were being held as hostages, waiting for Saddam to be executed," he said.

Most of the men were taken in the area around Latifiyah city, a Sunni stronghold 25 miles south of Baghdad. The Interior Ministry said the men were seized as they drove between the Shi'ite holy city of Najaf and Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0111428

Gunmen set up fake checkpoints and ordered the men from their cars, seizing four or five hostages at a time. About 80 men were also taken from Taji city when gunmen stopped three buses and ordered off the men inside.

The seizures went on for two months before Iraqi army units moved into the area and shut down the checkpoints.

Talking hours before Saddam's execution, relatives of the hostages said they were resigned to their fate.

Haider al Hachami said his brother, Kadri al Hachami, had been snatched a month ago as he drove from work in the Al Rashdia area of Baghdad to his home in the Shi'ite district of Al Shualaa.

He did not hold out any hope because his brother worked for the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the main Shi'ite party in Iraq.

"One day after his kidnapping a gang rang and told me, 'Your brother was working with the SCIRI party and he is now held as a hostage with us and all of them will be executed if Saddam is killed,' " he said. "Anyway, he will be killed. If that is so, I prefer to kill Saddam Hussein because I have lost my brother. He is dead, because he is working for the SCIRI party."

Officials said the men were thought to have been taken by a group known as the 20th Revolution Brigade, the military wing of the Islamic Resistance Movement, which has previously been linked to the kidnapping of foreign workers in Iraq.

Haider al Hachami said his brother was 32 and married with three children.

"He did not come back home and after one day these people called and told us those things and no one called after that," he said. "They did not ask for anything, only for no execution of Saddam Hussein. And they told me to tell the SCIRI party that they would do this, with hundreds of other people."

Saddam Exchanged Taunts Before Hanging (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 31, 2006

Iraqis awoke Saturday to television images of a noose being slipped over Saddam Hussein's neck and his white-shrouded body, the pre-dawn work of black-hooded hangmen. They went to bed as new video emerged showing Saddam exchanging taunts with onlookers before the gallows floor dropped away and the former dictator swung from the rope.

Saddam was buried shortly before sunrise Sunday in a family plot next to the graves of his two sons, witnesses said. Those who saw the ceremony said only a few people were present for the burial in Ouja, where Saddam was born.

In Baghdad's Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City, victims of his three decades of autocratic rule took to the streets Saturday to celebrate, dancing, beating drums and hanging Saddam in effigy. Celebratory gunfire erupted across other Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad and other predominantly Shiite regions of the country.

There was no sign of a feared Sunni uprising in retaliation for the execution, and the bloodshed from civil warfare was not far off the daily average — 92 from bombings and death squads.

Outside the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Ramadi, west of the capital, loyalists marched with Saddam pictures and waved Iraqi flags. Defying curfews, hundreds took to the streets vowing revenge in Samarra, north of Baghdad, and gunmen paraded and fired into the air in support of Saddam in Tikrit, his hometown.

Still, authorities imposed curfews sparingly in contrast to the several-day lockdown put in place after Saddam was sentenced to death Nov. 5.

By several accounts, Saddam was calm but scornful of his captors, engaging in a give-and-take with the crowd gathered to watch him die and insisting he was Iraq's savior, not its tyrant and scourge.

"He said we are going to heaven and our enemies will rot in hell and he also called for forgiveness and love among Iraqis but also stressed that the Iraqis should fight the Americans and the Persians," Munir Haddad, an appeals court judge who witnessed the hanging, told the British Broadcasting Corp.

Another witness, national security adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie, told The New York Times that one of the guards shouted at Saddam: "You have destroyed us. You have killed us. You have made us live in destitution."

"I have saved you from destitution and misery and destroyed your enemies, the Persian and Americans," Saddam responded, al-Rubaie told the Times.

"God damn you," the guard said.

"God damn you," responded Saddam.

New video, first broadcast by Al-Jazeera satellite television early Sunday, had sound of someone in the group praising the founder of the Shiite Dawa Party, who was executed in 1980 along with his sister by Saddam.

Saddam appeared to smile at those taunting him from below the gallows. He said they were not showing manhood.

Then Saddam began reciting the "Shahada," a Muslim prayer that says there is no god but God and Muhammad is his messenger, according to an unabridged copy of the same tape, apparently shot with a camera phone and posted on a Web site.

Saddam made it to midway through his second recitation of the verse. His last word was Muhammad.

DOJ_NMG_0111429

The floor dropped out of the gallows.

"The tyrant has fallen," someone in the group of onlookers shouted. The video showed a close-up of Saddam's face as he swung from the rope.

Then came another voice: "Let him swing for three minutes."

The responses within Iraq to Saddam's death echoed the larger reaction across the Middle East, with his enemies rejoicing and his defenders proclaiming him a martyr. While Iranians and Kuwaitis welcomed the death of the leader who led wars against each of their countries, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the execution prevented exposure of the secrets and crimes the former dictator committed during his brutal rule.

Some Arab governments denounced the timing of the 69-year-old former president's hanging just before the start of the most important holiday of the Islamic calendar, Eid al-Adha. Libya announced a three-day official mourning period and canceled all celebrations for Eid.

Within Iraq and across the world, the airwaves were alive with pictures of Saddam in death, a bruise on his cheek, his neck elongated and twisted impossibly to the right — grisly proof that the man who had tormented and killed so many during a bloody quarter-century rule was truly dead.

But some Iraqis — like 34-year-old Haider Hamed, a candy store owner in east Baghdad — wondered what would really change with the execution of Saddam, who was just four months shy of his 70th birthday.

"He's gone, but our problems continue," said the Shiite Muslim, whose uncle was killed in one of Saddam's many brutal purges. "We brought problems on ourselves after Saddam because we began fighting Shiite on Sunni and Sunni on Shiite."

At least 80 Iraqis died in bombings and other attacks Saturday, and police said 12 more tortured bodies were found dumped in Baghdad. The U.S. military announced six more service members — three soldiers and three Marines — were killed.

The execution took place on the penultimate day of the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops, with the toll reaching 109. At least 2,998 members of the U.S. military have died in Iraq since the war began in March 2003, according to an AP count.

On Sunday, Saddam was interred near his sons Odai and Qusai in the main cemetery in Ouja, a small town outside Tikrit. The sons and a grandson were killed in a gunbattle with the American forces in Mosul in July 2003.

Iraqi government officials initially wanted to bury Saddam in secret in an unmarked grave to prevent the burial site from becoming a place of pilgrimage.

But the Tikrit burial was facilitated after negotiations in Baghdad between the government and U.S. officials and a delegation that included the governor of Salahuddin Province and the head of Saddam Hussein's Albu-Nassir clan, Al-Arabiya satellite television reported late Saturday.

Um Abdullah, a Sunni and teacher in Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, said she would wear black to mourn the city's favorite son.

"Saddam will be a hero in our eyes," she said. "I have five kids and I will teach them to take revenge on Americans."

Police blocked the entrances to Tikrit and said nobody was allowed to leave or enter the city for four days. Despite the security precaution, gunmen took into the streets, carrying pictures of Saddam, shooting into the air and calling for vengeance.

Security forces also set up roadblocks at the entrance to another Sunni stronghold, Samarra, and a curfew was imposed after about 500 went into the streets to protest the execution.

Among minority Sunnis there was deep anger, born not only of Saddam's execution but of the loss of their decades-long political and economic dominance that began with Saddam's ouster in the U.S. invasion nearly four years ago.

"The president, the leader, Saddam Hussein is a martyr and God will put him along with other martyrs," said Yahya al-Attawi, who led prayer at a towering Sunni mosque constructed by Saddam in Tikrit.

There were cheers at the cafeteria of a U.S. outpost in Baghdad as soldiers having breakfast learned Saddam had been hanged.

But members of the Army's 2nd Battalion, 17th Field Artillery Regiment, on patrol in an overwhelmingly Shiite neighborhood in eastern Baghdad, said the execution wouldn't get them home any faster — and therefore didn't make much difference.

"Nothing really changes," said Capt. Dave Eastburn, 30, of Columbus, Ohio. "The militias run everything now, not Saddam."

Staff Sgt. David Earp, who also fought in 1991's Operation Desert Storm, said the execution worried him.

"In my opinion, something big is going to happen," said Earp, of Colorado Springs, Colo. "There will be a response. Probably not today because they know we are looking for one, but soon."

U.S. Deaths In Iraq Mark Increased Presence (WP)

By Donna St. George

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0111430

FORT LEE, Va. -- In a little-known museum tucked away on the grounds of an Army post near Richmond, a memorial wall just inside the door quietly announces a profound change in the nation's fighting force.

Name upon name, the wall honors soldiers who have died in the combat zones of Iraq and Afghanistan: PFC Lori Piestewa, CPT Kimberly Hampton, SPC Lizbeth Robles, SGT Jessica Housby. . . . All 59 are women.

They are casualties in a conflict that has seen women serving in larger numbers than before, in a wider array of jobs, amid violence that heeds no front line.

As the U.S. death toll in the Iraq war approaches 3,000, the memorial at the U.S. Army Women's Museum is a solemn acknowledgment that women have quietly taken a place in the nation's procession of flag-draped coffins and military funerals.

In all, 62 service women from all branches have died in Iraq, about two-thirds of them in hostile fire. By comparison, in World War II, historians say, 16 women were killed in action. In Vietnam, one woman's life was claimed by enemy fire; in the Persian Gulf War, five.

Most previous female casualties were nurses. Now the female dead include military police, truck drivers, intelligence analysts, helicopter pilots, medics, mechanics, media escorts and kitchen managers. At least 13 left behind children. More than half were younger than 25.

It is a scenario that experts once predicted would lead to a public outcry against "women in body bags." Instead, the casualties appear to have melded into the nation's experience of war.

"I think people have come to the sensible conclusion that you can't say a woman's life is more valuable than a man's life," said retired Air Force Brig. Gen. Wilma Vaught, president of the Women in Military Service for America Memorial Foundation. "We don't want to lose any of them."

* * *Spec. Jessica Cawvey

In the museum where Jessica Cawvey and other women are honored, there is a large interactive screen near the memorial wall. With the touch of any name comes a face, a biography, sometimes a video clip -- life by life, soldier by soldier.

Cawvey's biography mentions how she joined the Illinois National Guard in hopes of making a better life for her young daughter, Sierra. She was a single mother, enlisting in summer 2001, when few people foresaw a long and violent war.

By the time her Guard unit was shipped overseas, Cawvey was an accounting student at Illinois State University, having graduated on the dean's list with a two-year degree from Parkland College, not far from her home town, Mahomet, Ill.

In Iraq, Cawvey, 21, worked in convoys in a transportation company. She was widely viewed, her mother said in an interview, as fun-loving and upbeat.

She was last home in July 2004, for her two-week break, which she had arranged to coincide with Sierra's sixth birthday. Her mother recalled that Cawvey "took her to the zoo, she took her to the aquarium, she took her everywhere she went."

Before Cawvey returned to finish her duty in Iraq, her daughter insisted that she pledge not to get killed, locking pinkies with her as a form of promise. Jessica Cawvey was wary about this, her mother recalled, but gave in .

Three months later, Cawvey was killed near Fallujah, her vehicle hit by a roadside bomb. "Mommy pinkie-sweared she wouldn't die," the girl told her grandmother.

"We had to explain it was not Mommy's fault, that she wanted to come home," said Kevin Cawvey, the soldier's father.Spec. Toccara Green

Beside the narrative about Toccara Green, there is a photograph of her family members, taken shortly after her death, in front of their home in the Baltimore suburb of Rosedale. The first woman from Maryland to die in the war, Green was killed five days after she last saw them.

The 23-year-old soldier was part of a supply convoy Aug. 14, 2005, when a bomb went off during a refueling stop in Asad, in the turbulent Anbar province.

"Because she was not on the firing line, we never really thought something like that would happen to her," said her mother, Yvonne Green, "but as we and so many others have found out . . . those bombs are everywhere."

Women make up 11 percent of deployed U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan. But because they do not serve in traditional "frontline" combat units -- infantry, artillery, armor, Special Forces -- their casualties are proportionately smaller, 2 percent of the lives lost.

Just days before she was killed, "Tee" had been home for a two-week break. She had enjoyed a big family cookout, skated at her favorite roller rink, prayed at her Baltimore church, joined her mom for shopping and her aunt for a movie.

Her older brother was a Marine, and her father was a Baltimore police detective, and it seemed natural, her mother said, that Green would wear a uniform, too. Although she had done a semester at Norfolk State, and then Morgan State, she gave up college for the Army. The military, she had decided, would be her career.

"Anyone who knew her would tell you that was her calling," her mother said. "It was just something that was in her. It was part of her like her right arm."Sgt. Amanda Pinson

DOJ_NMG_0111431

Two photos of Amanda Pinson appear on the screen; she wears camouflage in one and a T-shirt that says "Angel" in the other. Pinson was killed by a mortar round outside a building on her post in Tikrit.

On that day in March, she was walking toward her fiance, a fellow soldier, to join him for lunch. She was wearing an engagement ring he had given her in Iraq.

Pinson was 21, a cryptologist from the St. Louis area who had been inspired by the Sept. 11 attacks to join the military. She worked in the intelligence unit for the Army's elite 101st Airborne.

"She was so strong," said her father, Tony Pinson. "She had so much heart, and she earned so much respect for her abilities. She was very hard-driven, working around the clock. You couldn't tell her she couldn't do something. She would prove you wrong."

On the day she was killed, her fiance was injured, but "she absorbed most of the impact," her father said. He said he thought that would have been her wish. Her fiance had two children from a previous marriage.

She was just starting out.1st Lt. Ashley Henderson Huff

It is her wedding day in this museum photograph, and Ashley Huff wears a jeweled tiara, her blue eyes looking out happily, all future and promise.

Near the photo, the display mentions Huff's love for the University of Georgia, where she graduated. The die-hard Bulldogs fan was a sorority girl and an ROTC standout.

Huff was killed in September by a suicide bomber in Mosul. She was 23.

Her mother, Janet Henderson, had not heard of the museum but finds solace in the idea of keeping her daughter's memory alive.

"I don't think the American public knows that there are young women, 23 years of age, working in Iraq and putting their lives on the line every day," Janet Henderson said. "They need to know that women like Ashley are doing so much there. She truly believed in her work and in protecting this country."

Huff led a unit of the military police in Irbil, and much of her work involved training Iraqi police. Her biggest project was a proposal for a police academy. "Ashley pushed and pushed and pushed until she got it approved," her mother said. "That was her biggest accomplishment."

Before her deployment, she had married her college sweetheart, Brian Huff. "We had a beautiful, beautiful wedding," her mother recalled. "We planned it for six months, we planned every detail, and it was a dream wedding, and she looked like a princess."

She was looking forward to buying a house with her husband and starting a family, her mother said. One day, she hoped to work in politics or diplomatic affairs.

The last time they spoke, her daughter told her: " 'Mom, I'll be home soon, and we'll have the best Christmas,' " her mother recalled, crying softly as the holiday approached.Pfc. Hannah McKinney

She is standing with her new husband and young son in the photograph, and her family members say she wanted nothing more than to be back with them in the United States. But she never got the chance after Sept. 6, when she was run over in the pitch-black night in an accident that has been under Army investigation.

This is the story her mother tells by phone one recent day as McKinney's 2-year-old son scampers around, trying to hang candy canes on his grandmother's Christmas tree in Redlands, Calif. "Her son will never know his mom," Barbie Heavrin said.

McKinney was a single mother when she enlisted over her parents' objections, telling them: " 'The Army would never send a young mother, a single mother, to Iraq,' " her mother said.

Before she shipped out in 2005, McKinney married her fiance in a civil ceremony. The couple was planning a wedding around the Christmas holiday at Immanuel Baptist Church in Highland, Calif.

"We would have been preparing for that right now," her mother said. "We had a funeral at the church instead of a wedding."Sgt. Jennifer Hartman

The story about 21-year-old Jennifer Hartman mentions her roots in Pennsylvania and her enthusiasm for riding snowmobiles and ATVs. She is pictured in uniform and with her younger brother and sister.

Hartman was killed by a suicide car bomber Sept. 14, near her work site in a power plant in Baghdad. "She would have been back in Texas on Nov. 10," her mother said. "She would have been home for Christmas."

The oldest of three children, Hartman enlisted while she was in high school, drawn to the promise of college tuition benefits and aware that her family, with two daughters and a son, could not afford so much higher education.

Her mother, Bernice Hartman, said the Army recruiter promised them that she would not be sent to Iraq, saying the Army " 'would take someone off the street before they take your daughter.' " Bernice Hartman said the words had haunted them.

"We would have never signed," she said, her voice breaking.

DOJ_NMG_0111432

Since Jennifer Hartman's death, her father has been unable to sleep. Bernice Hartman has so many questions, about how it happened, about the two soldiers who died with her. "It just seems like everything you want to know, they can't tell you," she said.

* * *

At the museum, Ron Bingham, who works with the collections, describes the memorial as an evolving tribute. It started with only the wall of names in 2004. When the interactive display of photographs and stories was added in 2005, it became much more, and now it expands all the time as more photographs and life details are gathered and as the toll of war grows.

Visitors often linger at the display. Sometimes they talk about the soldiers' lives. Sometimes they leave in tears.

"Every woman from a private to a general has an important story to tell," Bingham said. "The idea is to get as much information as possible to preserve their stories for future generations."

After Duty In Iraq, They're Back On The Beat (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

LAPD officers who have returned from reservist deployments find parallels and contrasts with their military service in the Mideast.

Ron Von Gober has had his share of close calls as a Los Angeles police detective, including the time a group of toughs patted him down during an undercover drug buy in Hollywood and discovered he was wearing a wire.

Surrounded, Von Gober pulled his gun and held the angry thugs at bay while he backed off and then ran to safety.

But Von Gober's closest brush with death happened far from the streets of L.A.

He was the gunner atop a Humvee on a highway outside Baghdad last year when a roadside bomb went off, sending shrapnel into one of his hands and leaving a spray of cuts across his head.

Evacuated from Iraq to an Army hospital in Germany, Von Gober recovered from his wounds and received the Purple Heart.

Now he can be found back chasing criminals for an auto theft detail at the LAPD's Van Nuys Division.

The 50-year-old cop is one of dozens of LAPD officers who have returned to the sometimes dangerous streets of Los Angeles after being deployed as military reservists to the meaner streets of Iraq.

He also is one of five LAPD officers who are back on the job after being wounded in combat. Two others who were injured have not rejoined the force, and another, a helicopter pilot, chose to retire after a brief return.

Von Gober said his decision to come back to potentially dangerous duty with the LAPD was an easy one.

"We go out in the field every day and we really make a difference," he said. "I arrested someone this morning for auto theft. It feels good to be part of that."

Christopher Burke cites a similar motivation. A four-year LAPD veteran, he suffered wounds to his left leg and face July 31 when a roadside bomb hit his Humvee in Ramadi, Iraq, west of Baghdad.

Although he is still recuperating from the latest round of surgery, doctors expect the 27-year-old to make a full recovery, and Burke said he looks forward to returning to the LAPD.

"I still have it in me to have a career being a cop," Burke said. "I just like making things right. People who shouldn't be on the street — I want to be the person who takes them off the street."

That continued drive, seen in so many of those returning from the war, has admirers in and out of the department.

"They are extraordinary individuals," said Police Chief William J. Bratton. "It's a phenomenal commitment when you think of it."

Bratton was on hand recently for a ceremony at the Police Academy, where a Marine general gave Burke his Purple Heart.

Burke's fiancee and Von Gober's wife were supportive of their decisions both to go to war and to return to the police force.

"My wife was a police officer for 20 years," Von Gober said. "Her father was a cop. Her brother was a cop. She had her hands full with the two kids, but she was understanding."

Experts estimate that more than 500 peace officers in California have been called to active military duty since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Police agencies are required to let officers go to military service, even if they volunteer, and the LAPD keeps paying its officers' salaries — minus whatever they collect in military pay — and benefits.

The LAPD has received special recognition from the Department of Defense for its support of officer-soldiers; it is one of only a few agencies in the country to assign an officer full time to help employees make the transition back to police work from military service.

DOJ_NMG_0111433

Military liaison Dennis Denoi, a police officer and former Marine, has smoothed the transition of more than 200 LAPD employees who are members of reserve and National Guard units called to active military duty, many to Iraq and Afghanistan.

Returning officers are given medical tests and refresher training. Psychological counseling is also available.

"They really took care of me," said Officer Brandon Valdez, a Marine Corps Reserve sergeant who suffered an arm injury when a roadside bomb exploded near his convoy.

Now a gang enforcement officer in the LAPD's Southeast Division, Valdez didn't leave behind violence when he left Iraq. Just months after his return, gang members opened fire on him from a passing car.

Valdez was not injured, and he brushes off the incident today.

"I just do my job," he said.

That job, policing a city that has had more than 450 homicides this year, is challenging enough. So why volunteer to go to a country where more than 2,000 people were killed just in October?

"I lost a few buddies, and the guilt was killing me," Burke said. "So I called up the Marines and said, 'The next unit to go — I want to go.' For me, personally, it was peace of mind."

Von Gober, who traded his .38-caliber police revolver for a heavy M-60 machine gun, said he volunteered to go to Iraq to be part of something historic and to fulfill his sense of adventure.

It didn't matter that he was teased by fellow soldiers for being a 50-year-old private.

For Jonathan Kirkpatrick, 39, an LAPD patrol sergeant who has 10 years with the department, joining the Marines followed in the footsteps of his father.

He served more than five years in the military before joining the LAPD, only to be called up as a reservist.

Kirkpatrick's experience as a police officer helped him distinguish himself during his five months in the battle zone at the outset of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

He received a Bronze Star, with a V for valor, for heroism during a battle with Iraqi forces in the town of Gharraf.

Kirkpatrick was credited with risking his life by leading a successful rescue after a U.S. artillery unit was pinned down and its company commander seriously wounded.

"We were the next unit back, and they told us to go get 'em, so we did," Kirkpatrick said recently as he prepared to begin his shift patrolling the streets of the North Hollywood Division.

Kirkpatrick sees some positive parallels between serving in the Marine Corps and wearing an LAPD badge that help explain why he has done both.

"There is a certain camaraderie," he said. "It's the people you work with. There is just something about working together in a challenging job."

Another similarity: There have been complaints that the U.S. did not send enough soldiers to Iraq to keep the peace, and complaints have been made here about the size of the LAPD.

"We are understaffed and undermanned here in the LAPD," Kirkpatrick said. "But you feel like you are really doing something together that is challenging. You are put to the test."

Some returning officers face adjustments.

Von Gober's foes these days are car thieves instead of insurgent bombers, but he now carries a backup gun and extra ammunition, a holdover from the days when he did not want to be caught short of firepower in Iraq.

In addition, Von Gober admits that he is irrationally vigilant whenever he drives under freeway overpasses while on the job in the San Fernando Valley.

One similarity Burke noticed centers on the danger to Iraqi civilians from insurgents if they are seen cooperating with American troops.

"If the gangbangers here see you talking to some innocent person, that can put them in danger," he said.

However, Burke said the similarities pretty much end there.

He said he has never fired his police firearm and never been shot at in Los Angeles, but exchanged fire with attackers many times in Iraq.

"People like to make comparisons between the war in Iraq and the war on the streets of Los Angeles," he said. "To the extent gangs are shooting at you instead of insurgents, it's similar.

"But in Los Angeles you don't have to worry on every street corner whether a bomb is going to go off or someone's going to shoot an RPG [rocket-propelled grenade] down at you."

patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

U.S. General Predicts Increased Fighting In Afghanistan (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

DOJ_NMG_0111434

AP, December 30, 2006

CAMP SHARONA, Afghanistan — The outgoing U.S. commander in Afghanistan predicted more fighting this spring and summer and said Taliban militants would try to overrun towns to "unhinge the Afghan people's morale."

Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry also said the recent killing of a high-level Taliban commander shows that fugitives such as Osama bin Laden and Mullah Omar will one day slip up, and that the U.S. will strike.

Eikenberry, who is expected to rotate out of Afghanistan in late January, said he expected militants this spring to attack border security posts, to extend their use of suicide bombs and to mass in groups of 25 to 100 for assaults on towns that serve as seats of local government.

But Eikenberry said none of the Taliban's efforts would provide "a significant military challenge" for U.S., NATO and Afghan forces, which he said have improved greatly in the last year.

"The capability exists for that array of allied and Afghan forces to dominate militarily wherever they move to," he told The Associated Press.

Eikenberry said that as he looks ahead to the spring and summer, "I anticipate higher levels of fighting."

When asked if that was in comparison to 2006, he said: "We should not be surprised by levels of fighting in parts of southern Afghanistan that rivaled what we saw last year."

Violence rose sharply in Afghanistan in 2006, killing an estimated 4,000 people, the deadliest year since the U.S.-led coalition swept the Taliban from power in 2001.

Militants launched a record 117 suicide attacks this year, about a six-fold increase over 2005, killing 206 Afghan civilians, 54 Afghan security personnel and 18 soldiers from NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said spokesman Maj. Dominic Whyte.

The number of U.S. troops killed in Afghanistan dropped slightly, from 93 in 2005 to 87 in 2006. But the number of casualties suffered by other NATO countries rose sharply.

On Friday, Eikenberry traveled to three U.S. bases in the rugged mountains of eastern Afghanistan to talk with commanders and meet the soldiers who must fend off attacks by Taliban militants entering from Pakistan.

Eikenberry said an "extraordinary amount of resources" from throughout the U.S. government — and including help from the Afghan and Pakistani governments — are being used to hunt down al-Qaida leader bin Laden and Taliban leader Omar, who are generally thought to be hiding in the mountainous region of the Pakistan-Afghan border.

He said the killing in a U.S. airstrike Dec. 19 of Mullah Akhtar Mohammad Osmani, regarded as one of three top associates of Omar, shows the U.S. is ready to strike.

"With that intensive effort that is out there, eventually opportunities will occur, and when those opportunities present themselves, as we demonstrated with Osmani, we're ready to strike," he said. "We continue the full-court press against them. One day they slip, one day they make a mistake, and we'll be there ready to strike."

Eikenberry is expected to rotate out of the country next month as Gen. Dan K. McNeil, a four-star U.S. general, prepares to take command of all NATO forces in Afghanistan.

1,373 Miles Into The Heart Of Afghanistan (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

Shahr-i-Safa, Afghanistan — AS a hair-thin line on a map, Afghanistan's national Ring Road looks easy enough to conquer.

But tell war-hardened Afghans that you're going to travel its entire 1,373-mile length unarmed, facing winter and a raging insurgency, and they look at you like you're completely mad.

Five years after the fall of the Taliban, it shouldn't be such a challenge.

Rebuilding the two-lane highway that connects Afghanistan's major cities has been a centerpiece of the U.S.-led effort to transform the nation. It is so important that Afghanistan's president, Hamid Karzai, said that President Bush once demanded daily updates on the roadwork from Kabul south to Kandahar, the seat of power under Taliban rule.

U.S. grants have paid for rebuilding a third of the road, according to Afghan government figures. Japan, Saudi Arabia and Iran are responsible for repairing other sections, a rare case in which Washington and Tehran are working toward the same goal. Officially, the $1.05-billion project is almost finished.

But as with many things in Afghanistan, there is a chasm between the rhetoric and reality.

Some of the best stretches of the road are among the Taliban's favorite killing grounds. This fall, Canadian troops led the biggest ground battle in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's 57-year history, in part to regain control of a stretch of highway west of Kandahar. The NATO offensive cleared the insurgents, but guerrillas and highway robbers still prey on travelers in many other places.

DOJ_NMG_0111435

About 40% of the road isn't finished. Some sections are nothing more than muddy tracks through the country's lawless Wild West, where you can drive for hours without seeing another vehicle fishtailing and backsliding through the muck along with you.

The only way to understand the condition of the road and grasp what it says about Afghanistan is to drive it.

The trip took my interpreter, driver and me seven days, inching along slippery edges of steep cliffs, wandering in the wilderness without road signs, suffering two flat tires, a ruptured radiator and a spinout on mountain ice.

On the way, we managed to avoid a Taliban ambush, a potential kidnapper or highway robber, a suicide bomber and a gunman who fired close enough to take off one of our heads.

Getting ready

I KNEW some of the Ring Road all too well. I traveled it for weeks in the early Taliban era a decade ago, when years of war and neglect already had reduced the highway to patches of broken asphalt connected by dirt, rocks and ruts. A trip that would take a few hours on a proper road was days of torture, the speedometer straining to break 10 mph as the vehicle crawled over shell craters and pond-sized potholes.

This time, I would be leaving from Kabul with interpreter Wesal Zaman and driver Zyarat Gul. A quiet and calm man, Gul had gotten us home safely from other terrible places.

Before starting out, we visited three experts at the Economics Ministry to find out what we were in for.

Sayed Arif Nazif, the ministry's director of design, told us that the building of the road began in the mid-1970s. The United States helped, but most of the money came from the Soviet Union and Arab countries.

Farmers used the road to get their produce to market. Afghanistan became the world's largest exporter of dried grapes, apples and other fruit. It also sent an assortment of nuts.

"In those days, in terms of our roads, we were much more advanced than neighboring countries," Nazif said. "But because of the wars and other problems, all our roads were destroyed."

Soviet troops and tanks poured down the Ring Road to invade Afghanistan in the dead of night on Dec. 25, 1979, setting off a decades-long tailspin from which Afghans are still trying to recover.

The rebuilding of the road is supposed to help revive the economy and break down ethnic differences by allowing Afghans to travel more freely. Although dried fruit exports are 20% of what they were before the wars, reconstruction is showing benefits, Nazif said. This year, the repaved road allowed farmers to get fresh pomegranates, grapes and apples to Kabul's airport, and the first few flights delivered the produce to wealthy Persian Gulf states.

I had a more pressing question: "How long do you think it would take to drive the whole Ring Road?"

Nazif shifted in his seat. "Take the length of 1,373 miles, and divide by an average speed of 50 miles an hour," he said.

"That sounds like we could do it in maybe four days," I replied, trying to do some quick mental math. Nazif smiled and nodded, but we both knew Afghanistan was a lot more complicated than that.

Before we started, we took some precautions that are prudent for any trip into the countryside: We loaded the car with two spare tires, a shovel, bottled water and snacks. And we made one rule: If Gul, an ethnic Pashtun like most of the Taliban, saw anything on the horizon or felt anything he didn't like, he should turn around without pausing to ask us.

A small victory

AS the Ring Road begins a steady climb out of Kabul on a 27-mile section rebuilt by the Taliban, the horizon is bright white with towering snow-covered mountains. The road is as smooth as any in the United States. But the government can't afford to keep it plowed, so it was covered with packed snow and ice that brought long lines of heavy transports to a halt on the highlands near Ghazni.

We were less than six hours into the journey near Shahr-i-Safa when we saw the first signs of Taliban activity.

Four insurgents armed with AK-47s and rocket-propelled grenades had ridden two motorcycles to a hill overlooking a stretch of the highway near Qalat. About 3 p.m., they opened fire on a civilian truck taking supplies to an Afghan military base, a common guerrilla tactic.

Normally, insurgents carry out swift attacks and make a getaway into the desert. But this time a pickup carrying half a dozen Afghan national army troops happened by. They pinned the guerrillas down from behind and called in a second unit to attack from the front.

We reached the scene about half an hour after the battle ended. Jubilant Afghan troops were smiling and joking next to three Taliban corpses, like scavengers enjoying quality roadkill. One of the dead men lay on his back with his knees bent, as if he might jump up at any moment. But the bullet hole in his neck left no doubt his war was over.

The fourth fighter escaped, so the victory wasn't complete, said Afghan army Maj. Atullah Maiwandwal.

DOJ_NMG_0111436

It was a battle too small to make the news, let alone change the course of a war. But the major and his men had achieved something significant: Without U.S. military advisors or foreign backup, they defended a piece of highway rebuilt with a $237-million U.S. grant, the sort of gradual progress that often gets lost amid the noise of suicide bombings and other insurgent attacks.

"Where are your bodyguards?" one soldier asked, stunned that we were traveling the highway without weapons.

We explained that we preferred to travel unencumbered by armed escorts. So as night fell, we rushed off to Kandahar, which has been staggering under a wave of suicide bombings. The governor gave us beds in his guest house.

Early the next morning, we headed west into Helmand province, the scene of fierce fighting this year between NATO forces and the Taliban.

A large billboard on the edge of Kandahar declared that the highway was being rebuilt as a gift of the Japanese people.

Actually, the 70 miles of road that Japan pledged $76 million to fix is the same bumpy, cracked surface that it has been for years. The area is too dangerous for road crews.

It is the hashish harvest season, and marijuana plants as big as Christmas trees are stacked by the thousands against mud-brick homes, curing in the sun. Villagers scrape the gooey resin, which is pressed into blocks and exported along the same routes that move the opium used to produce heroin, a big source of the insurgents' income.

Hundreds of gunmen prowl the Ring Road in Helmand. They are members of private militias who take orders from local warlords and drug barons and operate illegal checkpoints, mostly to squeeze money from truck drivers.

As one longtime resident of Lashkar Gah, the provincial capital, told us, "They are loyal to the government until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and then until the next morning they're enemies."

As we neared the Lashkar Gah turnoff, in an area where we were told that kidnappers had abducted two German journalists, our driver broke our one rule.

The broken rule

GUL slowed for a speed bump, and instead of accelerating when a militiaman jumped up with an AK-47, he stopped. Gul opened the driver's window, apparently weighing the comparative risks of getting shot and getting kidnapped. The gunman stuck his head in, saw me in the back seat and smiled like a dog sniffing fresh meat.

"Get us out of here!" I shouted at Gul, and he hesitated. "Get moving!"

Gul hit the gas. The barrel of the gunman's rifle clunked off the rear side of the car. Not daring to look back, I tensed for the shot that didn't come.

In Lashkar Gah, we stopped at a construction agency funded by the United States Agency for International Development, or USAID, where we previously had met cook Khudai Nazar. At 64, he is old enough to remember what is possible with peace, and young enough to believe he might live to see it again.

We asked what he remembered of the Ring Road of his childhood. He sent his son for an opaque plastic sandwich bag stuffed with browning reference letters and old photographs.

They tell of a more innocent age, from the late 1940s to the 1970s, when American workers and their families lived in Helmand. They were building a dam, a power plant, irrigation canals and other development projects in the Afghan desert.

In one black-and-white photograph, Nazar is 12 years old and standing on a lush lawn surrounded by a white picket fence with his new bicycle, a gift from Rose and Don Wonderly of Portland, Ore.

"The first time I met with her, I didn't understand English," recalled Nazar, who speaks with an American accent. "American people always like children, and they didn't have any. She said come every day to my house and I'm gonna teach you English."

Within a few days, Rose was giving the boy new clothes and encouraging other American families to leave him some of their hand-me-downs. The Wonderlys left in 1960.

By the time the Soviets invaded in 1979, Nazar had worked for a string of other Americans: George Belissary promoted the servant to a warehouse job; JoAnn and Ronald Thompson of Sacramento praised his bread-baking skills; Jack and Maxine Smith wrote of their fondness for his pastries and good humor.

The Smiths had to flee the Soviet occupation after 17 months in Afghanistan, and in her last words to him, Nazar said, Maxine urged him to take his wife and their 10 children to Pakistan.

"She said, 'Just send me a message and I'll have a house waiting for you — everything,' " Nazar said wistfully. It was clear in his breaking voice that he wished he could have left. But he never found enough money, or will, to turn his back on the land of his birth.

Nazar bid us farewell with the hope that some of his long-lost American friends might try to reach him, maybe even risk a visit.

Three hours after we left Lashkar Gah, a suicide bomber walked into the well-guarded compound of the provincial governor, a few blocks from where we'd visited Nazar, and blew himself up in the parking lot, killing eight people.

DOJ_NMG_0111437

The Wild West

HEADING north toward Herat, we drove for several hours past mountains weathered so smooth they seemed molded from clay. We reached Herat that night, putting us more than halfway along the Ring Road at the end of our second day.

Swift progress made us overconfident. We talked about being back in Kabul in a day or so. We marveled at the traffic lights operating at all the main intersections in Herat, the only major city to escape the destruction of Afghanistan's wars.

The pleasure was short-lived. The next morning, 35 miles northeast of Herat, the highway abruptly ended. We didn't see asphalt again for three days.

Iran was supposed to complete 70 miles of paved road from Herat into Badghis province, but its contractors suddenly stopped work, said Gov. Mohammed Naseem Tokhi. Some say the money ran out; others cite unspecified problems between Iran and the rest of the international community, Tokhi said. He has received no official explanation.

The Afghan national government hasn't even been able to find a country willing to fund construction of the road through the rest of the province.

Entering Badghis was like driving back into biblical times. Ours was the only internal-combustion engine running for miles. Most people were walking or riding donkeys. The gray smoke of cooking fires seeped through the black fabric of nomads' low-slung tents.

The province's people, many of whom are Pashtuns, have long felt cut off from the rest of the country. Now they are largely missing out on billions of dollars in international aid, and that makes Badghis an ideal recruiting ground for insurgents. Grinding poverty and poor health have left even moderates angry with Karzai's government and its foreign backers.

Prolonged drought followed by devastating floods last month left three-quarters of the province's people without enough food, Tokhi said. The only roads into the province are so bad that relief agencies are having a tough time reaching people. Many could die during the winter, he said.

In the frontier town of Bala Murghab, a Ring Road bridge is a dangerously unstable span covered with metal sheets laid by people who salvaged them from a derelict factory. The 200,000 residents of the surrounding area have no electricity, and their water is so bad that diarrhea is a main killer.

Smoldering rage exploded this fall when gunmen stormed the district commissioner's new headquarters, a three-story yellow brick building built by USAID. They blasted a rocket-propelled grenade through the guardhouse and fired assault rifles at offices and police cars, shattering most of the main building's windows. The district commissioner fled for his life. Three foreign workers at a U.S.-based agency's compound escaped by hiding in their garden as rampaging mobs looted the buildings.

When the aid agency shut its office, townspeople persuaded its Afghan supervisor, Ghalam Seddiq, to become mayor. Slipping another prayer bead along a string as he talked to us, Seddiq said the attackers wanted to stop the aid agency's education programs and prevent children from learning, a Taliban priority.

The center of town is a ramshackle bazaar, where merchants glared as we drove along muddy streets. A large padlock sealed the front doors of the only hotel. The elderly caretaker said it was too dangerous to stay there, but the new district commissioner ordered the hotel to open for us.

In this Afghan version of a Wild West town, Abdul Jalil Sekandari is the deputy sheriff.

Guarded by a young man with an AK-47 slung over his shoulder, Sekandari dropped by our hotel room that night. By the glow of an oil lamp, he griped about the government and foreign aid, personally guaranteed our safety and invited us to spend the night with him in the police station. We thought our odds were better in the hotel.

Good riddance

WE rode out of town at first light. We weren't far into the countryside when a man in a Taliban-style black turban lurking near a disabled Soviet tank leveled his Kalashnikov rifle and took a potshot at us. We heard the loud hiss-snap of a bullet passing close by, but he didn't fire again. It must have been a good-riddance round.

Soon even the dirt road disappeared into a labyrinth of mud tracks that crisscrossed broad valleys. We fishtailed and churned our way through dense fog, along tire ruts at least 2 feet deep. The four-wheel-drive car jerked and bucked like a rodeo bull.

There were no road signs, and no other vehicles. So the only thing to do was ask directions from a shepherd or a farmer working the sodden earth with a wooden plow pulled by his donkey.

"Does this road go to Maimana?" we asked an old man at one crossroads.

"Yes. But others prefer that way," he replied, nodding toward a dirt road heading in the opposite direction.

When we pulled in for a rest in Maimana, a pool of green fluid spilled out of a hole in the radiator, which a mechanic pounded shut the next morning.

We finally returned to paved highway at Andkhoi, a dust-blown place near the border with Turkmenistan, where for centuries tribal weavers have produced some of Afghanistan's best carpets.

DOJ_NMG_0111438

Mohammed Ikram, a dealer representing more than 400 female weavers, was at the roadside, squatting in the dirt to measure a carpet in a floral design of red, blue and yellow. It would go to Pakistan, where a trader would pay about $210 a yard, attach a "Made in Pakistan" label and export it to the United States or Europe for hundreds of dollars in profit, Ikram said.

If Afghanistan could have peace and security, traders would follow the Ring Road straight to Andkhoi, he imagined. "And if tourists come here, then we will all be rich," Ikram said, smiling.

Paved highway awaited us on the other side of town, so we pressed on south to Mazar-i-Sharif, chattering about how good it would feel to have hot water and lights.

Come back later

MAZAR-I-SHARIF means Tomb of the Exalted. It is home to one of the holiest sites in Islam. Some Shiites believe it is the final burial place of Hazrat Ali, the prophet Muhammad's cousin and son-in-law, who was assassinated and first buried near Baghdad in the 7th century. Blood is still being spilled over the schism that followed, but not in Afghanistan.

Robbers are the biggest threat on the roads around Mazar. Andkhoi's carpet traders say they are regularly fleeced by gunmen demanding illegal road taxes.

After a night of comfort in Mazar, it was an easy drive to the Salang Tunnel, a 1.7-mile passage at 11,034 feet built by the Soviets through the Hindu Kush mountains on the route south to Kabul.

In winter, howling blizzards pummel the Salang's peaks. Avalanches, asphyxiation and plunges off cliffs have killed dozens of travelers.

As we headed up the pass, we recalled another trip a few weeks earlier when Gul skidded on black ice in the tunnel. The wheels hit the edge of a concrete walkway so hard that the front axle broke. He was elected to walk through a blizzard to a public works outpost a mile down the mountain. It was the middle of the night and deathly cold. A few workers huddled around a small wood stove.

"Is anyone hurt?" one asked when Gul asked for help.

"No."

"Are there any women?"

"No."

"Are you stuck in the middle of the road?"

"No."

"Then go back to your car and come back in the morning."

This time, we made it through the tunnel and most of the Salang Pass without problems. The sky was ice blue, the road mostly clear. It seemed too easy for the end to such a hard journey.

Just then, Gul put the car into a 360-degree spin. A snow bank kept us from going over the edge.

We sat silently for a few seconds, staring up at the meandering Ring Road to see whether that was the worst that would happen — or whether fate was about to catch up with us in the form of a sliding truck.

Our luck held. There wasn't anyone close enough to harm us.

The car, with every bolt, spring and cable caked in mud, creaked and shimmied its way down the Shomali plains, and in a few hours we were overlooking Kabul, sprawled out across a plateau and shrouded in brown smog. The capital hadn't had a suicide bombing for days. The only thing left to worry about was traffic.

Don't Grow The Army (WP)

By Gordon Adams, John Diamond

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Pete Schoomaker, The Post, the New York Times, and many Democrats and Republicans have converged over the past month in support of a serious expansion of the U.S. Army -- a permanent addition of 40,000 to 90,000 over the current ceiling of 507,000 troops.

This proposal is a bad idea. It is irrelevant to the stresses the Army is experiencing in Iraq. It would build enormous long-term costs into the defense budget, and it presumes a role in the world for the U.S. military that the voters emphatically opposed in November.

To be sure, the concept has a certain easy appeal, especially to Democrats. Calling for more forces and more defense spending puts forth a "strong-on-defense" posture as a buffer against the perpetual charge that Democrats are weak on national security.

And the call for more troops highlights the all-too-real damage done to the Army by the Bush administration's stubborn refusal to adjust course when it was clear the U.S. strategy in Iraq wasn't working. Expanding the Army, some would argue, would relieve the stress of repeated rotations to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0111439

Moreover, urging an expanded Army has the political advantage of reiterating a key criticism about the Iraq mission: that President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld belittled the prewar advice of Army Chief of Staff Eric Shinseki and didn't send enough troops to get the job done.

Finally, for some, enlarging the Army represents a vote for the troops over defense contractors, who convinced the administration that it could wage war without having to cancel Cold War-era weapons programs.

What the advocates fail to recognize is that enlarging the Army wouldn't solve the problems they claim it would solve, and it would create serious new problems. Plainly put, it is bad national security policy.

First, deciding to add to the Army today would do nothing to deal with the stress of Iraq. The hype about our Army is true: Our troops are the world's best. And it takes time to make them so. The lag time for recruitment, training and deployment means that new forces would be available far too late to ease the stresses now facing the Army in Iraq. Even on a fast track, it might be as long as five years before an additional combat-ready brigade would be ready to deploy there.

Second, from a budgetary perspective, the costs involved in any significant increase in the size of the Army are simply eye-popping. Recruiting, training, housing, paying, equipping and supporting two additional divisions would add nearly $80 billion to defense spending between now and 2015. Add to that the rapidly growing costs of providing health care and retirement pay -- perhaps $3 billion to $5 billion. Ultimately it is the size of the force that drives the entire defense budget. Adding to that size would increase budgets by tens of billions of dollars for years to come.

At a more fundamental level, proponents of enlarging the Army, particularly the Democrats, avoid the basic question of what the mission of this larger Army would be. Are the supporters of Army expansion, many of whom opposed the invasion of Iraq in the first place, now arguing that we need an Army to better carry out more Iraqs somewhere else in the world?

One of the few things all sides in the Iraq debate seem to agree on is that we want the Iraqis to take over security so we can bring our troops home as early as possible. Yet, supporters of expanding the Army appear to be creating an American force sized to better perform a global occupation and peacekeeping mission -- one deployed around the world to impose or restore order well into the future.

If this is about invading Iran, or carrying out a land war in China, as The Post has suggested, then maybe we need to have a national debate about that strategy, not slip it in sideways by expanding the Army without agreeing on the mission. The experience of Iraq has clearly dulled America's appetite for continuing in the role of designated global occupier and nation-builder.

Historically, our military's mission is to fight and win America's wars -- decisively, with overwhelming force -- not to invade and occupy distant territories to create empires or settle local conflicts that we can barely understand, let alone referee.

Iraq represents the latest sobering reminder of a lesson for Democrats and Republicans alike in the post-Cold War world: Even the world's only remaining superpower, with forces unmatched by any other military on the planet, is limited in what it can do with its troops.

Donald Rumsfeld used to say that only four of Iraq's 18 provinces were troubled, but he neglected to consider the implications of his own statement: That even 140,000 U.S. soldiers -- just about the largest force that the United States could sustain in Iraq over several years -- could not pacify part of one country. The world's lone superpower, spending more on defense than the next dozen nations combined, has all that it can handle -- indeed, more than it can handle -- trying to deal with unrest in part of a single country the size of California. At nearly half a trillion dollars and counting, our power, skill and money buy us a losing outcome in one small corner of the world.

The point is not to belittle the extreme difficulty of the mission facing our troops but to highlight it and come to grips with the limits even of formidable military power set amid hostile populations. Our enemies, well aware of the dominance of conventional American forces, cordially decline our invitation to fight on our terms, under the traditional rules of military force-on-force, with defined battlefields largely separated from populations.

Terrorism is not a political movement so much as a logical weapon of choice for political extremists facing a superpower. There will always be a military component to meeting this threat. But as administration spokesmen have testified, the primary role in this "long war" may well belong not to the military but to the State Department, foreign assistance agencies, and the Treasury and Justice departments, supported by the appropriate application of force (usually in small numbers and with Special Forces troops, not Army brigades). The Army does not need to grow to perform this mission; it needs to refocus.

The question the new Congress must deal with is one not of enlarging the Army but of redefining the armed forces' mission in today's world. Do we want an Army big enough to invade and occupy Iran or Syria? Or do we want a tailored, restructured force designed to play its role in the pursuit of terrorist organizations (along with other tools of statecraft) and with enough heft to play a part in peacekeeping operations, deter potential adversaries and decisively win intense but brief conventional conflicts? This strategic alternative is hardly an endorsement of the "Rumsfeld doctrine." The U.S. military as currently sized can still "go heavy" when needed. What it can't do is remain indefinitely bogged down in a static mission with inadequate body armor and no strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0111440

A program of troop reductions and phased redeployment from Iraq would in effect increase the size of the Army by relieving the force of a burdensome, costly and unproductive mission. There will be opportunities to retrain and reequip to redress the shortcomings in armor and tactics so neglected by the Rumsfeld Pentagon. These are the issues the new Congress and the White House must deal with, not an elusive search for an irrelevant and costly capability for a mission that the nation does not want to pursue.

Gordon Adams is a fellow and John Diamond a public policy scholar at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Sugar Land Program To Snag Internet Predators Recognized (HC)

By John Pape, Chronicle Correspondent

Houston Chronicle, December 31, 2006

Mayor provides initiative details in national forums

Sugar Land's Internet safety program is being hailed as a "best practice" by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, as well as being featured as a model during a recent U.S. Department of Justice summit in Washington, D.C.

Mayor David Wallace was invited to present his city's "Keep Kids E-Safe" initiative to more than 1,000 mayors from across the nation, as well as to justice department personnel looking for ways to combat the increasing problem of cyberpredators.

The program has received national attention as an innovative cross-sector collaboration involving all levels of government, nonprofit organizations and the business community, city officials said. Keep Kids E-Safe utilizes education, enforcement and prevention to help parents, families and communities protect children from online predators.

Wallace said that he first realized how serious the problem was after seeing an undercover investigation conducted by NBC's Dateline news magazine more than a year ago.

Wallace talked to members of the Mayor's Youth Advisory Council to see if they would be interested in taking on a possible project. The 125-member council is a city-sponsored teen group that provides government leaders insight into the development of programs and services impacting young people.

Through meetings with Sugar Land Police Chief Steve Griffith and representatives of the Texas Attorney General's Cyber Crimes Unit, the youth council formulated a plan for addressing Internet safety. The plan, Wallace said, consisted of three basic components.

Youths educated"The first step was to go into the seventh grades to help educate the students about the dangers of Internet predators. The information came from the youth advisory council members, so it was more of a peer-to-peer discussion than something coming from an adult," Wallace said.

The presentations were a partnership between the youth council, the Sugar Land Police Department, Fort Bend ISD, the Texas Attorney General's Office and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. More than 600 public and private middle school students attended the educational sessions.

The program also included a presentation by Wallace and a demonstration by the Cyber Crimes Unit that featured a 34-year-old detective posing online as a 13-year-old girl with blonde hair and blue eyes. Within 15 minutes of entering a chat room, the fictitious young girl was propositioned.

"That really got (the students') attention and led to a discussion of the fact that you don't know who you're communicating with," Wallace said.

After the presentations, students signed Internet safety pledges, which were then taken home to share with parents.

Sugar Land stingAfter the youth education phase of the program, Sugar Land Police worked with the Attorney General's Office to conduct a sting operation similar to that depicted in the Dateline program. Using numerous computer stations in what was dubbed the "Cyber Crime War Room," six agents from the Cyber Crimes Unit simultaneously held multiple chat room conversations with various individuals, Wallace said. Within minutes, agents posing online as young children were propositioned, engaged in conversations and received obscene photos.

"We had six detectives from the Attorney General's Office working with our police officers in the war room. When (the online investigators) gave a clue that they're 12 or 13, you literally see the predators start to swarm," Wallace said. "It was truly frightening."

DOJ_NMG_0111441

During the two-week sting operation, detectives arrested three predators who came to the fictitious 13-year-old's "home," and collected evidence that led to warrants being issued for the arrest of 24 others.

"It was an eye-opening experience. It literally was within only a matter of minutes that the detectives posing as a young girl were propositioned," Wallace said.

Parents informedThe final component of the program involved parental education. Seminars were held for parents, presenting information designed to help them talk with their children and teens about Internet safety.

"It was critical that parents understand how their children can be at risk even from their own homes, especially those parents who think such things can never happen in Sugar Land. By having the sting operation, it allowed me to look parents in the eye and tell them, 'it has happened in Sugar Land,' " Wallace explained.

The cost of the program to taxpayers was less than $2,000, Wallace added, making it affordable for almost any city to implement. The success of the effort led to it being featured as a "best practice" by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, as well as catching the attention of the U.S. Justice Department and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"The (U.S.) Attorney General has made child protection a cornerstone of his agenda, and that led to the meeting with folks from the justice department and child protective services. We had about 800 people attend the meeting in Washington, and we provided over 700 packets of information on our program to them," Wallace said.

Wallace praised the assistance of Comcast Cable for providing a $25,000 grant to pay for several thousand of the informational kits. The materials include handouts, a CD containing PowerPoint presentations for both children and adults, and public service announcements.

"Comcast was good enough to also prepare the public service announcements. All of the materials can easily be personalized by other cities by adding that city's logo and adding an introductory message from the local mayor," Wallace said. "Although we did the legwork here in Sugar Land, the material can be used anywhere. If it protects a child from becoming the victim of an Internet predator, it's well worth the effort we put into it."

Continued operationsCapt. Gary Cox, head of the Sugar Land Police Department's investigative division, said that his department will continue working sting operations with agents from the Attorney General's Office. He hopes that some day the department will be able to develop its own cybercrime operation.

"This will be an ongoing effort. The Attorney General's Office was very willing to come down and work with us and were happy to help train our officers," Cox said. "Eventually, we'd like to develop the resources and manpower to have our own unit dedicated to cybercrime."

While the state officers worked the two-week sting, Cox rotated his staff of 12 investigators to take part so they could all learn the operation. The officers watched the techniques used to identify predators, as well as learned what was needed to make a case.

"It's not exactly like you see on TV. On TV they can lead people on more than we do," Cox explained.

The predators are typically quick to commit a violation with little encouragement, Cox said. During its last session, the state Legislature passed a law making online solicitation of a minor a felony, he said.

"Just making a solicitation or sending an obscene photo is, in itself, a violation of the solicitation of a minor statute. We get all the chat logs and that makes for a very clean case against an offender," Cox explained.

He emphasized that anyone convicted under the online solicitation law must, in addition to any sentence imposed, register as a sex offender.

Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott said statistics released last August showed that one of every seven children will receive a sexual solicitation while online.

The Year In Death (WP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

THE YEAR 2006 saw the fewest executions in the United States in a decade, 53. The use of capital punishment has been dropping since 1999, when 98 people were executed. The number of new death sentences is also falling precipitously, according to data from the Death Penalty Information Center, and the number of people on death row is dropping off as well. At least for now, capital punishment remains in retreat.

Perhaps the most striking indicator of this retreat is the degree to which executions are becoming a local phenomenon. While the preponderance of states have a death penalty, very few use it as a routine feature of their criminal justice systems. This year, 14 states carried out executions, but only six of them -- Texas, Ohio, North Carolina, Florida, Oklahoma and Virginia -- carried out more than one. Together, these states accounted for 85 percent of executions this year. All by itself, Texas, which executed 24 people, accumulated 45 percent. Over the previous three years, the leading six states for executions accounted for between 70 and 83 percent of executions annually. The less the death penalty gets used, the more it becomes a creature of its heartland: the South, and Texas especially.

DOJ_NMG_0111442

Although 38 states and the federal government have the death penalty on their books, only 18 states have executed more than 10 people since the Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976. Many states with laws that permit capital punishment use it only rarely -- such as Maryland -- and some don't use it at all.

Now is a good time to push for repeal of death penalty laws in states outside the region truly committed to its use. Crime and murder rates, though increasing, remain low. Many Americans are rightly concerned by the rash of wrongful convictions, including those of death row inmates who have been exonerated. The death penalty's decline should be translated into policies that will prevent its easy re-emergence if circumstances change.

Pratfalls And Prophecies In 2006 (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

The controversies of the year past -- Iraq, immigration, domestic surveillance and the rest, plus the political battles that climaxed in the Democratic victories in November -- all contributed to an exceptionally heavy load of reader-generated corrections and objections. Thanks to e-mail, many more of you are now contributing to this annual year-end "goofs" column, where I review (and repent) some of the judgments and misjudgments of the past year.

To start with the simplest, in an August piece about Ohio politics, I wrote that Ted Strickland was trying to become the first member of Congress since Rutherford B. Hayes to be elected governor of Ohio. Several of you pointed out that I had ignored two subsequent figures who moved from Congress to that governorship, James M. Cox and Frank B. Willis.

An interview with Bill Gates produced a wave of protests. The Microsoft billionaire was in Washington to lobby for an expansion of the H-1B visa program, which provides entry for foreign-born scientists and engineers offered jobs in the United States. Gates said that the limit on their numbers was hurting America's competitive position.

The letter writers, many of whom identified themselves as unemployed or underemployed people with similar skills, claimed that the H-1B workers were taking their jobs and working at lower wages. I waded through a mass of testimony and evidence, supplied by both sides in the controversy, without being able to resolve the issue. It will probably come up again when the next Congress tackles immigration reform, and this time, I promise I'll look at both sides before I write about it.

I had a similar experience when I wrote about Sen. Joe Biden's proposal for decentralizing the government of Iraq, allowing more authority for separate Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. I commended the Biden proposal as a step forward from what was already, in May, a seriously stalemated and deteriorating situation in Iraq.

But after the column appeared, I received several communications from people with as much knowledge of Iraq as Biden possesses. They argued that such a step toward federalism had serious dangers. It would be difficult to apply in urban areas such as Baghdad, where ethnicities and sects are mixed, and it risked, the correspondents said, inviting other countries such as Iran and Turkey to spread their influence into a partitioned Iraq.

Those same objections have blocked adoption of the Biden plan, but meanwhile, Iraqis fleeing violence have increasingly separated themselves into Shiite or Sunni strongholds, leaving the situation even worse than if there had been an orderly and legal division of authority.

Another column that drew great protest was one in which I took my colleagues in the media to task for their treatment of Karl Rove in the Valerie Plame leak investigation. When the special prosecutor announced that he was not charging Rove with anything, I reviewed some of the many articles that had accused the White House aide of masterminding the "outing" of Plame and said that an apology was in order.

The e-mail and letter writers argued that the simple fact that Rove had escaped prosecution did not mean that he was innocent of using his position to harass and frustrate critics of the administration. He had, after all, confirmed Plame's identity to at least two reporters working on the story. Even if the original leak came from elsewhere, these letter writers said, Rove was no innocent.

But I still believe that there is an important cautionary tale for the media in the Rove-Plame story. Too many of us got way ahead of the facts and let our suspicions grow into assumptions and assertions for which we had no evidence. That tendency to get ahead of the story is rampant in the media just now, fed by the speedup of news delivery through the Internet and cable. Just look at the stories announcing -- in 2006 -- who are "serious" candidates for president in 2008.

Speaking of politics, I'm embarrassed to say that the one state I wrote about that I got wrong was Michigan, where I had spent enough time to have known better. I thought Gov. Jennifer Granholm was going to be sunk by unemployment in the auto industry, but she put on a great campaign and won.

DOJ_NMG_0111443

On the other hand, I saw both stages of the Connecticut race correctly -- Joe Lieberman losing the primary but winning as an independent in November. And the downfall of the Republican Congress and rise of an independent breed of Democrats was forecast here from early March onward.

But a column about Hillary Rodham Clinton, touching lightly on the state of her marriage, drew lots of catcalls -- a tip-off that this subject will be a tough one to handle if she enters the presidential race. Bring on 2007.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Groundbreaking Changes Due At Prisons (WILNJ)

By LEE WILLIAMS And ESTEBAN PARRA, The News Journal

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, December 31, 2006

Federal investigation requires Delaware to renovate prison health care

Delaware Correctional Center near Smyrna is among the Delaware prisons looking at major changes in inmate health care after an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice found the prison system guilty of civil rights violations. News Journal file

Inmate Anthony Pierce died of a brain tumor.

It's been more than a year since a coalition of concerned citizens, lawmakers and clergy marched on the governor's mansion and knelt in prayer asking for better health care for inmates in Delaware's prisons. They were galvanized by horrific conditions outlined in a series of stories in The News Journal, the first of which appeared in late September 2005 -- a series Correction Commissioner Stan Taylor charged was "sloppy reporting" in a five-page response the newspaper published.

What's happened since will bring groundbreaking changes to Delaware's prison system:

· On Friday, following a nine-month investigation, the U.S. Department of Justice announced that federal investigators found "substantial civil rights violations" inside four Delaware prisons. For example, the report noted, flesh-eating bacteria inside Gander Hill prison went undiagnosed and untreated, placing "inmates and staff at risk of acquiring the infection and passing it to others in the community."

· Taylor and Attorney General Carl Danberg signed an 87-point agreement with the federal government that calls for sweeping changes in Delaware's penal institutions. The state promised to correct the deficiencies and "meet generally accepted professional standards." However, the state did not admit to violating any inmate's civil rights or breaking any other federal law.

· The 55-year-old Taylor, who's served the past 11 years as commissioner, announced this month that he will retire on Feb. 1. On Saturday a prison spokeswoman announced that Paul Howard, Taylor's longtime bureau chief of prisons, is retiring the same day. Prison spokeswoman Gail Minor Stallings said Howard's departure had nothing to do with the federal report that orders the state to completely renovate its prison health care system.

· Trial lawyers say the damning federal findings will serve as a road map for inmate lawsuits against the state.

· Senate Minority Leader Charles Copeland, R-West Farms, said Saturday the federal government might have taken a "wait and see" approach, if the state had reacted once concerns about inmate care were first raised by the newspaper, and by the citizen coalition he co-founded.

"If there had been a positive response from the state, the feds might have not felt the need to be the hammer," said Copeland, who estimates that changes ordered by the Justice Department will cost $20 million to $30 million more than the state already spends annually on prisons.

· House Majority Leader Wayne Smith, R-Clair Manor, said he was disturbed about the agreement being signed in secret. "I am troubled that we (lawmakers) were not consulted about something this important. By signing this, the governor and the attorney general have obligated the state to spending money without the General Assembly's consent -- and I think we should have learned about this from them, rather than from a reporter."

Copeland wasn't alone in suggesting that had state officials acknowledged serious problems existed, rather than denying their existence, the pain and suffering among inmates and their families -- as well as the final cost of taxpayer dollars -- would not have been as high.

Sen. Karen Peterson, D-Stanton, an early backer of the federal probe who wrote a letter in support of the investigation to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, said it's not as though the state pleaded no-contest to the federal charges of poor inmate health care.

"It's worse than that," Peterson said. "They don't think they did anything wrong."

Peterson receives letters from inmates seeking help for their medical conditions nearly every day.

"I'm glad the federal government did a thorough investigation and has an action plan so the state is not violating the civil rights of the inmates," Peterson said. "We could have saved money if the state wasn't in a state of denial."

DOJ_NMG_0111444

Federal prison regulators identified a host of problems inside prisons, including inadequate screening and health assessments, inadequate treatment of inmates with infectious diseases, inadequate treatment of inmates with serious mental illness, and deficiencies in the state's suicide-prevention measures.

They found substantial civil rights violations at Baylor Women's Correctional Institution, Young Correctional Institution, the Delaware Correctional Center and the Sussex Correctional Institution.

Inmate died from brain tumor

Dover lawyer Steve Hampton, who represents several inmates and their families including the young daughter of Anthony Pierce, who became known as "the brother with two heads" as an inmate at Sussex Correctional Institution. Pierce, who was profiled in a series of articles by The News Journal, was serving a 14-month sentence from an attempted burglary.

He died from a brain tumor after his condition was mishandled by prison medical staff. The state settled a wrongful death lawsuit in a confidential agreement last year.

"If the Pierce case didn't shock them and let them know something was wrong, what does it take?" Hampton asked. "If Taylor is still saying there were no civil rights violations, what does it take? It's still wrong."

In January of 2001, a prison doctor employed by a private medical contractor said the marble-size lump was most likely a cyst or an ingrown hair. Seven months later, when the growth had become like a second head, a prison doctor stabbed the bulging tumor five times with an 18-gauge needle, withdrawing a bloody fluid that he emptied into a trash can.

Michelle Thomas, who worked for the prison's medical contractor, held the hand of Pierce while the doctor removed the fluid. She was aghast and quit shortly thereafter.

"That boy was growing another head," Thomas recalled in an interview with The News Journal. "It was the most grotesque thing I have ever seen in my life. ... All of us who worked there will forever carry his death on our conscience."

Federal investigators cited the case of Anthony Pierce "as the most extreme example" of care denied in Delaware prisons.

Inaction

The federal investigation was prompted by a series of News Journal articles, information investigators built upon:

· AIDS-related inmate deaths: Nearly one in four inmates who died in Delaware prisons since 2000 died of AIDS-related causes. Federal investigators found care was especially poor for inmates with chronic diseases such as AIDS, hepatitis C, diabetes, asthma and hypertension.

· Suicides: The suicide rate inside Delaware prisons during 2001-2002 was double the national average.

As he was being booked into Gander Hill prison in November 2004, Christopher Barkes told the mental health screener he had attempted suicide before, while in Gander Hill, and that he was taking medication for depression. Rather than placing Barkes on suicide watch, they placed him alone in a cell, unsupervised. Barkes hung himself hours later.

In findings sent to Gov. Ruth Ann Minner, federal prison regulators noted that the "state's practices regarding suicide prevention substantially depart from generally accepted professional standards and expose inmates to significant risk of harm."

· Lack of medication: Nearly every inmate interviewed by The News Journal complained that, if they managed to get drugs prescribed to them, they often didn't receive it. Federal investigators confirmed that at Gander Hill "inmates had not received their medication, or that the medication administration was undocumented."

Like Taylor, Minner initially attacked the series, stating through a spokesperson that "the Department of Correction would welcome an opportunity to provide a briefing on the inmate health care system and to correct the many factual errors in recent news articles about the level of care being provided to Delaware."

When the Justice Department first made inquiries into the state's prison system, Minner's legal counsel, Joseph C. Schoell, sent a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales calling The News Journal's series "misleading."

In a written statement released Oct. 4, 2005, Minner said, "Like any program, there are areas we would like to improve, and the Commissioner has repeatedly said that. But to say the system is in crisis is not only wrong, but irresponsible."

Nearly two months later, while careful not to admit mistakes or confront a mounting toll of inmate deaths, Minner said it was time to determine whether inmates in Delaware were being treated "outside the parameters of acceptable medical practice."

She announced that Division of Public Health Director Dr. Jaime Rivera would start quarterly surveys of random inmate medical files to identify cases or procedures that may be below standard.

What effect the reviews had, if any, is not known.

Problems with staff denied

Ken Fields, spokesman for Correctional Medical Services, the Department of Correction's current health care provider, denied there are problems with CMS staff.

"In fact, to my knowledge, the consultants who have been retained by the Department of Justice have not even been to all of the facilities referenced in the news release," Fields said. "So, we are perplexed as to how they reached conclusions about the quality of care. In fact, in some cases, we walked away from our discussions with those involved with a distinctly different impression of what they found."

DOJ_NMG_0111445

Fields said CMS has "strengthened the team of health care professionals meeting the needs of inmate patients ... added additional orientation and training for health care staff, and we have in place a new regional management team of highly qualified medical staff."

Sen. James T. Vaughn, D-Clayton, served as Department of Correction commissioner from 1976 to 1979, and chairs the Senate Adult and Juvenile Correction Committee.

When problems were first revealed, Vaughn blocked prison reform legislation from being heard in committee, even though every member of his committee wanted the legislation discussed.

Vaughn said he was inclined to wait until the federal government completed its investigation before debating state legislation that would overhaul medical services at the Department of Correction.

The reform bill he blocked, which had the support of minority and majority leaders in the Senate, would have required testing inmates for HIV/AIDS, hepatitis and tuberculosis, provided medical training to guards, and required Correctional Medical Services to deliver records of inmate deaths for review and made other records available to the state for audit.

"I think it would have been a good start," said Margaret Rose Henry, D-Wilmington East, who sponsored the blocked bill. "Prisons are too crowded, the inmates need screening when they come in and when they come out, or we're just perpetuating the problem in a larger society."

Vaughn did not respond to calls or e-mails Friday or Saturday.

Copeland compared the changes ordered in the settlement agreement to Henry's bill.

"That cost was estimated at $20 million to $30 million to implement," Copeland said. "Read through point-by-point what the Justice Department put together. Ultimately, it's the same."

Litigation

Although the state entered into the settlement agreement, it was careful to avoid admissions that could be used against it in litigation said Jeffrey K. Martin, a Wilmington attorney who has defended several inmates in federal court and complained about medical conditions in state prisons.

"For the administration to deny that there are no civil right violations is mere posturing," Martin said. "If the state wants to brush this under the rug, one only needs to glance at this report to see numerous civil rights violations."

Martin said the U.S. Department of Justice's investigation points to overwhelming deficiencies that the state must now address.

"It's as if the prison system has to start all over," he said, adding that he hopes the DOC actually follows through with its agreement. He noted Delaware's prison system has not always kept its word, after problems have been pointed out to them.

Martin, who represented a prison counselor taken hostage by an inmate and sexually assaulted July 2004, said that incident pointed to many security failures, including doors being propped open. Despite these findings, Martin said he continues to hear about unaddressed safety issues.

"I know that doors continue to be chucked," he said, adding that he wonders how the findings will fair. "My concern is with compliance."

Although the report itself more than likely cannot be used in a courtroom, Martin said it "gives potential litigants a road map."

Martin said the settlement agreement will be reviewed by inmates, as well as their family members, in search of deficiencies relevant to health care administered by the prison system.

Karen Barkes, the wife of 37-year-old Chris Barkes, who committed suicide while in prison on a charge of loitering, said she hopes the settlement between Delaware and the U.S. Justice Department will be a wake-up call to state officials who have hesitated in the past to make changes.

"They know when Chris died that there was a problem with intake and how many people have died since," Karen Barkes said. "That prison administration has not wanted to look at the problems." Reporter Patrick Jackson contributed to this article.

Contact investigative reporter Lee Williams at 324-2362 or lwilliams@delawareonline.com.

Contact Esteban Parra at 324-2299 or eparra@delawareonline.com.

Post a Comment View All Comments

Posted by: WBMJ!- Mon Jan 01, 2007 12:46 pm

As an ex-employee of Gander Hill Prison, I had personally reported medical infractions repeatedly to the current contracted medical provider Correctional Medical Services and their administration. The former on-site health administrator also attempted to bring serious infractions to both CMS and the Department of Corrections attention and was literally “thrown out” of the prison by the warden! Both DOC and CMS wish to turn deaf ears to any problem with appropriate medical treatment at Gander Hill because it saves both agencies money in the long run.

Yes, prisons are for human beings who are there allegedly for committing a crime and for their punishment. This punishment does not include the withholding or ignorance of their healthcare needs as provided for them under their Constitutional Rights. As per my source, it is my understanding Andre had "problems" recognized that CMS had a duty to act upon when he entered the prison system during his intake process and CMS should have ordered "screening" that may have stabilized the condition that led him to kill himself. Other employees who were ushered out the door by CMS and DOC brought similar issues forth in the past and were told repeatively "just do your job."

That's why I am not there anymore; my patients were already judged by a court and also by the God of their particular religious beliefs. It is not anyone's place to provide additional punishment by withholding medical treatment and causing additional anguish to the patient (and in Andre's case, his family)!

The Department of Justice just completed a report on their inspection of the Delaware prison system echoing the words, "appalling conditions." This report is available online at delawareonline.

This also came about the same time the NCCHC (a private agency which approves prison healthcare credentialing) approved Gander Hill in proper operation of its facility.

Rights Groups To Seek Action On Profiling, Elections (FREEP)

By Deborah Barfield Berry, Gannett News Service

Detroit Free Press, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With Democrats taking control of Congress on Monday, civil rights groups will be pressing for an aggressive agenda that includes a ban on racial profiling, an overhaul in some election practices and stepped up oversight of the Justice Department.

Because of last month's vote in Michigan, civil rights advocates also may urge Congress to take a stand on affirmative action, depending on the outcome of several cases before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Advocates are concerned about the potential national implications of Michigan's Proposal 2 initiative approved in November that bans racial preferences in state hiring and university admissions.

"We will be looking to see if there is any role for Congress to play," said John Britton, chief counsel for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

Advocates say civil rights issues are more likely to have a platform and encounter less resistance than in the Republican-controlled Congress, especially with members of the Congressional Black Caucus heading powerful committees, including Rep. John Conyers of Detroit on the Judiciary Committee.

But experts caution that civil rights issues must compete with other Democratic priorities, such as high college costs, minimum wage increases and accessible health care.

"Congress is going to have a lot on its plate. ... It's going to be a bit of a climb uphill" for some civil rights issues, said Hugh Price, a senior fellow with the Brookings Institution and former president of the National Urban League.

Among the issues civil rights groups want Congress to address:

· More workplace protections for lesbian, gay and transgendered people.

· Voting rights for the District of Columbia.

· The disparity in arrests and sentencing of minorities.

"There's a real appetite on the hill to address some of the problems that have been lingering," said Caroline Fredrickson, Washington director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "I think Democrats were reluctant to push hard on those things knowing they would lose."

One measure, backed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and other groups, would ban racial profiling by law enforcement officials and provide federal funding to retrain officers. The measure has failed for at least the past eight years under Republican rule.

Congress has been "in some cases hostile to the civil rights agenda and in some cases indifferent" Fredrickson said.

In what civil rights officials describe as one of the few victories last year, Congress renewed the Voting Rights Act.

But civil rights groups were disappointed last fall when the House approved a measure that would require voters to show photo identification when they go to the polls for federal elections in 2008 and to show ID that certifies their citizenship by 2010.

Republicans said it would help protect against voter fraud.

The Kennedy Factor On The Roberts Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

THE Supreme Court, having decided only four cases since the term began in October, has not exactly been living in the fast lane. But the pace is about to pick up.

The coming months will be a testing time for the young Roberts court, including decisions due by early summer on abortion, school integration and environmental policy, with an unusually large emphasis on cases of significance to the business community.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. has spoken often of the virtues of a court that speaks modestly and unanimously. Those goals may well prove elusive. The court's conservative bloc reached out to hear challenges to voluntary integration plans put in place by the public school systems of Louisville, Ky., and Seattle, which had been upheld by lower courts.

If the Dec. 4 arguments were any indication, a majority will overturn student assignment plans that seek to maintain racial balance in systems that struggled for years to achieve it. The outcome is likely to prove divisive both within the court and outside it.

The Nov. 8 arguments in two cases on the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 did not provide such a clear basis for prediction. Instead, they served to showcase Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's position at the center of a court that is closely divided in cases that Justice Antonin Scalia has described as battles in the culture war. Before she retired a year ago, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor held that pivotal position.

Justice Kennedy did not tip his hand during the abortion arguments. But enough other justices tipped theirs to make clear that the first federal statute ever to make an abortion procedure a crime will stand or fall depending on Justice Kennedy's opinion.

As the term proceeds, the court will also have its say in its first brush with the issue of global climate change. But in this instance — a statutory rather than constitutional case — the court's word will not be the last. Whatever the justices decide about the Bush administration's refusal to regulate carbon dioxide in automobile emissions, the new Congress may well have something to say.

A Retreat On Rationing Free Speech? (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

A three-judge federal court recently tugged a thread that may begin the unraveling of the fabric of murky laws and regulations that traduce the First Amendment by suppressing political speech. Divided 2 to 1, the court held -- unremarkably, you might think -- that issue advocacy ads can run during an election campaign, when they matter most. This decision will strike zealous (there is no other kind) advocates of ever-tighter regulation of political speech (campaign finance "reformers") as ominous. Why? Because it partially emancipates millions of Americans who incorporate thousands of groups to advocate their causes, groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Rifle Association.

And Wisconsin Right to Life. It is another organization by which people assemble (see the First Amendment) to speak (see it again) in order to seek redress of grievances (the amendment, one more time). In 2004 Wisconsin Right to Life was distressed because Wisconsin's senators, Russ Feingold and Herb Kohl, were helping to block confirmation votes on some of President Bush's judicial nominees. It wanted to run ads urging people to "contact Senators Feingold and Kohl and tell them to oppose the filibuster."

But Feingold was running for reelection, and the McCain-Feingold "reform" makes it a crime for entities such as Wisconsin Right to Life to use their corporate funds to broadcast an "electioneering communication" within 30 days of a primary or 60 days of a general election. An "electioneering communication" is one that "refers to" a candidate for federal office.

Although in 2003 the Supreme Court upheld McCain-Feingold, the court said later that it would consider appeals against the law "as applied." The majority on the three-judge court, preserving the distinction between electioneering and grass-roots lobbying, held that Wisconsin Right to Life's ads were exempt from the McCain-Feingold election-eve blackouts of speech because the ads were not "coordinated" with a candidate's campaign and did not engage in "express advocacy" -- did not use the words "vote for" or "vote against" a candidate.

The dissenting judge wanted to examine the "intent" of the ads by examining their "context," looking for clues as to whether the group hoped to not only advocate an issue but influence an election. Imagine: Judges scouring the political landscape, searching for evidence (people's past opinions or associations; e-mails and other communications) that would empower them to rule that grass-roots lobbying about an issue is "really" the functional equivalent of electioneering (express advocacy).

Such a process would necessarily be so protracted that no challenged ad could be authorized in time for an election. Besides, Bob Bauer, a Democratic campaign lawyer, rightly warns that the prospect of such inquiries should "make a sensible citizen's blood run cold." An uncircumscribed inquiry into "intent" would become "an intrusive process" in which an organization's internal communications would be subpoenaed and political operatives and consultants would be "put under oath and questioned about what they meant and intended and thought."

DOJ_NMG_0111448

The Wisconsin Right to Life case is probably heading for the Supreme Court. There, Justice Samuel Alito occupies the chair that Sandra Day O'Connor occupied when she voted with the majority in the 5 to 4 ruling that upheld McCain-Feingold.

Still, the reformers' zeal for regulating speech is undiminished. The Federal Election Commission recently fined some "527" groups (named for the tax code provision under which they organize) $630,000. Their offense? Issue advocacy in 2004 that, "taken as a whole," could "only be interpreted by a reasonable person as containing the advocacy of the election or defeat" of a federal candidate. Editorial writers at The Post and the New York Times, ever eager to regulate political advocacy not done by newspaper editorial writers, approved, although the Times thought the fines insufficient, and although The Post, calling the current law "murky," thought the FEC should have enforced the murkiness quicker.

The Times no longer bothers to pretend that its rationale for speech regulation is fear of corruption or the appearance thereof. Rather, the Times justifies suppressing 527s on aesthetic grounds -- they are run by "hard-edged activists" and their ads are too negative. Presumably, suppressing 527s will elevate political discourse -- and, presumably, it is the government's business to enforce the elevation. The Post also is tellingly silent about the reformers' original corruption rationale for rationing political speech by restricting the political money that finances it. Instead, The Post says 527s wield "significant" -- by implication, excessive (relative to The Post's?) -- influence.

Bauer wonders why, absent a compelling government interest in combating corruption, unregulated speech resulting in influence should be a federal offense. When, as surely it will, the Supreme Court considers that question, it can begin undoing the damage it did at the time it affirmed McCain-Feingold and licensed government to ration political speech.

ANTITRUST:

States Scramble To Scrutinize Airline Takeover (SLT)

Salt Lake Tribune, December 31, 2006

Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff isn't opposed to US Airways' hostile bid for Delta Air Lines - yet.

But that could change in the coming weeks. The top law enforcement officer in Utah, who waged an antitrust fight against Microsoft Corp. a few years back, has teamed up with attorneys general in a dozen other states to investigate the impact of a Delta buyout on airline competition and ticket prices.

"It looks like and smells like a classic redundant merger, which often is anti-competitive and sometimes does violate antitrust laws. If we conclude that it is, then we can possibly bring an action to stop it," Shurtleff said last week.

In most cases, states have authority to challenge corporate mergers. The airline industry, however, is the one area where states are powerless to approve or reject mergers out of hand. That power is the sole right of the U.S. Department of Justice, said Jim Dick, an attorney who worked in the antitrust division of the Justice Department and whose private practice involves antitrust work in the airline industry.

"The states don't have a role. What they can do, though, is have an investigation and present their findings to the Justice Department, which is very likely to give them serious consideration," said Dick, who works in Washington, D.C., for the Cleveland-based law firm of Squires Sanders and Dempsey.

The investigation, already two weeks old, is a race against time. Delta, which has spurned the offer, is plowing forward with its plan to exit bankruptcy as a free-standing airline before next summer. The No. 3 U.S. carrier has set a meeting Feb. 7 with a federal judge to show why the plan contains enough information for creditors to vote on it.

At the same time, US Airways continues to assert that its $8.4 billion offer provides more value to creditors than Delta's stand-alone plan. US Airways contends that the merger could be completed in the first half of 2007 and should be done while Delta is in bankruptcy. And spokesman Philip Gee says his Tempe, Ariz.-based airline believes its offer to buy Atlanta-based Delta will pass antitrust review.

"That is based on a thorough city-pair-by-city pair analysis, the type the Department of Justice will perform," Gee said.

Justice Department officials did not respond to telephone calls seeking comment.

If the buyout succeeds, there could be far-reaching repercussions in Utah. Delta's westermost hub at Salt Lake City International Airport is a crucial piece of the local economy. In 2004, Delta shut its hub in Dallas and moved most of those operations to Salt Lake.

Since it filed for bankruptcy in September 2005, Delta has added more than 30 new nonstop routes from the airport. Today, the hub supplies 6,000 direct and indirect jobs. It plays a big role in efforts to recruit new employers. And it brings thousands of visitors who might not come here otherwise.

DOJ_NMG_0111449

US Airways has pledged to preserve the hub, but skeptics - including Shurtleff, the leadership of the Utah House and Senate, several Salt Lake County Council members and Ed Bastian, Delta's chief financial officer - doubt that is possible. A US Airways hub in Phoenix is just 700 miles south of Salt Lake. The company also has major airline operations in Las Vegas.

If the Salt Lake hub were closed or scaled back, "what you would expect out of that is fewer flights, fewer nonstops, fewer seats and, therefore, higher prices and poorer service," Shurtleff said.

Which states have joined with Utah to examine the merger is unclear. Representatives of the National Association of Attorneys General, which is coordinating the communication between state investigators, were unavailable last week. Florida has confirmed it's taking part. Shurtleff said he believes New York and Pennsylvania are on board, and the attorney general of Georgia has been approached. In Utah, the lead investigator is James Palmer, one of Shurtleff's top antitrust lawyers.

Shurtleff agrees that the authority to approve or reject the US Airways-Delta merger rests with federal regulators and not the states. But states do have the power to shape or at least block the merger through lawsuits.

Under federal law, states can file antitrust lawsuits in order to protect consumers, he said.

"These [mergers] have to be approved by the Department of Justice, but we are not bound by that. We often take action independent of the federal government on these antitrust issues," Shurtleff said.

Perhaps the classic example of states standing up for consumers is the role they played in the government's legal battle against Microsoft Corp. In 1998, the Justice Department and a group of states sued the software titan, alleging it illegally used its monopoly in computer operating systems to stop competitors from bringing their operating systems to the market.

Utah took part. After a federal appeals court upheld a lower court, which found that Microsoft abused its monopoly power, Microsoft and the department reached a settlement. Utah and several other states refused to go along, saying the terms didn't go far enough. Their intransigence forced Microsoft to make more concessions.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

His Omnipresence May Show His Clout, But Now Bruno Is On The Defensive (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

ALBANY, Dec. 29 — To get a sense of the celebrity and clout wielded around here by State Senator Joseph L. Bruno, the silver-maned Republican majority leader, consider this: One night last summer, minor league baseball fans who visited the Joseph L. Bruno Stadium across the river were given Joseph L. Bruno bobblehead dolls.

Over at the Albany International Airport, a bronze bust of Senator Bruno greets arrivals from the airport's observation deck. In Troy, people can catch performances at the Joseph L. Bruno black box theater. And at the public television station, WMHT, producers scurry about in the new Joseph L. Bruno Broadcast Operations Center. The area is full of projects and buildings for which Mr. Bruno secured state aid.

And his clout inside the Capitol building is even greater. For 12 years Mr. Bruno has been one of the three men who have effectively controlled state government, and he is poised to become the most important Republican official in New York State now that Gov. George E. Pataki is leaving office.

Mr. Bruno's ascension has a silver-lining aspect to it; he was simply the last man standing after Republicans were routed at the polls on Election Day, leaving them without a statewide office for the first time in decades. The State Senate is now the party's last, and shrinking, power base.

But at what should be his crowning moment, Mr. Bruno finds himself on the defensive as never before. The F.B.I. is investigating his business ties, newspapers are exploring his financial relationships with people seeking help from the state, some Republicans are grumbling that he is tarnishing their troubled party, and for the first time, a member of his conference, Senator John J. Bonacic, a Hudson Valley Republican, is calling on Mr. Bruno to step down.

Mr. Bruno, who was the light-heavyweight boxing champion of his Army regiment in Korea, and at 77 still weighs in at 173 to 175 pounds, is making it clear that he has plenty of fight left in him. He said during an interview on Friday that he fully expected to be re-elected as temporary president of the Senate — the title that gives him vast power over the body — when the Senate convenes here on Wednesday.

"I have 33 votes in my conference, as I sit here, out of 34," he said.

And Mr. Bruno bristled at news reports that the federal government was investigating his decision to award a $500,000 member item grant — the type that goes to individual lawmakers' pet projects — to Evident Technologies, a company with a former director, Jared Abbruzzese, who had business dealings with Mr. Bruno. Mr. Bruno said that the state gave aid to Evident before he did, and that the money was intended to keep the company from moving out of state.

"It gets me a little bit excited, because they all want to moan and groan and point to Evident," he said in his office. "Evident is one of the most worthwhile projects to be funded that I have funded. Now the fact that a friend of mine, it turns out, that I had a financial relationship with — too damn bad. What am I, a second-class citizen? Is he a second-class citizen? We vetted that through the whole process, O.K.?"

"I'm getting crucified," he said. "And you know something? Tomorrow, if I had that situation to do over, I'd do exactly what I've done."

Mr. Bruno said he entered politics in large part to try to reverse the state government's hostility to business through taxes and regulations.

Although throughout his political career, Mr. Bruno has been dogged by questions of whether his public and private roles were in conflict — from the state contracts won by his telecommunications firm, Coradian, to how legislation he worked on could affect investors — he has never before been accused of wrongdoing.

"My attitude has been, you think I'm in a conflict, then you prove it, and if you're right I'll pay the consequences," he said in an interview in 1994, shortly after he ousted the former Senate majority leader, Ralph J. Marino, in a coup orchestrated in part by Governor Pataki and Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato.

"But I'm not going to ever back off because somebody alleges there's a conflict," he said, "because I have spent my life in business and government trying to prove that businesspeople can be effective in government."

Mr. Bruno grew up with seven siblings in a cold-water flat in Glens Falls, N.Y. His mother had a botched gallbladder operation at age 33, and seven operations later, too poor to afford proper care, died at 44. His father shoveled coal in a paper mill for 32 years, and, Mr. Bruno said, was too proud to accept welfare.

"My childhood was miserable, in plain English, except for the love of my mother and my father," he said. "My father always had a work ethic: you'd take nothing that didn't belong to you, take nothing that you didn't earn. Honesty was his byword."

Mr. Bruno took his first job when he was just 9, delivering pastries each morning to a nearby shirt factory. He was paid in day-old pastries, breakfast for his family.

He went on to put himself through college delivering ice, and afterward went into business selling frozen food in bulk to families as a way to persuade them to buy Amana freezers. He can still rattle off large parts of the pitch: "Frozen food is healthier for you than anything else, if it's flash frozen. You trap all the goodness in everything."

Then, after borrowing $5,000 with a partner, he started Coradian, the telephone company. In 1975 Mr. Bruno was elected to the State Senate, forgoing a race for Congress, he said, in large part so that he could stay active in business.

When Mr. Bruno became majority leader, he was widely regarded as a conservative choice. But over the years he has moved to the left, passing gay rights legislation that had long stalled in the Senate and overriding Governor Pataki's veto to increase the state's minimum wage to $7.15, which takes effect on Monday.

It is a measure of his political skills and his good personal relations that he has received support this month from some of the state's most liberal union leaders and from Conservative Party officials.

"I learned in my tenure that if you're not elected, you can't govern," he said, adding that he believed compromise was essential. "In this state, if you don't move to the center, and sometimes the left of center, you're not going to survive."

The Republicans lost a Senate seat in November, giving them a 34-to-28 majority, though they held power despite the Democratic onslaught in every other area. But Senator Michael A. L. Balboni, a Nassau County Republican, just announced that he is leaving to join the Spitzer administration, setting up the possibility that Republicans could lose another seat.

Mr. Bruno said he did not think other senators would leave. "I think my members, most of them, want checks and balances, a bipartisan, two-party system," he said.

Mr. Bruno continued as a top executive at Coradian until 1990, selling phone systems to state and local governments as well as to businesses. He said he believed his job as a state senator might have hurt his business more than it helped.

The company was sold in 1990 for $23 million, and Mr. Bruno started a consulting firm, Capital Business Consultants. The firm has been subpoenaed in the inquiry, as investigators try to discern whether his clients won assistance from the state.

"Everything I have done, we have done to the letter of the law," Mr. Bruno said. He added that he had disclosed all the information the state required, and that he did not think it would be fair to clients who expected confidentiality to disclose their names now.

"We are a part-time Senate, a part-time Legislature," he said. "Everybody here does something else, almost everybody, and I think that's right, that's the way it ought to be. Do you remember this from your civics class? We are a citizen Legislature. Citizens, farmers, lawyers, businesspeople, doctors, retirees, that's what we are."

Bumbling Against Terror (PPG)

By Jack Kelly, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 31, 2006

The FBI's record doesn't inspire confidence that we're being well protected

The House International Relations committee issued a report last week criticizing the FBI's investigation of the 1995 bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City.

Jack Kelly is national security writer for the Post-Gazette and The Blade of Toledo, Ohio (jkelly@post-gazette.com, 412-263-1476).

The FBI failed to pursue credible information that Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols had help, the committee said.

The FBI shouldn't have abandoned its search for John Doe No. 2, the committee said. Jayna Davis, then a reporter for a television station in Oklahoma City, said she found at least 20 witnesses who identified Hussain al-Hussaini, a former Iraqi soldier, as the man they saw with Timothy McVeigh.

And the FBI should have investigated more thoroughly contacts between Mr. McVeigh and Andreas Strassmeir, a German national who was a paramilitary instructor at Elohim City, a neo-Nazi compound near the Arkansas border, the committee said.

The FBI says its investigation was exhaustive, but the discovery just two years ago of a large cache of explosives in a house in which Mr. Nichols lived (and which the FBI had searched) casts some doubt on that claim.

Investigative reporter Peter Lance has just completed his third book describing FBI blunders (or worse) in the war on terror.

In his first, "A Thousand Years for Revenge," Mr. Lance showed how the 1993 World Trade Center bombing could have been prevented were it not for negligence by senior FBI officials in New York, and how the FBI had been informed in 1995 of al-Qaida's plans to use airplanes to attack American landmarks.

In his second, "Cover Up," Mr. Lance described how the FBI ignored intelligence about al-Qaida provided by a young mobster, Gregory Scarpa Jr., in order to protect a corrupt FBI agent. (Former Special Agent Lindley DeVecchio was indicted last March on four counts of murder chiefly because of the information Mr. Lance provided in this book.)

Mr. Lance's third book, "Triple Cross," focuses mainly on how Ali Mohamed, one of Osama bin Laden's closest aides, bamboozled the FBI into thinking he was helping the bureau even as he was plotting multiple acts of mass terror.

Mr. Lance, who has won five Emmys, is a better reporter than he is a writer. Reading one of his books is like panning for gold: You've got to sift through a lot of silt to get to the nuggets. For me, the most valuable nuggets in "Triple Cross" are the additional details Mr. Lance provides on the scoops in his earlier books.

On July 17, 1996, TWA 800 disintegrated over Long Island Sound. The FBI and the National Transportation Safety Board concluded the crash was caused by the accidental explosion of the center wing fuel tank. What the 270 witnesses who thought they saw a surface-to-air missile streaking toward the aircraft before the explosion actually saw was a "zoom climb" by the damaged aircraft after its nose had been blown off, the FBI and NTSB said.

Former airline pilot Ray Lahr considers this improbable: "Such a steep climb is much beyond the capabilities of the engines alone on a large transport aircraft," he said. Last month a federal judge in Los Angeles ordered the FBI and the NTSB to turn over to Mr. Lahr documents they'd been trying to keep from him. The case Mr. Lahr presented was sufficiently strong "to proceed based on his claim the government acted improperly," the judge said.

The most startling thing reported by Mr. Scarpa was that al-Qaida operative Ramzi Yousef, who was in a cell next to him in prison, claimed that he had arranged to have TWA 800 destroyed. Mr. Yousef was about to go on trial for plotting to blow up a dozen airliners in Asia and wanted a mistrial declared.

Minutes after TWA 800's destruction, Mr. Yousef made a brief telephone call in his native language of Baluch, according to Mr. Lance and Jack Cashill, who wrote a book about TWA 800. It was translated by the National Security Agency: "What had to be done has been done. TWA 800 (last two words unintelligible)."

If what Mr. Lance says is true -- if only a small fraction of what Mr. Lance says is true -- the best that can be said of the FBI is that it has been grossly negligent.

A story in the New York Sun Wednesday also does not inspire confidence in the bureau. According to an FBI court filing, the files in 22 of 94 investigations into leaks of classified information are missing.

"Knowing what I know, I can confidently say that until the investigative responsibilities for terrorism are removed from the FBI, I won't feel safe," said former FBI agent Robert Wright in June 2001. Reading Mr. Lance's book won't make him feel any safer.

Our Bumbling FBI (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), December 31, 2006

THE House International Relations committee issued a report last week criticizing the FBI's investigation of the 1995 bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City.

The FBI failed to pursue credible information that Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols had help, the committee said.

The FBI shouldn't have abandoned its search for John Doe No. 2, the committee said. Jayna Davis, then a reporter for a television station in Oklahoma City, said she found at least 20 witnesses who identified Hussain al-Hussaini, a former Iraqi soldier, as the man they saw with Timothy McVeigh.

And the FBI should have investigated more thoroughly contacts between McVeigh and Andreas Strassmeir, a German national who was a paramilitary instructor at Elohim City, a neo-Nazi compound near the Arkansas border, the committee said.

The FBI says its investigation was exhaustive, but the discovery just two years ago of a large cache of explosives in a house in which Nichols lived (and which the FBI had searched) casts some doubt on that claim.

Investigative reporter Peter Lance has just completed his third book describing FBI blunders (or worse) in the war on terror.

In his first, A Thousand Years for Revenge, Mr. Lance showed how the 1993 World Trade Center bombing could have been prevented were it not for negligence by senior FBI officials in New York, and how the FBI had been informed in 1995 of al-Qaeda's plans to use airplanes to attack American landmarks.

In his second, Cover Up, Mr. Lance described how the FBI ignored intelligence about al-Qaeda provided by a young mobster, Gregory Scarpa, Jr., in order to protect a corrupt FBI agent. (Former Special Agent Lindley DeVecchio was indicted last March on four counts of murder chiefly because of the information Mr. Lance provided in this book.)

Mr. Lance's third book, Triple Cross, focuses mainly on how Ali Mohamed, one of Osama bin Laden's closest aides, bamboozled the FBI into thinking he was helping the bureau even as he was plotting multiple acts of mass terror.

Mr. Lance, who has won five Emmys, is a better reporter than he is a writer. Reading one of his books is like panning for gold: You've got to sift through a lot of silt to get to the nuggets. For me, the most valuable nuggets in Triple Cross are the additional details Mr. Lance provides on the scoops in his earlier books.

On July 17, 1996, TWA 800 disintegrated over Long Island Sound. The FBI and the National Transportation Safety Board concluded the crash was caused by the accidental explosion of the center wing fuel tank. What the 270 witnesses who thought they saw a surface-to-air missile streaking toward the aircraft before the explosion actually saw was a "zoom climb" by the damaged aircraft after its nose had been blown off, the FBI and NTSB said.

Former airline pilot Ray Lahr considers this improbable: "Such a steep climb is much beyond the capabilities of the engines alone on a large transport aircraft," he said. Last month a federal judge in Los Angeles ordered the FBI and the NTSB to turn over to Mr. Lahr documents they'd been trying to keep from him. The case Mr. Lahr presented was sufficiently strong "to proceed based on his claim the government acted improperly," the judge said.

The most startling thing reported by Scarpa was that al-Qaeda operative Ramzi Yousef, who was in a cell next to him in prison, claimed that he had arranged to have TWA 800 destroyed. Yousef was about to go on trial for plotting to blow up a dozen airliners in Asia and wanted a mistrial declared.

Minutes after TWA 800's destruction, Yousef made a brief telephone call in his native language of Baluch, according to Mr. Lance and Jack Cashill, who wrote a book about TWA 800. It was translated by the National Security Agency: "What had to be done has been done. TWA 800 (last two words unintelligible)."

If what Mr. Lance says is true - if only a small fraction of what Mr. Lance says is true - the best that can be said of the FBI is that it has been grossly negligent.

A recent story in the New York Sun also does not inspire confidence in the bureau. According to an FBI court filing, the files in 22 of 94 investigations into leaks of classified information are missing.

"Knowing what I know, I can confidently say that until the investigative responsibilities for terrorism are removed from the FBI, I won't feel safe," said former FBI agent Robert Wright in June, 2001. Reading Mr. Lance's book won't make him feel any safer.

Jack Kelly is national security writer for The Blade and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette.

Contact him at: jkelly@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1476.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Ethics Panel Concludes Conyers Inquiry With A Warning But No Punishment (RC)

By Susan Davis

RollCall.com, December 30, 2006

The House ethics committee concluded its three-year inquiry into incoming Judiciary Chairman John Conyers on Friday, voting to take no punitive action against the Michigan Democrat but warning him not to use Congressional staff for any campaign or personal purposes in the future.

DOJ_NMG_0111453

The inquiry was self-initiated by the ethics panel following news reports in December 2003 that Conyers had on multiple occasions demanded his Congressional staff do both political work outside of their official duties as well as personal errands and favors for the lawmaker and his wife, such as babysitting and tutoring his children.

In a joint statement, ethics Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and ranking member Howard Berman (D-Calif.) said Conyers had agreed to the terms set out by the panel to ensure that his office complies with House rules pertaining to Congressional staff. The committee further stated that Conyers cooperated with the investigation, providing documents and other information at the panel's request.

"In the course of providing information to the committee, Representative Conyers acknowledged what he characterized as a 'lack of clarity' in his communications with staff members regarding their official duties and responsibilities, and accepted responsibility for his actions," the committee said in a statement, "Representative Conyers also provided the committee with documents indicating that he had begun taking steps to provide clearer guidance to staff regarding the requirement that campaign work and official work be separate."

Conyers agreed to six conditions laid out by the panel, and if he abides by them the matter will remain closed.

He must prohibit his personal staff, other than his chief of staff, from performing any campaign-related work even if done on a voluntary basis, unless the employees takes paid leave from their Congressional duties. He must also inform his staff in writing of the terms of their Congressional or campaign work as well as distribute a memo to his staff that clarifies all House rules relating to their duties. Conyers must maintain a "detailed time-keeping system" as to his Congressional staffers' duties and require all of his staff to attend a briefing by an ethics committee counsel on House rules that pertain to campaign and non-official work on behalf of a Member of Congress. And Conyers' personal Congressional staff must hold annual meetings to discuss and explain House rules, with all new employees required to learn the rules as part of their orientation.

Conyers Accepts Responsibility For Possible Ethics Violations (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan, Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, December 30, 2006

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) has "accepted responsibility" for possibly violating House rules by requiring his official staff to perform campaign-related work, according to a statement quietly released by the House ethics committee late Friday evening.

The top Republican and Democratic members on the ethics panel, Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), said in a statement that Conyers acknowledged a "lack of clarity" in communicating what was expected of his official staff and that he accepted responsibility for his actions.

"[Conyers] agreed to take a number of additional, significant steps to ensure that his office complies with all rules and standards regarding campaign and personal work by congressional staff," they stated. "We have concluded that this matter should be resolved through the issuance of this public statement."

The finding by the ethics panel could spark debate, and perhaps eclipse, the first week of the incoming-Democratic majority's plans to change the House ethics rules, as well as raise questions about Conyers' standing to chair the Judiciary Committee.

On Dec. 14, Conyers sent a letter to his supporters from his campaign website announcing that he had been elected as chairman-designate of the House Judiciary Committee. Berman is the second-ranking Democrat on the panel.

A spokesman for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said Conyers will remain chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

The House ethics committee conditions that Conyers has agreed to must be complied with throughout the 110th Congress.

Conyers had alarmed Democrats, poised to recapture the House after 12 years in the minority, by indicating that he would begin impeachment proceedings against President Bush.

In May, a spokesman for Pelosi, said that she told her Democratic colleagues in a closed meeting, "that impeachment is off the table; she is not interested in pursuing it."

As House Republicans and Democrats prepare for former President Gerald Ford's funeral and the transfer of power set to take place next week, aides to Pelosi were not available for comment.

The ethics inquiry began in December, 2003 when former staff members complained to the ethics panel, formerly named the House Committee on Standards and Official Conduct, that Conyers had required his official staffers to work on campaigns, babysit his children, and run personal errands. Conyers subsequently hired Stanley Brand, a well-respected defense lawyer with a long track record of defending public officials implicated in corruption cases.

In 2003, Reps. Joel Hefley (R-Colo.) and Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.) headed the ethics committee.

DOJ_NMG_0111454

The Hill reported last March that two former Conyers' aides alleged that he repeatedly violated House ethics rules by requiring aides to work on local and state campaigns, and babysit and chauffeur his children. Deanna Maher, a former deputy chief of staff in the Detroit office, and Sydney Rooks, a former legal counsel in his district office, shared numerous letters, memos, e-mails, handwritten notes and expense reports with The Hill.

They also sent the same materials to the House ethics panel, the FBI and the U.S. attorney's office. House rules allow the chairman and ranking member of the ethics panel to initiate informal inquiries into allegations of misconduct in the absence of a formal complaint.

Hastings and Berman said in their statement that Conyers provided information and documents to the panel. Committee staff also interviewed witnesses. They also said that Conyers agreed to take six steps to ensure that the matter remain closed. First, he agreed to prohibit his personal congressional staff, other than his chief of staff, from engaging in any voluntary campaign-related work in the 110th Congress unless that staff members takes a leave of absence and obtains prior approval from the wthics Committee.

He also must take several additional steps to make it abundantly clear to his government-paid aides that they need not work on campaigns to gain employment or stay employed in his office. In addition, he will have to maintain a detailed time-keeping system that he implemented during the course of the committee's inquiry.

"Provided that the above requirements are complied with, this matter will remain closed, and the Committee will take no further action on it," Hastings and Berman said.

The following is the text of the House ethics committee statement regarding Conyers:

December 29, 2006

Statement of Chairman Doc Hastings and Ranking Minority Member Howard L. Berman Regarding Representative John Conyers

The Chairman and Ranking Minority Member, pursuant to Committee Rule 18(a), initiated an informal inquiry in December 2003 into reports that members of the congressional staff of Representative John Conyers had performed campaign activity on official time and in some instances using official resources, and that some staff members may have been compelled to do campaign work or personal work for Representative Conyers. The assertions in the reports, if true, could implicate a number of laws and House rules applicable to Members, including: House Rule 23, clause 1 (requiring the conduct of a Member or employee to reflect creditably on the House of representatives); House Rule 23, clause 8 (requiring that congressional staff perform official duties commensurate with compensation); 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) and corresponding regulations of the Committee on House Administration (providing that official funds may be used only for the purposes appropriated); and 18 U.S.C § 606 (prohibiting adverse personnel action or intimidation to secure a "contribution of money or other valuable thing" including services, for a political purpose). Committee Rule 18(a) permits the Committee, in the absence of a filed complaint, to consider "any information in its possession indicating that a Member, officer, or employee may have committed a violation of the Code of Official Conduct or any law, rule, regulation, or other standard of conduct . . ." The Chairman and Ranking Minority Member may jointly gather additional information concerning such a potential violation unless and until an investigative subcommittee is established. During the course of their inquiry, the Chairman and Ranking Member asked for and received information, including documents, from several sources, including Representative Conyers. Committee staff also interviewed witnesses regarding the allegations. In the course of providing information to the Committee, Representative Conyers acknowledged what he characterized as a "lack of clarity" in his communications with staff members regarding their official duties and responsibilities, and accepted responsibility for his actions. Representative Conyers also provided the Committee with documents indicating that he had begun taking steps to provide clearer guidance to staff regarding the requirement that campaign work and official work be separate. After reviewing the information gathered during the inquiry, and in light of Representative Conyers' cooperation with the inquiry, we have concluded that this matter should be resolved through the issuance of this public statement and the agreement by Representative Conyers to take a number of additional, significant steps to ensure that his office complies with all rules and standards regarding campaign and personal work by congressional staff. Representative Conyers has agreed to the following conditions:

1. Prohibiting his personal congressional staff (other than his Chief of Staff) from performing any campaign-related work, including work done on a voluntary basis, during the 110th Congress, unless the staff member takes a paid position on his campaign while on leave without pay status and obtains prior written approval from the Committee.

2. Informing staff members in writing of the prohibition set forth above against the voluntary performance of campaign work.

3. Distributing a memorandum to each member of his personal congressional staff which clearly sets forth all House rules concerning (1) the performance of campaign and other non-official work by congressional staff members and (2) the prohibition against the performance of any campaign-related work being conducted in either his congressional or district offices. Additionally, this memorandum will explicitly state that the performance of campaign or other non-official work by staff members may not be required as a condition of their employment.

4. Directing that meetings of his personal congressional staff be held annually in which the House rules concerning staff participation in campaign activities are discussed and explained. In addition, a description of these rules will be made a part of the orientation for all new staff employees.

5. Continuing to maintain the detailed time-keeping system initiated by Rep. Conyers during the course of the Committee's inquiry.

6. Requiring that all members of his congressionalstaff attend a briefing conducted by Committee counsel on the application of, and compliance with, applicable House rules concerning the performance of campaign and other non-official work by congressional staff members.

Provided that the above requirements are complied with, this matter will remain closed, and the Committee will take no further action on it.

Job Evaluation: George W. Bush (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

IT'S THAT TIME of year, when the drones of corporate America gather their No. 2 pencils and call over to human resources for all the personnel files. The dirty little secret (or maybe it's not so secret) is that managers resent these yearly job performance evaluations as much as employees do. But why let the private sector have all the fun? An election is a kind of evaluation, of course, but what if our elected officials had to fit their year's accomplishments on the same kind of form with which millions of the rest of us are familiar? For President Bush, the results would not be encouraging.

*

Knowledge of job: Below expectations. Despite describing himself as "the decider," employee often abdicated important decisions to others, as in his insistence that he could do nothing about prison conditions at Guantanamo Bay without judicial branch input.

*

Job effectiveness: Below expectations, even his own, and not just in his controversial and poorly planned takeover of despotic foreign operation (also see previous evaluations). Confirmation of favored candidate for a top-level judicial branch appointment was a major achievement. But failed to rally support in legislative branch and among own partisans for positions on which he was in the right, such as his call for comprehensive immigration reform.

*

Critical thinking skills: Meets expectations, which were low. Instead of building bridges to opponents within the legislative branch on foreign policy, he demonized them with this election-year rant: "The Democrat [sic] approach comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses." Failed to dismiss key architect of war until after Republicans were routed in midterm elections.

*

Works well with others: Meets expectations. More successful at staking out common ground with headstrong allies of own party than at seeking out compromise with extra-party rivals who may actually be useful to policy goals. Needlessly provoked Democrats with renomination of partisan flame-thrower to major international body even after it was clear that nominee was unfit for the job. Unclear at the end of this performance period whether he will accept any advice from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

*

Financial management: Exceeds expectations. Federal budget deficit is smaller than expected, though employee's insistence that this is a result of his tax cuts is unpersuasive. Also, after the election, indicated that he was open to fresh talks with Democrats about Social Security.

*

Areas for improvement: New management in legislative branch will require considerable improvement in people skills, especially but not exclusively in identifying a "way forward" in Iraq. To borrow a phrase associated with one of employee's predecessors, present employee needs to adopt a "kinder, gentler" rhetorical style, one that acknowledges past mistakes and doesn't demonize those who think differently.

Ten Suggestions For Rescuing The Bush Legacy (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

Particularly after all the tributes to Gerald Ford in the last few days, President Bush may be pondering his own legacy and obituary. Sorry, Mr. Bush, but it doesn't look good right now, with your obit perhaps beginning something like this:

"George W. Bush, who achieved tremendous acclaim for his handling of the 9/11 terror attacks but left office vilified and disgraced, mired in the Iraq war and stalemated at home, his hard-line partisan tactics souring the electorate and crippling his beloved Republican Party for a generation, died. ..."

But Mr. Bush, your plight isn't hopeless. In the holiday spirit, let me offer you 10 suggestions for what you can do in 2007 to try to rescue your legacy.

First, seriously engage Iraq's nastier neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and renounce permanent military bases in Iraq. None of that will solve the mess in Iraq. But these steps will suggest that you are belatedly trying to listen and are willing to give diplomacy a chance. They may also help at the margins: renouncing bases is a simple move that has no downside and will make it harder for Iraqi militants to argue that Americans are just out to steal Iraqi oil and grab military bases.

Second, start an intensive effort to bring peace to the Middle East. Work with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia to flesh out his peace proposals. And vigorously back the Geneva Accord approach to an Israeli-Palestinian peace, since everybody knows that is what a final peace deal will look like. Frankly, it seems unlikely that peace is going to break out anytime soon in the Middle East, but there is a huge dividend for America's image if we at least try.

Third, confront the genocide in Darfur. President Bill Clinton has said that the biggest regret of his administration is not responding to the Rwandan genocide, and someday you — and your biographers — will rue your lame response to Darfur. For starters, how about inviting the leaders of Britain, France, China, Egypt and Saudi Arabia to travel with you to Darfur and Chad to see firsthand the women who have been mutilated and raped, the men whose eyes have been gouged out? Follow that up with a no-fly zone, an international force to prop up Chad and the Central African Republic, and a major push for an internal peace among Darfur tribes.

Fourth, encourage Dick Cheney to look pale in public. Then he can resign on health grounds, and you can appoint Condi Rice or Bob Gates to take his place. Mr. Cheney has been the single worst influence on your foreign policy, as well as the most polarizing figure in your administration. There's no better move you could make to signal a new beginning than to accept Mr. Cheney's resignation.

Fifth, revive the theme of compassionate conservatism by extending your excellent five-year AIDS program (while not being so squeamish about condoms in the future). And above all, work with Europe to promote incentives for business investment in Africa, modeled after the African Growth and Opportunity Act program. The best hope to raise Africa's standard of living is to nurture factories manufacturing clothing, shoes and toys for export.

Sixth, address climate change. Nobody expects you to be an Al Gore, but you sully America's image when you run away from any serious attempt to curb carbon emissions.

Seventh, put aside those thoughts of a military strike on Iranian nuclear sites, and make it clear to Israel that we oppose it conducting such an attack. A strike would set back Iran's nuclear programs by only five years or so, but it would consolidate hard-line rule there for at least 25 years.

Eighth, instead of giving up on Social Security, revive the reform proposals that President Clinton urged in 1999. That does mean bringing the budget back into black ink, which will mean phasing out some tax cuts for the wealthy.

Ninth, address our disgraceful inequities in health care. You could push for comprehensive coverage for children up to age 5 (as President Jimmy Carter tried to achieve a generation ago), and for almost zero cost you could mount a public health campaign to tackle obesity in children. Mike Huckabee, the Republican governor of Arkansas, has shown how state governments can fight diabetes and obesity, and you should take his approach nationwide.

Tenth, don't toss this newspaper to the floor and curse the press for your unpopularity. Instead, borrow from your playbook after you lost the New Hampshire primary in 2000 — grit your teeth, retool and steal ideas from your critics and rivals. It worked then, and it just might help in 2007.

A New Year For School Reform (NYT)

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

The No Child Left Behind Act broke new ground when it required the states to educate impoverished children up to the same standards as their affluent counterparts, in exchange for federal aid. The law did not just drop out of the sky. It represented a deliberate attempt by Congress to ratify and accelerate the school reform effort that swept the country in the early 1990's, when the states began to embrace standards-based accountability systems that quickly showed promising results.

The achievement gains have fallen far short of what Congress hoped for when it passed the landmark federal law — and also far short of what the country needs to keep pace with its economic rivals. In addition, student performance has flattened in recent years. In many cases, that is because states that reaped all of the early, easy gains that are typically achieved by merely paying attention to a long-neglected problem failed to do the tougher work necessary to sustain their reforms.

DOJ_NMG_0111457

Recent studies offer sobering news about the challenges that lie ahead. Happily, there is also encouraging news from the states that have stayed the course and continued to build rigorous, standards-based reforms.

The value of the standards movement itself was underscored this year in an analysis that was part of Education Week magazine's annual survey of student achievement. Analyzing student performance between 1992 and 2005, the study found clear signs of progress, especially in fourth-grade math performance, which had gone up nearly two grade levels since 1992. Black and Hispanic students, by the way, showed larger gains than their white counterparts over that same period. Had the scores of white students not risen at all, the progress by black and Hispanic students would have substantially erased the white-minority achievement gap.

The news was less heartening in reading performance, which inched up only about two points over the same time period. Even so, Education Week found that reading achievement for black, Hispanic and low-income fourth graders had risen at nearly three times the national average.

Low-income students still lag far behind their affluent counterparts. But the data in a subsequent study by the Fordham Foundation shows that states that commit to rigorous standards and accountability systems can make progress in this difficult area. The bad news is that only eight states even achieved what Fordham described as "moderate progress."

Those states are: Delaware, Florida, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Texas, Washington and California. In California especially, statewide reforms (and, in Los Angeles, dynamic leadership by the former superintendent, Roy Romer) are clearly having an effect. These gains are tentative and will certainly evaporate if the states lose momentum. But they show that performance for low-income students can be nudged upward if states hew to rigorous reforms.

That bad news is that too few states are actually doing that.

With the easy achievement gains already behind us, the next level of progress will require rigorous systemic change. The states, for example, will need to adopt rigorous examinations that track the federal test, the National Assessment of Educational Progress, more closely. They will have to crack down on state teachers colleges that turn out poor graduates, and devise ways — including differential pay — to persuade highly qualified teachers to work in failing schools that they have historically avoided. To move forward, the country must also find new ways to support and transform failing schools, beyond labeling them failures and presuming that the stigma will inspire better performance.

These are difficult issues. But they are the ones that Congress needs to focus on as it moves toward reauthorizing No Child Left Behind.

Playing The Angles (WP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

INCOMING HOUSE Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) pledged to run the "most open" Congress in history. Unfortunately, that promise doesn't seem to extend to letting the American people see what's really happening on the House floor. In a letter released the Friday before Christmas, Ms. Pelosi delivered a lump of coal to C-SPAN, which had asked to be freed from the restrictive rules that -- since House proceedings first were televised in 1979 -- have kept the cameras under control of the House and limited footage to tight shots of the podium or the lawmaker who's speaking. Senate rules are similarly constraining. As C-SPAN's president, Brian Lamb, explained in his letter to Ms. Pelosi asking that the cable network's cameras be permitted in the chamber, "This compromise was crafted long ago to convince wary members to allow congressional sessions to be televised, and in the ensuing years it has become an anachronism that does a disservice to the institution and to the public. . . . Rules and established practices prevent congressional cameras from taking individual reaction shots or from panning the chamber, leaving viewers with an incomplete picture of what's happening in the House of Representatives."

Through its years of televising floor proceedings, and its sober, unbiased coverage of congressional hearings and other events,

C-SPAN has demonstrated that it is both essential and responsible. There is no reason to prevent its cameras from operating freely in both the House and Senate. Ms. Pelosi, however, disagrees. "I believe that the dignity and decorum of the United States House of Representatives are best preserved by maintaining the current system of televised proceedings," she wrote to Mr. Lamb.

But why shouldn't those who want to see what's going on in the House -- it's the people's House, after all -- be able to have the same view as if they were in the chamber? What's to hide -- lawmakers orating to an empty House, or, to take one example, then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay buttonholing a balky member during the Medicare prescription drug vote in 2003?

C-SPAN may have better luck with another of its requests: to have immediate access to voting records. As Mr. Lamb explained in his letter, the House has had electronic voting for decades, but "official public release of individual votes is still delivered long after a vote has closed" -- often hours later. Ms. Pelosi said she had asked the House clerk to look into a change; it's hard to imagine that this can't be done.

DOJ_NMG_0111458

And Now, A Word From Chile... (NYT)

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

Everyone who followed the debate about privatizing Social Security back in 2005 has vivid memories of the Chilean model. Sometimes it seemed impossible to get through any discussion of fixing Social Security without hearing a free-market paean to the way Chile had given its workers control over their own retirement investments, followed by a demand that the United States get on the same boat.

Therefore, it seems worthwhile to note that the Chileans are now bailing water.

The Chilean government recently announced that in 2007 it plans to pursue far-reaching reforms aimed at creating a larger government role in Chileans' old-age security. The reforms are urgently needed. It has been nearly a generation since the regime of Gen. Augusto Pinochet began to supplant Chile's government-supported retirement system with a plan for Chilean workers to save 10 percent of their salaries in private accounts. Today, roughly half of Chile's labor force has either not participated or has not accumulated enough to generate what the government considers a minimum payout of about $140 a month.

The overarching problem for Chile — and the real lesson for the United States — is that private savings are not a substitute for a guaranteed core tier of old-age support. The first measure of success of a retirement system is not how much certain individuals manage to sock away, but whether the system as a whole provides basic dignity for all. By that measure, Chile's privatized system has failed and Social Security has succeeded.

Social Security does need some changes to protect it over the long term. The best solution would involve a combination of modest benefit cuts and modest tax increases, which could be phased in gradually over decades and could guarantee a government benefit that replaces about 30 percent of preretirement income on average, compared with a replacement rate of about 35 percent today.

Getting there would require sacrifices from both political parties. Republicans would have to give up on their privatization efforts. And the Democrats would have to control their knee-jerk tendency to preface any discussion of Social Security with a pledge never to cut anyone's future retirement benefits. President Bush will also have to go further if there is to be any chance of progress while he is still in office. Tax increases must be a part of any plausible Social Security reform mix. Unfortunately, the president appears unalterably opposed even to something as overdue as raising the cap on earnings that are subject to Social Security tax.

As long as tax increases are off the table, severe benefit cuts become unavoidable. If the gap in Social Security's finances were closed through benefit cuts only, the average worker's payout would equal only about 10 percent of preretirement earnings. Such bare-bones benefits would signal the end of Social Security, as surely as would privatization.

As the debate unfolds anew in 2007, another vital lesson to remember from the Chilean experience is that institutions, once dismantled, are not easily restored.

OTHER NEWS:

A Solemn Homecoming (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

To the strains of a Navy piper's farewell, the clank of sword scabbards and the bang of an artillery salute, Washington welcomed the body of former president Gerald R. Ford last evening.

The ceremonies began four days of services and tributes in the city he left three decades ago.

The journey of the president's body, from its arrival at Andrews Air Force Base about 5:15 p.m. to its installment in the Capitol Rotunda about two hours later, took place in the early evening darkness that was broken by floodlights, streetlights and simple holiday decorations.

It was attended by modest but somber crowds that lined the avenues of Alexandria, where the former president once lived. People also gathered in silence as his hearse, and the limousine bearing his wife, Betty, 88, paused beside the flickering fountains of the World War II Memorial. The cortege of about 40 vehicles then moved slowly along the broad and empty expanse of Constitution Avenue toward the gleaming dome of the Capitol, bright against the night sky. The casket bearing Ford's body was carried up the steps to the grand, columned east entrance of the House of Representatives.

The casket was placed on the same bier as the one used for Abraham Lincoln 141 years ago and Ronald Reagan 2 1/2 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0111459

In the ceremony that followed, Betty Ford looked composed as she sat between Vice President Cheney and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). The service closed with the former first lady bowing her head over her husband's casket, her clasped hands on the flag that covered it. It was Washington's second presidential state funeral in 31 months and different from the more elaborate leave taking accorded Reagan. But there was elegance to last night's proceedings, as the former chieftains of 30 years ago, several using canes, stood by with younger mourners who said they knew little more than that the former president had been an honorable and decent man.

"It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely through a crisis that could have turned to a catastrophe," said Cheney, among those who eulogized Ford at the service. "We do know this: America was spared the worst, and this was the doing of an American president. For all the grief that never came, for all the wounds that were never inflicted, the people of the United States will forever stand in debt to this faithful servant we mourn tonight."

U.S. Rep. Vernon J. Ehlers (R), who represents the Grand Rapids, Mich., district where Ford was a congressman decades ago, teared up as he said, "People are finally starting to realize what he did for this country and how special he was."

President Bush did not attend last night's ceremonies. He and first lady Laura Bush plan to pay respects tomorrow, when they return to Washington from Texas. Bush also plans to speak at Ford's funeral Tuesday at Washington National Cathedral.

Bush, in his weekly radio address yesterday, said: "Gerald Ford distinguished himself as a man of integrity and selfless dedication. He always put the needs of his country before his own, and did what he thought was right, even when those decisions were unpopular. Only years later would Americans come to fully appreciate the foresight and wisdom of this good man."

Ford served 25 years as a Republican congressman from Michigan before he became Richard Nixon's vice president in 1973, succeeding the disgraced Spiro T. Agnew. He became president in 1974 when Nixon resigned in the wake of the Watergate scandal. In one of his early acts as president, he issued a pardon absolving Nixon of any Watergate-related crimes.

He died Tuesday at age 93 at his home in California.

"In the nation's darkest hour, Gerald Ford lived his finest moment. . . . He knew the road to national healing began with the courage to forgive," said Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), the Senate's president pro tem, who also spoke at the state funeral.

Outside the Capitol, hundreds of people waited to pay their respects. Some waited five hours or longer before getting into the Rotunda late in the night.

They included Becky Reese, 47, and her husband, Ralph, 48, of West Chester, Ohio, who prolonged a stay in Washington to attend the viewing. They were with their sons, Benjamin, 12, and Evan, 9. They planned to drive home as soon as they left the Rotunda last night.

Becky Reese sat on the ground with her back against the metal grates. Her children were huddled against her: "We decided this would be a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity." She said her children saw the services for former president Ronald Reagan on television and said they wanted to be on hand when Ford was honored.

Her husband said that Ford was the first presidential candidate he ever voted for, and he fondly recalled the Ford years as calmer than the presidencies before and after it. "There was just no real big news," he said. "You didn't have Iran. You didn't have Watergate. It was quiet. No news was good news."

As midnight approached, the crowd diminished, but people continued to come.

The day began with private services at Ford's church in California. Then his body was carried aboard an official presidential jumbo jet for the cross-country flight to Andrews Air Force Base.

The plane arrived in darkness, and Ford's flag-covered casket was carried from the aircraft to a black hearse by eight uniformed service members.

Black artillery pieces fired a 21-gun salute, belching smoke that drifted like fog across the tarmac, as a military band played "Hail to the Chief" and "America (My Country 'Tis of Thee)", which had been requested by the family.

Standing by in the evening chill were several dozen honorary pallbearers, including former secretaries of state Henry A. Kissinger and James A. Baker III, former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld, former transportation secretary William T. Coleman Jr. and Cheney, who had once been Ford's chief of staff.

Once the music stopped, the quiet was broken only by a long roll of drums and the shouted orders of the military commanders.

Betty Ford, looking tiny on the arm of white-gloved Army Maj. Gen. Guy C. Swann 3d, watched as the casket was carried by and then took a seat in a limousine, where she could be seen wiping her face with a handkerchief.

The cortege left the air base at 5:53 p.m. and traveled via the Capital Beltway, which was briefly closed, to Alexandria, where the Fords lived when the former chief executive represented his Michigan district in the U.S. House.

DOJ_NMG_0111460

Along Washington Street, a crowd of several hundred assembled around the intersection with King Street, and those who went to pay respects were joined by a throng of shoppers. Word spread through the crowd that Ford had once lived in Alexandria.

Sylvia Lukens, a 37-year resident of Alexandria, waited in the cold for about an hour to see the president who had once lived a few blocks from where the motorcade was passing. "I liked that Ford still had affection for this town," Lukens said. "Even when he entered the high echelons of power he stayed here. That says a lot about the man."

As the motorcade drove through, the crowd burst into soft applause. "He had no pretenses, that was what was so refreshing about the man," Lukens said.

The procession then made its way north, crossing Memorial Bridge over the Potomac River and heading for the World War II Memorial.

At the Ford family's request, the cortege paused on floodlit 17th Street before the twin stone arms of the Mall's World War II Memorial plaza.

Ford served as a navigator and gunnery officer on the aircraft carrier USS Monterey at the height of the war in the Pacific, and one of the memorial's 24 metal relief panels depicts a frenetic moment on the deck of a carrier, with a plane about to take off amid hurrying pilots and crew.

As the hearse stopped, Navy Chief Boatswain's Mate Carlos Ribbot, 41, stepped forward, saluted with his right hand and with his left raised a stainless steel boatswain's pipe hanging from an ornately braided rope lanyard around his neck.

Ribbot, a native of Humacao, Puerto Rico, played the three long, solemn notes that constitute "piping the side," the Navy's traditional farewell.

As Ribbot piped, a group of 12 Eagle Scouts from local Boy Scout troops gave their three-fingered salute as they stood at attention in olive green pants and tan shirts, draped in merit badge sashes. Ford is the only president to have been an Eagle Scout, said Alan F. Lambert, scout executive of the National Capital Area Council.

One of the Scouts was Jeb James, 17, of Arlington County, a member of Troop 664 in Baileys Crossroads. "It's a pretty big honor," James said. "He's the only Eagle Scout to become president. . . . Didn't he fight in World War II, and he saved his boat? He played for Michigan, and was the MVP center for his team."

The cortege moved along Constitution Avenue and just before 7 p.m. wheeled slowly around a corner into the Capitol plaza, which was illuminated by floodlights.

American flags on the front fenders of the hearse barely fluttered in the evening stillness, as the hearse pulled up in front of the broad stone steps leading up to the House chamber. In two lines, flanking the path of the coffin, stood dignitaries and celebrated figures from Ford's past.

After cannon volleyed again in salute, Ford's casket was carried slowly up the steps to the House portico. At 7:43 p.m., with the coffin on the Lincoln bier, in the Rotunda, beneath the dome, the service began.

Ford joins a list of presidents who have lain in state beneath the Rotunda. It includes Reagan, Dwight D. Eisenhower, William H. Taft, Warren G. Harding, William McKinley Jr., James A. Garfield and Herbert Hoover.

Last night, after leaving the Rotunda, Joris Nieuwint, 28, from the Netherlands described the scene as impressive.

"It was very stately -- a huge room with a very big casket with a U.S. flag around it," he said. His wife, Dorien, 26, said people in line had been complaining about the cold while waiting. "Once you got in the room," she said, "everything was forgotten. Everyone was silent and respectful."

Ford's Final Visit To Capitol (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

The nation paid tribute yesterday to Gerald R. Ford's legacy of service -- in the military, in Congress and as the president who helped to heal the country after the Vietnam War and Watergate.

"Tonight we say goodbye to a true gentleman, an exceptional leader and our good friend," Sen. Ted Stevens, Alaska Republican, said in the Capitol Rotunda, where the former president's body rested in a flag-draped casket. "In our nation's darkest hour, Gerald Ford lived his finest moment. He was the man the hour required."

It was noted repeatedly that Mr. Ford never aspired to be president, but served honorably after the Watergate scandal forced Richard M. Nixon to resign.

"President Ford proved as worthy of that office as any who had ever come before," said Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff. "He assumed power without assuming airs; he knew how to treat people. He answered courtesy with courtesy; he answered discourtesy with courtesy."

DOJ_NMG_0111461

Mr. Cheney also addressed the 38th president's decision to pardon Mr. Nixon, which was so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election.

"It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely though a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe," he said. "Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon."

Mr. Ford died Tuesday at age 93.

Yesterday evening, an aircraft from the White House fleet brought Mr. Ford's body to Andrews Air Force Base from services near his adopted California home.

In Washington, hundreds waited along the route the former president's motorcade took on its way to the Capitol -- through Alexandria, where he once lived; to the National World War II Memorial, in honor of his service in the Navy; and past the White House.

Lights covered the arch at the World War II Memorial dedicated to the Pacific Theater, where Mr. Ford served aboard the USS. Monterrey. As the funeral motorcade paused at the memorial, a bos'n mate stepped forward to play "Piping Ashore," a piercing whistle heard for centuries to welcome officers aboard a ship and now to honor naval service. Mr. Ford's wife, Betty, was seen waving to the crowd from her vehicle.

The pageantry was muted, as Mr. Ford wanted, but the ritual unfolded according to traditions dating back to the mid-1800s.

A motorcade was arranged instead of the horse-drawn caisson familiar to Americans from the funerals of Presidents Ronald Reagan in 2004 and John Kennedy in 1963.

The military flyover that is also traditionally part of a state funeral in Washington will happen instead in Grand Rapids, Mich., where Mr. Ford's body will be entombed Wednesday on a hillside near his presidential museum.

In another departure from tradition, pallbearers placed Mr. Ford's casket outside the House chamber before it was taken to the Rotunda, where his body will lie until Tuesday morning. That honored Mr. Ford's 25 years of service in the House as a congressman from Michigan and minority leader. On Tuesday, Mr. Ford's body will rest briefly outside the Senate chamber, commemorating his service as vice president, which also made him Senate president.

During the Rotunda ceremony, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said the country "needed" the man whose ambitions were said to go no further than the post the Illinois Republican currently holds.

"In 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince," Mr. Hastert said. "We needed a healer, we needed a rock, we needed honesty and candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

The ceremony was interrupted when William Broomfield, 84, a former Michigan congressman who served with Mr. Ford in Congress, collapsed. He was attended by outgoing Sen. Bill Frist, a physician, before being taken out in a wheelchair. Mr. Frist, Tennessee Republican, later indicated that Mr. Broomfield was OK.

After the ceremony, Mrs. Ford walked to the casket with the aid of her son and rested her clasped hands briefly on top of it.

As the crowd followed her out of the Rotunda, the Rev. Barry C. Black, chaplain of the Senate, made one final reference to Mr. Ford's role in healing the nation.

"Accept our gratitude for his courage to decide based upon principles, for his pragmatic leadership during cynical times and for his long life of exemplary service," Mr. Black said.

Earlier yesterday, in Palm Desert, Calif., a 13-hour period of public viewing ended just as the sun rose over the resort community where Mr. Ford and his wife settled nearly 30 years ago. People waited up to three hours to pay their respects at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church.

Barbara Veith, 69, said Mr. Ford's "everyman" persona drew her to the viewing.

"There is something personal about his passing even though we didn't really know him," Miss Veith told the Associated Press. "He just kind of had an everyman quality to him though he was far from it. He was the president."

President Bush, who plans to attend the funeral service on Tuesday, praised Mr. Ford during his weekly radio address.

"In his 2½ years as President, Gerald Ford distinguished himself as a man of integrity and selfless dedication. He always put the needs of his country before his own, and did what he thought was right, even when those decisions were unpopular," Mr. Bush said. "Only years later would Americans come to fully appreciate the foresight and wisdom of this good man."

Cheney Hails Ford's Pardon Of Nixon (AP)

By Calvin Woodward, Jeff Wilson

AP, December 30, 2006

With the thunder of cannon and the whistle of a bos'n pipe, the nation's capital honored Gerald R. Ford's memory Saturday in funeral ceremonies recalling the touchstones of his life, from combat in the Pacific to a career he cherished in Congress to a presidency he did not seek.

DOJ_NMG_0111462

Old colleagues, today's leaders and ordinary Americans remembered him as a man called to heal the country from the wounds of Watergate, the scandal that shattered Richard Nixon's presidency in 1974 and brought the even-keeled Ford to the Oval Office.

Ford's decision to pardon Nixon, so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election, was dealt with squarely in his funeral services by his old chief of staff, Vice President Dick Cheney.

"It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely though a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe," said Cheney, speaking in the Capitol Rotunda where Ford's body rested in a flag-draped casket. "Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon."

Ford, In Final Journey, Returns To Washington (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30 — After a slow journey past the touchstones of his political life, Gerald R. Ford was brought to a place of honor Saturday under the Capitol dome, where a crowd of dignitaries gathered to commemorate the man whose presidency encompassed one of the most tumultuous periods of American history.

Many of Mr. Ford's most prominent protégés came to mourn him, remembering the era of political unity, however brief, he oversaw after the Watergate scandal. Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff and was an honorary pallbearer, said, "Few have ever risen so high with so little guile or calculation."

Representative J. Dennis Hastert, the departing House speaker, recalled that "in the summer of 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince, an aloof aristocrat or a populist firebrand."

"We needed a healer; we needed a rock," Mr. Hastert said. "We needed honesty, candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

Betty Ford, 88, the former first lady, stood silently during prayers for her husband of 58 years, her eyes downcast. Mrs. Ford appeared frail but poised, and at the ceremony's end moved forward and bowed her head, her hands lightly touching her husband's coffin.

President Bush did not cut short his vacation in Crawford for the weekend ceremony. He and his wife, Laura, are scheduled to return Monday to pay their respects as Mr. Ford lies in state in the Capitol, before the formal state funeral at the National Cathedral on Tuesday. In his weekly radio address, which was dedicated to the 38th president, Mr. Bush described him as "a great man who devoted the best years of his long life to public service."

"He always put the needs of his country before his own and did what he thought was right, even when those decisions were unpopular," Mr. Bush said. "Only years later would Americans come to fully appreciate the foresight and wisdom of this good man."

Also missing from Saturday's service was Donald H. Rumsfeld, the recently retired secretary of defense, who had served in that same capacity under Mr. Ford. Although he had been scheduled to be a pallbearer, Mr. Rumsfeld was kept away by a snow storm. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, traveling on an official trip to South America, also did not attend.

The ceremony was briefly interrupted when, after the opening prayers, a retired Michigan congressman collapsed. The congressman, William Broomfield, 84, was treated by medical attendants and by Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the departing majority leader, who is also a physician.

Understated to the end, Mr. Ford had requested a simple motorcade, rather than an elaborate horse-drawn caisson, to carry his remains to the Capitol. He had asked to return one last time, for a relatively simple service, to Congress — "my real home," as he called it when he spotted it below during his flight out of Washington in 1977.

But on a cloudless Saturday night, as military personnel carried his coffin up the Capitol steps, Mr. Ford was given the full pomp of a presidential funeral, only the third such service in three decades. After lying in state for three days, Mr. Ford's remains will be flown to Grand Rapids, Mich., for his burial next week.

Mr. Cheney praised his former boss for his "capacity to forgive" and for being "always a striver — never working an angle, just working." He noted that Mr. Ford had been treated more kindly in hindsight than when he was in office, after he pardoned former President Richard M. Nixon.

"In politics, it can take a generation or more for a matter to settle, for tempers to cool," Mr. Cheney said. "The distance of time has clarified many things about Gerald Ford. And now death has done its part to reveal this man and the president for what he was."

DOJ_NMG_0111463

Democrats and Republicans, many of whom worked alongside Mr. Ford in his decades in Congress, returned to honor a president who served the nation in a time of turmoil. So, too, did several members of the Supreme Court, including Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state and, most recently, a co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, which issued recommendations for a new policy in Iraq, served as an honorary pallbearer. Senators Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska; Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan; and Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, stood in the forefront of the gathering in the Capitol.

The 747 carrying Mr. Ford's coffin from a private service in Palm Desert, Calif., landed just after sunset at Andrews Air Force Base outside Washington. Members of the Ford family filed solemnly down the steps to the tarmac, where they were met by a special honor guard.

Military personnel escorted Mrs. Ford to the waiting crowd of dignitaries. The group watched silently as uniformed soldiers lowered the coffin from the plane.

A 21-gun salute was fired under the klieg lights, and a military band played "My Country 'Tis of Thee." In the crowd were other honorary pallbearers, including Alan Greenspan, the former chairman of the Federal Reserve; Henry A. Kissinger, the former secretary of state; Bob Dole, the former Senate majority leader; and Brent Scowcroft, the former national security adviser.

An image of Mrs. Ford captured her solitary grief: seated alone in the back seat of a limousine, she wiped away a tear, then turned to gaze out the window into the darkness.

The motorcade then pulled away, carrying Mrs. Ford and her family on an emotional tour of the life she and her husband shared in Washington a quarter-century ago.

On an unseasonably warm winter night, people lined the streets of Alexandria, the Virginia suburb where the Fords lived during his 25 years in Congress, to wave to the motorcade. At the World War II Memorial on the National Mall, the procession paused in front of large clusters of veterans and Eagle Scouts — two groups to which Mr. Ford had belonged — as they stood in mourning.

From one end of the Mall to the other, historic monuments were flooded in light, providing a dramatic backdrop for the motorcade's winding journey toward the Capitol. A circle of flags around the Washington Monument flew at half-staff.

Kathy Kocharhook, 52, of Cupertino, Calif., said she and her 25-year-old son had extended their Christmas vacation in Washington to attend the memorial services. Ms. Kocharhook called Mr. Ford a "very decent man who gave a lot of service to the country" and recalled his healing effect on the country after the Watergate scandal and the resignation of Nixon.

"It was almost a sigh of relief that we could begin anew — a second life," she said. "We needed someone with honesty and decency and a sense of honor for the office they were holding, and Gerald Ford was a good man for that."

Nation Honors Ford At Capitol Rotunda (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The nation honored Gerald R. Ford in funeral ceremonies Saturday that recalled the touchstones of his life, from combat in the Pacific to a career he cherished in Congress to a presidency he did not seek. He was remembered as the man called to heal the country from the trauma of Watergate.

Ford's decision to pardon Richard Nixon, so divisive at the time that it probably cost him the 1976 election, was dealt with squarely in his funeral services by his old chief of staff, Vice President Dick Cheney.

"It was this man, Gerald R. Ford, who led our republic safely though a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe," said Cheney, speaking in the Capitol Rotunda, where Ford's body rested. "Gerald Ford was almost alone in understanding that there can be no healing without pardon."

Hundreds of ordinary Americans lined up for a chance to view the closed, flag-draped casket of the 38th president late into the night and through the weekend. From teenagers in sweatshirts to mothers pushing infants in strollers, they flowed into the night in two steady streams along velvet ropes encircling the casket, pausing only for the periodic changing of the military guard standing watch.

The Washington portion of Ford's state funeral opened with a procession that took his casket from Maryland to Virginia and then over the Memorial Bridge -- dressed in flags and funeral bunting -- to the World War II memorial, past the White House without pausing and on to the U.S. Capitol for the first service and a lying in state that continues until Tuesday morning.Watergate a common theme

Although Ford's family planned the state funeral to emphasize Ford's long service in the House, Watergate quickly set the tone of the proceedings.

"In our nation's darkest hour, Gerald Ford lived his finest moment," Republican Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska told the Rotunda service. "He was the man the hour required."

DOJ_NMG_0111464

Said House Speaker Dennis Hastert: "In 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince. We needed a healer, we needed a rock, we needed honesty and candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

The Rotunda ceremony was interrupted when William Broomfield, 84, a former Michigan congressman who served with Ford in Congress, collapsed. He was laid out on the floor of the Rotunda, and attended to by Sen. Bill Frist, a physician, before being taken out on a wheelchair. Frist later indicated Broomfield was OK.

Lights bathed the granite arch of the memorial commemorating the Pacific theater as Ford's nighttime funeral procession, bearing his wife, Betty, and the casket of the 38th president, stopped there in tribute to his years as an ensign and gunnery officer. The other arch, representing the Atlantic theater, stood in darkness.

Mrs. Ford sat stoically in the line of gleaming limousines, clutching a tissue and dabbing her face on occasion, then walked slowly at the Capitol on the arm of her military escort, soon followed by the casket bearing her husband of 58 years. Another round of cannon fire rang out.

After the ceremony, Mrs. Ford walked to the casket with the aid of her son and rested her clasped hands briefly on top of it.

The pageantry was muted, as Ford wanted, but the ritual unfolded with regal touches and according to exacting traditions dating back to the mid-1800s.

In one departure from tradition, pallbearers placed his casket outside the House chamber before it was taken to the Rotunda to lie in state. That honored Ford's years of service in the House as a congressman from Michigan and minority leader.

Similarly, Ford's body will rest briefly outside the Senate chamber on Tuesday, commemorating his service as vice president, which also made him Senate president.Procession tours Washington

On the way to Capitol Hill, World War II veterans and Boy Scouts gathered by the memorial and saluted at the brief, poignant stop. Mrs. Ford waved through the window. A bos'n mate stepped forward to render "Piping Ashore," a piercing whistle heard for centuries to welcome officers aboard a ship and now to honor naval service.

The event, without words, recalled Ford's combat service aboard the aircraft carrier USS Monterey. In December 1944, when a typhoon struck the Third Fleet, Ford led the crew that battled a fire sparked by planes shaken loose in the storm, taking actions that some credited with saving the ship and many lives. He sought no award, and received none.

The Capitol commemorated a man whose highest ambition, never realized in an era of Democratic control of Congress, was to become House speaker.

History intervened; he became vice president when Spiro Agnew resigned in scandal, then president when Nixon left office in disgrace. "A funny thing happened to me on the way to becoming speaker," he once cracked.

In Palm Desert, California, a 13-hour period of public viewing ended just as the sun rose over the resort community where Ford and his wife settled nearly 30 years ago. People waited up to three hours to pay their respects at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church before an aircraft from the White House fleet flew Ford's remains and the funeral party to Washington.

The funeral procession to the Capitol lacked the full trappings, by the design of Ford and his family. A motorcade was arranged instead of the horse-drawn caisson most familiar to Americans from the funerals of Ronald Reagan in 2004 and John Kennedy in 1963.

Ford, a man of modest character whose short presidency lacked the historic drama of Kennedy's and Reagan's, also was mourned without the riderless horse customarily included in the procession.

The thundering military flyover that is also part of a full-throttle state funeral in Washington will happen instead in Grand Rapids, Michigan, where Ford will be entombed Wednesday on a hillside near his presidential museum. Ford represented the city in the House for 25 years.

Ford died Tuesday at age 93. He became president when Nixon resigned in August 1974 and then was defeated by Jimmy Carter in the 1976 election.Hundreds pay tribute in California

Six days of national mourning began Friday with military honors and a simple family prayer service at St. Margaret's, where the Ford family has worshipped for many years. Mourners ranging from children to the elderly had walked through quickly and then reboarded their buses -- a process taking less than two minutes.

Barbara Veith, 69, said Ford's "everyman" persona drew her to the viewing.

"There is something personal about his passing even though we didn't really know him," Veith said. "He just kind of had an everyman quality to him though he was far from it -- he was the president."

During his weekly radio address on Saturday, President Bush called Ford a "courageous leader, a true gentleman and a loving father and husband."

"He always put the needs of his country before his own, and did what he thought was right, even when those decisions were unpopular," Bush said. "Only years later would Americans come to fully appreciate the foresight and wisdom of this good man."

DOJ_NMG_0111465

When they return to Washington from their Texas vacation on Monday, Bush and first lady Laura Bush plan to pay their respects to Ford while he lies in state at the Capitol. On Tuesday, the president will speak at Ford's funeral at Washington National Cathedral before Ford's remains are taken to Grand Rapids.

Thousands Wait For Cortege To Be A Part Of U.S. History (WT)

By Joseph Weber

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

A light fog was settling on the District late yesterday afternoon when Joe Callaghan began his nearly five-hour wait to see the casket of former President Gerald R. Ford lie in state inside the Rotunda of the U.S. Capitol.

"This is U.S. history, and I wanted to be a part of it," said Mr. Callaghan, 47, a Florida resident who was returning from Pennsylvania, where he was visiting family for the holidays. "President Ford was a good man. I'm not of the [Republican Party], but he was a good man."

Mr. Callaghan was one of hundreds who began standing in line long before the public viewing began after 8 p.m., and among the thousands who came to the region to mourn the death of the 38th president.

Mike Cole, 43, of Mansfield, Ohio, also was traveling in the region and changed plans so his family could witness history and pay their respects to Mr. Ford.

"I was a kid during Watergate and when Ford later became president, so I didn't know much about him at that time," said Mr. Cole, standing with his wife and two children at the National World War II Memorial hours before the motorcade arrived. "Now I look back and realize he did a good job. He brought some order to this country."

The Ford family requested the brief ceremony at the memorial, off 17th Street Northwest, to honor the president's service in the Navy during World War II.

Veterans and Boy Scouts saluted as they waited inside the memorial grounds, whose Pacific Theater arch was lighted to honor Mr. Ford's duty aboard the aircraft carrier USS Monterey.

Senior Chief Boatswain Mate Carlos Ribott, a U.S. Navy piper, played "Piping Ashore," a whistle traditionally used to welcome officers aboard ship and now to honor naval service.

The casket arrived at Andrews Air Force Base at about 5:30 p.m., then joined the awaiting motorcade, which traveled along the Capital Beltway, past the Ford family's former home in Alexandria, across the Memorial Bridge, into the District and past the war memorial before reaching the East Steps of the Capitol at about 7:15 p.m.

Mourners applauded the motorcade, trimmed in flags and bunting, throughout the procession. The route was most crowded along the final leg, on Constitution Avenue Northwest, with hundreds sitting on sidewalks and on the steps of such historic U.S. landmarks as the National Archives building and the Smithsonian Institution museums.

Additional officers from the Metropolitan Police Department, the U.S. Capitol Police and other agencies were on duty yesterday, lining the motorcade route, other city streets and walking the Capitol grounds. However, no arrests or other problems were reported.

"He was my boss. He was the commander in chief," said Maj. Mike Conroy, who was commissioned in the Army in 1975. "He brought Midwestern values and common sense to the presidency at a time when the nation was hurting. I also admired his athleticism, including his football career at the University of Michigan and his low handicap in golf."

Maj. Conroy, 54, stood at the foot of Capitol Hill, along the procession route, where many people used their cell phones and cameras to take pictures of the motorcade of gleaming black limousines.

Among them was Micah Kauffman, 31, a missionary working with orphans in Romania who brought his camera.

"Ford was president when I was boy, the first one I remember," said Mr. Kauffman, a member of the Christian Aid Ministry. "I'm going to take these pictures back to show the children."

Mr. Ford, 93, died Tuesday night at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif. He was honored Friday with prayer services at St. Margaret's Church in Palm Desert, Calif. The casket was flown from California yesterday morning.

The public viewing last night followed a ceremony in the House of Representatives, where Mr. Ford served for 24 years. The casket was then moved to the Rotunda. The public viewing continued until midnight. The viewings resume today and tomorrow from 9 a.m. until 6 p.m. The national funeral service is Tuesday and includes a ceremony at the Washington National Cathedral. Mr. Ford will be buried Wednesday in his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich.

"I want my children to see this," said Mark Remington, 46, of Clifton, who stood along Constitution Avenue with his wife and six children, ages 2 to 12. "I want them to be part of history."

"Good Man, Faithful Servant" Honored (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson, Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a day of somber ceremony, the body of Gerald R. Ford was flown Saturday from Palm Springs to Washington, where the former president was hailed for his role in helping heal the nation in the aftermath of the Watergate scandal.

A black-draped bier of rough pine used in funerals for Abraham Lincoln and other American dignitaries held the coffin of the 38th president, who will lie in state inside the Capitol until Tuesday.

Ford will be transported to Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday morning for a memorial service that will be attended by President Bush. The six days of funeral rites are scheduled to end Wednesday, when Ford will be buried in his boyhood home of Grand Rapids, Mich.

As the focus shifted Saturday from Ford's adopted home in the Coachella Valley to the nation's capital, the former president was fondly saluted by career politicians who, along with family members and longtime friends, attended the evening service in the Capitol Rotunda.

"In 1974, America didn't need a philosopher-king or a warrior-prince," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "We needed a healer. We needed a rock. We needed honesty and candor and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

At the evening service, speakers repeatedly described Ford as a man of decency who led a traumatized nation away from a divisive political crisis.

"He was not just a nice guy, the next-door neighbor whose luck landed him in the White House," said Vice President Dick Cheney in the main eulogy of the night. Cheney, who served as chief of staff to Ford, said his former boss "led our republic safely through a crisis that could have turned to catastrophe."

"For all the grief that never came, for all the wounds that were never inflicted, the people of the United States will forever stand in debt to the good man and faithful servant we mourn tonight," Cheney said.

The honorary pallbearers included longtime Republicans such as Cheney; James A. Baker III, who served as Ford's undersecretary of Commerce and went on to become secretary of State; Alan Greenspan, a top economic advisor to Ford who later became Federal Reserve chairman; and former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger. Former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld also was scheduled to be a pallbearer but was unable to reach Washington from New Mexico because of bad weather.

The day's events, which featured patriotic music, military honors and touching moments of family privacy, bore the down-to-earth imprint of Ford, who took part in his own funeral planning and sought to play down some of the majestic trappings of a state funeral.

"He would not want it to be ostentatious," said William Brock, a Republican senator from Tennessee during Ford's presidency.

Before reaching the Capitol, Ford's hearse passed through the suburban neighborhood he lived in as a congressman and vice president, and paused for a moment of respect near the World War II Memorial.

Ford had declined a Washington military flyover and chose a standard hearse rather than a horse-drawn caisson for his trip to the Capitol. Those choices contrasted with those of some earlier presidents, such as Ronald Reagan and Lyndon B. Johnson, both of whom had military flyovers and horses at their state funerals.

In another unusual gesture, Ford had chosen to have his flag-draped coffin rest briefly outside the House chamber, where he served for a quarter-century as a congressman, including more than eight years as Republican leader.

After the stop at the House chamber, military pallbearers hoisted the coffin past onlookers lining the House's amphitheater-like Statuary Hall, past carved likenesses of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson, and carried the casket into the circular heart of the Capitol, the ornate Rotunda that features busts of presidents and explorers, wreathed panels and frescoed scenes of American history.

They then placed it on the 141-year-old bier, known as a catafalque, beneath the soaring Capitol dome.

Ford died Tuesday at age 93. President Nixon appointed him vice president after the resignation of Spiro T. Agnew, and he became an unelected president in 1974 when Nixon resigned during the Watergate scandal. Ford later pardoned Nixon, an act that enraged much of the country and may have doomed his prospects to be elected president.

On Saturday, however, his leadership was applauded. "In our nation's darkest hour, Gerald Ford lived his finest moment," said Republican Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska.

At one point, as a Navy choir began a tribute to Ford, the ceremonies were interrupted when former Rep. William S. Broomfield (R-Mich.) collapsed. Broomfield, who was among the official greeters at the Capitol when the funeral procession arrived, was taken from the chamber. Among those tending to Broomfield was outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a physician.

DOJ_NMG_0111467

The condition of the 84-year-old Broomfield, who served in the House for 36 years, was not immediately known, although he was believed to be receiving medical attention Saturday night.

The Rotunda resonated with hymns played by an Army brass ensemble as several hundred dignitaries filled the cavernous hall. The guests included senior Bush administration officials, three justices of the Supreme Court, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and many past and present lawmakers.

After the benediction, Stevens, Hastert and Cheney placed wreaths of white lilies and roses at three points around the coffin, representing the executive branch and the two chambers of Congress in which Ford served. Betty Ford and the four Ford children approached the flag-draped casket; the former first lady placed her folded hands on the coffin for an extended moment before departing.

As the poignant ceremony came to an end, the U.S. Army Brass Quintet performed an old Shaker tune whose title seemed to fit with the theme of Ford's life: "Simple Gifts."

Earlier Saturday, several hundred people lined the perimeter of Palm Springs International Airport to bid goodbye to Ford, who had made the area his home after leaving the White House.

In Palm Springs, members of the Ford family stood, hands over their hearts, while a Marine band played. A 21-gun salute was performed by a Marine regiment out of Twentynine Palms.

Betty Ford, dressed in a black dress and dark sunglasses, was in a wheelchair as she boarded a jetliner from the White House fleet. The aircraft, which when used by President Bush is known as Air Force One, departed at 10:15 a.m.

Though Ford had sought to avoid an excess of pomp, the day nonetheless brimmed with choreographed ceremony once the former president's body reached Washington at twilight.

As Ford's casket was lowered from the plane, the Air Force Band performed "Hail to the Chief," and a 21-gun salute rang out as dignitaries watched.

Nine pallbearers carried the late president from the aircraft to his hearse, and the 32-vehicle motorcade took him one last time through his old neighborhood of Alexandria, Va. Ford lived there in a time when vice presidents maintained private residences.

The funeral cortege paused along the National Mall at the World War II Memorial, where a granite arch in honor of the Pacific battleground glowed in brilliant light. Ford, a Navy ensign and gunnery officer, saw action aboard the aircraft carrier Monterey. A Navy piper played, and Betty Ford waved to the several hundreds onlookers, including veterans and Eagle Scouts, who had waited for the motorcade to arrive.

Shortly after 7 p.m., the cortege arrived at the Capitol, where a crowd of Washington officials was waiting on a clear, cool night.

Betty Ford, appearing stoical in her grief, stood with a white-gloved military escort as her late husband received another 21-gun salute. A band played "America the Beautiful" as eight military pallbearers carried the coffin up the 45 steps and into the House.

In his weekly radio address Saturday, Bush paid tribute to the former president, describing Ford as a "courageous leader, a true gentleman and a loving father and husband" who "displayed a decency, patriotism and courage that Americans will always admire."

State Funeral Honors Ford (DETN)

By Gordon Trowbridge

Detroit News, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Gerald Ford returned Saturday evening to the House that was his professional home, taking a final trip through the halls of the Congress in which he served for nearly three decades.

The motorcade transporting the deceased 38th president of the United States arrived at the U.S. Capitol's East Steps outside the House Saturday evening, greeted by more than a dozen former congressional colleagues. Already, the procession had moved through Alexandria, Va. -- the Ford family's Washington-area home while he served 13 terms in the House -- and past the World War II Memorial, where the convoy paused to honor his World War II service in the Navy.

But it was the House of Representatives, a beloved institution to Ford, that provided the center stage for Saturday's ceremonies in Washington, part of a three-day mourning period in the nation's capital. The man who turned down chances to run for Michigan governor and the Senate, who said his highest goal in politics was to become Speaker of the House, was carried up the Capitol's steps and through a corridor to the entrance to the House chamber, and paused there for several moments to mark his time as representative of Michigan's 5th Congressional District and his service as the Minority Leader of House Republicans, before moving on to the Capitol's ornate Rotunda.

DOJ_NMG_0111468

Ford held a seat in the House from 1948 to 1974 -- when, as a disgraced Richard Nixon resigned the presidency, Ford assumed the nation's highest office in one of the most difficult periods in American political history.

"This is the opportunity for President Ford's colleagues, present and former, to honor him and also to reminisce on the remarkable career he had," said Rep. Vernon Ehlers, R-Grand Rapids, who now holds Ford's old House seat.

"Whenever I meet anybody around here, and they ask where I'm from, I tell them Grand Rapids, and they say, 'Oh, yeah, Jerry Ford's seat.' They still call it Jerry Ford's seat. That tells you something about him."

In a brief ceremony in the Rotunda, congressional leaders and Vice President Cheney eulogized Ford, praising his leadership during the crisis of Watergate and honoring the widow he left behind, former First Lady Betty Ford, who gained nationwide respect for her battles against breast cancer and drug dependency.

"The president was not a hard man to read," said Cheney, Ford's first White House chief of staff, as he turned to Betty Ford. "And nothing was more obvious to the friends than the source of his happiness. That was you."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert remembered Ford as a midwestern everyman.

"He represented the strength of the middle america that forged him," said Hastert. "He never changed, even when power was thrust upon him."

Top officials greet motorcade

Among the ceremonial greeters for the arrival of the funeral procession: Rep. John Dingell, D-Dearborn, as well as former Michigan congressmen Guy Vander Jagt and William Broomfield. Also in the group were former Democratic House Speaker Tom Foley; former Rep. Lee Hamilton, who co-chaired the Iraq Study group; and current Rep. Charles Rangel of New York and Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi.

A list including an old-lion liberal such as Rangle alongside the conservative Lott is indicative of Ford's consensus-building ways, Ehlers said. "He was always very good at putting together groups with varying ideas, and then proceeding to make his decisions using his best judgments," Ehlers said.

The honorary pall bearers accompanying the casket were a who's who of late 20th Century Washington: Vice President Cheney, who served in the Ford White House, as well as former secretaries of state Henry Kissinger and James Baker, former National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft and former Chairman of the Federal Reserve Alan Greenspan. Former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who also served Ford at the Pentagon, was listed before the ceremony as an honorary pall bearer, but was not among the group escorting the casket up the Capitol steps.

An Air Force 747 jet from the presidential fleet, which had carried Ford's remains from California on Saturday morning, touched down at Andrews Air Force Base, Md., outside Washington, just after sunset.

Ford's history noted

Once in downtown Washington, the procession halted in front of the World War II Memorial on the National Mall, where a group of Boy Scouts -- honoring Ford's status as an Eagle Scout -- and military veterans stood watch. A Navy bosun's mate performed the ceremony of piping Ford aboard -- an honor rendered to dignitaries as they arrive aboard ship. Also on hand were female graduates of the service academies, which opened to women during Ford's presidency.

After the funeral procession's arrival at the Capitol, it moved to the House chamber were it paused, flanked by portraits of founding fathers Thomas Jefferson and John Quincy Adams. From there, Ford's body was to be carried to the Capitol's ornate Rotunda, and placed on a pine catafalque -- a rough platform built to display the casket of President Abraham Lincoln and subsequently used for the 26 men to have lain in state in the Capitol.

In the Rotunda, as former first lady Betty Ford looked on, dignitaries including many members of the congressional leadership, Supreme Court Chief Justice John Roberts, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and members of the city's diplomatic corps attended a memorial service before the chamber was opened for public viewing.

On all minds were the difficult circumstances under which Ford assumed the presidency.

"When he took his oath of office as president, we were a people shaken by disbelief, wracked with cynicism and paralyzed by doubt," said Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who spoke as president pro tem of the Senate. "In our nation's darkest hour, he lived his finest moment. He was the man the hour required."

Throughout the day, as a small army of protocol experts, press aides, police, military personnel and television technicians bustled about the Capitol finishing arrangements for the procession's arrival, tourists and mourners walked the Capitol grounds, many of whom made the trip specifically to honor Ford.

Washington is the second of a three-leg funeral journey that began in California Friday and will end when Ford's body is buried at his presidential museum in Grand Rapids on Wednesday. He will lie in state in the Capitol's ornate Rotunda until Tuesday morning, when he will receive a state funeral at the National Cathedral.

Before the flight to Washington, nearly 20,000 people visited St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., to view the flag-draped mahogany coffin from late Friday afternoon to Saturday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0111469

President Bush was not among the mourners in Washington on Saturday; he remained in Crawford, Texas, where he is expected to stay until Monday, when he will join mourners viewing Ford's remains at the Capitol. In his weekly Saturday radio address, Bush praised Ford's World War II service, his 13 terms in the House, and his assumption of the presidency amid the disarray of Watergate.

"Providence gave us Gerald Ford's steady hand and calm leadership during a time of great division and turmoil," Bush said. "He guided America through a crisis of confidence, and helped our nation mend its wounds by restoring faith in our system of government."

Solemn Tribute For President Ford (NSDY)

By Jonathan Abrams, Michael Muskal

Newsday, December 31, 2006

The body of Gerald R. Ford arrived in Washington this evening as the official mourning for the 38th president shifted from the personal grief that marked the ceremonies in California to the more formal protocol of a state funeral.

Through each step of the obsequies, the ceremonies became more grandiose, the military presence larger and the guest list filled with more political celebrities, many of whom served in the relatively short Ford administration.

The six-day mourning period is less elaborate than that for Ronald Reagan in 2004. There has been no military flyover; gone was the symbolism of the riderless horse marking the passing of a leader.

Instead, there were several simple motorcades with a hearse, emphasizing the modesty of a man who became president through a series of accidents during a politically tempestuous period.

Several thousand people lined the route and greeted the arrival of the flag-draped body at the Capitol where Ford will lie in state in the Rotunda. A 21-gun salute was followed by "Hail to the Chief."

Then eight military pallbearers carried the casket up the east steps of the Capitol, past a double line of servicemen and civilian dignitaries from Ford's past, including honorary pallbearers Henry A. Kissinger, former secretary of State, Brent Scowcroft, former national security advisor, and Alan Greenspan, former head of the Federal Reserve.

Betty Ford, escorted and sometimes leaning on Maj. Gen. Guy Swan III, waited at the top of the 45 stairs. She followed the casket inside the Capitol as it moved through the building to the Rotunda. Along the way, it rested before the door to the House of Representatives where Ford served 25 years. He often said his political goal was to become Speaker, a job he never won.

Despite the New Year's holiday, the funeral drew an A-list crowd of Supreme Court justices, law-makers and religious leaders to the Rotunda. The coffin was placed on the same black catafalque built for Abraham Lincoln.

The Rev. Daniel P. Coughlin, House chaplain, gave the invocation and mentioned civility and reconciliation, themes that marked Ford's administration. Many commentators have noted both traits seem to be in short supply in the current, more rigid era.

The ceremony was briefly interrupted when an elderly man seemed to faint during a performance by the U.S. Navy Sea Chanters Chorus, singing "God Bless America" and the Navy hymn "Eternal Father Strong to Save."

The man, identified as a former congressman from Michigan, was treated by Sen. Bill Frist, a physician and then take by wheelchair outside the Rotunda.

Senate President Pro Tempore Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), and Vice President Dick Cheney, who was Ford's chief of staff, briefly spoke before presenting wreaths that were placed by the coffin.

Retired Rear Adm. Barry C. Black, the Senate chaplain, gave the final benediction, before the family paid its respects. Betty Ford placed her clasped hands on the casket and bowed her head.

Ford will lie in repose Sunday and Monday. On Tuesday the body will be flown to Grand Rapids for burial at the Gerald R. Ford Museum on Wednesday.

Earlier, the plane carrying Ford and his family flew through the growing dusk and touched down at Andrews Air Force Base about 5:15 p.m., or 2:25 p.m. in Los Angeles.

Then in the dark, the family led by widow Betty Ford left the plane, known as Air Force One when the president is on board.

They watched as the flag-draped casket, carried by military pallbearers, brought the body from the plane for the arrival ceremony.

The Air Force Band performed "Hail to the Chief," and a 21-gun salute with 21 individual shots was fired. The second song, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," also known as "America," was chosen by the family.

Ford's body was greeted by nine of the honorary pallbearers, led by Cheney and Bob Dole, Ford's running-mate in their unsuccessful national campaign in 1976.

The 32-vehicle motorcade then traveled through Alexandria, Va., where the Fords once lived. The motorcade went past the World War II Memorial. There, he was piped ashore, a salute to Gerald Ford's Navy Service.

DOJ_NMG_0111470

The ceremonies in Washington were more elaborate than the private simplicity of St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, where the Ford family mourned Friday and today.

Thousands of people filed past the casket in St. Margaret's Episcopal during the night and early morning hours as the public paid its respects following a private ceremony for family and friends on Friday.

Ford died at home in nearby Rancho Mirage on Tuesday. The former congressman from Grand Rapids, Mich., who was appointed vice president and then elevated to the presidency amid the turmoil of the Watergate scandal, was 93.

Like its arrival on Friday, the departure of the coffin from the church at about 9 a.m. was more about simplicity than the ostentatious flourishes that mark the passing of the leader of a nation.

The flag-draped coffin was wheeled by two military pallbearers from the church down the aisle to the waiting hearse. An American flag was carried in front of the coffin; a presidential flag followed.

As it left the church, a military honor guard stood at attention as a Marine band from Twentynine Palms offered presidential honors, playing "Hail to the Chief."

There was a presenting of arms to salute the body, but there was no firing of weapons.

Betty Ford, 88, escorted by Maj. Gen. Swan and accompanied by her children stood nearby.

They entered waiting limousines and followed the hearse, with two small U.S. flags and a small presidential seal to Palm Springs International Airport. There a plane from the presidential fleet waited to take the casket and the family to Washington.

The tone changed by the time the body arrived at the airport. Hundreds of people crowded a grandstand near the airport to watch the brief departure ceremony.

To the sound of cannon firing a 21-gun salute, the body was carried by eight military pallbearers, representing different branches of the service. The notes of "America the Beautiful" played by the Marine band flowed through the air.

A frail-looking Betty Ford watched. She was gently held on one side by a military escort, but she also clutched the hand of her daughter, Susan, for added support. It was a scene repeated later at Andrews Air Force Base and in Washington.

President Bush remained at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, on Saturday. He will return to Washington on Monday.

In his weekly radio address, President Bush again eulogized Ford, calling him a "courageous leader, a true gentleman and a loving father and husband."

"Gerald Ford never lost the spirit that Americans grew to admire so much," Bush said.

President Ford Eulogized In U.S. Capitol As "Healer" (BLOOM)

By Kevin Miller, Jonathan D. Salant

Bloomberg, December 30, 2006

Dec. 30 (Bloomberg) -- President Gerald Ford was praised at his state funeral in the Capitol Rotunda as a man of courtesy and dignity whose qualities served the U.S. well to mend the wounds of the Watergate political scandal and the Vietnam War.

``We needed a healer, we needed a rock," House Speaker Dennis Hastert said in the eulogy in Washington. ``We needed honesty and character and courage. We needed Gerald Ford."

Hastert, an Illinois Republican, was joined by Vice President Dick Cheney and Senator Ted Stevens of Alaska, the Senate President Pro Tempore, in offering tributes before Ford's wife, Betty, their family and government officials. The speakers touched on whether the only man to become president without the vote of even a single American did so not by happenstance, but by Providence.

``His path to office was unlikely," Stevens said. ``History will show it was no accident."

The decision to pardon to Richard Nixon, whose resignation in August 1974 propelled Ford into the White House, likely cost Ford an election in his own right two years later, the speakers said. Yet history is showing that Ford made the right call, given that the U.S. was also trying to resolve rifts caused by the Vietnam War, Cheney said.

``It's far from the worst fate that a man be remembered for his capacity to forgive," Cheney said, standing at a lectern with Nixon's daughter, Tricia Nixon Cox, among those seated behind him. Ford resolved ``a crisis that could have turned into a catastrophe."

Arrival in Washington

Ford's flag-draped casket arrived at Andrews Air Force Base outside Washington from California just after sunset. The casket was loaded into a hearse for a final trip to the nation's capital. En route, the motorcade passed through Alexandria, Virginia, where the Fords lived during his years in Congress, and then paused at the World War II Memorial on the Washington Mall. Ford served in the Navy during the conflict, reaching the rank of lieutenant commander.

At the Capitol, Ford's casket was carried up the steps leading to the House, recognizing his 24 years as a member of that body. Honorary pallbearers included Cheney, former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, former Treasury Secretary

DOJ_NMG_0111471

Paul O'Neill, former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and James Baker and former National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft. All were also members of Ford's administration. Cheney served as Ford's chief of staff.

Sanford Weill

Another honorary pallbearer was former Citigroup Inc. Chairman Sanford Weill, a friend of Ford's who was a donor to the Gerald R. Ford School of Public Policy at the University of Michigan. Ford was a member of Citigroup's board.

The ceremony was briefly interrupted when former Representative William Bloomfield, a Michigan Republican and one of the officials assigned to greet the Ford family at the Capitol, collapsed in the audience and was taken to George Washington University Medical Center.

Ford's body will lie in state through Tuesday in the Capitol Rotunda, the same place where mourners paid tribute to President Ronald Reagan in June 2004, the last state funeral.

On Tuesday, his casket will first be taken to the Senate side of the Capitol to commemorate his tenure as vice president, the official who presides over the Senate. From there, a motorcade will take his remains to the National Cathedral for a memorial service. His body will then be flown for burial to Grand Rapids, Michigan, near his presidential museum.

American flags are being flown at half staff for 30 days.

Died at 93

Ford had lain in repose in Palm Desert, California, since Friday. He died Dec. 26 at age 93, the oldest ever ex- president, eclipsing Reagan, also 93 when he died in 2004.

He represented Michigan in the House from 1949 to 1973, rising to become minority leader. Nixon tapped him as vice president to replace Spiro Agnew, who resigned after facing bribery charges stemming from his tenure as governor of Maryland.

Nixon resigned in August 1974 rather than face impeachment because of his efforts to obstruct an investigation into Democratic Party headquarters at the Watergate complex in Washington. Ford then became the 38th U.S. president, the only occupant of the White House never elected as either president or vice president.

``Our long national nightmare is over," Ford declared as he assumed the office. ``I assume the presidency under extraordinary circumstances. This is an hour of history that troubles our minds and hurts our hearts."

The Nixon Pardon

Ford pardoned Nixon a month after taking office, an act that contributed to his defeat in 1976.

Calling Watergate ``an American tragedy," Ford said in a speech, ``It could go on and on and on, or someone must write the end to it. I have concluded that only I can do that, and if I can, I must."

Twenty-five years later, in 2001, Ford received the John F. Kennedy Profile in Courage Award for pardoning Nixon.

``People have finally started to realize what he did for this country," Representative Vernon Ehlers, a Michigan Republican, said as he waited for Ford's procession to arrive at the Capitol. Ehlers is from Grand Rapids, Michigan, the district Ford represented in Congress.

Election Loss

Before losing the presidency to Democrat Jimmy Carter, Ford fended off a primary challenge from Reagan. Four years later, Reagan was elected president and served two terms. In 1980, as Reagan prepared to accept the Republican presidential nomination, he held unsuccessful talks with Ford about having the former president join the ticket.

In recent years, Ford was in declining health. He could no longer travel to Washington for the annual Gerald Ford awards for reporting on the presidency and defense. He was hospitalized as late as October. In August, he traveled to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minnesota, for a pacemaker and for stents in his arteries to improve blood flow. He had a stroke while attending the 2000 Republican National Convention in Philadelphia.

``I never heard him utter and unkind word," Cheney said, who like many of the dignitaries in the room worked for Ford during his presidency from 1974-77. ``He answered courtesy with courtesy. He answered discourtesy, with courtesy."

"Everyman" Ford Honored In Rotunda (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

RollCall.com, December 30, 2006

In a ceremony marked by solemn tributes and a bit of momentary chaos, former President Gerald Ford was honored Saturday night in the Capitol Rotunda as a man who restored faith in America's political system.

Senate President Pro Tem Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), outgoing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Vice President Cheney each spoke about Ford, reflecting on how the 38th president was able to reunite a wounded nation following the Watergate scandal and Vietnam War.

"While his path to office was unique, history will know Gerald Ford's presidency was no accident," Stevens said of the only president to never be elected either president or vice president.

DOJ_NMG_0111472

He added: “History will know that in our hour of need, our nation sought him.”

Ford, 93, died Tuesday at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

Hastert recalled how even as a football player at the University of Michigan, Ford had a “big and solid” presence that reflected upon his solid convictions. Those convictions, Hastert said, gave Ford the ability to lead the United States following years of turmoil.

“He reminded us who we should be, and he helped us to heal,” Hastert said.

“He never changed,” Hastert later added. “Even when power was thrust upon him, he remained an everyman.”

The three speakers also praised former first lady Betty Ford, who sat quietly near his casket.

Betty Ford “literally offered hope to millions of Americans,” Stevens said, while Cheney called her the former president’s “source of happiness.”

The ceremony was briefly interrupted when former Rep. William Broomfield (R-Mich.) collapsed a few feet behind leaders such as Cheney and former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Capitol Police, medical personnel and several funeral attendees — including outgoing Senate Majority Leader and heart surgeon Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) — rushed to the 84-year-old’s side.

Broomfield was wheeled out of the Rotunda and the ceremony resumed about five minutes later. His condition was not immediately known at press time.

Washington’s Republican elite and an eclectic mix of other leaders attended the service, ranging from Chief Justice John Roberts to members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to Washington, D.C., Mayor-elect Adrian Fenty (D), who postponed his inaugural activities to honor the official six-day mourning period of the late president.

As Ford’s casket arrived at the Capitol, the blast of cannons boomed outside in a 21-round salute and guests walked into the service. The United States Army Brass Quintet played selections including “America the Beautiful” and “The Battle Hymn of the Republic.”

House Chaplain Daniel Coughlin opened the service by reflecting on how Ford’s strong convictions and faith helped move the nation into a positive direction.

“Mighty is the hand that could turn a page of history,” Coughlin said.

At the conclusion of the service, Cheney escorted Betty Ford was to her late husband’s casket. She paused briefly to touch the casket, leaned over it and left.

Cheney also was among the honorary pallbearers for the service. Others included Rumsfeld, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, former Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.) and Alan Greenspan, the former head of the Federal Reserve.

Cheney, who served as Ford’s chief of staff, said that while the decision to pardon former President Richard Nixon likely cost him re-election, it remained the right thing to do, and history will remember Ford for making the right decision.

Ford’s body arrived by airplane in the Washington area early Saturday evening after a day of public viewing in Palm Desert, Calif. Upon arrival, the body was taken from Andrews Air Force base to the Capitol, pausing momentarily in front of the World War II Memorial to honor Ford’s Navy service.

A number of national figures have lain in state in the Rotunda. Civil rights pioneer Rosa Parks was the most recent person to do so — her flag-draped casket sat in the Rotunda for two days in October 2005. The last president given the honor was former President Ronald Reagan, who laid in state for three days following his death in June 2004.

Visitors may view Ford’s casket until midnight Saturday and from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Sunday and Monday. A service at the National Cathedral is scheduled for Tuesday, when Ford’s body then will be flown to be buried in Michigan.

The waiting area to view Ford’s casket in the Rotunda is at Third Street and Maryland Avenue Southwest.

Cell phones and other electronic devices must be turned off in the Capitol, and no photography or other electronic recording will be allowed, according to an Architect of the Capitol press release.

Public and staff tours also are temporarily on hold, set to resume on Jan. 3. The 110th Congress is scheduled to open the following day.

At The Capitol, VIP Roll Call Has Many No-Shows (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

The military band drilled. Wreaths with white roses hung outside the House and Senate chambers. In the Capitol Rotunda rested the black velvet catafalque that once bore the remains of Abraham Lincoln.

Everything was in place for Gerald R. Ford's state funeral last night -- everything, that is, but the statesmen.

DOJ_NMG_0111473

President Bush sent his regrets; he was cutting cedar and riding his bike on his ranch in Texas. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and his deputy, Richard Durbin, couldn't make it, either; they were on a trip to visit Incan ruins. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi took a pass, too -- as did nearly 500 of the 535 members of Congress.

A 6-to-3 majority of the Supreme Court, including Ford's appointee, John Paul Stevens, ruled against attending. All the nation's governors were invited; few, if any, came. Apparently only two Cabinet members -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez -- accepted the invite.

Congressional staffers and Ford family representatives scrambled to find sufficient greeters and honorary pallbearers to join Vice President Cheney and a score of former lawmakers and Ford administration officials. Organizers had to scratch one name they had circulated Friday as a pallbearer: Elford Albin Cederberg, the former Republican congressman from Michigan, died eight months ago.

Waiting in the Capitol crypt -- the holding place for lawmakers attending the rites for Ford -- Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) noted the absence of a quorum. There were only eight congressmen in the room, and a couple of them were watching the Texas-Iowa football game. "What's the score?" one called out.

"Everybody's got to deal with their own schedule," Sensenbrenner, who brought his wife and son to the funeral, said of his absent colleagues. But in his minority view, funerals "are important," he said. "When you're in an official position, it's one of the things that's the right thing to do."

The American people quickly outdid their representatives in respect for the departed president, as several hundred citizens lined up for a late-night public viewing of the casket. But the populace, too, was slow to rally. Capitol police erected barriers to contain thousands, but by mid-afternoon yesterday, only 20 people were in line -- providing a luxurious person-to-portable-toilet ratio of 1:1.

Ford, a onetime college football star, would have understood that New Year's weekend is a difficult time for a funeral. His 6:30 ceremony was tucked in between the 4:30 p.m. Alamo Bowl (Texas vs. Iowa) and the 8 p.m. Chick-Fil-A Bowl (Virginia Tech vs. Georgia). And it was just bad luck that the ceremony would fall on the same day as James Brown's funeral, a Redskins home game and the appearance of photos showing Saddam Hussein in the hangman's noose.

The modest 38th president -- a "Ford, not a Lincoln" was his famous self-description -- probably would not have fretted about the attendance.

His family, reflecting his wishes, dispensed with the horse-drawn caisson, the military flyover and the round-the-clock viewing that accompanied Reagan's rites here in 2004. And high officials will have a chance to improve on their performance when a second ceremony is held for Ford on Tuesday at Washington National Cathedral. Certainly, though, official Washington could have done better by Ford last night.

Had the majority of America's leaders dragged themselves to the Capitol, they would have developed the inevitable lumps in the throat as they felt the percussive pounding of the cannon battery, heard the gentle strains of "America the Beautiful" and viewed the crisp steps of a military guard carrying the flag-draped casket. But, as it happened, there were only 77 chairs put out for mourners in the vast Rotunda; staffers were invited in to pad the crowd and make the room look less empty.

Bob Dole, Alan Greenspan, Henry Kissinger, Brent Scowcroft and other luminaries from the Ford orbit were there. Chuck Hagel, Bill Frist and Mitch McConnell were among about 10 senators visible in the crowd, and departing Speaker Dennis Hastert and outgoing Senate President Pro Tempore Ted Stevens offered workmanlike eulogies.

Cheney graciously overlooked his old boss's posthumously published view that the Bush administration had made a "big mistake" and should not have gone to war in Iraq. "He answered discourtesy with courtesy," Cheney told the mourners. Former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld, an honorary pallbearer, was a no-show -- reportedly the victim of a delayed flight. And if pallbearer James A. Baker III was in attendance, he proved elusive to the cameras.

Democratic attendance was rather more sparse. The official greeters included Rep. John Dingell, former congressman Lee Hamilton and former speaker Tom Foley. Spied in the crowd were Sens. Chuck Schumer, Carl Levin and Byron Dorgan, and incoming House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer.

Conservatives were quick to condemn Reid and Durbin, who proceeded with four other senators on a trip to South America, knowing they would miss the rites in Washington. "He's the incoming Senate majority leader, for crying out loud, and he can't even show a little bit of respect?" commentator Mike Gallagher demanded on Fox News.

But the disregard was bipartisan. The White House sent out a press release from Crawford, Tex., detailing the logistics of last night's service, then added an asterisk: "Please note that President George W. Bush will not be attending this event." He will pay his respects when he comes back to Washington, then go to the other service on Tuesday. Aides pointed out that this was the same thing Bush did for Reagan's funeral, but Bush had a better excuse that time: He was hosting the G-8 summit of world leaders, not clearing brush on the ranch.

DOJ_NMG_0111474

Instead, Bush phoned in a eulogy, using his usual Saturday radio address to proclaim Ford a man of "selfless dedication" and saying, "He always put the needs of his country before his own."

It was a rare trait in official Washington last night.

"No Point In Being Bitter" (WP)

By Bob Woodward, Christine Parthemore

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

Upon becoming president in August 1974, Gerald R. Ford faced the task of ending a war -- a war not of his own making. In two wide-ranging interviews with Ford conducted in 2004 and 2005 by The Washington Post's Bob Woodward and Christine Parthemore, the former president revealed the depths of his disillusionment and frustration during the final years and months of the Vietnam War. The interviews, excerpted below, were granted on the condition that they not be made public until Ford's death.

Bob Woodward : [Vietnam] is the big master problem you got handed.

Gerald R. Ford: My approach was, we inherited the problem with the job. It's my obligation on behalf of the country to try and solve the damn thing.

You know, there was a fundamental mistake made back after World War II, when the French had committed to support the Vietnamese. In fact, I went down to Saigon [in 1953]. . . . I wanted to find out why we're going to spend a lot of money in South Vietnam on behalf of the South Vietnamese. I was in Saigon, stayed at the ambassador's residence, and I went over to the French military headquarters, and boy, all these French generals and colonels were dressed up here out in Saigon and telling me how they were gonna win the war against the [North] Vietnamese.

Well, it sounded good on paper, and they ought to know more than I did. Well, in about six months the French got the hell kicked out of them in Dien Bien Phu. . . . The point is, we were on the wrong side of the locals. We made the same mistake that the French did, except we got deeper and deeper in the war. We could have avoided the whole darn Vietnam War if somebody in the Department of Defense or State had said, "Look here. Do we want to inherit the French mess?"

What do you think about Vietnam in retrospect? Digging very deeply, what was the mistake? I don't know that you ever looked at [Defense Secretary Robert S.] McNamara's book "In Retrospect," but he says we were wrong, terribly wrong.

I know, and that used to bother me, because if we were wrong, why did he participate? I used to sit in the Congress and hear him testify to support the [Lyndon B.] Johnson commitment of 250,000, or whatever it was, U.S. personnel, and he never backed off until he got out.*

* *How do you feel about it now? Ten years later, you were the president of the United States who had to eat that national humiliation.

It was a combination of following the recommendations of top people in the executive branch and the feeling that we got involved in this, we better finish it. So it was not a pleasant decision over that long 10-year period to try and rationalize it. I don't think I ever adequately did.

Did you ever, as president, during that period, particularly April '75 during the evacuation, wake up in the morning and say, "What happened here? How did I get dealt this mess? "

I couldn't help but wonder that, but we had a plan, or at least it was on paper a plan. . . . In retrospect, you wonder how unwise you were. In retrospect, if you could sit there and see in reality, I would hope you would do it differently, but we went along. And we finally had to concede that the South Vietnamese were inadequate to solve the problem.

But if you look at the memos internally in the Johnson administration, '65, '66, '67, they are saying to themselves: The South Vietnamese are corrupt, terrible. We bet on the wrong horse here.

Well, if that's the way they felt, why in the hell didn't they go to the public? They never related that to us.*

* *When [Richard M.] Nixon came in, in '69, and took over as president, took over the war, did you ever have any conversations with him or [Henry] Kissinger about what to do, or how to -- or your old friend [Melvin] Laird, who was defense secretary? . . . Even Nixon was saying we were gonna get out. He always said, "Peace with honor. "

He was obsessed with that phraseology.

What did it mean ?

That we had saved Vietnam from becoming communist. That was his goal, superficially, and that's what he kept emphasizing. And we're preventing the domino theory from taking place in Asia. Well, the domino theory never really materialized. . . . Nixon really believed that, that it won't take place if we stayed firm. . . .

I hope we never live through another era like that in American history. The answers were very evasive. The results were very disillusioning.*

* *What's the big lesson from all of this? What's the big lesson from the broadest history ?

DOJ_NMG_0111475

Well, I've often thought about that, Bob, based on my 30 years in government in very difficult times. We have to assume that we are the most powerful nation in the world militarily, and that we have some obligations on behalf of democracies worldwide. But I don't think we can force democracy on people or a nation that aren't prepared for it. But that doesn't mean we should go to war to change their mind. We believe in democracy and we think it's the right policy. We had a standoff with the Soviet Union, but we never went to war with the Soviet Union for other good and sufficient reasons, economic and so forth. That ill-fated system failed. . . .

I'm often asked . . . does the president today have a tougher job than you and [Ronald] Reagan had about our enemies? I said I think Reagan and I and [Jimmy] Carter, we had a relatively simple problem. That sounds kind of silly, but we had one enemy. We knew what their military capabilities were. They knew generally what our capabilities were. And we had a standoff for 40 years. The present situation where you have these renegade governments on a global basis in this part of the world and that part of the world, they're a different kind of enemy. And I don't envy the present president, whoever it might be, having to combat that circumstance.

What did [Donald H.] Rumsfeld think of Vietnam? Do you recall any input from him ?

Don was never vocal in his support or criticism. . . . Don never got off the track, as far as I remember. He was not a critic. He just followed good, what his boss thought was good policy.*

* *You could have been very bitter about [Vietnam], and you weren't at all.

Well, I'm not a bitter person. . . . There's no point in being bitter about it. Just change the policy.I tried to justify what happened. I tried to justify what we were doing about it. But I never -- the Vietnam War, in my opinion, should not have been in the '76 campaign. That was an event that took place and it was over. There should not be a place where they said, "You were wrong, you're responsible." We had plenty of other problems that had to be solved. You know, we ended Vietnam and I think reasonably successfully, but we had a terrible economic circumstance. We had high inflation, high interest rates, the economy was sluggish. I tell you, it was a mess.

But no bitterness ?

No, I don't carry grudges.

You said it was the saddest day of your presidency when all the helicopters were --

I did, when they left the embassy in Saigon. Oh, to see those helicopters go out, come back, go out and come back. We saved the lives of not only our U.S. military personnel, our U.S. civilian personnel, but on my personal orders, saved the lives of South Vietnamese who had supported us, contrary to [Defense Secretary] Jim Schlesinger, who wanted to let everybody go to hell.

You saved some lives. You could have saved more if there would have been more time.

That's right.

I think at one point Kissinger said, "If we had another week we could have saved 12,000 more."

Oh, at least I think, . . . Well, if you see pictures of that mob in the area of the embassy, you know there were a lot of people that never made it, and if they didn't make it they probably lost their lives under the North Vietnamese.

Serving As Ford's No. 2, Rockefeller Never Took His Eye Off Top Job (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

Without even trying, Gerald R. Ford more or less stumbled into the presidency in 1974 in the wake of the Watergate scandal. But the man who became his vice president through the same historical quirk not only always wanted the top job, but defined his professional life by it.

Nelson A. Rockefeller made a brief foray into presidential politics in 1960 after barely a year as governor of New York. He began a campaign to run, which he quickly abandoned when Richard M. Nixon surged. Mr. Rockefeller unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination in 1964 and again in 1968. He coveted the vice presidency in 1973, when Spiro T. Agnew resigned. Instead, President Nixon named Mr. Ford.

After 15 years as governor, Mr. Rockefeller resigned later in 1973 to devote more time to his Commission on Critical Choices for Americans, which he created to set goals for the nation and to keep himself in the national limelight for a likely campaign to succeed Mr. Nixon.

Then, another seismic upheaval reshaped the political landscape. Mr. Nixon stepped down, and Mr. Ford recruited Mr. Rockefeller, who gambled on the vice presidency as his last best hope.

Among the prospective vice presidents Mr. Ford rejected was George H. W. Bush. Remembering the telephone call from Mr. Ford that August morning, Mr. Bush said modestly last week: "I went on, and thanks to him, had wonderful assignments in life."

DOJ_NMG_0111476

Mr. Bush's later roles in government included as vice president and president. Mr. Rockefeller had to settle for a short-lived, appointive vice presidency.

His younger brother, Laurance, once recalled a sermon by Harry Emerson Fosdick, whose brother managed John D. Rockefeller's philanthropy. It was titled "Life Is Making the Most of Second Best," and, Laurance said, "I believe life taught Nelson that sermon."

But as vice president, even with Mr. Ford intending to seek a full term in 1976, the 66-year-old Mr. Rockefeller harbored hopes that, somehow, he might finally fulfill his vision of becoming president.

"I'm a politician," he once explained. "That is my profession. Success in politics, real success, means only one thing in America."

Not long after Mr. Ford enlisted him, Mr. Rockefeller was asked whether he had accepted the vice presidency partly as a vehicle to the White House. After persistent questioning, he answered with the exasperation of a harried commuter racing to catch the last train: "What do you think I'm doing here?"

He was confirmed by the Senate, but only after he confronted what he said was the "myth" about his wealth (by today's standards, according to the holdings he disclosed to Congress, he would barely qualify as a billionaire).

"Would my family background somehow limit and blind me, so that I would not be able to see and serve the general good of all Americans?" he asked, then replied: "Poverty, too, can blind a man or a woman. Some never rise above the hungry resentments of early hardships."

The conventional wisdom was that the incandescent Mr. Rockefeller, known for declaring, "I never wanted to be vice president of anything," would quickly outshine Mr. Ford.

But Washington protocol doesn't give even larger-than-life vice presidents much latitude. Moreover, observers said that Mr. Rockefeller's ambitions to dominate domestic policy were sabotaged by Donald H. Rumsfeld, then the White House chief of staff, who recently resigned as President George W. Bush's defense secretary.

James M. Cannon, whom Mr. Rockefeller made executive director of the Domestic Council, said Mr. Rockefeller took the vice president's job "because it was his duty, but it was not a happy experience for him."

"He gave every indication he was not pleased by not being given a more important role."

And with all the political upheaval, one thing never changed. "Every movement needs a villain," said William Rusher, the publisher of National Review. "For the G.O.P. right, Nelson Rockefeller was it."

He failed to placate conservatives, but not for lack of trying. In 1975, he told the National Urban Coalition that as governor he had refused to criticize the Nixon administration's pursuit of the war in Vietnam because he did not want to jeopardize federal aid to New York.

He boasted that "we got the cheats off welfare" and "we cracked down on the dope pushers." In the South, he once favorably likened Mr. Ford to George Wallace, the Alabama governor who would seek the presidency again in 1976. "They are both dedicated Americans who believe in the basic values of this country," he said. "They happen to be of different parties and make slightly different appeals to people."

But within less than a year, Mr. Rockefeller was gone from the Republican ticket as Mr. Ford's running mate.

"He was unhappy — maybe there's a stronger word — that he was dumped from the ticket," Mr. Cannon recalled.

"Ford once said to me, 'I hope Nelson doesn't hold this against me,' " Richard M. Rosenbaum, a Rockefeller confidant and former Republican state chairman of New York, recalled the other day.

Mr. Rockefeller never complained publicly, though, both out of loyalty to Mr. Ford, whom he referred to as "the boss," and because some of his own supporters still harbored a slim hope that if the Republicans won in 1976, he might be rewarded with a cabinet post like secretary of state.

Short of a deadlock for the nomination between Mr. Ford and Ronald Reagan, though, forcing a move to a third alternative, the possibility of success by Nelson Rockefeller's definition appeared to be doomed.

A few days before the Super Tuesday primaries early in 1976, he debated into the night with Mr. Rosenbaum about whether his New York Republican delegation should endorse Mr. Ford. Mr. Rockefeller seemed uncertain, Mr. Rosenbaum recalled, as if he were also weighing the impact on his own political future. Finally, Mr. Rockefeller gave the go-ahead.

Around that time, he repeated the lament that he made after the 1968 campaign that he had lost his ambition. (Bill Moyers replied at the time: "I believe Rocky when he says he's lost his ambition. I also believe he remembers where he put it.") But, this time, at least in political terms, he seemed to mean it.

"When you think about what went on after he left government service, he did some pretty interesting, some might say bizarre, things," Mr. Rosenbaum said.

DOJ_NMG_0111477

He delivered an obscene gesture to protesters as he campaigned for Mr. Ford. In 1979, at age 70, he was found dead of a heart attack late one night in his Manhattan office where he was said to be working on an art book with a young woman on his staff.

Before that, he finally was able to rest his head in the White House, however briefly. On Jan. 19, 1977, his last night as vice president, Mr. Rockefeller, his wife, Happy, and their children were invited by Mr. Ford to stay over.

Moderate? Conservative? With Gerald Ford, Take Your Pick (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

LYNDON JOHNSON in 1973. Richard Nixon in 1994. Ronald Reagan in 2004.

The last three former presidents to die dominated the world stage. They bent history to their will, for better or worse, and became the subjects of a crowded shelf of biographies. For the writers of memorials and obituaries, they were easy.

Not so Gerald R. Ford, who served only 29 months, never won a national election, and was constricted by an overwhelmingly hostile Congress. He is remembered mainly for the pardon of his predecessor, an act that ultimately doomed his bid for re-election.

Yet the public ritual surrounding the death of a former president demands a period of public rumination, and partisans across the political spectrum have been finding substance to admire in Mr. Ford.

There are, of course, the common sentiments that he was a decent, humble, calming leader at a precarious time. But peering back at his modest and often overlooked legacy many have also found elements in concert with their own views, variously honoring him as an icon of moderate Republicanism, a conservative budget hawk, an accidental apostle of Reaganism, a critic of the Iraq war and a proponent of gay rights.

"You can pick and choose," said Richard Norton Smith, the historian and former director of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum. "The Ford presidency is a very good example of how history is argument without end, and the thing is, that we haven't had this argument until recently because we are so mesmerized by Nixon. Historians have always tended to look at the Ford presidency as a kind of coda, the un-expired Nixon term."

For those who never thought highly of him, the change in tone was striking. An online column last week in the left-leaning Nation magazine, which railed against Mr. Ford's pardon of former President Nixon, commended President Bush for being "appropriately respectful" toward Mr. Ford.

The column urged Mr. Bush to heed Mr. Ford's criticism of the Iraq war, made during a 2004 interview with Bob Woodward of The Washington Post reported after the former president's death. "I just don't think we should go hellfire damnation around the globe freeing people, unless it is directly related to our own national security," Mr. Ford was quoted as saying.

In television coverage of his death, the Iraq war comments soon received as much attention as anything he did in office. "He was atrocious at P.R. when he was president, but getting the Woodward interview released after his death was a pretty savvy P.R. move on Ford's part," said Franklin Foer, editor of The New Republic, who added that the magazine did not plan any Ford coverage because of a holiday printing schedule. "I don't exactly consider it the most momentous event in the history of the republic."

The conservative National Review has scorned Mr. Ford for 30 years as the wishy-washy establishment Republican who beat back Mr. Reagan's conservative 1976 primary challenge. Conservatives disdained Mr. Ford for what they considered his too tolerant approach to the Soviet Union and for naming Nelson Rockefeller as his vice president.

But on the National Review's Web site last week several conservatives stretched to admire their former bête noire. Some praised Mr. Ford for at least trying to veto 66 Democratic bills, even though the Democratic majority in Congress usually overrode them. Paul Kengor, a professor at Grove City College in Pennsylvania, credited Mr. Ford with "paving the way for Reagan" by "giving détente a chance, and thus an opportunity to show its true colors." And Lee Edwards, a scholar at the Heritage Foundation, thanked Mr. Ford for nominating Mr. Rockefeller because it infuriated conservatives into forming the New Right.

"It's like congratulating the Soviets for the Marshall Plan," Richard Brookhiser, a senior editor at the National Review, said in an interview. "In fairness to Ford," he added, looking for praise, "I have never seen him on a list of the worst presidents."

Socially moderate Republicans, in contrast, have embraced President Ford in death as the champion of their vision of the party. "Jerry believed this party was about a right to be left alone," said former Senator Alan Simpson of Wyoming, a friend of Mr. Ford's, arguing that the Republicans' losses in the last election sent a message to return to smaller government and stop emphasizing social issues like abortion restrictions.

After Mr. Ford died, Charles Francis, a friend of President Bush who founded a group to welcome gay voters in the Republican Party, circulated a private letter from Mr. Ford supporting gay rights. Mr. Ford eventually decided to join the group and publicly supported legally recognizing gay unions. The Log Cabin Republicans, a group of gay Republicans, called Mr. Ford "a great man" who will be remembered "for acting as a force for tolerance."

DOJ_NMG_0111478

There was a time, shortly after President Bush's election in 2000, when some of his critics murmured that he was bringing back the Ford White House, noting the return of three prominent veterans of the Ford administration: Vice President Dick Cheney, former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and former Treasury Secretary Paul H. O'Neill.

Six years ago, David Frum, a former Bush speech writer, leapt to the president's defense, arguing in The Weekly Standard that the administration's philosophy and personnel drew more heavily from the Reagan White House. "Ford was not a success in office," Mr. Frum wrote, repeating the columnist Nicholas von Hoffman's observation that Ford's destiny was "to vex generations of schoolchildren yet unborn with the question whether it was he or Martin Van Buren who fought the French and Indian War."

In an interview last week, however, Mr. Frum offered a more sympathetic appraisal, describing Mr. Ford as essentially a Reaganite in fiscal matters and noting that he appointed Alan Greenspan to head his Council of Economic Advisers. "It is very hard to be a great president when the opposition party has not only two-thirds of the votes in Congress but is on an ideological binge," Mr. Frum said.

The liberal American Prospect chose to highlight another influential Ford decision — his nomination of John Paul Stevens to the Supreme Court — when it posted an article on its Web site last week that its editor Harold Meyerson wrote last summer. Mr. Meyerson noted that it was Justice Stevens who wrote both the dissent in Bush v. Gore, the case that put Mr. Bush in the White House, and the majority opinion in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, the case that rejected the Bush administration's use of military tribunals or torture to handle military detainees.

"Ford is one lucky former president, that Stevens, in his mid-80s, has emerged as the leading voice and most effective force in defense of the American democratic system," Mr. Meyerson wrote. "Instead of just having a forgettable presidency and bequeathing the nation two of the most dangerous thugs ever to hold high office," he continued, referring to Mr. Cheney and Mr. Rumsfeld, Mr. Ford's legacy "is at least self-negating."

Historians say it is misleading to judge President Ford by any of the standards of contemporary politics since he operated in a very different context, before the rise of supply-side arguments about tax cuts, social issues like abortion or gay rights, or the rise of radical Islamic terrorism. What is now called "moderate" was then called "establishment" in the Republic Party.

Mr. Smith, the former director of the Ford library and now head of the Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library and Museum, said President Ford was an old school limited-government conservative: "He didn't want government in the classroom, he didn't want it in the board room, and he didn't want it in the bedroom."

In some ways, Mr. Brookhiser of the National Review said, the efforts to memorialize the Ford presidency recall the challenges caricaturists once faced drawing his plain, handsome, even-featured face. "He was the hardest president for cartoonists."

When Ford Lost, So Did Dems (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

ONE OF THE funny things about politics is that people often have a very poor sense of which elections are important and which aren't. This fact hit me a few years ago when I was watching a "Saturday Night Live" episode from 1976. Jane Curtin was on as the host of "Weekend Update," and the joke was that SNL's feelings about the upcoming election could be summed up with a photo of Gerald Ford, defaced with horns and a mustache.

I was only 4 years old in 1976. Seeing this sketch more than 20 years after it first aired, what struck me was the overwhelming strangeness of it. Why would anybody work up a hatred of Ford? And when I thought about it further, it seemed to me that Ford's defeat in the 1976 presidential race may have been one of the worst things that ever happened to American liberalism.

Liberals, of course, detested Ford for his pardon of Richard Nixon, and indeed the pardon was a pretty rotten act. In the light of history, however, Ford comes through as a far more innocuous figure. By the standard of his day, he was a conservative. But by the standard of our times, he's a raging moderate.

In Ford's time, to be a conservative meant to be cautious and prudent. Ford opposed deficits, and he vetoed spending hikes and tax cuts alike. His recently released comments criticizing the Iraq war (made in a 2004 interview but embargoed until after his death) show how alien he found the current president's reckless foreign policy. In his post-presidential career, Ford emerged as a critic of the religious right and an advocate of political reforms, both of which placed him far to the left of today's GOP.

It was Ford's narrow loss to Jimmy Carter in 1976 that enabled the subsequent radicalization of the Republican Party. Carter was a mediocre president, and he came into office under terrible conditions — stagflation, an energy crisis, the wake of a losing war — under which no president could have succeeded. His inevitable failure paved the way for Americans to elect Ronald Reagan. And after Reagan, a new orthodoxy took hold in the Republican Party that celebrated deficit-financed tax cuts, ultra-nationalistic foreign policy and a cynical culture war.

DOJ_NMG_0111479

If Ford had managed to win in 1976, it would have been Republicans who were saddled with the stagflation mess. And a Democrat probably would have won the presidency in 1980 and presided over the expansion that followed. (Stagflation was solved when the Arab oil embargo collapsed and the Federal Reserve induced a recession that crushed inflation.)

So we can now see that 1976 was a great year to let the other party win. With the passions of Watergate running high, the election seemed really important, but it probably had negative importance: Democrats lost by winning.

The same thing probably happened to Republicans two years ago. The 2004 elections seemed like a vital, titanic clash, one many people regarded as the most important of our lifetime. But imagine if John Kerry had won. He'd have presided over a mediocre economy and a war in Iraq for which conservatives would blame him. (Can anybody doubt they'd be saying that we were winning until Kerry screwed it up?) Democrats never would have taken back the House or the Senate in 2006. We'd be poised for another GOP sweep in 2008, and the Republicans would be far less chastised than they are today.

And the elections that people think don't matter often do. Moderates and liberals widely regarded the 2000 presidential campaign as a snoozer. Apathetic liberals held "shadow conventions" that year to highlight the stultifying timidity of the two major parties. The implicit premise of Ralph Nader's 2000 candidacy was that it was as good a year as any for liberals to make a protest statement and throw the election to a Republican. We now can see that the radicalism of George W. Bush, then half-concealed, along with the rallying effect of Sept. 11 made the 2000 election incredibly consequential.

So the 2000 election that so many people thought didn't matter turned out to be the most important election of our lifetime. And the next presidential election, which many said was the most important election of our lifetime, barely mattered at all, and may even have had negative importance — for the Republicans. I guess I ought to be thankful to Kerry for being such an awful candidate. If only Gerald Ford had been a slightly better politician….

Back In View, A First Lady With Her Own Legacy (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

PALM DESERT, Calif., Dec. 30 — It has been a while since America drew its face close to Betty Ford. But what the nation saw this week here in Southern California — an impossibly tiny face, lips pinched in grief and eyes blinking in the harsh midday sun — served as a poignant reminder of the woman whose reign as first lady, while brief and wholly unexpected, was among the most remarkable in modern history.

Former President Gerald R. Ford's death on Tuesday at the age of 93 thrust Mrs. Ford back into a public spotlight that she had largely avoided in recent years.

On Friday, with her children and other family members clustered about her, Mrs. Ford watched as her husband's coffin was carried by a military honor guard into St. Margaret's Episcopal Church here for a private prayer service. It was the beginning of six days of national mourning.

Mrs. Ford has taken pains to keep her husband's death as private an affair as possible for a former president — limiting the prayer service here to only the immediate family, followed by a visitation from a small group of invited friends and then a public viewing.

She has spent the last three decades living in a golf community and tending to her treatment center for alcohol and drugs. But her husband's death has served as a catalyst for an American trip back through the 1970s.

Thrown into the role of first lady during a period of deep distrust in government, she fulfilled the role of honest arbiter of American family life and of the modern woman, speaking candidly on just about any subject she was asked about, both shocking and delighting the country.

She was a product and a symbol of the cultural and political times — doing the Bump along the corridors of the White House, donning a mood ring, chatting on her CB radio with the handle First Mama — a housewife who argued passionately for equal rights for women, a mother of four who mused about drugs, abortion and premarital sex aloud and without regret.

Her candor about her battle with breast cancer, which led to unprecedented awareness among American women about detecting the disease, and her later commitment to alcohol and substance abuse treatment, stemming from her own abuse history, set the stage for widespread acknowledgment and advocacy that is commonplace today.

Given her impact on these crucial health issues and her influence over the modern East Wing, Mrs. Ford's effect on American culture may be far wider and more lasting than that of her husband, who served a mere 896 days, much of it spent trying to restore the dignity of the office of the president.

DOJ_NMG_0111480

"I think that's true," said Carl Sferrazza Anthony, a presidential family historian and expert on first ladies. "The impact of her influence on the general public extended beyond her tenure in the White House. It was a situation of somebody coming along in history who, in simply being themselves, ends up crystallizing something that the nation at large is feeling."

Born Elizabeth Anne Bloomer in Chicago in 1918 and raised in Grand Rapids, Mich., Mrs. Ford was passionate about dance. Not long after she graduated from high school, she studied with Martha Graham in New York City, becoming a member of the Martha Graham Auxiliary Group. In 1941, back in Grand Rapids, she became a fashion coordinator for a department store and formed her own dance group.

After a brief marriage to a furniture salesman, she met Mr. Ford in 1947 and married him the next year, two weeks before he was elected to his first term in Congress. Together they raised four children: Michael Gerald, John Gardner, Steven Meigs and Susan Elizabeth. Her husband's political career, including eight years as House minority leader, and its attending absences often left her lonely and depressed, and she looked forward to private life.

But instead of becoming the wife of a retired congressman, as she expected, in 1974 she found herself first lady when Mr. Ford was sworn in as the 38th president, after the resignation of Richard M. Nixon.

"I went to their house in Virginia," said Sheila Weidenfeld, who served as Mrs. Ford's press secretary. "She came down in her robe. I think it was such a shock when you find out your husband is president, and the next day you had to have a dinner for King Hussein."

There was no learning curve, Ms. Weidenfeld said, nor preparation. "I remember saying to Betty Ford, 'Well, what would you like me to do?' And she said, 'I don't know, what am I supposed to do?' "

Her role was defined in part less than two months into Mr. Ford's presidency, when she discovered that she had breast cancer and then discussed her mastectomy openly in hopes of giving other women the tools to detect the disease early and treat it courageously. According to a 1987 article in The Journal of the National Archives, Mrs. Ford received 55,800 cards, or "92 cubic feet of material," in response to her openness.

The next year, Mrs. Ford took it upon herself to champion the Equal Rights Amendment. She personally phoned legislators, held a slide show in the White House for staff members and gave speeches across the country about women's rights.

She talked about her support of abortion rights and mulled the idea that her children might have smoked marijuana.

Perhaps most infamously, she told Morley Safer in a "60 Minutes" interview that she would provide "counsel" to her daughter, Susan, then 18, if Susan were involved in a sexual relationship, or, in Mr. Safer's words, "having an affair."

"Her husband threw a pillow at her, jokingly, and said, 'You just lost me 10,000 votes,' " Ms. Weidenfeld said. "And Donald Rumsfeld said, 'No, 20,000.' Susan asked her later, 'What's an affair?' "

Ms. Weidenfeld said the times called for candor, and Mrs. Ford was able to provide it. "When Ford said this will be an open presidency, we thought, 'O.K., let's let the first lady open up.' "

While Mrs. Ford drew hundreds of angry letters, public opinion ended up on her side, with "Betty's Husband for President" buttons decorating the campaign trail.

"One day we had finished an event on the floor and we were going back upstairs," recalled Maria Downs, her social secretary at the time. "And I said, 'You don't seem yourself,' and she said, 'I'm all right. I would give my life to have Jerry have my poll numbers.' "

Mrs. Ford remained an accessible first lady, even as her days became consumed with details like choosing centerpieces for state dinners. She consulted with her aides while sitting at the edge of the bathtub, dabbing on her makeup; gave a twist to the scarves of staff members to give them a fashionable edge; and chatted about their furniture choices and children.

Her staff was also forced to tiptoe around late appointments and to scramble schedules stemming from Mrs. Ford's addiction to pain killers, which began when she was prescribed medication in 1964 for a pinched nerve. "She had to cancel events or couldn't leave the house sometimes," said Ms. Weidenfeld, who said she once asked the first lady's doctor to "lay off the pills."

In 1978, Mrs. Ford's family intervened in her drug and alcohol abuse, opening a new chapter in her life as a founder of a clinic in California. She described her recovery process in a 1987 book, "Betty: A Glad Awakening."

Until recently, Mrs. Ford, who is 88, continued to be in charge of her center in Rancho Mirage, and she has remained on the board after handing the helm to her daughter in 2005.

She continues to support treatment centers, attend charity events and speak about substance abuse and breast cancer awareness. Most of all, she enjoyed her expansive and close family, and her time with her husband, whom she remained enamored with through 58 years of marriage.

"Gerald Ford's father abused his mother, and she was a very strong woman and he was unthreatened by strong women," Mr. Anthony, the historian, said of the first couple. "You take that kind of a husband and you look at Betty Ford and you see part of what made her an unusual first lady was the context of her marriage."

DOJ_NMG_0111481

Mrs. Ford's expressions of personal opinions, which several people who worked in the White House at the time say were never discouraged by the president, "were personally held opinions not suited for a political agenda," Mr. Anthony said.

"Even Eleanor Roosevelt, who did speak her mind, was much more politically savvy in terms of knowing what buttons would be pushed," he said. "Betty Ford inherited that role, and she already knew that it was not right for her to say things she didn't mean. In that act, she shattered a precedent and set up a new paradigm for first ladies."

Would-Be Presidents With Cold Shoulders (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

THE campaign for president will dominate American politics in the coming year, and while Republicans and Democrats will no doubt be talking about very different things, they face a common strategic challenge: How do you deal with the folks back in Washington?

For Republican candidates, the problem is President Bush. They are in a different place from the one they were in just two years ago, when Mr. Bush was riding high and the big question was who, if anyone, would win the Bush mantle. It is hard to imagine, at least today, Republicans squabbling over who gets a moment on a stage with the president.

The trick for Republican candidates is to distance themselves from Mr. Bush without offending Republican loyalists on guard for anyone showing disrespect to the president, or offending Mr. Bush's own considerable corps of advisers and contributors, any one of whom could prove useful in 2008. Talking about spending is one way to create that distance. Senator John McCain of Arizona, for one, has made a point of criticizing the deficits during Republican rule in Washington.

But will any of them aggressively distance themselves from Mr. Bush's Iraq policy? Could there be a spot in this cycle for an antiwar Republican? And could any echo the chord Barack Obama has struck on the Democratic side by promising an end to the brutal partisanship that has marked the Bush era, and campaign against Mr. Bush, however discreetly, on this ground?

Democrats have a different kind of problem as they try to figure out how closely to be associated with the new Democratic-controlled Congress. Democrats, led by Nancy Pelosi in the House and Harry Reid in the Senate, could take up bills — perhaps on taxes or spending in Iraq — that might not play so well for a presidential candidate.

Alternatively, Congressional Democrats might face a legislative breakdown and accomplish nothing at all — again not the kind of record a Democratic presidential candidate wants to be associated with. Complicating things is the fact that at least four of the prospective Democratic candidates are full-fledged members of Congress: Senators Obama of Illinois, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and John Kerry of Massachusetts.

This Clinton Machine Is a Tighter Ship (LAT)

By Stephen Braun

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has spent much of the last month behind closed doors, putting the final touches on a presidential campaign-in-waiting.

Her hectic schedule has been crammed with private lunches and phone conversations with elected officials and political operatives. She has sounded out Democratic Party officials from New York to Des Moines about her chances and hired a cadre of new campaign aides.

And she has made time for television interviews, re-releases of her books and delicately timed appearances with her high-wattage husband.

It is all part of a political organization that has been under construction since the turbulent Clinton White House years and was bolstered by two successful Senate campaigns. Awaiting only her go-ahead — with a decision expected in January — the machine that Hillary built has the heft and advance billing of an election-year juggernaut.

It is a high-stakes fusion of her political world and her husband's, two camps with markedly different styles and, at times, competing agendas and egos. The test, should she decide to run, will be getting the two cultures to work together.

"Her organization is much different than the old Clinton organization," said New York political consultant Hank Sheinkopf, who worked on President Clinton's 1996 reelection effort. "She has a whole loyal national network of her own. They're all hard, tough people. The trick she'll have is to find a way to blend them in and keep them together."

Bill Clinton ran a loose and leaky ship during his two White House terms, and many in his old brain trust who are expected to return to the fold for a Hillary Clinton presidential campaign now have careers to tend and outside interests to promote.

By contrast, "Hillaryland" is a disciplined structure of her own design, a tight-knit realm populated by discreet, fiercely devoted aides who have been with the former first lady since her East Wing days, along with newer additions who serve on her Senate staff. Some wonder if her circle is too buffered.

DOJ_NMG_0111482

"The danger she faces," one longtime Clinton intimate said, "is the problem of insularity. You saw that at times in the Clinton White House. She tends to filter a lot through her most trusted people. That's an advantage when things are going well. But you can get closed off when things are falling apart."

Her machine would nonetheless be tested early. Recent polls in New Hampshire and Iowa show Clinton would have stiff competition from two potential Democratic rivals, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former vice presidential candidate John Edwards.

"The challenge she'll have in the primaries is building something that's lean and supple, an operation that can turn on a dime," said Democratic pollster Geoffrey D. Garin.

Clinton's closest aide is, of course, her husband — "the best strategist of his generation," Sheinkopf says. But their dynamic would make for a unique campaign with its own risks and opportunities.

The former president will have to restrain the urge to grab the spotlight. "It's her campaign, not his," Sheinkopf said.

During recent appearances together, intimates say, the former president has had to work to rein in his impulse to play to the crowd. "You can see him champing at the bit," one said.

Hillary Clinton has warmed on the stump, but party leaders still worry that Bill Clinton's mastery of the stage muffles her presence by comparison. And a recent spate of news accounts of the Clintons' marriage and reversed political roles have dredged up unwelcome memories of the Monica S. Lewinsky affair and the impeachment crisis.

In her Senate run this year, the Clintons often deployed separately across New York, operating like complementary vaudeville troupers. While the senator concentrated on working-class communities upstate, pushing economic hardship issues to win over independents and suburban Republicans, the former president secured the Democratic base in New York, hobnobbing with East Side donors and barnstorming in Harlem and elsewhere in Manhattan. She easily won reelection, taking 67% of the vote.

Most Clinton loyalists insist the couple would be a magnetic duo. "He's the best campaign weapon any Democrat can have — and that includes his wife, who's superb in her own right," said John Catsimatidis, an influential New York supermarket chain owner who is a longtime Clinton donor.

After her husband, the senator depends most on her core staff. These aides dubbed their close-knit enclave Hillaryland after whimsical signs that sprouted inside the Little Rock transition office in 1992 to identify the camps working for Clinton, Vice President Al Gore and their spouses (the others were Clintonville, Goreville and Tipper Town). The self-mocking tag remained after the first lady's protectors circled the wagons during Whitewater, Travelgate and the impeachment.

Patti Solis Doyle, a Hillaryland stalwart who was Hillary Clinton's first hire as scheduler in 1992, is expected to be tapped as campaign manager. Doyle, 41, had key roles in both Senate campaigns, and most recently headed up Hillpac, the well-oiled fundraising arm that drummed up more than $50 million in donations for 2006.

Doyle has long been considered the senator's most reliable aide and confidant. She is among the few, one Hillarylander said, "who can talk tough to Hillary and get away with it." A selfless wunderkind from Chicago's hard-boiled political terrain who shuns publicity, Doyle won Clinton's lasting admiration by helping rejuvenate her flagging first election effort in 2000.

"Patti's there because she has the best working knowledge of Mrs. Clinton's history, her needs and her desires," said G. Neel Lattimore, a Children's Defense Fund communications strategist who was the first lady's press secretary. "She can get people in a room who are warring with each other to calm down and make the tough decisions."

Those skills might prove critical in blunting the sharp elbows sometimes thrown by the senator's troika of senior political strategists. Mark J. Penn, Mandy Grunwald and Harold M. Ickes all had integral stints during the Clinton administration and have since worked at close quarters in both of Hillary Clinton's Senate triumphs.

Directing overall strategy would fall to Penn, the centrist pollster who was a key player in Bill Clinton' 1996 reelection and now works as chief executive of the Burson-Marsteller public relations firm. Advertising decisions would be handled by Grunwald, who had a pivotal role shaping ads in Bill Clinton's first presidential run. Ickes, the acerbic son of Franklin Roosevelt's Interior secretary and a Clinton White House deputy chief of staff, would probably oversee the campaign's budget and relations with party officials and affiliated "527" committees, groups that can spend money on behalf of candidates or issues but cannot give it to their campaigns. Ickes also would delve into voter profiling, an interest he developed while running Catalist, a private database targeting firm.

Communications strategy in Clinton's Senate campaigns has been overseen by Howard Wolfson, a New York public relations veteran who is already handling campaign-related media for Clinton.

During Hillary Clinton's campaigns, these four aides have dominated a daily 7:30 a.m. conference call in which her political strategy was hammered out and her daily message crafted. "It's not for the faint of heart," one participant said. "Some of these guys hate each other's guts. But the principal finds it useful as long as it doesn't get too vicious."

DOJ_NMG_0111483

There are dangers to blood-letting. Chaos within the presidential campaigns of Al Gore and Sen. John F. Kerry toppled campaign managers and left internal scars.

"That won't happen with Patti because Hillary depends on her too much," one former trusted campaign aide said. "If there are casualties, they'd be lower down the food chain."

A slew of other Clinton familiars are expected to help out. High-profile Democratic consultant James Carville, who lauded the "power of Hillary" in a widely circulated article he and Penn wrote earlier this year, is expected to provide strategic advice. Howard G. Paster, who was Bill Clinton's chief congressional lobbyist and works with Penn as chairman of Burson-Marsteller's executive board, is said to be primed for a senior advisory role. Former Democratic National Committee chief and Clinton friend Terry McAuliffe is slated to line up top donors along with a new hire, campaign finance director Jonathan Mantz, a Democratic Party financial expert.

Hillary Clinton's heavy spending in the 2006 campaign — too heavy, some said — left her with a less-than-bountiful $14 million in the bank. But Ann Lewis, communications director for Hillpac, noted that more than $11 million of the $37 million outlay was used to build a massive national database — essential to mining millions more in small donations and profiling likely volunteers.

"The money we spent was well worth it," Lewis said.

Catsimatidis said he and other big donors on both coasts were already being approached to replenish the coffers. In New York, the effort revolves around venture capitalist Alan J. Patricof, Sen. Clinton's campaign chair and a longtime fundraiser for the couple. In California, key money players will probably be Susie Tompkins Buell, co-founder of the Esprit clothing company, billionaire Ron Burkle and entertainment chief Haim Saban, who recently hosted the Clintons at an annual Mideast policy forum he sponsors in Washington.

"She can raise whatever she needs," said Maurice Carroll, director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute.

For policy advice, Clinton would turn to John Podesta, who was her husband's White House chief of staff and now heads the Center for American Progress, a progressive think tank with strong connections to his former employers. "I talk to her from time to time on policy and issues," Podesta said. "There's no formal structure at this point."

Despite the center's "nonaligned" status, Sen. Clinton played a "formative" role in discussions that led to its creation, Podesta acknowledged recently.

New hires from Democratic party ranks also have been brought in, depriving rivals of some of the party's top talent. Phil Singer, communications director for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, would run Clinton's war room. Blogging whiz and former Kerry Internet aide Peter Daou would tackle Web-based opposition research. Karen Hicks, who was Howard Dean's New Hampshire primary field director, is set to run Clinton's early primaries. Burns Strider, who spearheaded religious outreach for the House Democratic caucus, has been hired to tap into the evangelical Christian movement.

Along with the professionals, Clinton aides expect a groundswell of women — political operatives, donors, volunteers — would flock to Hillary Clinton because she is a female presidential candidate.

"She wants people who work for her to want to be there out of a sense of mission, not just simply as professionals," said Lorraine Voles, Clinton's Senate communications director.

The mission, Voles said, "would be electing the first woman president. It's not the only thing that brings people in the door, but it's what would be on everyone's minds over the long run."

"That is," Voles added, "assuming she runs."

Schwarzenegger Looks Beyond California As Second Term Begins (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci

San Francisco Chronicle, December 31, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger -- whose eclectic resume as a bodybuilder, movie star and successful politician suggests a never-ending pursuit of the new challenge -- is preparing for the next one.

As he starts his second term, the Republican governor is intent on taking his message of bipartisan cooperation to the rest of the country as part of an ambitious effort aimed at shaping politics on both sides of the aisle.

Schwarzenegger wants to press Republicans and Democrats for more "action, action, action" -- with particular attention to appealing to the growing ranks of decline-to-state and independent voters increasingly turned off by partisan politics.

For the California governor, the issues open to bipartisan solutions are as diverse as redistricting, health care and prison reform. But Schwarzenegger doesn't intend to stay within state boundaries as he addresses such matters, planning to make his case in states that will play center stage in presidential politics -- New Hampshire, Ohio and Iowa among them.

DOJ_NMG_0111484

"He's always looking to build something: his body, his movie career, his business. And now he's looking to build on being the governor of California," said Karen Hanretty, a former state Republican Party spokeswoman and now a consultant and television commentator.

With an overwhelming victory last November that gave the GOP a bright spot in an otherwise dismal year across the nation, the governor may now be aiming to "supersize Arnold," Hanretty said -- trying "to elevate himself to the next level -- or maybe it's a question of elevating the stature of California."

No wonder Schwarzenegger, even as he was hobbled by a leg broken in a skiing accident, announced last week a "research and innovation initiative" to boost the economy in biotech, nanotech and "clean tech" areas.

Such moves, insiders said, keep California on the leading edge both politically and economically, and may help moderate the GOP's rigid conservatism demonstrated during the Bush presidency and the Republican control of Congress.

Schwarzenegger communications director Adam Mendelsohn said the governor's focus remains his home state.

"The governor is very passionate about public service and passionate about California," Mendelsohn said. "And nothing inspires the governor more than bringing the ideas of California to the forefront."

The governor, who formally begins his second term Friday, will shape his ambitious calender in 2007 with the same inner circle of advisers who handled his re-election campaign, including campaign manager Steve Schmidt and Matt David, who ran his campaign "war room," as well as Democratic chief of staff Susan Kennedy and Mendelsohn.

The question being asked by political observers watching the governor's attempt to expand his political profile: What's in it for him?

Schwarzenegger, in the past, has explained his political drives as a direct result of personal growth.

"In the beginning I was selfish: It was all about -- how do I build Arnold? How can I win the most Mr. Universe and Mr. Olympic contests? How can I get into the movies and get into business? I was thinking about myself," he once said. "As I grew up, got older, maybe wiser, I think your life is judged not by how much you have taken but by how much you give back."

But some skeptical Democrats say Schwarzenegger's motivation is about political ambition, noting he has hinted at a run for U.S. Senate in the future.

"I think it's about him; I don't think it's about his party," said Garry South, a former senior adviser to Schwarzenegger's predecessor, Democratic Gov. Gray Davis. "I have never gotten a sense Arnold stays up worrying about the future of the GOP."

Democratic strategist Chris Lehane, a former White House spokesman, said, "Arnold is always concerned, first and foremost, with the Arnold brand, and that is reinforced and amplified by exporting 'Arnoldism.'

"He tapped into something with the lesson from 2006: The American public recognizes that there are enormous issues facing the country and that (voters) reject the George W. Bush philosophy -- that one should govern to the base, by the base and for the base," Lehane said.

The challenge for the governor in trying to spread the gospel of "Arnoldism," Lehane said, is that "the Republican Party, no matter how you slice it, is still governed by its base. The Republican primary doesn't give you a ticket to play unless conservatives punch it first."

But Hanretty said the California governor has shown an uncanny knack for political timing.

Schwarzenegger's moves come during a noticeable "vacuum of leadership in the GOP."

"President Bush does not command respect from Republicans -- whether we're talking about grassroots or establishment Republicans," she said. With the party fresh from a midterm drubbing, "none of the Republican leadership is even very well known."

Clearly, "there is an opportunity right now for a Republican to stand out (on the national stage) ... because, who else is there?" she said.

But Bill Whalen, Hoover Institution research fellow, said the California governor is a unique political actor.

"Arnold bipartisanship works in California because Arnold works for Arnold," Whalen said. "He's not necessarily working for anyone."

Still, political insiders on both sides of the aisle have speculated that the governor's "big picture" approach means that he will have more influence as the 2008 presidential race begins in earnest; that means he could act either as an endorser or an active campaigner who could help swing delegate-rich California.

But South scoffs at that idea.

"Look how powerful his own coattails were in 2006," when -- even as a landslide winner -- Democrats dominated statewide offices and didn't lose a legislative seat. And Schwarzenegger, who actively campaigned for some Assembly Republicans in 2004, was also unable to convince voters to follow his recommendations.

The lesson, South said: "Arnold's star power is not transferable to anybody. It is unique to himself. He has no coattails."

DOJ_NMG_0111485

So on the national races, "he can have influence -- but the notion that he can power a GOP presidential candidate is silly," he said.

Mendelsohn, the governor's communications director, insisted his boss' plan for action in 2007 is simple.

"The governor believes that the more we do here in California, the more influence we'll have abroad."

Job Evaluation: Arnold Schwarzenegger (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

GOV. ARNOLD Schwarzenegger's year began with an apology and ended with a victory. In other words, it got better as it went along. His performance evaluation reflects his progress in several important areas.

Knowledge of job: Meets expectations. Employee was recently rehired to four-year term and appears to have settled into job. Has become more comfortable with company culture and the bounds of his authority following a shaky start. Has also come to develop a much better knowledge of the organization's goals, has embraced them as his own and has begun to lead.

Job effectiveness: Exceeds expectations. With colleagues in other branches of organization, produced landmark legislation to reduce greenhouse gases, placed on ballot and persuaded voters to approve unprecedented infrastructure bond measures, brokered low-cost prescription drug plan, opened debate on housing and healthcare issues.

Critical thinking skills: Exceeds expectations. Perceives political problems, navigates them to achieve policy objectives. Previous position involved rote learning and heavily rehearsed behavior; employee's ability to improvise and respond to conditions is a welcome surprise.

Works well with others: Exceeds expectations. Employee was hired after severely criticizing performance of predecessor in position and colleagues-to-be, but he abandoned adversarial approach and developed close working relationships with other branch leaders to produce substantive programs. Rapport with Democratic Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez has become exemplar for those holding his position. Has developed strategic dialogue with private enterprise, labor and other experts to solve some of organization's deepest problems. Has demonstrated outstanding teamwork and consensus-building skills. Exhibits little of the egocentricity for which he was known in previous positions.

Financial management: Below expectations. Produced competent budget. Failed to reduce structural budget deficit of over $5 billion. Persists in troublesome campaign finance practices, such as raising money from donors while bills affecting their interests await his signature or veto.

Areas for improvement: Must work harder to effect many of the financial controls for which he was first hired. Employee has committed to solving state's healthcare, prisons, budget deficit, redistricting and immigration problems — tasks that should be expected to keep him occupied through the first fiscal quarter.

Different Climate, Different Pawlenty (MINNST)

By Patricia Lopez

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 31, 2006

After a brush with political death, a reinvigorated Gov. Tim Pawlenty begins his second term this week facing huge DFL majorities in the Legislature and acknowledging that compromise is no longer optional.

Promising a change in agenda and tactics for the legislative session, which will convene Wednesday, Pawlenty has already advocated universal health coverage for Minnesotans, proposed free college tuition for the state's top students, and thrown his weight behind expansions of mass transit and greater reliance on renewable fuels.

But he hasn't turned into Democratic-lite, Pawlenty added quickly in a recent interview. He remains committed to fiscal conservatism and wants to tie taxpayer money to results, shifting government from what he calls a "seniority culture to a performance culture."

But Pawlenty is pragmatic about the seismic shift November's election brought to the political landscape and the direction of his own party.

"There has to be a reconciliation of their perspective and my perspective," he said of the newly powerful DFL.

At 46, Pawlenty remains boyish, genial, optimistic. But he's less brash, less combative and just a tad grayer than he was in 2003. Back then, backed by a strong Republican House, he all but dared DFLers to cross him and bragged of getting "everything we wanted."

Four years' experience with budget crises, legislative gridlock, a state government shutdown and his near-loss in November have tempered Pawlenty's judgment and the sometimes wise-cracking style.

Confronted with nearly veto-proof DFL dominance in both legislative chambers, he is open about changing course and style. Dismissing opposing ideas as "profoundly stupid," as he once did, is out.

DOJ_NMG_0111486

"Everybody grows and matures," Pawlenty said, relaxing in a wingback chair as dusk eased over his corner office at the Capitol. "I'm in a different place, a different stage of my life."

What's emerging is a conservative populist streak, an impatience with old-line, shrink-government Republican dogma.

Government has to be smarter, stronger, more daring about taking on entrenched interests -- including business interests -- to effect change, Pawlenty said.

Changing the brand

Charlie Weaver, Pawlenty's close friend, former chief of staff and now head of the Minnesota Business Partnership, said this kind of thinking isn't new for Pawlenty.

"He's never been as conservative as people have portrayed him," Weaver said. When Pawlenty was struggling to resolve a $4.5 billion projected deficit, Weaver said, "he'd say, 'I can't wait until the day when we dig ourselves out and we can do stuff.' The things he's talking about now reflect the kind of thinking he's noodled for years, how government can be better, smarter."

The public has tired, Pawlenty said, of a Republican message that says government is always the problem, never the solution.

"You can't just say 'no' to everything," he said. "Republicans have to have a positive vision for how you're going to improve schools, deal with the health care crisis, for how we're going to move energy policy. The challenge now is to figure out what is the Republican message that is empowering, that's populist, that's people-oriented."

Such talk leaves true conservative believers such as David Strom, head of the Minnesota Taxpayers League, feeling angry and betrayed.

Pawlenty has become, Strom said, "a Republican who's very bad for the brand. He's mushed it up. He's for all good things, whatever you think a good thing is. He's a triangulator who's positioning himself for VP."

That's VP as in vice president. Having survived the Democratic sweep of 2006, Pawlenty is back on pundits' short list of possible nationwide candidates, even though he demurs whenever the subject comes up, insisting that he intends to serve out his term. But his close alignment with Sen. John McCain, a top presidential contender, is unmistakable.

An unusual Republican

Larry Jacobs, head of the Center for the Study of Governance and Policy at the Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Minnesota, has dubbed Pawlenty's thinking "progressive Republicanism," and said it could prove a winner.

"He'll still be spending consistently less than what Democrats want, tapping the brakes," Jacobs said. "But he also sees some pretty serious flaws in the private market: pharmaceuticals, the oil industry, HMOs. That's a huge departure from Republican orthodoxy."

National political observer Norm Ornstein calls Pawlenty "a very unusual kind of Republican." But, he said, "there's a hunger for a different type of Republican right now."

A South St. Paul boy with blue-collar, meatpacking, truckdriving family roots, Pawlenty said that regular visits to his old hometown have convinced him that government needs to be more aggressive, not less.

Freed from a no-new-taxes pledge that defined his first term, Pawlenty enters his fifth legislative session as governor with a $2 billion projected surplus and a more finely honed set of goals.

Known for bouncing out ideas one after another, he said he'll confine his energies to just a few big ideas this time: serious changes in education, health care and renewable fuels.

The ideal? Teachers would get paid for performance, not years on the job. Health care providers would get paid for results, not procedures. Government would break the oil industry's stranglehold on innovation and make renewable fuels a priority. A statewide smoking ban would pass.

"My critics say, 'Let the market work, Pawlenty. You shouldn't be getting involved,' " he said. "Oh, really? Has anybody reviewed the federal tax code for the tax breaks we give to oil companies? Are we doing a true private market now? The answer is no."

Similarly, he said, government must "get in and drive" health care reform. Details will come out in his proposed budget, scheduled for Jan. 23. Included, he said, will be tax relief but no tax rebate checks.

Obliged by law to submit a tax rebate proposal for the projected surplus, Pawlenty said he nevertheless will make clear that "my preference is for tax relief, not a rebate."

DFLers are skeptical, but are willing to give Pawlenty pragmatism the benefit of the doubt.

"For now I'm going to take the governor at his word," said Senate Majority Leader Larry Pogemiller, DFL-Minneapolis. As former Senate tax chairman, Pogemiller has sat across the table from Pawlenty in budget negotiations for years, going back to Pawlenty's days as House majority leader. He remembers well Pawlenty's earlier posture as a budget hawk.

"How he'll do all this without spending more money is a good question, but we want to work with him," Pogemiller said. "We're waiting for the details."

DOJ_NMG_0111487

Most Americans Say Life Is Good -- At Home (WT/AP)

By Nancy Benac

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

The news from Iraq and national headlines may be grim, but in Greenville, N.C., John Given has a new baby and his first home. Life is good.

So, too, for Sandra Trowbridge in tiny Magnet Cove, Ark. The situation in Iraq makes her feel pessimistic about the state of the nation, but at home, at least, all is well. Even if nothing special has happened to her family, she says, "we still love each other," and that's enough.

And so it goes for most Americans. An Associated Press-AOL News poll finds that while most Americans said 2006 was a bad year for the country, three-fourths thought it had been a good one for them and their families.

"In a time of war, so little has been asked of us as citizens," said Mr. Given, who teaches ancient Greek at East Carolina University. "We haven't had to sacrifice anything. We've been allowed to live our lives very, very well."

Looking ahead, optimism reigns.

Seventy-two percent of Americans feel good about what 2007 will bring for the country, and an even larger 89 percent are optimistic about the new year for themselves and their families, according to the poll.

That fits with a long-term trend suggesting that Americans are generally an optimistic lot. Polling over recent decades is replete with optimism, and with a tendency for people to feel more positively about their own situations than that of the country overall.

Self-proclaimed optimists and pessimists think they understand why.

Krista Grueninger, communications director for Optimists International, a volunteer service organization based in St. Louis, says it's easier for people to be optimistic about their situation "because they feel they have more control over their own lives."

"It kind of goes along with the American dream: If you really want something, you can go out and get it," she said.

Iowan Jack Duvall, who organized a tongue-in-cheek countervailing group called the Iowa City Benevolent & Loyal Order of Pessimists, says that when people look at the country, "it's easy to say, 'No, I'm not optimistic.' " But on a micro level, he says, "We insist on seeing our lives as having hope."

Pessimists aren't unhappy, he said, "they're just not disappointed as often as optimistic people are."

The current optimistic outlook among Americans does not extend to their assessments of the war in Iraq. Forty percent of those polled expect the situation there to get worse in 2007, and 31 percent see no change on the horizon. Just 27 percent expect the situation there to get better.

Eric Wolley, of Upper Marlboro, Md., paused to look ahead and back last week as he and his 8-year-old daughter, Iyana, took pictures outside the White House.

"For me, personally, financially, it was great," Mr. Wolley, a real estate agent, said of 2006. "Family and everybody's healthy, so everything's been going pretty good." But as for Iraq, he said, "I wish we could go in and get that figured out."

Among the one-quarter of Americans who felt pessimistic about what 2007 will bring for the country, Iraq was a recurrent theme, along with concern about poor political leadership.

"I don't really like the person running the show," one poll respondent said.

"Look at the servicemen that are dying over there," another said.

"I don't think our leaders are capable of fixing the problems," a third said.

Democrats were more likely than Republicans to have a negative view of the past year, and were less likely to feel optimistic looking forward.

The AP-AOL News poll of 1,000 adults was conducted by telephone Dec. 12-14 by Ipsos, an international public opinion research company. The margin of sampling error was plus or minus three percentage points.

January Effect May Take A Year Off (NYT)

By Condrad DeAenlle

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

JANUARY will begin in a few hours, but how about a January effect?

That term has been used to describe various phenomena in the month, including the relatively robust performance of shares of smaller companies or companies judged to be of poorer quality, based on factors like earnings consistency and dividend yield. It can also refer simply to strength in broad market averages, versus other months.

DOJ_NMG_0111488

Henry H. McVey, a strategist at Morgan Stanley, has warned that the market rally investors are accustomed to enjoying as a year begins may already have come and gone. Action in the stock market "could be bumpy, including a pullback in January," he said in a note to the bank's clients.

"Returns have been positive for 6 straight months and 11 out of the last 12 months," he noted. "Also, in recent years, it appears that fourth-quarter rallies have taken a lot of the steam out of the traditional January effect, and as such we would not be surprised to see a correction" in the first quarter.

Richard Bernstein, chief investment strategist at Merrill Lynch, finds an especially strong discrepancy in returns based on quality. Since 1987, stocks that Standard & Poor's rates C and D have beaten returns of those rated A+ by 7.8 percentage points, on average, the first month each year.

Mr. Bernstein said in a research report that the performance of poor-quality stocks tends to diminish if they have displayed strength in the preceding year. Average returns were 20 points higher this year through Dec. 15 for C and D stocks than for those rated A+.

Mr. Bernstein added that while the January gap often narrows, it doesn't vanish, so he suggests that investors willing to tolerate some risk look at these lower-rated companies. "Given the historical probability of C's and D's outperforming in the month of January, and the magnitude of that outperformance," he said, "we think investors should seriously consider an overweight of low quality for the month of January to take advantage of this distinct seasonal pattern."

But he cautioned against letting those weaklings linger in portfolios. "As January progresses, we recommend investors sell lower-quality stocks into strength and again overweight higher-quality issues," he said.

He says he is so convinced that C's and D's will spend the rest of the year living down to their ratings that he advises other investors to forget the January effect: "For medium- to longer-term investors, we suggest ignoring this possible trade and maintaining a strong overweight in higher-quality issues as our longer-term theme of focusing on quality remains intact."

DATA WATCH The December employment report arrives Friday. A Bloomberg News poll of economists estimates that 115,000 net new jobs were created, a subdued showing after the 132,000 in November.

The Grown-Ups Step In (WP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

FINALLY, THE grown-ups have seen fit to mediate in the spitting match that passes for fraternal relations within Virginia's Republican Party. Northern Virginia's two Republican congressmen, Reps. Thomas M. Davis III and Frank R. Wolf, along with the new state party chairman, Ed Gillespie, and Robert F. McDonnell, the attorney general, are trying to broker an intraparty deal on state funding for transportation. No doubt they have been moved to action by well-founded fear -- fear that voters have grown tired and testy at the ongoing spectacle of the GOP's civil war and fear that the party as a whole will be punished at the ballot box next fall for its contemptible failure to address the state's transportation mess. Whatever the motive for the intervention, here's the only way the mess will be solved: with taxes.

It's been 20 years since Virginia (with a Democratic governor and a Democrat-controlled state legislature) tapped a new funding source for its overstressed roads and rails. Since then, the state's population and economy have boomed, and traffic has mounted in key areas. Meanwhile, the legislature has come under the control of Republicans divided into Senate moderates, who grasp that roads require an adequate, stable, long-term source of revenue, and House fundamentalists, whose anti-tax zealotry has blocked any reasonable funding plan.

Billions in new revenue are needed to deal just with Northern Virginia's road mess and to ensure that maintenance costs do not deplete the state's entire road-building budget within the next few years. But the House has managed to propose only short-term, small-potatoes, gimmicky fixes designed more to provide political cover than deal with a generational problem. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, has rightly rejected those and insisted on a long-term approach. The result: political gridlock to match that on Virginia's roads.

Now Republican leaders are looking at the ballot next November, and they don't like what they see. All 140 members of the state's General Assembly will be up for reelection, and plenty of voters may not take the trouble to sort the good Republicans from the bad -- that is, to distinguish between those who comprehend that new taxes are unavoidable and those whose allegiance is more to conservative Republican orthodoxy than to the everyday concerns of commuters. They're more likely just to vote against candidates with an R after their names and be done with it.

So party elders are knocking heads. So far, according to reporting by The Post's Michael D. Shear, there is little to show for their efforts.

No one likes higher taxes. But without them, the state's most populous and dynamic regions -- Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads -- will strangle on their own congestion. Let's hope the GOP grown-ups can sell a new year's resolution to the party's hard-liners -- preferably one that involves investing in the state's future before it's too late.

DOJ_NMG_0111489

That Blasted Year (WP)

By Dave Barry

The Washington Post Magazine, December 30, 2006

IT WAS A MOMENTOUS YEAR, a year of events that will echo in the annals of history the way a dropped plate of calamari echoes in an Italian restaurant with a tile floor. Decades from now, our grandchildren will come to us and say, "Tell us, Grandpa or Grandma, as the case may be, what it was like to be alive in the year that Angelina Jolie, Tom Cruise, Brad Pitt, Britney Spears and Katie whats-hername all had babies, although not necessarily in those combinations." And we will smile wisely and emit a streamer of drool, because we will be very old and unable to hear them.

And that will be a good thing, because there are many things about 2006 that we will not want to remember. This was the year in which the members of the United States Congress, who do not bother to read the actual bills they pass, spent weeks poring over instant messages sent by a pervert. This was the year in which the vice president of the United States shot a lawyer, which turned out to be totally legal inTexas. This was the year in which -- as clearly foretold in the Bible as a sign of the Apocalypse -- Howie Mandel wound up with a hit TV show.

Also, there were many pesky problems left over from 2005 that refused to go away in 2006, including Iraq, immigration, high gas prices, terrorism, global warming, avian flu, Iran, North Korea and Paris Hilton. Future generations are going to look back at this era and ask us how we could have allowed Paris Hilton to happen, and we are not going to have a good answer.[JANUARY]

. . . a month that dawns with petty partisan bickering in Washington, D.C., a place where many people view petty partisan bickering as honest, productive work -- like making furniture. The immediate cause of the bickering is the Republican ethics scandal involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, both of whom you can tell, just by looking at them, are guilty of something. The Democrats charge that the Republicans have created a Culture of Corruption and should be thrown out of office so the Democrats can return to power and run the scandal-free style of government for which they are so famous. The Republicans respond that the Democrats are soft on terrorism, soft on terrorism, soft on terrorism, soft on terrorism. Both sides issue news releases far into the night.

The other big focus of the bickering is the nomination of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. As always, the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings provide high-quality TV entertainment as the nation tunes in to see whether Sen. Edward M. Kennedy will be able to successfully remember the nominee's name. The bulk of the hearings are spent in the traditional manner, with Democrats trying to trick the nominee into revealing his views on abortion, and Republicans reminding the nominee that he does not have to reveal his views on abortion. The subsequent exchange of news releases is so intense that several government fax machines burst into flames.

In the War on Terror, Osama bin Laden, who may or may not be dead, nevertheless releases another audiotape, for the first time making it downloadable from iTunes. Bin Laden also starts a blog, in which he calls upon his followers to destroy the corrupt infidels and also to try to find out how a person, hypothetically, can get Chinese food delivered to a cave.

In the Middle East, Palestinian voters elect the militant Hamas party, which assumes control of government functions such as street repair, which Hamas decides to handle by firing rockets at potholes. Canada also holds elections, which are won by some Canadian, we assume.

In economic news, the big story is the retirement of Federal Reserve Board Chairman Alan Greenspan, who, after 19 years as the person most responsible for guiding the American economy, steps down, taking with him the thanks of a grateful nation and a suitcase containing $11 billion. But the financial news is not so good in . . .[FEBRUARY]

. . . when President Bush, delivering what is billed as a "major address on energy policy," reveals that the nation has an "addiction" to "foreign oil," which comes from "foreign countries" located "outside of the United States" that are getting this oil from "under the ground." To combat this problem, the president proposes the development of "new technology" in the form of "inventions" such as "a Lincoln Navigator that gets 827 miles per gallon," although he allows that this could take "time."

But this bold energy initiative does not get nearly as much attention as the administration's decision to allow a company owned by the United Arab Emirates to operate some U.S. seaports. This outrages Congress, which briefly ceases partisan bickering to demand that the White House return control of the ports, in the interest of national security, to Tony Soprano.

Speaking of guys who avoid the limelight: Vice President Dick Cheney, attempting to bring down a quail with a shotgun, shoots attorney Harry Whittington. Local authorities rule the shooting was an accident, noting that if the vice president were going to intentionally shoot somebody, it would be Nancy Pelosi. The quail is eventually tracked down and vaporized by an F-16.

Internationally, the big news comes from Denmark, center of a mounting furor over some cartoons, published the previous year in a Danish newspaper, that depict a prophet whom, in the interest of not offending anybody, we will refer to as Fohammed. This upsets several million of the prophet's followers, who request a formal apology from the newspaper, greater sensitivity to their religious beliefs and, where necessary, beheadings. Eventually everybody realizes that the whole darned thing was just a silly misunderstanding. That is all we are going to say about this.

DOJ_NMG_0111490

In sports, Super Bowl XVXXLMCMII takes place in Detroit, and by all accounts it's a big success for the Motor City, with huge crowds thronging to both of the restaurants. The Pittsburgh Steelers win a game featuring a controversial play in which an apparent Seattle Seahawk touchdown pass is called back after the Steeler defender -- in what is later ruled an accident -- is gunned down by Vice President Cheney.

But the big sporting event is the Winter Olympics, a glorious quadrennial celebration of world-class virtuoso athletic accomplishment in sports nobody has ever heard of. Surprise winners include Latvia in the 500-kilometer Modified Nordic Combined; the Republic of Irvingkahnistan in the 2,300-meter Slavic Personified; and U.S. skier Bode Miller in Most Nike Commercials Featuring a Competitor Who, in the Actual Competitions, Mainly Falls Down.[MARCH]

. . . the real-estate boom appears to be over, as the government reports that, so far in 2006, only one U.S. homeowner managed to sell his house, and he had to offer, as an incentive to the buyer, his wife. But the employment numbers remain strong, thanks to strong growth in the sector of people trying to get you to refinance your mortgage for, like, the sixth time. Meanwhile, as the average gasoline price creeps past $2.50, the Hummer company, having downsized from the massive Hummer to the somewhat smaller H2, and then to the even smaller H3, begins development of the H4, which the company says will be "a very rugged skateboard."

In the Academy Awards, the overwhelming favorite for best picture is "Brokeback Mountain," the story of two men who discover, while spending many isolated weeks together in the mountains, that they enjoy exchanging instant messages with Mark Foley. But, in a stunning upset, the Oscar for best picture instead goes to "Crash," a documentary about Bode Miller.

In other entertainment news, a book by two San Francisco Chronicle writers revives suspicions about possible steroid use by San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds, alleging, with extensive documentation, that as recently as 10 years ago, Bonds was a woman.

In other science news, thrilled NASA astronomers, in what they describe as a "smashing, surprising" discovery, announce that they have found evidence of pockets of water beneath the surface of Enceladus, one of the moons of Saturn, which strongly suggests -- as has long been suspected -- that astronomers do not get out much.

In foreign news, Israeli voters give a parliamentary majority to acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert because his name can be rearranged to spell "hot eel drum." Meanwhile in Paris, thousands of demonstrators take to the streets and shut down the city to demonstrate the fact that, hey, it's Paris. In the Middle East, tension mounts in response to mounting tension. We don't know specifically what is happening in Africa, but we know it is bad.[APRIL]

. . . Tom DeLay decides not to seek reelection to Congress, making the announcement via audio-tape from a cave somewhere in Pakistan. Republican leaders express relief over DeLay's decision and issue a statement pledging that there will be "no more Republican scandals, unless somebody finds out about Mark Foley."

Meanwhile in the Middle East, tension mounts still higher when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announces that Iran has successfully produced enriched uranium, although he claims that his nation plans to use it only for peaceful purposes, "such as cooking." In Iraq, there is good news and bad news for the Bush administration: The good news is that rival Iraqi leaders have finally agreed on a new prime minister. The bad news is that it is Nancy Pelosi.

Domestically, the national debate over illegal immigration heats up as thousands of demonstrators take to the streets of major U.S. cities, thus causing a total shutdown of Paris. Meanwhile the Mexican government, in what is widely viewed as a deliberate provocation, convenes in Milwaukee. But the big story is the price of gasoline, which continues its relentless climb toward an unprecedented $3 a gallon. Responding quickly, Congress, in a rare display of decisive bipartisan action, takes a recess, with both sides promising to resume bickering the instant they get back.[MAY]

. . . the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which has a budget of over $3 billion, predicts that the 2006 hurricane season will be worse than usual. This item will seem funnier later in the year. In related news, the voters of New Orleans reelect Ray Nagin as mayor, proving that Hurricane Katrina killed far more brain cells than was previously believed.

On the terrorism front, the Bush administration comes under heavy criticism following press reports that the National Security Agency has been collecting telephone records of millions of Americans. Responding to the outcry, President Bush assures the nation that "the government is not collecting personal information on any individual citizen," adding, "Warren H. Glompett of Boston, call your wife back immediately, because your dog has eaten your entire Viagra supply."

In another controversial move, the president announces that he will use National Guard troops to stop illegal immigration. The initial troops are assigned to guard the border between Mexico and Arizona, with California, New Mexico and Texas being covered by Dick Cheney.

DOJ_NMG_0111491

In Houston, former Enron executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling are convicted of fraud by a federal jury, which apparently is not persuaded by the defense's claim that Skilling and Lay could not have been responsible for the collapse of the $100 billion corporation because they were, quote, "both getting haircuts."

TRUE FACT: After the verdict, Lay says, "We believe God in fact is in control."

ANOTHER TRUE FACT: Less than two months later, Lay will die of heart failure.

In sports, Barbaro, the popular racehorse who won the Kentucky Derby, breaks his leg in the Preakness after a freak collision with Bode Miller. Barbaro is forced to retire, although his agent does not rule out future appearances on "Dancing With the Stars." Meanwhile the hottest show on TV is the much-hyped finale of "American Idol," which is won by crooner Taylor Hicks, who narrowly edges out Nancy Pelosi.[JUNE]

. . . the big sports story is the start of the World Cup tournament, with U.S. fans hopeful that our players have finally caught up with the rest of the world in soccer. The American team arrives in Italy brimming with confidence, only to be informed that the tournament is being held in Germany. Undaunted, the team boards a train for Geneva, with the coach promising that "we will score many touchdowns."

In politics, the debate over Iraq continues to heat up, with President Bush insisting that "we must stay the course, whatever it may or may not be," while the Democrats claim that they would bring the troops home "immediately," or "in about six months," or "maybe not for a long time," depending on which particular Democrat is speaking and what time of day it is. On a more positive note, U.S. troops kill Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who is identified by intelligence experts as "a person with a really terrorist-sounding name." In another hopeful development in Iraq, the Sunnis and the Shiites agree to try to come up with a simple way for Americans to remember which one is which.

On the legal front, the U.S. Supreme Court rules that the Bush administration cannot try suspected terrorists in ad hoc military tribunals, after the court learns that the administration is interpreting "ad hoc" to mean "under water."

Dan Rather, who stopped anchoring the evening news in 2005, announces his retirement from CBS after a career spanning 44 years and several galaxies. Explaining his decision, Rather cites a desire to "explore other options" and "not keep getting maced by the CBS security guard."

On a happier note, the United States marks the 50th anniversary of the interstate highway system -- an engineering marvel consisting of 47,000 miles of high-speed roads connecting 157,000 Waffle Houses. A formal ceremony is planned, but it has to be canceled when Dad refuses to stop.[JULY]

. . . the Tour de France bicycle race is once again tainted by suspicions of doping when the winner, American Floyd Landis, is clocked ascending the Alps at over 200 mph. Landis denies that he uses illegal drugs, attributing his performance to, quote, "gears."

In other sports highlights, Italy defeats France in a World Cup final match that is marred by a violent head-butting incident involving Bode Miller. The U.S. team fares poorly in the World Cup, failing to win a single match; the players blame this on their inability to adjust to the "no hands" rule.

But the month's big story occurs in the Middle East, where violence flares along the Israel-Lebanon border in response to the fact that, because of terrible planning, the two countries are located right next to each other. In another troubling international development, rogue state North Korea test-fires seven ballistic missiles, including two believed to be potentially capable of reaching U.S. soil. World tension goes back down when the missiles, upon reaching an altitude of 200 feet, explode and spell "HAPPY BIRTHDAY." American military analysts caution that these missiles "could easily be modified to spell something more threatening."

In other rocket news, the troubled U.S. space program suffers yet another setback when the launch of the shuttle Discovery is delayed for several days by Transportation Security Administration screeners, who insist that the astronauts remove their shoes before they go through the metal detector. Finally, however, Discovery blasts off and flies a flawless mission, highlighted by scientific experiments proving that when you let go of things in space, they float around, same as last year.[AUGUST]

. . . when the International Astronomical Union rules that Pluto will no longer be classified as a major planet, on the grounds that it is "less than half the size of James Gandolfini." A top U.S. law firm immediately files a class-action lawsuit on behalf of Pluto, as well as "anybody else who has been hurt by this ruling or has ever experienced neck pain."

In sports, a French medical laboratory burns to the ground after the catastrophic explosion of Floyd Landis's urine sample.

Fidel Castro is rumored to be seriously ill after publication of photographs showing worms crawling out of his eye sockets. Cuban authorities insist that the aging leader is merely recovering from surgery and that, for the time being, government operations are in the capable hands of Nancy Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0111492

As the situation in Lebanon deteriorates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warns that, if violence continues, the United States will have no choice but to dispatch Vice President Cheney to the region to hunt doves. Within minutes, a cease-fire breaks out, with both sides agreeing to resume fire at a mutually convenient future date.

Meanwhile, commercial air travel turns into a total nightmare. No, wait, it was already a total nightmare. But it turns into an even worse total nightmare after Britain uncovers a terrorist plot targeting international flights, which results in a whole new set of security rules, including a total ban on all gels and liquids, including spit, urine, heavy perspirers and lactating women. After days of chaos at the airports, the TSA issues a new directive stating that "passengers may carry small quantities of liquids on board, but only if they are inside clear, one-quart, sealable plastic bags." This leads to still more chaos, as many TSA employees interpret this to mean that the passengers must be inside the bags. Eventually the TSA issues a clarification stating that "if necessary, the bags can have air holes."

Elsewhere in the War on Terror, the Bush administration suffers a setback when a federal judge in Michigan rules that U.S. authorities cannot call up suspected terrorists and try to get them to switch long-distance carriers.

In crime news, a man in Thailand claims that he had something to do with the 1996 murder of JonBenet Ramsey. It quickly becomes clear that the man is an unstable creep whose story is totally unbelievable, so the cable TV shows drop it.

Ha-ha! Just kidding! The cable TV shows go into days of round-the-clock, All-JonBenet-All-the-Time Wallow Mode. Battalions of legal experts are called in, some of them so excited about the opportunity to revisit the JonBenet tragedy that additional janitors have to be brought to the studios to mop up puddles of expert weewee.

On the weather front, the until-now quiet hurricane season erupts in fearsome fury in the form of Tropical Storm Ernesto, which hurricane experts, using scientific computer models, predict could become a major storm and inflict devastation upon Texas, or possibly Florida or Connecticut. A state of near-panic sets in as millions of coastal residents jam gas stations, hardware stores and supermarkets, while many schools and businesses close. Tension mounts for days, until finally Ernesto slams into Florida with all the fury of a diseased fruit fly. Life slowly returns to normal for everyone except the ever-vigilant hurricane experts, who immediately begin scanning their scientific computer simulations for the next potentially deadly threat.[SEPTEMBER]

. . . Steve Irwin, of "Crocodile Hunter" fame, is fatally wounded while filming a new TV series-- in what biologists describe as a freak accident -- he collides with Bode Miller. Meanwhile, Americans -- already on edge because of concern over terrorism, avian flu, AIDS, nuclear escalation and global warming -- find themselves facing a deadly new menace: killer spinach. The lethal vegetable is removed from supermarket shelves by police SWAT teams; many units of innocent produce are harmed. Paris shuts down completely.

Speaking of vegetables, the U.S. Congress is rocked by yet another scandal with the publication of e-mails and instant messages sent to male pages by Congressman Mark Foley of Florida, in which he explicitly discusses acts of a sheepherding nature. As the scandal expands, House Republican leaders issue a statement claiming that they "are not aware of any so-called Congressman Mark Foley of Florida." Democrats cite Foley as another example of Republican corruption, declaring that they would never, ever, under any circumstances tolerate such behavior, unless it involved a consenting page.

In other political developments, the New York Times prints a leaked top-secret government report expressing doubts about the war in Iraq. The Bush administration holds a secret meeting to prepare a response, but within hours the Times prints leaked details of the meeting, including who went to the bathroom and why. The administration then attempts to take out the Times building with a missile, but the Times, using leaked launch codes, redirects the missile to The Washington Post. As the debate over Iraq heats up, President Bush pledges to "keep on continuing to stay the present course while at the same time not doing anything different." Democratic leaders declare that they have a "bold new plan" for Iraq, which they will reveal just as soon as the New York Times leaks it to them.

Abroad, Pope Benedict XVI gets in big trouble when he gives a speech suggesting that the Muslim religion has historically been linked to violence. Ha-ha! What a crazy idea! The pope soon sees that he has made a big mistake and apologizes several times.

Rumors about Fidel Castro's health continue to swirl following publication of a photograph showing Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez shaking Castro's hand. The rest of Castro's body is nowhere to be seen.[OCTOBER]

. . . North Korea conducts an underground nuclear test, which is especially troubling because the ground in question is located in Wyoming. This goes virtually unnoticed in Washington, where everybody continues to be obsessed with the growing body of instant messages generated by Mark Foley, who, despite his busy schedule as a lawmaker, apparently found time to attempt to become sheepherding buddies with pretty much every young male in North America.

In other political developments, Sen. Barack Obama, looking back on a career in the U.S. Senate that spans nearly 20 months, allows as how he might be ready to move on to the presidency. Obamamania sweeps the nation as millions of voters find themselves deeply impressed by Obama's views and the fact that he was on "Oprah." In a gracious gesture from a potential 2008 rival, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton sends Obama a good-luck card, which is stapled to the head of a horse.

DOJ_NMG_0111493

Opponents of illegal Mexican immigration had cheered when Congress authorized the construction of a 700-mile fence. Their cheers quickly fade when they learn that, because of wording inserted at the last minute by Sens. Robert Byrd and Ted Stevens, 650 miles of the fence will be constructed in West Virginia and Alaska.

Vice President Dick Cheney again becomes the center of controversy when, while being interviewed on a radio show, he defends the interrogation technique known as "water-boarding" as a legitimate anti-terrorism tool, not torture. At first the host disagrees, but after several "commercial breaks," Cheney brings him around.

A strong earthquake shocks Hawaii, causing Paris to shut down completely.

In sports, a football game between the University of Miami and Florida International University is marred by violence, prompting both schools to seriously consider banning players from carrying handguns onto the field. In baseball, the New York Yankees, despite being clearly the best and most expensive team the world has ever seen, fail to even get into the World Series, leaving Yankee fans to spend yet another bitter off-season wondering why their team can't simply be awarded the championship and not have to play these stupid games against clearly inferior teams from dirtball cities that don't even have subways.[NOVEMBER]

. . . when Kerry's "joke" causes widespread outrage, prompting Kerry, with typical humility, to insist that it was obviously humorous and that anybody who disagrees is an idiot. Kerry is finally subdued by Democratic strategists armed with duct tape, but not before many political analysts see a tightening of the race to control Congress.

As the campaign lumbers to the finish line, the Republicans desperately hope that the voters will not notice that they -- once the party of small government -- have turned into the party of war-bungling, corruption-tolerating, pork-spewing power-lusting toads, while the Democrats desperately hope that the voters will not notice that they are still, basically, the Democrats. The actual voters, of course, are paying no attention, having given up on politics months ago because every time they turn on the TV all they see are political ads accusing pretty much every candidate on either side of being, at minimum, a child molester.

Thus nobody really knows what will happen as the voters go to the polls. In Florida, nobody knows anything even after the voting is over, because -- prepare to be shocked -- many electronic balloting machines malfunction. Voters in one district report that their machines, instead of displaying the candidates for Congress, showed "Star Wars: Episode IV." (By an overwhelming margin, this district elects Jabba the Hutt.) Nationwide, however, it eventually becomes clear that the Democrats have gained control of both houses of Congress. President Bush handles the defeat with surprisingly good humor, possibly because his staff has not told him about it. For their part, future House and Senate majority leaders Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid issue a joint statement promising to "make every effort to find common ground with the president," adding, "We are clearly lying." Pelosi sets about the difficult task of trying to fill leadership posts with Democrats who have not been videotaped discussing bribes with federal undercover agents.

The first major casualty of the GOP defeat is Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who, the day after the election, is invited to go quail-hunting with the vice president. He is never seen again. As Rumsfeld's replacement, the president nominates -- in what is widely seen as a change in direction on Iraq -- Barbra Streisand.

In other celebrity news, Michael Richards, a graduate of the Mel Gibson School of Standup, responds to a comedy-club heckler by unleashing a racist tirade so vile that even John Kerry realizes it is not funny. A chastened Richards apologizes for his behavior, citing, by way of explanation, the fact that he is a moron.

Speaking of which, O.J. Simpson is once again in the headlines when Fox TV announces that Simpson will be interviewed on a two-night special in conjunction with his new book, If I Did It, in which he will explain how, "hypothetically," he would have murdered Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman. This idea is so sick, so disgusting, so utterly depraved that it would undoubtedly get huge ratings. But Fox, faced with withering criticism, is forced to cancel the project, which is the brainchild of publisher Judith Regan, about whom you could write a "hypothetical" book titled If Judith Regan Had the Moral Standards of a Tapeworm.

On the economic front, the holiday shopping season officially kicks off with "Black Friday," and retailers are pleased with the numbers: 2,038 shoppers hospitalized, up 37 percent from last year.

In other good news, with only a few days left in the virtually storm-free 2006 hurricane season and still no storms in sight, U.S. weather experts, citing new data, predict that the season will end up having been very mild. This forecast turns out to be right on the money, but the experts waste no time on self-congratulation, as they immediately begin making scientific predictions for next year's hurricane season, which, they warn, could be a bad one.[DECEMBER]

. . . gets off to a troubling start , with the worsening situation in Iraq worsening faster than ever. The nation's hopes for a solution are pinned on the Iraq Study Group, a presidentially appointed blue-ribbon panel consisting of five Republicans, five Democrats and the Wizard of Oz. In accordance with longstanding Washington tradition, the panel first formally leaks its report to the New York Times, then delivers it to the president, who turns it over to White House personnel specially trained in reading things.

DOJ_NMG_0111494

In essence, the study group recommends a three-pronged approach, consisting of: 1) a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops, but not on a fixed timetable; 2) intensified training of Iraqi troops; and 3) the physical relocation of Iraq, including buildings, to Greenland. Republican and Democratic leaders, after considering the report for the better part of a nanosecond, commence what is expected to be a minimum of two more years of bickering.

With the Iraq situation pretty much solved, the world's attention shifts to Iran and its suspected nuclear program, which becomes the subject of renewed concern after U.S. satellites detect a glowing 400-foot-high spider striding around Tehran. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad insists that it is "a peaceful spider" that will be used "only for mail delivery." Shortly thereafter, North Korea -- in what many observers see as a deliberate provocation -- detonates a nuclear device inside the Lincoln Memorial.

Finally responding to these new threats to international stability, the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council -- the United States, the United Kingdon, Russia, China and Google -- hold an emergency meeting in Paris, where, after heated debate, they vote to have a bottle of 1959 Chateau Margaux with their entree. Unfortunately, they cannot agree on a dessert wine, causing the city, which had just reopened, to shut down completely.

In other food news, New York City, having apparently solved all of its other problems, bans "trans fats." Hours later, police surround a Burger King in Brooklyn and fire 50 bullets into a man suspected of carrying a concealed Whopper. The medical examiner's office, after a thorough investigation, concludes that the man "definitely could have developed artery problems down the road."

Speaking of health problems, rumors that Fidel Castro is ailing gain new strength when, at an official state dinner in Havana, a waiter accidentally tips over the longtime Cuban leader's urn, spilling most of him on the floor.

In other deceased-Communist news, British police rule that the mysterious death of a former Russian spy in London was a murder, caused by the radioactive element polonium-210. New York immediately bans the element, forcing the closure of 70 percent of the city's Taco Bells.

As the year, finally, nears its conclusion, Americans turn their attention to the holiday season, which they celebrate -- as generations have before them -- by frantically overbidding on eBay for the Sony PlayStation 3, of which Sony, anticipating the near-homicidal level of demand, manufactured an estimated 11 units. Millions of Americans also head "home for the holidays," making this one of the busiest air travel seasons ever. The always vigilant TSA responds by raising the Security Threat Level to "ultraviolet," which means that passengers may not board an airplane if they contain blood.

But despite the well-founded fear of terrorism, the seemingly unbreakable and escalating cycle of violence in the Middle East, the uncertain world economic future, the menace of global warming, the near-certainty that rogue states run by lunatics will soon have nuclear weapons, and the fact that America is confronting these dangers with a federal government sharply divided into two hostile parties unable to agree on anything except that the other side is scum, Americans face the new year with a remarkable lack of worry, and for a very good reason: They are busy drinking beer and watching football.

So, Happy New Year.

(Burp.)

Dave Barry can be reached at 20071@washpost.com.

Bush Has Quietly Tripled Aid To Africa (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

President Bush's legacy is sure to be defined by his wielding of U.S. military power in Afghanistan and Iraq, but there is another, much softer and less-noticed effort by his administration in foreign affairs: a dramatic increase in U.S. aid to Africa.

The president has tripled direct humanitarian and development aid to the world's most impoverished continent since taking office and recently vowed to double that increased amount by 2010 -- to nearly $9 billion.

The moves have surprised -- and pleased -- longtime supporters of assistance for Africa, who note that because Bush has received little support from African American voters, he has little obvious political incentive for his interest.

"I think the Bush administration deserves pretty high marks in terms of increasing aid to Africa," said Steve Radelet, a senior fellow at the Center for Global Development.

Bush has increased direct development and humanitarian aid to Africa to more than $4 billion a year from $1.4 billion in 2001, according to the Paris-based Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. And four African nations -- Sudan, Ethiopia, Egypt and Uganda -- rank among the world's top 10 recipients in aid from the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0111495

Beyond increasing aid to Africa, Bush has met with nearly three dozen African heads of state during his six years in office. He visited Africa in his first term, and aides say he hopes to make a return visit next year.

Although some activists criticize Bush for not doing more to end the ongoing genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan, others credit him for playing a role in ending deadly conflicts in Liberia, the Congo and other parts of Sudan. Meanwhile, Bush has overseen a steady rise in U.S. trade with Africa, which has doubled since 2001.

"He should be known for increasing -- doubling development assistance and tripling it to Africa after a period in which U.S. development assistance was essentially flat for decades," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a recent interview with the Associated Press. "He should be known for the largest single investment in AIDS and malaria, the biggest health investment of any government program ever."

To many longtime Africa supporters, all of this is surprising for a president who is often criticized as lacking curiosity about much of the world and who heads a political party traditionally skeptical of the efficacy of foreign aid.

But attacking African poverty has become a growing priority of some of the religious groups at the core of Bush's political base, and some lawmakers credit them with stoking the president's interest in the subject.

"The evangelical community raised the awareness of HIV and AIDS to the president," said Rep. Donald M. Payne (N.J.), the top-ranking Democrat on the House International Relations subcommittee on Africa. "When the Bush administration came in, HIV and AIDS were not an overwhelming priority. Now we have seen a total metamorphosis."

Current and former White House aides and independent analysts say Bush's interest in Africa is rooted in the numerous humanitarian crises that continue to bedevil the continent, as well as in the growing importance of Africa in a world increasingly linked by economics and terrorist threats.

"I think there are two reinforcing trends here. One of them is the upside of foreign policy moralism," said Michael J. Gerson, a former Bush aide who was a persistent and persuasive advocate for Africa. "Another one is the growing strategic significance of Africa: the conflict with radical Islam; the problem of failed states and terrorism; and the growing importance of Africa on the resource side: oil."

Some advocates suspect that the Bush administration's interest in Africa is motivated more by business ambitions than altruism. Grants made by the Millennium Challenge Corp., a foreign aid program developed by Bush with the aim of rewarding poor countries that practice good governance, are also partially predicated on whether countries have open markets that allow widespread foreign investment.

"I know a lot of activist groups who believe that the president's stated commitment to Africa is, at best, a play on words," said Nii Akuetteh, executive director of Africa Action, a Washington-based advocacy organization. "First of all, much of the aid is emergency food or medical aid, rather than true development assistance. Then there are conditions that are attached where the emphasis is more on countries that open up their markets so American companies can go in and privatize things like water and electrical service or have access to certain resources."

Bush launched his $1.2 billion malaria initiative in June 2005 with the goal of reducing malaria-related deaths in 15 African countries by 50 percent. The disease kills more than 1 million people a year, most of them African children under age 5.

The malaria program complements the president's largest global health initiative, the $15 billion, five-year plan known as the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR). Under the program, about 800,000 Africans are receiving drugs that enable them to live longer with the disease and help to prevent mother-to-child transmission of the virus.

"We launched one of the most important initiatives in American history, as far as I'm concerned, and that is the Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief," Bush said at a recent conference on malaria.

PEPFAR, which often funds programs through religious organizations, has come under criticism for promoting faith-based ideology over science, emphasizing abstinence programs and giving inaccurate information about the effectiveness of condoms in preventing HIV transmission. Payne says such concerns have been allayed in recent years, and he and others credit PEPFAR with saving hundreds of thousands of lives.

The Bush administration's efforts in Africa have dovetailed with a rise in aid to Africa from private groups, including the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, as well as loan forgiveness from organizations such as the World Bank and stepped-up assistance from other countries, including Britain and France.

"I think [increasing aid to Africa] will be one of the things the president is most proud of when he leaves office," Gerson said. "It doesn't fit the preconception, the caricature that the president somehow has a preference for using the blunt instruments of force in international affairs when in fact on a variety of topics, the president has been a root-cause thinker in an unexpected way."

Somalia's Islamists Vow Never To Surrender (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

DOJ_NMG_0111496

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Dec. 30 — A phalanx of Ethiopian tanks and armored personnel carriers chugged toward Kismayo, the last city occupied by Somalia's diminished Islamist movement, witnesses said Saturday, while the Islamists inside the city dug in and vowed never to surrender.

According to residents along Somalia's coast, the Ethiopian troops, with soldiers from Somalia's transitional government, were preparing to seize Kismayo, a port city near the Kenyan border.

Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, a high-ranking cleric, emerged from a mosque in the city on Saturday, surrounded by gunmen, and told his followers that the Islamist leadership was not finished.

"The Islamic courts are still alive and ready to fight against the enemy of God," Sheik Ahmed told residents of Kismayo in a speech on Saturday. "We left Mogadishu in order to prevent bloodshed in the capital, but that does not mean we lost the holy war against our enemy."

Sheik Ahmed called on Somalis to begin an anti-Ethiopian insurgency. Already, several masked gunmen have surfaced on Mogadishu's streets, suggesting a guerrilla movement may have begun.

Diplomats in Kenya, though, said that they were talking to moderate representatives of the Islamic movement on Saturday, trying to persuade them to back down. The Islamists are essentially cornered, hemmed in by the Indian Ocean, a sealed Kenyan border and thousands of troops headed their way. Their only route of escape may be to flee into the thickly forested area south of Kismayo, which Western intelligence officers suspect has been used before as a terrorist hide-out.

In Mogadishu, the presence of Ethiopian soldiers continued to spark scattered violence, with supporters of the Ethiopians battling street by street against the remaining Islamist partisans. Gunshots rang out, men and women battled with sticks and rocks and the thick black smoke of burning barricades lifted into the air.

Just two days ago, in a stunning reversal of fortune, Somalia's transitional government, with the muscle of the Ethiopian military, reclaimed Mogadishu from the Islamist movement that had ruled large swaths of Somalia. Despite the Islamists' repeated vows to fight to the death, their forces evaporated and Mogadishu fell without a shot. Many Somalis said Saturday that they hoped the same thing would happen in Kismayo.

More than a thousand people have been killed in fighting across the country since Dec. 20, and Somalia's leaders now face the daunting task of trying to piece together a country that has not had a functioning central government for 15 years.

Sheikhdon Salad Elmi, the director of a large hospital in the Medina neighborhood of Mogadishu, said the prospects for stability depended on how long the Ethiopian troops stayed. "I think it's naïve for them to go right now," Dr. Elmi said. "We need them for security. But they are very visible and most people don't like them. The longer they stay, the more resentment that will come."

Somalia has fought, and lost, two wars with Ethiopia, but never before have Ethiopian troops occupied the capital. On Saturday, some supporters of the Ethiopians waved pictures of Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister. "It's very humiliating," Dr. Elmi said.

Ethiopian officials have said that they plan to withdraw troops in a matter of weeks but not before neutralizing the Islamists, who declared a holy war against Ethiopia, a country with a long Christian history and Somalia's larger and more powerful neighbor.

The Ethiopian military, with tacit American approval, unleashed a fierce attack against the Islamists last Sunday, bombarding their positions with jet fighters and pushing tanks deep into Somali territory.

Since then, the Islamists have been steadily on the run, their teenage troops no match for Ethiopia's well-equipped modern army.

Further Combat Looms In Somalia (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Dec. 30 -- Somali government troops heavily backed by Ethiopian tanks and soldiers pushed Saturday toward Somalia's port city of Kismaayo, the last stronghold of the Islamic Courts movement swept from power in recent days.

A major battle between the two sides seemed imminent, as Ethiopian jets blew over towns near Kismaayo, and leaders of the Islamic movement rallied fighters who had retreated to the area in the face of Ethiopia's vastly superior military force.

The Islamic Courts movement is "ready to fight against the enemy of Allah," Sharif Ahmed, a leader of the group, told residents of Kismaayo, according to the Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0111497

Somalis are growing impatient with the presence of thousands of Ethiopian troops in their country, but Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who has backed the interim Somali government now in power, has said his military will not pull out until it has captured the most "extremist" leaders and "international jihadists" within the Courts movement.

Meles has accused those leaders of supporting ethnic Somali separatist groups in Ethiopia, and both the United States and Ethiopia have accused the Islamic Courts fighters of sheltering terrorists, an allegation the movement has called propaganda.

The United States has denied giving Ethiopia the green light to invade Somalia but has steadfastly supported Ethiopia's right to self-defense, and Meles has characterized this war as defensive, not preemptive. Just days before the Ethiopian action, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for African affairs, Jendayi E. Frazer, accused the Islamic group of being "controlled" by an al-Qaeda cell, an allegation that regional analysts say was exaggerated and intended to justify Ethiopia's incursion.

The U.S. government, which has a substantial military presence up the coast in Djibouti, has said that four suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania could be among the 2,000 or so fighters who retreated in recent days to the Kismaayo area, which includes a vast forest ideal for hiding in and staging a guerrilla war.

The Islamic Courts movement came to power in June with the popular support of Somalis tired of the brutish rule of warlords who called themselves an "anti-terrorism coalition" and received financial backing from the CIA.

Somalis tend to adhere to a moderate version of Islam, and for many, supporting a movement that enforced Islamic law with varying degrees of severity was a pragmatic choice rather than a religious one.

It is perhaps a measure of that pragmatism that as the government asserted control of Mogadishu, the capital, on Friday, many of the Islamic fighters simply slipped off their uniforms, shaved their beards and went back to regular life, witnesses said.

Hundreds of Somalis greeted the formerly exiled Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi, seemingly willing to give the secular government a chance if it means restoring order to their country, which has not had a central government since the warlords overthrew President Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991.

Elsewhere in the city Friday, hundreds of Somalis protested against Ethiopian troops in Mogadishu. The rallies continued on a smaller scale Saturday, witnesses said.

More than religious fervor, Somalis seem motivated by nationalism. Analysts say the presence of the Ethiopian troops could jeopardize the government, which was cobbled together by negotiators in Kenya nearly two years ago and has struggled against its image as a group of outsiders.

"If it happens that the Islamic extremists win out, I think moderate Somalis will be supportive under the banner of Somali nationalism, not religious extremism," said David Shinn, a former U.S. ambassador to Ethiopia.

By Saturday, Ethiopian and Somali government troops had reached the town of Jilib, about 80 miles north of Kismaayo, and were pushing ahead, according to Somalia's ambassador to Ethiopia, Abdikarin Farah. "Obviously," he said, "they are advancing."

Somali Forces Pursue Islamists (WT)

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia (Agence France-Presse) -- Somali government forces marched on the last stronghold of the country's powerful Islamist movement yesterday, even as Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi called for dialogue with Islamist leaders.

Residents said fighter jets, thought to be Ethiopian, were flying over Kismayo, about 300 miles south of the capital, prompting fears of attacks on the city.

"Our troops are moving towards Kismayo," Mr. Gedi told reporters.

Islamist fighters had regrouped in Kismayo after government forces backed by Ethiopian troops forced them to abandon the capital Mogadishu on Thursday, following 10 days of heavy fighting.

Witnesses told Agence France-Presse that they had seen a convoy of military vehicles heading in the direction of Kismayo and others said planes were flying over the city.

"Military jets are flying over the town. We cannot see them [because it is night], but they are flying low-level, they have not dropped any bomb yet," Farahan Jiis, a resident, said.

"We can hear the terrible sound they are making," added Leila Sheikh Aden.

Earlier yesterday, Mr. Gedi had called on his government's Islamist rivals to "join us" and enter into a dialogue. At the same time he warned of serious reprisals if the Islamists followed through on threats to wage a guerrilla campaign.

The appeal for talks came as Deputy Prime Minister Mohamed Hussein Aidid warned that the security situation in the capital, which has long been awash with arms, remained potentially volatile, with "around 2,000" Islamists thought to have remained behind when the city was taken.

DOJ_NMG_0111498

"Some are hiding in houses and some are armed," Mr. Aidid said. "There are mines, lots of weapons and many foreign fighters in the city."

A day of violence and looting after the Islamists abandoned Mogadishu triggered fears of a return to the bleak days when the capital was a battleground for feuding clan chiefs.

Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed held talks with clan elders yesterday in Afgoye, west of Mogadishu, and later announced the nomination of a new mayor for the capital and the reinstatement of the city's police chief.

Somalia's transitional administration, which has international recognition, was set up in October 2004 in a bid to impose the rule of law in a nation where political institutions had become powerless.

Mr. Gedi's arrival in Mogadishu on Friday marked the first time the weak interim government has been in a position to exercise authority in the capital, which was under Islamist control for six months.

The city has witnessed several angry protests in the past two days against the presence of Ethiopian troops, with demonstrators hurling stones and burning tires in the streets.

Somalia fought wars against Ethiopia in 1964 and in 1977-78.

In Kismayo, senior Islamist leader Sheik Shariff Sheik Ahmed vowed that the movement would continue to wage war against the Ethiopian troops.

"I want to tell you that the Islamic courts are still alive and ready to fight against the enemy of Allah," Sheik Ahmed told residents in the port town.

Somalia Government Steps Gingerly Toward Its Capital (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA — Leaders from Somalia's capital gathered Saturday where matters of importance are often debated and settled here: under the shade of a thorny aqab tree.

This one was at a bombed-out military barracks on the edge of Mogadishu, chosen because the guest of honor, President Abdullahi Yusuf, refuses to enter a notoriously dangerous city that until last week had been under the control of an Islamist alliance. "I will come to Mogadishu once everything is in place," he said.

Though most Islamist fighters fled Thursday when troops from Ethiopia and Somalia's transitional government advanced, so far the government is moving cautiously in finishing the pacification and occupation of the capital. Most government soldiers remain on the city outskirts. Only one government agency, the Interior Ministry, has moved back in.

The security vacuum has led to sporadic looting and rioting. Local leaders warned that the transitional government might lose control of the capital if it did not act quickly to solidify its victory.

"People are already hiding their guns underground," said Ibrahim Shawey, the former mayor of Mogadishu. "I urge the government to use force [to disarm the city], rather than negotiate."

Part of the delay is strategic, officials said, with government forces needed elsewhere in the country. On Saturday, thousands of Ethiopian-led troops were heading south to the last Islamist holdout in Kismayo, about 280 miles from Mogadishu. Town leaders there briefly drove the Islamists out last week, but the region was overwhelmed again by hard-line fighters after they fled the capital.

Leaders of the Islamic Courts Union, supported by an extremist faction known as Shabab and some suspected foreign fighters, are threatening to make a last stand against Ethiopian soldiers in the region.

"Islamic Court officials will not surrender," said the alliance's chairman, Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed. "We will defend ourselves and defeat the enemy." He issued similar threats in Mogadishu, only to abandon the capital without a fight.

Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi said Saturday that a battle was possible if the Islamists refused to give up or flee. "If remnants try to attack, bloodshed will take place," he said.

But the possible final showdown was sapping needed troops inside Mogadishu. Pacifying the capital will not be easy, Interior Minister Hussein Aidid said.

An estimated 2,000 armed opponents, including some Islamist fighters, are believed to be hiding in the city, and it is feared that Islamists may have left behind mines or booby traps.

Although the Islamic Courts Union collected the guns of militias and citizens at the beginning of its six-month reign, it redistributed them shortly before leaving the city. As a result, Mogadishu is once again awash in guns, particularly among two clans with a history of animosity toward the transitional government.

Many say they will keep their weapons. "I'll never give up my gun, either to the government or to the Ethiopians," said Iman Adan, 31, who worked at a high school before joining the Islamic Courts. "I'm ready to fight or die."

Government officials won't say how many troops are providing security inside the city.

DOJ_NMG_0111499

Yusuf, who took a great deal of ribbing Saturday for his reluctance to enter Mogadishu, vowed to immediately implement a disarmament program, by force if necessary. Gedi predicted the guns would be collected within three weeks.

But both men said Mogadishu's leaders must share the responsibility by supporting the government, including the deployment of Ethiopian troops, and by controlling their children. In recent days, much of the anti-Ethiopia looting and rioting has involved teenagers.

"You must welcome the president not only by mouth, but by heart," said Gedi, who was targeted by assassins twice last year during visits to the capital. "In the past, you were welcoming me, but not working with me."

Peacekeepers Rebuff Chad Protection Force Proposal (AFP)

AFP, December 31, 2006

United Nations (UN) peacekeepers have rebuffed a call from the Security Council for a force to protect refugees in Chad, a report said.

The suggested force, which would also have policed the border with Sudan, was snubbed in a rare challenge to the security council, the Financial Times said, citing a UN peacekeeping department report which has yet to be released.

"Conditions for an effective UN peacekeeping operation do not seem to be in place at this time," it quoted the report as saying.

"Unless all the parties were to agree to a ceasefire and engage in a dialogue...a UN force would be operating in the midst of continuing hostilities and have no clear exit strategy."

The force was proposed in August in a resolution dealing with the regional consequences of the Darfur conflict.

The security council has also expressed concerns about attempts by rebel groups to seize power in Chad.

The report reflects peacekeepers' concern that they are being asked to do too much around the world, the FT said.

In October, Jean-Marie Guehenno, a senior UN peacekeeping official, described an "unprecedented" surge in the number and size of missions, for example in Lebanon and Sudan.

Castro Message Says He Could Recover (AP)

By Anita Snow, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 31, 2006

A statement attributed to Fidel Castro on the eve of the revolution's 48th anniversary assured Cubans Saturday that the ailing leader could still recover from his prolonged illness.

The message was read by a newscaster on state television and radio. Castro traditionally sends a message to Cuban citizens every New Year's Eve to mark the anniversary of the Jan. 1, 1959, revolution that brought him to power.

"I am grateful to you for your affection and support," read the message. "Regarding my recovery, I have always warned that it could be a prolonged process, but it is far from being a lost battle.

"I collaborate as a disciplined patient, attended by the...team of our doctors."

Castro purportedly said he was still "in the loop" when it came to matters of state. "I have had exchanges with our closest comrades always when cooperation has been necessary on vitally important issues."

Earlier Saturday, Cuba's Communist Party daily reported that Castro telephoned the Chinese ambassador in Havana to wish President Hu Jintao a happy new year.

The government's release of the message and the news about his call to the Chinese ambassador seemed aimed at ensuring the world that he is recovering, five months after he underwent emergency intestinal surgery.

Because Castro's medical condition is shrouded in secrecy, it has been the subject of speculation and rumor.

Castro, 80, has not been seen in public since shortly before July 31 when he announced he was temporarily stepping aside while he recovered from his operation.

He has provisionally ceded power to his brother Raul, the 75-year-old defense minister.

Saturday's story said Castro called Chinese Ambassador Zhao Rongxian on Thursday evening and they discussed relations between their countries. The ambassador also transmitted his president's wishes for Castro's speedy recovery.

The island's official media has not commented on a Spanish surgeon's declarations earlier this week that Castro did not have cancer and was slowly recovering from a serious operation.

Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido, chief surgeon at Madrid's Gregorio Maranon Hospital, said he flew to Havana on Dec. 21 to see Castro and consult with the Cuban leader's medical team on how his treatment was progressing.

Castro's medical condition is a state secret, but Cuban authorities deny he suffers from terminal cancer, as U.S. intelligence officials have claimed. Cuban officials have nonetheless stopped insisting Castro will return to power.

Garcia Sabrido said Castro could resume the presidency if his recovery is "absolute."

DOJ_NMG_0111500

Some doctors believe Castro may suffer from diverticular disease, which can cause bleeding in the lower intestine, especially in people over 60. In severe cases, emergency surgery may be required.

Castro Issues New Year's Message (BBC)

BBC.com, December 31, 2006

In his New Year message, ailing Cuban President Fidel Castro has said he is recovering slowly from his surgery.

"Concerning my recovery I always said it would be a long process," he said in the written message, read out by announcers on state-controlled media.

"But it is far from being a lost battle," he added.

The 80-year-old leader handed over control of the country to his brother Raul in July, when he underwent urgent intestinal surgery.

President Castro traditionally sends a message broadcast by state TV and radio to Cubans on New Year's Eve to mark the anniversary of the 1 January 1959 revolution that brought him to power.

"I have not stopped being in the loop on main events and information.

"I have had exchanges with our closest comrades always when co-operation has been necessary on vitally important issues," the statement read.

The president also thanked the Cuban people for their courage during his recuperation.

Speculation about President Castro's medical condition has been rife.

Although Mr Castro's health is a state secret, Cuban officials have said that he is not suffering from cancer or any terminal illness, and that he is recuperating.

After Fidel, Business As Usual? (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, December 31, 2006

President Bush's hard-line attitude toward Cuba has prompted businesses to pull back from exploring opportunities in the communist nation.

That is not expected to change even as ailing, longtime dictator Fidel Castro lies in a hospital bed and his brother Raul runs the country.

Other factors hindering the potential of doing business there include the island's small population and poor investment climate, but Mr. Bush's strong stance is the overarching issue, according to government officials, businesses and longtime observers and analysts.

The Cuban economic embargo, imposed in the early 1960s, allows cash sales only for food, medicine and medical equipment and restricts travel to the island.

During the Clinton administration, U.S. companies visited Cuba on trade missions and considered trade, investment and other business opportunities.

The Bush administration, however, has adopted a tougher approach, including a tightening last year of payment requirements on food exports to Cuba. That, business officials say, has played a major part in discouraging U.S. companies from exploring the Cuban market.

"If you look at the way the administration has tried to restrict food sales to Cuba, even though Congress passed a law permitting them, and at the roadblocks they've placed in the path of people and companies trying to visit Cuba, companies don't have to stare too hard at the tea leaves to get the message," National Foreign Trade Council President William A. Reinsch said.

"They just give up on trying to plan for business there. There has clearly been a chilling effect on opening doors to Cuba, and the result is that we will be unprepared when restrictions are finally lifted, which everybody knows will happen eventually," he said.

Bush backs embargo

The Bush administration has left little doubt where it stands on the embargo.

Mr. Bush said in 2002 that without political and economic reform, trade with Cuba "will merely enrich Fidel Castro and his cronies" and that the bar on U.S. financing for Cuban farm purchases would continue, saying that it "would just be a foreign-aid program in disguise, which would benefit the current regime."

Whenever the United States has shown interest in easing relations with Mr. Castro, "somehow it's always failed," Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in a recent interview.

"You look back at history over the last 47 years and anytime that it looks like we're getting too friendly, they go to Angola, they shoot a plane down, they open up their jails ... and they let out a lot of very nasty people, not political prisoners," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0111501

The administration believes that outside investment will not lead to political liberalization or democratization, stressed Caleb Charles McCarry, the administration's Cuba transition coordinator.

"Investing in the current economic and political structure in Cuba simply supports the regime, and does not support the aspirations of the Cuban people for genuine change that leads to political and economic freedom," he said.

Under current law, Cuba would have to establish a transition government that takes a number of steps toward democracy and "does not include" Mr. Castro or his brother Raul for the embargo to be lifted.

Raul Castro is now running the country while the Cuban leader is in the hospital, leading some observers to speculate that the post-Fidel Castro era has begun. Mr. Castro has not been seen in public since July.

However, even if Fidel Castro leaves office in the next five years, the Economist Intelligence Unit in London said in an October report that it "does not anticipate any sudden, radical alterations in the political system."

In addition, unless relations with Washington improve, the report said, Havana "will continue to limit dissent on the grounds of national security."

The report predicted continued hostile U.S.-Cuban relations and sanctions, regardless of Fidel Castro's presence, saying the sort of fundamental change in the relationship that could lead to liberalization "would require strong political will on both sides to overcome resistance based on ideology and vested interests, and there are no signs yet of any shift in the entrenched positions."

Hill could ease embargo

The election of Democratic House and Senate majorities for the next Congress could lead to efforts to ease the embargo. But without radical change in Cuba or a softened administration stance, those moves would be limited.

Earlier this month, a delegation of 10 members of Congress from both sides of the aisle visited Havana, the largest U.S. legislative mission to Cuba under Mr. Castro to date.

Raul Castro invited the U.S. to talk about the two countries' relations, including topics such as the embargo, immigration, drug trafficking, capture of fugitives, the environment and oil exploration.

Rep. Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican who has sponsored legislation to allow U.S. companies to work with Cuba to exploit oil reserves off its northern coast, said his bill would be more likely to get out of committee in the next Congress and predicted more proposals around the edges of the embargo, in such areas as banking regulation.

He is the Republican chairman of the Cuba Working Group, a bipartisan group of members of Congress who are pushing for changes in U.S. policy toward Cuba.

Rep. Bill Delahunt, Massachusetts Democrat and the probable chairman of the International Relations oversight and investigations subcommittee, plans hearings on U.S. democracy assistance for Cuba. Mr. Delahunt, who is the Democratic head of the Cuba Working Group, said Congress initially will focus on travel restrictions, although he criticized current overall Cuba policy.

"You'd have to be oblivious to the past 50 years not to conclude that this just hasn't worked. And now, we don't understand, I don't think, what's happening in Cuba, what the reality is in Cuba, and I think it hurts us if we want to have influence in Cuba as Fidel Castro passes from the scene," he said.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who is expected to head the Ways and Means Committee, will continue to oppose the embargo through a Treasury appropriations amendment to bar funding of the enforcement of the embargo, according to his staff.

But any push to lift the embargo in the new Congress would not get to the floor for a vote, said Sen. Larry E. Craig, an Idaho Republican who sponsored the oil legislation in the Senate.

He cited both a reluctance in the Senate to take dramatic action until there is a change in Havana and strong backing for the embargo by the Bush administration.

Congress can have some influence on foreign-policy issues, he said, "but if the executive is hard over on an issue, and they are, clearly, on this issue, then it will be very difficult to do anything over the next two years."

Doing business tough

One U.S. official said the administration is not using its embargo enforcement to try to discourage American companies from considering the Cuban market, but to ensure a transition to "real democracy," including "real economic reform."

Mr. Reinsch, however, described the situation more ambiguously.

"We don't think -- or can't prove at any rate -- that the administration has overtly told companies to stay out of Cuba notwithstanding the laws permitting them to engage in certain activities there," he said.

"We do think that their actions have been deliberate and have sent clear signals to the business community that doing business with Cuba won't be worth the effort."

Others clearly say the administration's stance has tamped down business enthusiasm for Cuba.

In 1994, members of the U.S.-Cuba Trade and Economic Council came from a variety of industries, including pharmaceuticals, financial services, tourism, food, agriculture and retail, although legal trade was limited to health care products, said John S. Kavulich II, the group's senior policy adviser. By 2002 and 2003, he said, membership was largely in the food and agriculture industries.

Many businesses that have shown interest in Cuba would not comment for this article.

Cuba has bought more than $1.3 billion in U.S. farm products since late 2001, according to the Congressional Research Service, but even companies allowed to export to Cuba see the embargo as a hindrance.

The U.S. rice industry exports 150,000 to 200,000 metric tons to Cuba a year, but that should be more like 500,000, said Stuart E. Proctor Jr., president of the USA Rice Federation. Cuban officials have said the U.S. would be Cuba's top rice supplier if it weren't for the embargo, he said.

Mr. Proctor said U.S. regulations have made shipping rice to Cuba more difficult, raising questions for Cuban officials about America as a rice supplier.

"You've got to be a reliable supplier, and we're not, in the eyes of the Cubans," he said.

Investment possibilities

Observers instead stress the potential for investment, where opportunities for U.S. companies remain, although companies coming from countries ranging from Israel to China to Britain are already working there.

Investors from other countries have moved into such industries as nickel mining, telecommunications, infrastructure and citrus production, Lexington Institute Cuba analyst Philip Peters said, although he added that Cuba is looking for partners in other areas.

Potential opportunities for American companies include energy, agriculture, tourism, biotechnology and information technology, Mr. Peters said.

The best initial opportunities will be those that generate hard currency, such as nickel mining, where there is still room for new foreign companies, as well as oil and hotels catering to foreigners, he said.

Some foreign oil companies have signed agreements with Cuba for oil and gas exploration along Cuba's northern coast, including Repsol of Spain, Sherritt International of Canada and Sinopac of China.

Executives from energy-related U.S. companies such as Exxon Mobil Corp., Caterpillar Inc. and Valero Energy Corp. met with Cuban officials in Mexico City earlier this year to discuss Cuban oil reserves, but are barred from exploring those reserves.

The U.S. Geological Survey has estimated there are between 1 trillion and 9.3 trillion barrels of undiscovered oil and between 1.9 trillion and 22 trillion cubic feet of undiscovered natural gas off Cuba's northern coast.

If the United States maintains its embargo, India, Spain and Canada could end up drilling for oil 51 miles off the U.S. coast, according to Kirby Jones, president of the U.S.-Cuba Trade Association.

"If you're a Floridian looking with binoculars away from Key West, if you're going to see an oil platform, I think you'd feel more comfortable if it was a U.S. platform than a Chinese platform," Mr. Flake said.

Mr. Jones says the post-Castro era already has arrived, describing the country as a sophisticated, growing business environment with 350 joint ventures operating and 500 to 600 foreign companies maintaining offices. He said that even in areas that are still open to Americans, opportunities become fewer each day.

Cuba, he said, is much different than it was in 1994, when the first joint venture was set up. Foreign partners already are operating in all the sectors of the Cuban economy where they are allowed -- those aside from defense, health care and education -- and he said many of them have invested hundreds of millions of dollars in the past 12 years.

Other hindrances

The U.S. embargo is not the only obstacle to business, though. Observers note that Cuba only has about 11 million people and they have limited access to hard currency. Vietnam, by contrast, has a population of more than 84 million and is not an island.

One agriculture industry official said his company's attention to the Cuban market "would not be enormous" if the embargo were lifted but the political situation didn't change. The official said U.S. companies in the agricultural sector would be interested in Cuban possibilities without the embargo, but that there would be no rush into Cuba as long as the economy is state-driven.

Another agriculture executive said there are appealing aspects to Cuba, including its proximity and the fact that it pays cash, but added it will always be a small part of the market, even without the U.S. embargo.

Outside of agriculture, opportunities for U.S. exports may be limited as well.

"There's reason to believe that over time the Cuban economy is going to do well and produce a consumer class for American goods, but not in the short term," according to lawyer Robert Muse, who has substantial experience in U.S. laws relating to Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0111503

"When the embargo's lifted, some U.S. companies will seek to export to Cuba, but it's going to be targeted exports. It's going to be luxury goods for the hotel trade, for example," he said.

Joint ventures aren't as numerous as they used to be for investors. Cuban authorities have cut back on the number of small foreign companies active in Cuba since 2003, but are interested in larger companies for major projects in such areas as mining and energy, according to the Economist Intelligence Unit.

In opening to outside investment, Mr. Muse said Mr. Castro "made a tactical accommodation with capitalism" during the 1990s, when the Soviet bloc trading arrangements expired and "Cuba needed serious foreign investment, it needed to, in the expression they used in Cuba at the time, reinsert itself into the world economy."

It also needed some limited reform to alleviate serious shortages of food, consumer goods and services, according to the CIA's World Factbook.

"But that situation has bettered itself over time," Mr. Muse said, adding that Cuba is now more economically stable "and there's been a direct correlation between the lack of new investment going into Cuba and its financial health," he said.

Cuba has increased ties with China and Venezuela, which has helped Cuba's economy. "These relationships seem set to become more important" and will overshadow Cuban relations with Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development countries, according to the Economist Intelligence Unit.

Cuban authorities would not comment for this article, but others pointed to Cuban government policies as a barrier to investment.

The Economist Intelligence Unit described Cuba as "one of the world's least attractive foreign investment destinations" from 2001 through 2005. The situation is likely to improve only slightly through 2011 because of state domination of Cuba's economy and limited opportunities for private business, the report said.

Outside investment also has been hindered by outstanding claims on expropriated property and by U.S. sanctions, which increase costs of such activities as shipping and restrict the export market for Cuban products, the report said.

Cuba's inhospitable investment environment may mean that there are still opportunities for U.S. firms, should relations ease between the two countries.

Mr. Muse said Mr. Castro's "genuine distaste for international capitalism and the profit motive" probably has left much of the investment market relatively open, adding that "very little is foreclosed from American companies at the moment."

However, he added that in areas where there is room for only one foreign investor, primarily in raw materials, American companies could lose out.

Spain Suspends Plan For Talks With ETA (AP)

By Mar Roman, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 31, 2006

A powerful car bomb exploded at Madrid's international airport Saturday and Spain's government, blaming the Basque group ETA, suspended plans for peace talks with the separatists.

The blast left two people missing and 26 injured, most with damage to their ears from the shock wave.

Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero said the government would halt talks with ETA over the bombing. The group had agreed to stop attacks in its cease-fire declaration earlier this year that was seen as the greatest hope in a decade of a peaceful end to the conflict.

"The condition for dialogue was and is the unequivocal desire to abandon violence," said Zapatero, who cut short a family holiday after the bombing. "The very grave attack today by the terrorist band ETA is radically contrary to that desire."

Zapatero had insisted as recently as Friday that he was optimistic the cease-fire would lead to a permanent peace.

ETA did not claim responsibility for the bombing, but a man who placed a warning call before the attack said he was a representative of the group. Following previous attacks, the group has sometimes waited weeks to claim responsibility.

ETA and its political supporters have been warning for months that the peace process was faltering. They have complained that the government has made no gesture to reciprocate its call for a cease-fire, such as meeting a long-standing ETA demand for its prisoners to be moved to the Basque region of northwestern Spain from other parts of the country.

The group has also said that continued arrests of suspected members and court rulings against the movement have broken a government promise to relieve pressure on the pro-independence group. It is also angry that the government has refused to allow talks among Basque political parties on the region's future until ETA's outlawed political wing Batasuna renounces violence.

The head of ETA's political wing, Arnaldo Otegi, said Saturday after the attack that he did not consider the peace process dead.

"Not only is it not broken, but it more necessary than ever," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0111504

"What happened in Madrid, if it's confirmed ETA is behind it, doesn't take us back to the scenario that existed before March 24," he added, referring to the day ETA declared its cease-fire.

Otegi blamed the government for the recent breakdown in peace talks, saying it has not made any gestures to the separatist group.

The attack early Saturday, which occurred inside a multistory parking garage at the airport, halted some air traffic on one of the year's busiest travel days.

More than 1,000 pounds of explosives had been packed inside the car used in the bombing, Spanish media reported. The explosion sent a massive column of smoke into the air and collapsed part of the building, sending rubble crashing onto parked cars.

Two Ecuadorean men believed to have been sleeping inside two separate parked cars were missing in the rubble, officials said.

More than 800 people have died since the ETA took up arms in the late 1960s, but none since May 2003. The group had continued a series of low-level bombings until just before it declared the cease-fire in March.

The opposition Popular Party, which has strongly opposed Zapatero's stance on negotiations with ETA, urged the government to break contact with the group and work to defeat it.

"This attack means that ETA is a criminal organization that doesn't want peace" said Popular Party leader Mariano Rajoy.

__

Associated Press Writer Harold Heckle contributed to this report.

Madrid Blast Leaves 2 Missing, 26 Injured (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

MADRID, Dec. 30 -- A powerful car bomb exploded in a parking lot at Madrid's international airport Saturday, leaving two people missing and 26 injured. Spain's government blamed the Basque group ETA and suspended plans for peace talks with the separatists.

The blast halted all air traffic on one of the year's busiest travel days and brought a fiery end to a nine-month-old ETA cease-fire and plans for talks that had spurred the greatest hopes in a decade of a peaceful end to the conflict.

"The condition for dialogue was and is the unequivocal desire to abandon violence," said Prime Minister JosÃ© Luis RodrÃ-guez Zapatero, who cut short a family vacation after the bombing. "The very grave attack today by the terrorist band ETA is radically contrary to that desire."

ETA did not assert responsibility for the bombing, but a man who placed a warning call before the attack said he was a representative of the group. Following previous attacks, the group has sometimes waited weeks to assert responsibility.

ETA and its political supporters have been warning for months that the peace process was faltering. They have complained that the government has made no gesture to reciprocate the group's call for a cease-fire, such as meeting a long-standing ETA demand for its prisoners to be moved to the Basque region of northwestern Spain from other parts of the country.

The group has also said that continued arrests of suspected members and court rulings against the movement have broken a government promise to relieve pressure on the pro-independence group. It is also angry that the government has refused to allow talks among Basque political parties on the region's future until ETA's outlawed political wing Batasuna renounces violence.

The head of ETA's political wing, Arnaldo Otegi, said Saturday after the attack that he did not consider the peace process dead.

"Not only is it not broken but it is more necessary than ever," he said.

"What happened in Madrid, if it's confirmed ETA is behind it, doesn't take us back to the scenario that existed before March 24," he added, referring to the day ETA's cease-fire took effect.

Two Ecuadoran men believed to have been sleeping inside a parked car were missing in the rubble, officials said.

More than 800 people have died since ETA took up arms in the 1960s, but none since May 2003. The group had continued a series of low-level bombings until just before it declared the cease-fire.

Spain Breaks Off ETA Talks After Madrid Airport Bomb (BLOOM)

By Sharon Smyth And Ben Sills

Bloomberg, December 31, 2006

Dec. 30 - Spain's government broke off talks with Basque terrorist group ETA after concluding it planted a truck bomb in Madrid's Barajas airport today that destroyed a four-story parking structure and left two people presumed dead.

DOJ_NMG_0111505

``All initiatives for dialogue with ETA are suspended while ETA acts violently,'' Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero said hours afterward at a televised press conference in Madrid. ``The attack is incompatible with the cease-fire.''

The bombing ruptured a ``permanent'' cease-fire the separatist group announced in March that had persuaded Spain's Socialist Party-led government to begin talks in July. ETA had not killed in an attack in more than three-and-a-half years.

The reversal for Zapatero may weaken his chances for re- election in 2008. Opposition leader Mariano Rajoy has repeatedly denounced the terms of the ETA detente for being too favorable to a group that assassinated 800 people over the last 40 years.

Just yesterday the prime minister had said he expected progress in peace talks with ETA in the new year.

Zapatero, 46, was swept into office in an election upset three days after the March 2004 Islamic terrorist bombings of Madrid commuter trains that killed 191 people. He has since made the Basque peace process his first policy priority.

Today, he froze the talks, without entirely shutting the door, saying ``all initiatives aimed at moving forward this dialogue'' are suspended.

Condition for Talks

``With violence there is no dialogue of any sort,'' the prime minister said. ``The essential condition'' for talks was ``an unmistakable willingness to end violence. Until that condition is fulfilled, there will be no moves towards dialogue.''

The government hasn't publicly described any progress made so far in negotiations.

Bomb disposal experts, not waiting for the device to detonate, triggered the explosion of the powerful truck bomb in a parking lot at Madrid airport's Terminal 4 at around 9 a.m. local time today. The decision followed three warning phone calls to authorities, the last of which claimed to be from ETA.

The terminal, a 6.1 billion euro ($8.1 billion) structure that opened only in February, had 575 flights scheduled today, and authorities suspended all for several hours while they cleared the site. Services at the other three terminals were unaffected, said the airport's operator AENA.

440 Pounds of Explosives

Terminal 4 is the base of Iberia Lineas Aereas de Espana SA, Spain's largest airline, and OneWorld alliance partners such as British Airways Plc. The massive building designed by Richard Rogers Partnership won the U.K.'s top architecture prize.

About 200 kilograms (440 pounds) of explosives were used in the blast, the largest charge employed by ETA in an attack in 15 years, Efe newswire reported, citing initial calculations of unidentified security officials. It damaged the terminal's arrivals lounge and destroyed several floors of the parking structure.

Two people are missing in the rubble, including a man who stayed in his car while his girlfriend went to meet a relative in the terminal.

Twenty-six people were treated for light injuries at the scene and five were later hospitalized, television station Antena 3 de Television reported.

``The information that we have leaves us with no shadow of a doubt that ETA is responsible,'' said Spanish Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba at a Madrid press conference. The explosives were ``extremely powerful,'' he said.

Batasuna Blames Government

Leaders of Batasuna, the separatist political party banned because of its links to ETA, have said that the peace process is blocked because the government has not delivered concessions that Batasuna say it was promised.

The leader of Batasuna, Arnaldo Otegi, today refrained from condemning the attack, and criticized the government for dragging its feet in negotiations.

``The process of resolving the Basque political conflict is not broken,'' Otegi said in a televised press conference. ``In no way does this return us to the situation before March 24,'' when ETA's cease-fire began.

Bomb disposal experts were called in after three phone calls were made, the last of which claimed to be from ETA, warning about the bomb and giving the color, make and license plate number of the truck containing it, Rubalcaba said.

``This confirms what we already knew, that ETA is a criminal organization that doesn't want peace or the freedom of the Spanish people,'' opposition leader Mariano Rajoy said. Rajoy has demanded that the government break off all contact with the organization, according to a written statement.

ETA has been campaigning since the late 1960s for an independent state comprising the Basque-speaking provinces of northern Spain and southern France.

New Year Rings In EU Membership For Bulgaria, Romania (AFP)

AFP, December 31, 2006

Bulgaria and Romania have braced for a double New Year's celebration, with both countries set to become the newest members of the European Union at the stroke of midnight.

DOJ_NMG_0111506

But with enlargement fatigue gripping large parts of the bloc, the EU's latest and poorest members are likely to be greeted more with a shrug than open arms.

And in Brussels, EU headquarters will be keeping a close eye on whether the two nations abide by their pledges to crack down on corruption and organised crime.

In Bulgaria, thousands of revellers were expected to flock to a gigantic rock and pop concert on Alexander Battenberg square in the capital, Sofia.

The show will be interrupted for speeches by President Georgi Parvanov, Prime Minister Sergei Stanichev and European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso. But the partying is expected to continue long into the night.

A pyramid of light will illuminate the sky above Sofia, its five rays emanating from the city's Orthodox cathedral, its Armenian church, a synagogue, a church and a mosque.

The latest Eurobarometer poll published in December shows that at the eve of accession 63 percent of all Bulgarians and 69 percent of all Romanians think their eastern European states will largely benefit from EU membership.

This is above the European norm where the average approval of membership ranges around 54 percent.

Together with Greece, the two newcomers will be the only Balkan nations in Europe's rich club, and will play a key role as representatives of a region ravaged by the wars in the former Yugoslavia.

Political analyst Ivan Krastev of the Sofia-based Centre for Liberal Strategies told AFP that "with the accession of Bulgaria and Romania the region will receive a clear message that enlargement is not dead".

The two newcomers "will bolster the voices in Europe calling for the enlargement to continue and include countries like Macedonia and Serbia," he said.

"Otherwise the EU risks ending up with a ghetto on its borders," Krastev said.

And for Niculai Idu, from the European Institute of Romania think tank, "joining the EU will be a guarantee that Romania will continue to evolve in terms of democracy and a market economy."

EU leaders agreed December 15 in Brussels to put the lid on further enlargement of the bloc.

The decision has major repercussions for EU hopefuls in the Balkans such as Croatia, which is at the front of the queue and expected to join by 2010.

Bulgaria and Romania will be Europe's poorest members with gross domestic product per capita barely reaching one third of the European average, Eurostat statistics show.

The two will contribute only one percent to the EU's gross domestic product.

The gap between Bulgaria and Romania and the current EU members has raised fears of a sharp rise in prices after January 1 in the newcomers where average monthly salaries are about 200 euros (260 dollars).

Perhaps due to people fearing instant inflation, Bulgaria this month saw a 30 percent rise in purchases compared to the usual end of year holiday spending spree.

Romanian hypermarkets also reported higher sales towards the end of the year with French Carrefour posting a 45 percent rise in 2006 compared to 2005.

Bulgaria and Romania will be subjected to unprecedented monitoring by Brussels, due to lagging reforms.

The fight against crime and rampant corruption, management of the European funds and food safety will be particularly placed under Brussels' magnifying glass.

Bulgaria will also have to carry out reforms to make its judiciary more efficient, with several notorious criminals managing to avoid imprisonment.

If progress is slow, the enthusiasm of the two newcomers risks being clouded by restrictions, including partial suspension of agricultural subsidies and non-recognition of the decisions of their courts in Europe.

Another problem is allowing borders to fall totally.

Fearing a flood of cheap labor, Spain, Britain, Denmark, Hungary, Ireland, France and Greece have announced restrictions on workers from the two incoming states.

A New Parliament, But Still All Putin? (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

RUSSIA heads into 2007 facing the question of whether President Vladimir V. Putin's centralization of power can ensure the smooth — and more important, credible — election of a new Parliament, now scheduled for December.

Elections, even in a "democracy" as managed as Russia's, have a way of surprising, as Ukraine showed after a fraudulent presidential election in 2004 led to mass protests. Mr. Putin is popular enough to ensure that whoever he supports will fare well, but corruption remains deeply rooted, as do poverty and crime and violence, any of which could be a catalyst for an electoral nyet.

DOJ_NMG_0111507

The Kremlin is taking no chances. With Mr. Putin's blessing, the existing Parliament, or Duma, spent much of 2006 preparing for the elections by tightening laws. It abolished minimum turnout requirements and the option of voting "against all." New election rules also barred candidates from criticizing the authorities in office or even encouraging a vote against an opponent.

New laws against extremism have already been used to raid a political group led by the chess champion Garry Kasparov. When Mr. Kasparov led a rally of a few thousand protesters in Moscow this month, the police outnumbered them four to one.

Critics said the restrictions would stifle what opposition remains, including what's left of the Communist Party and the old liberal democrats. The Duma is already dominated by United Russia, a party with little identity except as a reflection of Mr. Putin's legislative will.

Liliya Shevtsova of the Moscow Carnegie Center said the Kremlin risked eliminating competition. "To have just one party with a constitutional majority," she said, "it starts to look like the Soviet Communist Party."

So in October, the Kremlin created an "opposition" party, cobbled from smaller parties. It is called Just Russia, and it, too, supports Mr. Putin. For the party's leader, Sergei M. Mironov, this is a familiar path. He ran in the 2004 election "against" Mr. Putin by urging voters to re-elect Mr. Putin.

With a Kremlin endorsement and coverage on state television, Just Russia could provide a foil for United Russia, and provide at least a modicum of interest to the stilted politics of Mr. Putin's second term, marked more than anything by an absence even of debate, let alone real competition.

Mr. Kasparov says the Kremlin has obscured the seeds of discontent. And they are growing, he says, especially beyond the glow of Moscow's riches.

A big question looming is who will replace Mr. Putin in 2008? The maneuvering expected in 2007 reflects a concern over whether the system he created could survive without him. "The big day is approaching," Mr. Kasparov said. "Uncertainty kills the system."

Politics, Economics And Time Bury Memories Of The Kazakh Gulag (NYT)

By Ilan Greenberg

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

KARAGANDA, Kazakhstan — Maria Sadina hunched over fading pictures of her parents, ethnic Germans who were deported in 1941 from the Volga region in Russia to one of Karaganda's many gulag camps.

Ms. Sadina's father was imprisoned for praising the quality of a German-made tractor, and for a decade he worked as a slave laborer in the nearby coal mines. Her mother was sent to the Karaganda gulag simply for her German heritage.

They had married and reared their daughter, Ms. Sadina, in a two-room brick house so low to the ground that visitors must bend over to avoid hitting the ceiling. Ms. Sadina, now a grandmother, continues to live in the same house, the walls now appearing to crumble, tending the same garden her parents once harvested to survive.

She pointed to the neighbors' homes through her kitchen window. "These people are all children of the gulag," she said. "Nobody talks about it anymore. Nobody even wants to look at their pictures anymore."

The gulags once spread over the Kazakhstan steppe like a thick wreath. Eleven sprawling camps with names like Alzhir, a Russian acronym for the Akmolinsk Camp for Wives of Traitors of the Motherland, housed hundreds of thousands of prisoners and their families. The camps, built shortly after the creation of the Soviet Union, were partly emptied to provide soldiers and workers during World War II and were eventually closed, although not dismantled, after Stalin died in 1953.

In Kazakhstan today, a large percentage of people have parents or grandparents whose life trajectories were savagely rewired by deportation and imprisonment in the camps. But memories of the gulags are dying, fading like Ms. Sadina's photos.

"For younger generations the gulag is uninteresting," said Arest Savchak, a 61-year-old teacher whose parents and grandparents were exiled to Karaganda as political prisoners for the crime of supporting Ukrainian nationalism. "After the collapse of the Soviet Union, when we entered market economy, the values and the views of people have changed. Unless the gulag can be linked to the present time, it is meaningless."

For many Karaganda youngsters, the oppression the gulags stand for does not register. "This was just a village for miners," said Sasha Talabaev, 12, who was riding a bicycle through the heart of what was one of the gulags. Some of the reasons for a quick and collective forgetting are obvious. The memories, after all, are painful. And since the fall of the Soviet Union and Kazakhstan's independence in 1991, there are more pleasant things to focus on.

DOJ_NMG_0111508

Growing affluence is one of them. The economy is growing at about 10 percent a year, and with the aid of oil, the country has developed a sophisticated middle class and has nurtured to maturation a regional banking center. Its once dour towns have metastasized into modern cities.

But there are political aspects to a sidestepping of Kazakhstan's recent history, too, often born out of the government's determination to stay friendly with Russia.

To sustain support for a pro-Russia foreign policy, "the Kazakhstan state has gone to great lengths to construct an ideology for its nation-state that glosses over its colonial and neo-colonial history with Russia," Sean R. Roberts, a researcher in Central Asia affairs at Georgetown University, wrote on Dec. 19 in his Web log about the region.

Although those efforts have not added up to a blanket ban on public remembrances of the gulags, the government has instead chosen to ignore the issue. And it has used its control of the education system to keep texts from dwelling on the topic.

In a more pointed example of control, the government forbade large-scale remembrances of a violent uprising in Almaty, the capital, that took place in December 1986. As many as 40,000 ethnic Kazakhs poured into Almaty's central square then to protest Mikhail S. Gorbachev's firing of the chief of the Kazakh Soviet state. Soviet security forces are estimated to have killed at least 200 protesters on the square.

The rebellion was a watershed for Kazakh identity. It resonated too strongly for the government to ignore this year, so in October, President Nursultan A. Nazarbayev quietly dedicated a statue to commemorate the event. But the gesture received little coverage in the Kazakh press, which is closely monitored and controlled by the government.

Opposition leaders and several thousand nationalists hoped to use the statue as a gathering point for an antigovernment rally on the anniversary, but the government moved swiftly to crush preparations for it.

With Kazakh nationalism having become mostly the purview of the anti-Russia opposition here, the government has had to use other avenues to promote a coherent national identity. That is no small challenge in this country of 17 million people who span 80 different ethnicities and nearly as many religions — a direct legacy of the Soviet Union's use of Kazakhstan as a holding pen for prisoners, dissidents and people who did not fit in the Russian mainstream.

Popular culture has been one tool of choice, especially through the government-financed movie studio KazakhFilm, which has a near monopoly on the country's film industry. This year the studio released its biggest hit yet, a historical piece called "Nomad" that delved into distant history, telling the little-known story of an ancient battle to give an uplifting view of Kazakh identity. The film, a $34.5 million production, broke box-office records in Kazakhstan, grossing more than $1 million here and also doing well in Russia.

Despite the huge expense of such historical movies, KazakhFilm plans more. But the company's chief executive, Talgat Temenov, says that none will be set in the 20th century.

"The Kazakh people have a tragic history, but with a movie like 'Nomad,' people can feel a sense of pride," he said. "Film is an art and should not be a political tool, but at the same time we need to respect what history can do to people's psychology."

Steven A. Barnes, an assistant professor of history at George Mason University who has studied the gulags in Karaganda, insists that history's relevance to society is exactly why remembering Kazakhstan's painful gulag past is so important.

"In the post-Soviet space, the trip from remembering to forgetting has been remarkably swift," he said. "Perhaps such public forgetting would seem less problematic if not for the fact that it enables strong, authoritarian rule that clamps down on basic human rights like freedom of speech and the right of assembly."

Chinese Focus On Navy Leaves Big Political Wake (LAT)

By Mark Magnier, Mitchell Landsberg

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

BEIJING — President Hu Jintao's call last week for a strong Chinese navy won't threaten U.S. military dominance any time soon. But in China, where symbolism often is as important as substance, the address was seen by analysts as serving two functions: to help build a policy consensus and signal his near-complete grip on the political field before a key party congress next fall.

"This is very significant," said Ni Lexiong, a professor at the Shanghai Institute of Political Science and Law. "Though this does not mean immediate budget increases, it is a strong signal that lays out our future direction."

State media gave prominent play Thursday to comments by Hu a day earlier at a Communist Party meeting on the need for a powerful navy prepared "at any time" for military struggle.

"We should make sound preparations for military struggles and ensure that the forces can effectively carry out missions at any time," Hu reportedly said.

DOJ_NMG_0111509

China's navy has been the country's weakest link under a military structure that has emphasized a homegrown manpower advantage for its army and borrowed Soviet technology for its air force. But even as it restructures, China is keen to bolster its weak third arm.

The aim is to prevent Taiwan from declaring independence and to safeguard the seaborne trade, oil and other resources needed to power China's booming economy. China has considered Taiwan a part of its territory since a split between the Nationalists and Communists in 1949 after protracted civil war.

China's growing military profile has raised eyebrows at the Pentagon, which fears an erosion of its military dominance in the Pacific and beyond.

"Previously, China did not have the capability to maintain anything but symbolic naval presence on the approaches to the mainland," the Defense Department said in its 2006 report "Military Power of the People's Republic of China." "The PLA [People's Liberation Army] navy, however, appears interested in expanding its presence through the Straits of Malacca and into the Indian Ocean."

Of significance in China's one-party state with its emphasis on political theater, analysts said, was Hu's choice of venues. Rather than addressing an audience from all major service branches, he chose a meeting of naval specialists, a signal that the navy can expect special treatment in the bureaucratic battle for attention and resources.

Also significant was the timing. The military has been an area of political weakness for Hu. The president's resume doesn't boast the years of military service many of his predecessors had. Nor did it help that ex-President Jiang Zemin held on to his last military post until late 2005, more than two years into Hu's administration.

But the notably careful leader's confident military tone Wednesday and his appearance in military green immediately after a purge of a key Jiang loyalist in Shanghai suggests he faces no significant opposition across the Chinese political spectrum.

China has made no secret of its desire for a credible "blue water" navy, and its blistering economy, $1 trillion in foreign reserves and growing confidence place it in an increasingly strong position to fund its objective.

"It may be time for them to get their fair share," said Ralph A. Cossa, president of the Honolulu-based Pacific Forum CSIS, a think tank. "A lot of other sectors of modernization took priority."

In an 83-page defense white paper released Friday, China said it also would strengthen its air force to enhance its airstrike, missile defense and early-warning systems.

In March, China announced a 14% increase in overall military spending to $35 billion, the latest in a string of double-digit increases. Some U.S. defense analysts say the actual figure may be two or three times higher.

Beijing faces significant challenges before it can pose a military threat to the U.S., some analysts say. Politically it is also wary of any step that might appear too provocative to Washington under its "peaceful rise" strategy, given the importance of U.S. trade for domestic stability and development.

China's military spending, even at a higher figure, is still a fraction of U.S. levels. China's dream of acquiring a working aircraft carrier is years, perhaps decades, off. And it faces enormous challenges in revamping a labor-intensive, technologically challenged military into a modern, flexible fighting force.

In his comments Wednesday, Hu called for "strict management of the navy according to law."

Some analysts read this as a veiled reference to corruption in the ranks. This month, a military court handed down a life sentence to Vice Adm. Wang Shouye on embezzlement charges, according to Hong Kong's pro-mainland Wen Wei Po newspaper. He reportedly is the most senior Chinese military officer ever jailed for corruption.

"It's not only a reference to the vice admiral, but the corruption, irregularities and general lack of discipline," said Andrew Yang, a military analyst with Taiwan's Chinese Council of Advanced Policy Studies. Hu "plans to emphasize discipline and rule of law."

Beyond China's aircraft carrier plans, U.S. military planners are watching closely any steps Beijing takes to expand its deep-water anti-submarine capability, to develop large numbers of nuclear attack submarines or to increase open-water training.

Washington has also called on China repeatedly to be more forthcoming on its military budgets, plans and capabilities.

China first voiced a desire for an indigenous aircraft carrier in the late 1970s, according to Pentagon reports, before buying, in 1985, the carrier Melbourne from Australia. The hull was scrapped, but not before engineers studied the ship and built a replica of the flight deck for pilot training, the Defense Department said.

After the fall of the Berlin Wall, the Chinese purchased two Soviet carriers — the Minsk in 1998 and the Kiev in 2000 — which they turned into floating military theme parks after carefully studying their designs.

Some analysts say the Chinese could have an operational carrier by 2015; others say it probably won't be before 2020. A working carrier would require a huge increase in its military budget, analysts said, as well as overcoming significant technological hurdles and significantly upgrading the skill of its navy personnel.

"They're still far behind for the foreseeable future for the United States, and also for India," Yang said.

DOJ_NMG_0111510

The Buzz On Japan's New Premier: Too Old-school (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

TOKYO — Political honeymoons end sooner or later for almost every leader, but the danger for new Japanese Prime Minster Shinzo Abe is not just that his popularity is sliding three months into the job. It's that he's already being mocked.

Consider the view of Brutus magazine, a style bible for Tokyo men who care about being ahead of every trend, whether it's fad food or how to look cool at the gym. "Beautiful Country?" asked the cover of the magazine's December edition, invoking the political mantra Abe has used to sell his nationalist vision of a resurgent Japan.

Out of touch, Brutus scolded Abe.

"Right now what the entire world is crazy about is cool Japan," the magazine cover line told Abe, referring to the elements of Japanese culture, from anime to architecture, that are now part of global chic.

The Brutus view sums up a developing perception here: that Japan's youngest postwar prime minister may be an out-of-touch young fogey, more nostalgic for an old Japan than eager to usher in a new one.

Critics contend that his government's focus on nationalist obsessions such as passing laws to enforce patriotism among schoolchildren is a distraction from the core economic and social issues that present far graver challenges to Japan.

They also argue that Abe's government lacks discipline and coherence. Since North Korea's nuclear weapons test Oct. 9, some senior government officials have repeatedly called for a debate on whether Japan needs its own nuclear option, in defiance of Abe's desire to shut down the chatter.

Suspicions that Abe lacks toughness — and control over his party — are contributing to his sudden slip in polls. A Jiji Press poll in mid-December put Abe's approval rating at 42%, a 9-percentage-point fall in a month.

He had been off to a positive start. Within days of taking office, Abe held summit meetings with the leaders of China and South Korea, ending the top-level diplomatic freeze sparked by the visits of his predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi, to Yasukuni Shrine, where Japanese war criminals are among the honored souls of the country's war dead.

But the prime minister has stumbled on the domestic front. Despite the markets' buzz about the long-last arrival of a Japanese recovery, the economy has yet to truly catch fire, largely because domestic consumption remains sluggish.

That hurts Abe, who is counting on consumer-led growth to help resolve Japan's massive public debt. The prime minister is eager to avoid any high-profile tax hikes ahead of crucial Upper House elections in July, which are being seen as a referendum on his leadership.

That leaves little room to maneuver. Abe is committed to continuing Koizumi's belt-tightening reforms that have cut public spending, notably transfers of cash to the towns and regions that form the Liberal Democratic Party base.

Koizumi used his populist skills to free himself from the calcified hand of the political machine that has ruled postwar Japan from its backrooms. His ability to build a public consensus for his policies gave him an independence that allowed him to hack away at the party's habit of showering its supportive constituencies with public money.

Koizumi was even able to chase the hard core of anti-reformers out of the party by successfully calling a death-or-glory election in which he ran his own reformist candidates against LDP "rebels" who opposed a key economic reform.

But Abe shocked many here by welcoming that old guard back into the party this fall. The move made him appear beholden to the LDP's old back-room chieftains and seem deaf to voters' call for a more modern approach to politics.

"When Abe brought the rebels back into the party, people got the impression he was retreating from the reform agenda," political analyst Takao Toshikawa said.

Even Abe's 2007 budget shows how he is being pulled between imperatives to slash the size of government and the political need to satisfy politicians clamoring for public funds.

Abe billed his first budget as a cost-cutting exercise that would eliminate annual budget deficits by 2011 or earlier, pledging to cut the number of bonds issued by 15.2% and lowering spending on public works projects by 3.5%.

Even so, rising welfare and medical costs associated with Japan's rapidly aging population meant the budget's overall spending rose by 4%. And in its less-noted supplemental budget for 2006, the Abe government chose to spend much of the $38.6-billion windfall from higher-than-expected tax revenue on public works projects, although some were labeled "disaster prevention programs."

"Koizumi reduced spending on public works and cut the allocation of taxes to local governments, but with local economies weakening, there has been mounting pressure within the LDP to restore some of the old subsidies," said Hiromichi Shirakawa, chief economist at Credit Suisse in Tokyo. "These extra tax revenues were funneled back into what you could call 'old Japan.' "

Amid Political Upheaval, Israeli Economy Stays Healthy (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0111511

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 31, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 26 — For Israel, it has been a typically tumultuous year: Ariel Sharon, then the prime minister, collapsed into a coma on Jan. 4, the radical Islamic group Hamas won Palestinian elections later that month, and Israel fought a monthlong war in Lebanon this summer.

But despite the political turmoil and spasms of violence, Israel, it seems, has figured out how to keep its economy charging forward.

It was the country's third straight year of strong growth, with the economy expanding nearly 5 percent. The stock market has been hitting record highs; unemployment is at a 10-year low. Israel's central bank is lowering interest rates to 4.5 percent on Jan. 1, putting them well below rates in the United States, an almost unprecedented development. The Israeli shekel is trading at 4.2 to the dollar, its strongest level in five years.

Further, Warren E. Buffett, the billionaire investor, paid $4 billion for an Israeli company, and Donald Trump is developing a 70-story luxury residential tower on the outskirts of Tel Aviv.

"Israelis look at the economy, and they've essentially been through these disturbances in the past, and they know the economy is pretty robust and it tends to come back," said Stanley Fischer, the governor of the Bank of Israel. "Things that happen here have a smaller impact on markets than I think they would abroad."

While the Israeli economy has been thriving, the Palestinian economy has moved in the opposite direction, contracting by an estimated 10 to 15 percent this year, according to the Palestine Monetary Authority.

For Israel, the business that best illustrates the economy's resilience this year is the company Mr. Buffett bought, Iscar Metalworking Company, a global leader in the manufacture of precision metal-cutting tools.

In May, Mr. Buffet bought 80 percent of the company, which has its headquarters on an isolated hilltop in northern Israel that offers a panoramic view of the nearby border with Lebanon.

Barely two months later, a cross-border raid by Hezbollah guerrillas ignited 34 days of fighting that pushed Israeli troops into Lebanon and drew heavy rocket barrages against northern Israel.

One rocket slammed into the Tefen Industrial Park, where Iscar is situated, causing minor damage to a building belonging to another company. Many more rockets crashed nearby during the weeks of war.

Many Iscar workers moved their families away from the border region, but the company maintained production, with only occasional slowdowns.

"It took us a brief time to adjust, but we didn't miss a single shipment," said Eitan Wertheimer, Iscar's chairman. "For our customers around the world, there was no war."

The northern city of Haifa came under almost daily rocket attacks, and ships stopped entering Haifa's port, the country's largest. Some exporters shipped their goods by air at much higher expense in order to meet deadlines.

The Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, which has been setting records throughout the year, seemingly shrugged off the war; it was slightly higher at the end of the conflict in August than before it started in July.

At the beginning of the year, Israel's economy was forecast to grow at around 5.5 percent, and will come in at about 4.8 percent, according to Mr. Fischer, who attributed the dip to the war.

The Palestinian economy, meanwhile, has been devastated. During the peace talks of the 1990s, the Israelis and Palestinians increased cooperation, and by 2000, both sides were growing rapidly and nearly 150,000 Palestinians entered Israel daily. Most were workers who accounted for a large slice of the Palestinian economy.

When the Palestinian uprising began in September of that year, both sides took an immediate economic hit, but for the Palestinians, the downward spiral has yet to end.

Israeli security forces greatly increased the web of restrictions in the Palestinian areas to prevent attacks, and the measures have also imposed great hardships on Palestinian economic life. The Palestinians grew increasingly dependent on aid as their access to Israel's economy dwindled. The problems worsened into crisis this year after Hamas came to power, and Israel began withholding Palestinian tax revenues and Western countries cut off direct aid to the Palestinian government.

The Palestinian per capita gross domestic product, which was about $1,800 annually at the beginning of the uprising, plummeted to $1,200 last year and continues to fall.

For Israelis, per capita gross domestic product has risen over the last six years from a little over $15,000 a year to around $18,000, according to government figures.

Israel turned the corner on a two-year recession in 2003, and for the past three years the economy has expanded at 4.4 percent to 5.2 percent annually, with a similar forecast for next year. The growth comes from technology, service and other modern industries, and trade mostly with the United States, Europe and East Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0111512

Plagued by hyperinflation in the 1980s, Israel has an inflation rate hovering around zero percent this year, and it has been averaging less than 1 percent annually for the past five years.

The economic tide is not lifting every Israeli boat, however. Despite the economic growth, the number of Israelis living below the poverty level has been edging up, from 18 percent in 2002 to more than 20 percent last year, according to the government's National Insurance Institute.

Critics say this is because Israelis who are struggling economically have seen their benefits fall sharply, while they remain unemployed. The unemployment rate is at its lowest level in a decade, but still relatively high at 8.4 percent.

Benjamin Netanyahu, who as finance minister pushed aggressive open-market policies from 2003 to 2005, was also widely criticized for cutting social programs in a country where couples often have many children and depend heavily on such subsidies.

"The basic problem is that economic growth has been very uneven," said Shlomo Swirski, the academic director of Adva, a research institute that focuses on the poor.

Job growth, he said, has been concentrated in sectors that require a high level of education. Economic growth has been greatest in Tel Aviv and surrounding areas, the economic hub of the country, while the less developed Galilee in the north and Negev Desert in the south have seen much less progress, Mr. Swirski added.

"We're looking at growth that is highly concentrated geographically, economically and socially," he said.

Economists note that many of the poor come from two groups, Israeli Arabs and ultra-Orthodox Jews, that have large families and low participation rates in the work force. Among Israeli Arabs, few women have formal jobs. Among the ultra-Orthodox, many men do not work.

"We still see a strong debate over income distribution," said David Levhari, an economics professor at Hebrew University. "But overall, I think we're looking at an economy that should continue to do pretty well."

Analysis: Annan To Leave Office Sunday, But Won't Leave U.N. Behind (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — Kofi Annan steps down as U.N. secretary-general at midnight Sunday, leaving behind a global organization far more aggressively engaged in peacekeeping and fighting poverty — but struggling to restore its tarnished reputation.

Taking office six years after the collapse of the Soviet Union, Annan helped preside over a decade that saw the world unite against terrorism after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, then divide deeply over the U.S.-led war against Iraq which toppled Saddam Hussein.

At a Millennium Summit in September 2000, he spurred world leaders to adopt a blueprint to wage a global war on poverty and bring the United Nations into the 21st century.

Five years later, he called a follow-up summit to mark the U.N.'s 60th anniversary. Hoping to complete the bold changes, he sought to promote development, ensure international security and end human rights abuses. History's largest gathering of world leaders took a first step, but it fell far short.

Unlike the upbeat atmosphere at the dawn of the new millennium, the World Summit in 2005 took place after a year of almost daily attacks on the United Nations over allegations of corruption in the U.N. oil-for-food program in Iraq, bribery by U.N. purchasing officials, and widespread sexual abuse by U.N. peacekeepers.

World leaders agreed to create an internal ethics office but they did not give Annan the authority to make sweeping management changes. The major overhaul of the U.N.'s outdated management practices and operating procedures will be left to Annan's successor, Ban Ki-moon, who takes over on Jan. 1.

In what was considered a major summit achievement, world leaders pledged to protect civilians from genocide, war crimes and ethnic cleansing — but before stepping down earlier this month U.N. humanitarian chief, Jan Egeland accused leaders of failure to translate their pledge into action, especially in Sudan's Darfur region, Iraq and the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

The 2005 summit also approved a fund to promote democracy and a new Peacebuilding Commission to help countries make the difficult transition from war to peace, and it renewed a commitment to achieve the Millennium Development Goals including cutting extreme poverty by half and achieving universal primary education by 2015.

A new Human Rights Council was highly touted as a replacement for the discredited Human Rights Commission — but in its first year, the council disappointed Annan and human rights activists by following the commission's tradition of focusing its attacks on Israel and ignoring abuses elsewhere.

At a farewell news conference earlier this month, Annan said he considered his top achievements the promotion of human rights, fighting to close the gap between extreme poverty and immense wealth, and the U.N.'s campaign to fight AIDS and other infectious diseases.

DOJ_NMG_0111513

"His greatest accomplishment was to set a framework that moved the U.N. from one century to the next — the response to mass atrocities, the central role of democracy, the importance of human rights, and a priority to development," said Lee Feinstein, a fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations.

Under Annan, U.N. peacekeeping has expanded with nearly 80,000 U.N. troops and international police currently deployed from Africa and the Mideast to Kosovo, Haiti and East Timor.

Annan's first five-year term culminated in 2001 with the Nobel Peace Prize — shared with the United Nations — for "their work for a better organized and more peaceful world." Annan himself was lauded for "bringing new life to the organization."

But Annan's second five-year term was not without shadows. An investigation led by former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker blamed shoddy U.N. management and the world's most powerful nations for allowing corruption in the $64 billion oil-for-food program in Iraq to go on for years. Volcker's final report in October 2005 accused more than 2,200 companies from some 40 countries of colluding with Saddam Hussein's regime to bilk the humanitarian program in Iraq of $1.8 billion.

Annan was besieged with questions about his son's involvement with a company that won an oil-for-food contract, and U.S. Sen. Norm Coleman, a Minnesota Republican, called for his resignation.

Annan told reporters that one of his worst moments was the way oil-for-food "was exploited to undermine the organization."

Feinstein said that "Annan was perhaps the most pro-American secretary-general who nonetheless was never accepted by U.N. critics in the Congress."

"His greatest failings were clearly the failure to rein in the U.N. Secretariat and streamline management more broadly," Feinstein said.

Professor Edward Luck, director of the Center on International Organization at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs, said he thinks "historians are going to give Kofi Annan relatively high marks."

"He's certainly someone who aimed high and sometimes failed to achieve what his rhetoric promised," Luck said. "But he certainly did succeed in restoring the individual to the center of the U.N.'s agenda, both in terms of human security and human rights and the responsibility to protect."

Annan, 68, said he will maintain all those U.N. concerns — and many more — in his new life, likely to be divided between Switzerland and his native Ghana.

"You can take the man out of the U.N.," Annan told one recent farewell party, "but you can't take the U.N. out of the man."

Annan Focused On Human Element (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, December 31, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Kofi Annan says that he will keep working until midnight tonight, when his 10-year tenure as the world's top diplomat officially ends. But he has already begun reflecting on his achievements, frustrations and failures as a leader who embodies the world's ideals, and as a man who often could not escape his limitations to make those ideals a reality.

Although it is sometimes debated whether Annan, 68, was more "secretary" or "general," he was mostly an idealist. He would like to be remembered, he said this month, as the leader who pushed the world to agree to intervene to stop genocides, and to try to cut poverty in half. He sought to make the U.N. about people, not just geopolitics.

But he was often overwhelmed by the details of managing a gargantuan organization that kept the peace in 18 countries and once ran the entire economy of Iraq. His management lapses were blamed for the subversion of the $64-billion oil-for-food program in Iraq, as well as a wave of corruption scandals and sexual exploitation by peacekeepers under his watch.

Recognizing the need to update the 60-year-old institution, Annan proposed sweeping reforms that would make the U.N. better able to deal with the new threats and challenges of the 21st century. But he was stymied by a group of developing countries, which saw the changes as a loss of power, and by the U.S., which had its own vision of how to revamp the world body.

At a Security Council luncheon six weeks after he launched his reform plan, Annan jokingly apologized for not yet having finished the reorganization. Russian Ambassador Sergei V. Lavrov piped up and said, "Mr. Secretary-General, what are you complaining about? You have had more time than God!" Annan responded, "You are right, but God started with one great advantage — with a clean canvas, and without a Security Council and a General Assembly."

Annan, the son of a chieftain from Ghana, was christened "Anthony" but was known by the name Kofi, which means "born on Friday." He joined the bottom ranks of the U.N. in 1962 and didn't plan to stay longer than four years, he said. But he quietly rose through the institution to head the peacekeeping department. In December 1996, the Clinton administration pushed him as its candidate to replace Boutros-Boutros Ghali, the outspoken Egyptian secretary-general it deemed a liability to U.S. interests.

DOJ_NMG_0111514

Annan was chosen because he was an African who knew the U.N. system, and had proved that he was pragmatic and effective and could work with the United States when he oversaw peacekeepers in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Haiti. But most important, he did not have a political agenda or an overweening ego that could put him in conflict with the U.S. By the end of Annan's decade, however, he grew to be a quiet but compelling challenger to Washington.

First, a honeymoon

Annan's first five years in the wood-paneled office at the top of the shimmering U.N. headquarters were a honeymoon of sorts. Annan's manner is gentle, and nonconfrontational, and he is so soft-spoken that he can hardly be heard without a microphone. When perturbed, his voice gets lower, not louder. When anxious, he clenches his jaw and twists his large gold ring. That demeanor gave him a kind of regal aloofness, and a gracious yet distant charm that served him well as a nonpartisan mediator, but sometimes made him seem to lack fire.

He and his Swedish wife, Nane, the elegant niece of Holocaust hero Raoul Wallenberg, traveled around the U.S. and the world, giving a human face to an otherwise impersonal institution and imparting Annan's belief that every person has equal rights, and that a government's duty is to protect them.

Annan introduced the doctrine of "humanitarian intervention" — that borders should not shield governments that cannot or will not protect their own people. The idea was born in part of his feelings of impotence and guilt as the head of peacekeeping during massacres in the Bosnian town of Srebrenica and in Rwanda that the U.N. did little to stop. Although some countries initially resisted, in 2005, 191 leaders endorsed "the responsibility to protect," something Annan considers one of his top achievements.

For championing human rights and development, and "for bringing new life to the organization," Annan and the U.N. won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2001. He became known as "a diplomatic rock star," and the spotlight seemed to shine on the U.N. as a central stage in world affairs.

But the second half of his tenure would be much darker.

Sept. 11

The Sept. 11 attacks made the Bush administration more determined to strengthen national security — but, Annan later argued, at the expense of multilateralism and human rights. In 2002, President Bush challenged the Security Council to confront Iraq or stand aside, and while the U.S. attempted for six months to gain the U.N.'s stamp of legitimacy for its long-planned invasion, it ended up going into Iraq without it.

Annan cited the failure to stop the Iraq war as the worst moment of his career.

"I really did everything I could to try to see if we could stop it," he said, including desperate rounds of phone calls and meetings with every leader he could reach, with every proposal he could think of. In April 2003, weeks after the invasion began, Annan literally lost his voice.

He seemed to lose his nerve as well, taking weeks off with what was described as "a very bad cold," but what aides described later as a sort of depression or "paralysis of despair. " He returned, somewhat diminished but determined to make the U.N. the kind of institution that the U.S., or any other country, would find indispensable.

Washington went into Iraq without the U.N.'s blessing, but it also had to do without significant U.N. help in rebuilding the country, an essential piece of postwar planning that the administration had assumed the world body would take on. Annan did send a team of his best and brightest, including his close friend and diplomatic icon, Sergio Vieira de Mello. Another one of the most painful moments of his career came in August 2003, when the bombing of the U.N.'s headquarters in Baghdad killed 22 people — many of whom he had personally asked to go. De Mello was among those slain.

Those deaths "hit me as much as the loss of my twin sister," Annan said this month. His sister, Efua, died in 1991 after an illness.

Annan's career and the image of the U.N. would sustain another heavy blow in 2003 when revelations surfaced of payoffs and subversion of the oil-for-food program. Saddam Hussein had constructed a massive kickback scheme to siphon billions from the U.N.-run aid program; Security Council members, including the U.S., quietly allowed the diversions, considering it the cost of keeping weapons materials out of Hussein's hands.

An 18-month investigation led by former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul A. Volcker found that Annan was responsible for grave mismanagement, and charged several staff members with conflict of interest, but found "no evidence" of wrongdoing by Annan.

Yet the inquiry left questions unanswered about Annan's meetings with executives from Cotecna, a Swiss firm that employed his son Kojo and that won a $10-million contract three months after the company officials' last meeting with the secretary-general.

'Best place on Earth'

DOJ_NMG_0111515

Annan will leave office with many of his reforms unfinished, with no magic words to help his successor, Ban Ki-moon, reconcile the divisions between the rich and poor nations, between Washington and its opponents, between ideals and reality.

Though Annan acknowledged that "SG" often seemed to stand for "scapegoat," he also said "it is the best place on Earth to be."

In his valedictory speech to the General Assembly in September, he said: "Together we have pushed some big rocks to the top of the mountain, even if others have slipped from our grasp and rolled back…. And while I look forward to resting my shoulder from those stubborn rocks in the next phase of my life, I know I shall miss the mountain."

North Korea's Pass (WP)

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

NEARLY 12 WEEKS have passed since the North Korean dictatorship conducted what it said was a nuclear bomb test -- and made explicit the grave threat it poses to global security. At the time the regime of Kim Jong Il appeared to be calculating that it would not suffer severe consequences for its provocation and that the world would eventually accept it as a nuclear power, as India and Pakistan have been accepted. Sadly, that logic is beginning to look justified.

True, the U.N. Security Council passed a resolution on Oct. 14, five days after the test, that condemned the action and applied some sanctions. But China blocked the tougher sanctions proposals, and both Beijing and South Korea have resisted U.S. pressure to enforce the measures rigorously. Three weeks after the test the North agreed under apparent pressure from China to return to the "six-party" negotiations on its nuclear program. But when the talks finally took place earlier this month it turned out the only subject North Korea's representatives were authorized to discuss was unrelated U.S. banking sanctions. The talks ended without result, and no new session has been scheduled.

North Korea's ability to sustain its defiant posture is remarkable because, in contrast to the cases of India or Pakistan, the outside world has the ability to cripple the regime if it chooses. China provides 90 percent of North Korea's oil and most of its food; it also enforces inhumane border controls that prevent brutally repressed and frequently starving North Koreans from fleeing their country. South Korea provides most of the foreign investment in the North. If the two countries were to decide that stopping North Korea from producing more nuclear weapons was more important than preserving its dictatorship, they could remove the lifelines they provide Kim Jong Il. So far, they haven't.

The leverage of the United States is limited. Critics who insist that the Bush administration should conduct bilateral negotiations with Pyongyang not only ignore the extensive one-on-one talks that Ambassador Christopher R. Hill has held with North Korean officials, they also presume that it's possible to change North Korean behavior without the collaboration of its prime benefactors. Some argue that the administration should give up the financial sanctions that froze North Korean accounts in a Macao bank last year and that are now the focus of Pyongyang's demands. Yet it's hard to see why abandoning the scant nonmilitary leverage the United States does possess -- and easing the pressure on North Korea's dollar counterfeiting and drug trafficking -- would make the regime more likely to negotiate seriously about its weapons.

In fact the best option the Bush administration now has is to work with such allies as Japan to raise the economic pressure on North Korea as much as is possible. Diplomacy is best focused not on Pyongyang, but on Beijing -- which needs to be convinced that the stability it says it seeks in Asia, and in its relations with the United States, depends on its willingness to bring real pressure to bear on North Korea. The aim need not be to bring down the regime, only to convince it that its existence will be imperiled rather than secured by nuclear weapons.

While You Were At War... (WP)

By Richard A. Clarke

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

In every administration, there are usually only about a dozen barons who can really initiate and manage meaningful changes in national security policy. For most of 2006, some of these critical slots in the Bush administration have been vacant, such as the deputy secretary of state (empty since Robert B. Zoellick left for investment bank Goldman Sachs) and the deputy director of national intelligence (with Gen. Michael V. Hayden now CIA director). And with the nation involved in a messy war spiraling toward a bad conclusion, the key deputies and Cabinet members and advisers are all focusing on one issue, at the expense of all others: Iraq.

National Security Council veteran Rand Beers has called this the "7-year-old's soccer syndrome" -- just like little kids playing soccer, everyone forgets their particular positions and responsibilities and runs like a herd after the ball.

In the end, there are only 12 seats at the conference table in the White House Situation Room, and the key players' schedules mean that they can seldom meet there together in person or on secure video conference for more than about 10 hours each week. When issues don't receive first-tier consideration, they can slip by for months. I learned this firsthand: In the early days of the Bush administration, I called for an urgent meeting to discuss the threat al-Qaeda posed to the United States. The Cabinet-level meeting eventually took place -- but not until Sept. 4, 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0111516

Without the distraction of the Iraq war, the administration would have spent this past year -- indeed, every year since Sept. 11, 2001 -- focused on al-Qaeda. But beyond al-Qaeda and the broader struggle for peaceful coexistence with (and within) Islam, seven key "fires in the in-box" national security issues remain unattended, deteriorating and threatening, all while Washington's grown-up 7-year-olds play herd ball with Iraq.

Global warming: When the possibility of invading Iraq surfaced in 2001, senior Bush administration officials hadn't thought much about global warming, except to wonder whether it was caused by human activity or by sunspots. Today, the world's scientists and many national leaders worry that the world has passed the point of no return on global warming. If it has, then human damage to the ecosphere will cause more major cities to flood and make the planet significantly less conducive to human habitation -- all over the lifetime of a child now in kindergarten. British Prime Minister Tony Blair keeps trying to convince President Bush of the magnitude of the problem, but in every session between the two leaders Iraq squeezes out the time to discuss the pending planetary disaster.

Russian revanchism: When Russian President Vladimir Putin and Bush leave office in rapid succession in 2008 and 2009, it seems likely that Russia will be less of a democracy and less inclined to cooperate with Washington than it was six years ago, when Bush stared into the eyes and looked into the heart of the Russian leader. Given her extensive background in Soviet studies, Condoleezza Rice would have been a natural to work on key U.S.-Russian issues, first as national security adviser and now as secretary of state. But the focus on Iraq has precluded such efforts, even as the troubling issues multiply: Russian governors are no longer elected, but appointed; dissidents die mysteriously and probably at the hands of the new KGB; opposition media are suppressed; and corporate leaders are jailed or hounded out of the country.

Meanwhile, Moscow plays petro-politics by dramatically raising the cost of energy to former Soviet republics that do not toe the Kremlin's line, and by threatening to turn off the pipeline to European nations that don't cooperate. If Bush hoped that turning a blind eye to all this would help win Russian cooperation in Iraq and Iran, the strategy failed.

Latin America's leftist lurch: In the years before the Iraq war, U.S. presidents were welcomed at summits throughout Latin America and the Caribbean. Indeed, the attacks of Sept. 11 found then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell in South America, visiting one area of the world where U.S. policies had worked. Friendly, democratic governments were in power in every nation in the hemisphere except Cuba. Formerly debt-ridden economies were implementing pro-market reforms, and the United States was welcomed as a partner. Washington seemed confident that if and when Fidel Castro died (there was always some doubt), even Cuba might join the democracy/free market club.

Today, Castro has been replaced, but not just by another Cuban dictator. The leader of the hemisphere's new anti-Yankee alliance is Hugo ChÃ¡vez, the democratically elected president of Venezuela. ChÃ¡vez's anti-U.S. campaign is supported by Cuban intelligence and Venezuelan oil money. By 2006, Venezuela and Cuba were not alone in their opposition to Washington; kindred spirits have been elected in Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua. Having begun his administration pledging new cooperation with Mexico, Bush backtracked after Sept. 11, focusing instead on tightening immigration and border controls.

Africa at war: The genocide spilling from the Darfur region of Sudan into neighboring Chad has captured attention in the United States mainly because of (belated) media coverage and an aggressive advocacy campaign by concerned groups, but the prospects of Washington dealing with the problem seem slim. Darfur, however, is only one of a pox of conflicts that, together with HIV/AIDS, are depopulating parts of Africa and robbing it of potential wealth from mineral, oil and gas deposits. Wars have also raged in Chad, Congo, Liberia, Sierra Leone and Somalia. Were it not for the Iraq war, Washington may have acted to stop what the Bush administration admits is genocide in Darfur, or taken steps to prevent the chaos sweeping Somalia after a group affiliated with al-Qaeda took over the country and left Ethiopia no choice but to invade in hopes of preventing a more disastrous war. Unfortunately, even designating a small presence of U.S. Special Forces to lead a U.N.-approved peacekeeping force in Darfur appears beyond the capability of the badly stretched American military.

Arms control freeze: Once atop several administrations' national security agendas, international arms control has received little White House attention since the Bush administration decided early on to walk away from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty. National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley has extensive government experience working on arms control and he began to focus on this turf in early 2001, when he was number two at the National Security Council. But after 9/11, Hadley has had little opportunity to advance international efforts to control biological weapons, nuclear testing and proliferation, or the threat of nuclear or radioactive terrorist weapons. For a long time, the White House outsourced dealing with Iran's nuclear weapons to the Europeans, just as the onus of stopping North Korea's nuclear development was placed on Asian nations. The sustained senior-level attention that is needed to stop two nuclear weapons programs at the same time has simply not been available -- because of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0111517

Transnational crime: In a nationally televised address in 1989, President George H.W. Bush held aloft a bag of cocaine that had been sold near the White House and declared a "War on Drugs." That initiative was later enlarged to target the international criminal cartels engaged in human trafficking, gun and contraband smuggling, money laundering and cyber fraud. The momentum from these efforts produced international treaties to combat hidden global crime conglomerates, but the White House leadership necessary to coordinate dozens of U.S. agencies and mobilize other nations has dissipated. Moreover, the world's international crime cartels received a major shot in the arm with the occupation of Afghanistan by NATO forces. From relatively low levels of heroin production in 2001, Afghanistan's economy is now dependent upon the widespread cultivation of heroin that is flooding black markets in Europe and Asia. With most of the U.S. Army either in Iraq, heading to Iraq or returning from Iraq, insufficient U.S. forces were available to prevent the once-liberated Afghanistan from morphing into a narco-state.

The Pakistani-Afghan border: Afghanistan increasingly receives the attention of senior U.S. policymakers, not because of the narcotics problem, but mainly because the once-defeated Taliban again threaten Afghan and coalition forces. However, if there is a solution, it lies on the other side of the Khyber Pass where a sanctuary has emerged, a Taliban-like state within a state in western Pakistan. Dealing with that problem is more than Washington has been willing or able to handle, for it involves the complex issue of who governs nuclear-armed Pakistan and how.

Thus far, Washington has accepted Gen. Pervez Musharraf's half-hearted measures for dealing with the nuclear proliferation network of A.Q. Khan, addressing the terrorist involvement of Pakistani intelligence and controlling the Taliban/al-Qaeda bases in Waziristan. Getting Pakistan to do more would require a major sustained effort by senior U.S. officials, including addressing the longstanding tensions with India. Because of Iraq, Washington's national security gurus do not have the hours in their days to manage that -- nor the troops needed to secure Afghanistan.

As the president contemplates sending even more U.S. forces into the Iraqi sinkhole, he should consider not only the thousands of fatalities, the tens of thousands of casualties and the hundreds of billions of dollars already lost. He must also weigh the opportunity cost of taking his national security barons off all the other critical problems they should be addressing -- problems whose windows of opportunity are slamming shut, unheard over the wail of Baghdad sirens.

Richard A. Clarke, former national coordinator for counterterrorism, is chairman of Good Harbor Consulting and author of "Against All Enemies" (Free Press) and "Breakpoint" (Putnam).

Lebanon's Wartime Memory Lapse (WP)

By Lynn Maalouf

The Washington Post, December 31, 2006

On a bridge overlooking downtown, a large poster of Maarouf Saad flutters in the winter night's breeze. Beneath the bridge, army tanks line a square, as they do other streets and crossroads around the capital. Except for the flamboyantly restored Ottoman-era buildings in the background, the atmosphere is disturbingly reminiscent of the time 30 years ago when Saad was killed -- and Lebanon became engulfed in a 15-year civil war.

Today, as the Lebanese people once again find themselves divided along political and sectarian lines, the question reverberates around the country: Are we about to be drawn into another civil war?

In February 1975, Saad, a former member of parliament and an advocate of Arab nationalism, was leading a fishermen's protest in the southern city of Sidon when he was fatally shot -- many believe by the army. His killing exposed the depth of the divide running across Lebanese society, separating a leftist, Arab nationalist, pro-Palestinian, largely Muslim community and the pro-Western Christian Maronites who were effectively running the state.

The war that erupted barely two months after Saad's death killed 100,000 people -- 90 percent of them civilians -- and left another 100,000 disabled. About one-fifth of the prewar population was displaced.

Yet the lessons from that war were never learned. In 1989, an inter-Lebanese treaty signed in the Saudi summer resort of Taef ended the fighting. There was no victor, no vanquished. No reconciliation process was initiated. An amnesty law passed by the very people who had been fighting one another only weeks earlier exonerated them of war crimes.

As a result, the same warlords still color today's politics, including Druze leader Walid Jumblatt, Speaker of Parliament Nabih Berri, the Christian leader Samir Geagea and Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah. Meanwhile, the amnesty stifled the rights of victims -- there was no compensation for damages, no truth commissions, no interest in the fate of the roughly 17,000 who had disappeared.

Lebanon slipped into a state of amnesia. Today, having turned the page on its civil war without achieving closure, it is a country in danger of repeating the past.

On a sunny day last month, a handful of workers were painting the wooden shutters of a two-story white stone house in Beirut's southern suburbs. It is the home of Lokman and Monika Slim and their organization, Umam Documentation and Research, which aims to deal with the civil war's aftermath and with war memories.

DOJ_NMG_0111518

Not far away, just off Resistance and Liberation Street, a tall concrete building was half-demolished by Israeli jets last summer. Shrapnel destroyed not only parts of the Slims' house, but also wiped out some of the couple's most valued items: war archives that they had collected over the past five years, including leaflets, books, magazines, newspapers, photographs and audio-visual materials.

"It's as if we will never have enough time to build archives in this country," says Monika, a tall, blond German and a former reporter who helped her husband found Umam in 2004.

In the absence of documented history, Lebanese cling to conflicting narratives of the war and to their selective memories, passing them on to the younger generation. Jad Chaaya, a weary-looking 23-year-old, is a member of the Lebanese Forces, a Christian party allied with the government. After the assassination of Prime Minister Rafik Hariri on Feb. 14, 2005, Chaaya spent 90 days in a tent in downtown Beirut with other protesters, demanding an investigation into Hariri's killing and the withdrawal of Syrian troops from Lebanon.

It was part of the Intifada of Independence, in which groups that had fought one another in the civil war camped side by side, voicing the same demands. Many hailed it as the beginning of national reconciliation.

But Chaaya has a different reading of that time. "All that Lebanese Forces people who were in that tent wanted was the release of Samir Geagea," he says. Geagea, the head of the Lebanese Forces, was imprisoned for 11 years on assassination charges before being released in July 2005, following the Syrian withdrawal. "In the end, each sect is just interested in its own cause," Chaaya says.

He is too young to remember the 1975 war. What he knows is that his family was forced to flee their house overnight in 1976 after Palestinian gunmen attacked their town of Damour. He says he inherited his sense of "Christian insecurity" from his father, and that is why he thinks Geagea is the only one who can protect his community today.

"I don't really know much about the war," Chaaya says. "They haven't been able to put a history book together. So who am I to know?"

In his home one street off the former Green Line, which split the capital into East and West Beirut during the civil war, Antoine Messarra remembers being part of a government-appointed committee in charge of setting up a new history program. "These history books, had they really been created, they would have created a unifying memory for all Lebanese," says the law and history professor, not without some bitterness.

In 2000, the Council of Ministers approved the history program, but the minister of education at the time stopped it because it did not suit the Syrian occupying authorities, Messarra says. Today, most history books stop at 1943 and cover only one region of the country.

"The people of my generation have a vivid memory of the war," Messarra says. "They have experienced it in their flesh. The generation that was born out of the conflict has no such memory." In the street outside sits a row of army tanks that have marked nighttime checkpoints for the past several weeks. In early December, street brawls erupted in various residential neighborhoods between pro- and anti-government supporters, resulting in the death of a young man.

"We never described to [the young generation] what barricades are," Messarra says, "the suffering that came from these barricades. A lot of people died at barricades. We should have transmitted that trauma to them."

Back in Ghobeiry, Lokman Slim scrolls through a poem in which a sheik from the Shiite group Amal curses Hezbollah during a notorious 1989 battle when the two groups fought each other. Today, Amal and Hezbollah stand together in opposition to the government.

"Did we ever get over the civil war?" Slim asks. He turns off his computer and steps into the garden, facing a tree known as fitna -- coincidentally, the Arabic word for strife. In the street, an elderly man pushes a vegetable cart alongside a wall covered with the pictures of young people killed during last summer's war.

"The Lebanese," Slim says, "never made any effort to build peace."

Lynn Maalouf is a special correspondent for The Washington Post in Beirut.

DOJ_NMG_0111519

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, January 3, 2007 8:20 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, December 30, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061230.pdf; agnb061230.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Antiterrorism Successes Seen As Some Of The Few 2006 Bright Spots For Bush 2

Circuit Court Panel Rejects Ex-Judges' Amicus Brief In Guantanamo Case 2

Homeland Response:

Proposed Port Security System Encounters Technology Snags 3

Crews To Excavate World Trade Center Service Road For Remains 3

War News:

Saddam Hussein Is Dead, Executed By Nation He Once Ruled 3

Troops Braced For Post-Execution Violence In Iraq 7

December Is Deadliest Month Of 2006 For US Troops In Iraq 8

Pentagon Reviews Surge Plans 8

Pentagon To Request "Annual Record" In War Spending 8

Iranians' Detention, Expulsion Said To Worsen US-Iraqi Relations 9

Poll Finds Plurality Of Troops Disapprove Of Bush's War Policy 9

Kennedy Urges More Help For Iraqi Refugees 9

Taliban Commander Vows Continued War Against US, Allies 9

Corporate Scandals:

Apple Report Clears Jobs Of Options Wrongdoing 10

MetLife Unit Settles New York Commission Probe For $19 Million 11

Wachovia Fund To Settle Civil Allegations 11

Criminal Law:

FBI Alleges 96-Year-Old Man Is An Active Mafia Figure 12

Police Seek Clues In Two Virginia Attacks 12

NYTimes Argues Against Banishing Sexual Predators 12

Civil Law:

DOJ Sues Over Alleged Small Business Fun Fraud 12

Civil Rights:

DOJ Asked To Probe Duke Lacrosse Prosecution 13

6th Circuit Backs Michigan Affirmative Action Ban 13

Antitrust:

FCC Approves AT&T-BellSouth Deal After Seven-Month Impasse 14

Financial Services Firms Avail Themselves Of Patent Protections 14

Environment:

DOJ Investigating Interior Official Over Oil Royalties 15

Woolsey Encourages Development Of "Plug-In" Hybrid Autos 15

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI And Coast Guard Reportedly Contested Responsibility For Hijacked Ferry During Drill 15

Nixon-Ford Tapes' Release Revives Controversy Over FBI Surveillance 15

Congress-Administration:

Tornado Warning Forces President And Mrs. Bush To Move To Shelter 16

Cheney Expected To Be Focus Of Attention In 2007 16

Ninth Circuit Reportedly Investigating Federal Judge Appointed By Bush 17

Democrats Expected To Seek Expansion Of Health Coverage For Children 17

Long-Term Elder-Care Costs Often Not Covered By Medicare 17

WPost Urges Ethics Reforms In Wake Of Murtha Revelations 17

Other News:

Dow Ends Year Up 16% In Best Performance Since 2003 18

Ford Mourning Underway After Understated California Services 18
Experience In 2004 Seen As Having Improved Edwards Campaign 20
Pro-Obama Group To Air Ads In Iowa 20
Romney Considered Among "Top-Tier" GOP Presidential Candidates 20
Congressional Democrats Voice Objections To FL13 Vote 20
Kline Continues To Divide Kansas GOP 21
Schwarzenegger's Inauguration Festivities Described As "Lavish." 21
Spitzer Plans "Modest" Inauguration 21
States' Minimum Wage Boosts Effective Monday 21
DC Memorials Commemorating International Figures Draw Controversy 21
Somali Government Asserts Control, Imposes Martial Law 22
Chinese White Paper Pegs Military Buildup To Economic Development 22
Iranian UN Ambassador Pans Security Council Sanctions, Backs Cooperation 23
Turkmen Opposition Given Little Chance Of Ousting Interim President 23
Russia, Belarus In Standoff Over Natural Gas 23
Slovenia Will Join Euro Zone Monday 24
Sinn Fein Conference Will Consider Supporting Ulster Police 24
Bush Eliminates Jackson-Vanik Trade Limits For Vietnam 24
Convicted US Marine Remanded To US Custody In Philippines 24
Reid Seeks To "Strengthen Relations" With Ecuador 24
Top Bangladeshi Women Politicians' Rivalry Said To Hamper Development 25
Sub-Saharan Africa Faces Challenges Of Meeting Renewed Education Demand 25
British Authorities Arrest Four Rwandan Nationals On Genocide Charges 25
Desmond Tutu's "Moral Leadership" Profiled 25
Global Warming Faulted For Arctic Ice Shelf Break 25
NYTimes Says EU, Not Turkey, To Blame For Accession Slowdown 26

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 26

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 27

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Antiterrorism Successes Seen As Some Of The Few 2006 Bright Spots For Bush. The Washington Times (12/30, A1, Dinan, 88K), in a front-page article titled "Bush Eager To Put '06 Behind," reports 2006 saw President Bush's "poll approval ratings fall to new lows, saw Congress back him off his veto threat on the Dubai ports deal and forced him to issue his first veto, on stem-cell research, ended with Democrats' winning outright control of Congress." The Times adds, "But he also won confirmation of a second justice to the Supreme Court and won congressional approval of detention and military trials for detainees in the war on terror. Just as important, the United States helped Britain foil another major terrorist plot to hijack airplanes this past summer, and the fifth full year since September 11 is about to expire without another successful terrorist attack on U.S. soil. At the same time, though, the situation in Iraq deteriorated, and the administration made only halting progress in using diplomacy to try to contain Iran's and North Korea's nuclear programs."

Circuit Court Panel Rejects Ex-Judges' Amicus Brief In Guantanamo Case. The New York Times (12/30, Liptak, 1.16M) reports, "A divided panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which will soon decide an important case concerning detainees at Guantánamo Bay, rejected a friend-of-the-court brief submitted in the case by the retired judges. Two former chief judges of the court were among those rebuffed. … The unsigned majority decision, for Judges David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, said the brief violated a 1982 advisory opinion from a committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States, which is the administrative and policy-making body of the federal court system." However, "Judge Judith W.

DOJ_NMG_0111522

Rogers dissented," saying "the 1982 advisory opinion was meant to address situations in which former judges acting as lawyers are referred to by the honorific title 'Judge.'"

The Washington Times/AP (12/30) reports, "Seven federal judges from both political parties filed friend-of-the-court briefs in November urging the appeals court to declare key parts of the new law unconstitutional. They said the law, which sets up military commissions to hear terrorism cases, 'challenges the integrity of our judicial system' and effectively sanctions the use of torture." This AP story also appears in the Washington Post (12/30, A4, 690K).

WSJournal Pleased By Decision. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A10, 2.04M) editorializes, "Undeniably, former Judges Abner Mikva, Patricia Wald, Shirley Hufstedler, et al., are trying to throw the full weight of their former eminence against the new Gitmo detainee law passed by Congress this fall. … [F]orgive us for thinking that these amici expected their criticism of the new detainee law signed by President Bush to be seen, even admired, as the views of the magnificent seven, not the merely mortal thoughts of law professors. … We see little reason why that endless roster of former judges, ambassadors, generals and the like shouldn't approach the bench as do the rest of us. These seven should feel free to refile their opinions, as Mr., Ms., or whatever."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Proposed Port Security System Encounters Technology Snags. The New York Times (12/30, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "A Coast Guard plan to combat terrorism by creating the maritime equivalent of an air traffic control system in the coastal waters here, a test for a nationwide effort, has fallen far short of expectations." Initially tested in Miami's port, the system, which uses "long-range surveillance cameras, coastal radar and devices that automatically identify approaching vessels," has encountered difficulty: "[T]he radar, it turns out, confuses waves with boats. The cameras cover just a sliver of the harbor and coasts. And only a small fraction of vessels can be identified automatically." The Times adds, "A surveillance system similar to the one in Miami is supposed to be installed at as many as 35 ports. But given the challenges here, and the unwillingness of Congress to finance the still-unproven effort, the Coast Guard has delayed expanding the effort to other ports until at least 2014."

Crews To Excavate World Trade Center Service Road For Remains. The New York Times (12/30, Dunlap, 1.16M) reports, "Most of the service road along the western edge of the World Trade Center site will be excavated as part of the expanded search for human remains at ground zero, the Bloomberg administration said yesterday. The overall effort — searching buildings, excavating the block where St. Nicholas Greek Orthodox Church stood, investigating 595 manholes and other underground structures — may cost as much as $30 million, Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler said in a memorandum yesterday to Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg. … Four remains were recovered yesterday from the haul road, said Ellen Borakove, a spokeswoman for the office of the chief medical examiner. They are regarded as potentially human, pending further testing."

The AP (12/29, Kugler) reports, "In a memo to Mayor Michael Bloomberg about the search for remains, Deputy Mayor Ed Skyler said debris believed to be from the towers had been dug up from under a service road on the site's western edge and said more of the road would be excavated. Crews sifting through the material have reported finding computer parts, office carpet, electrical wires and steel from the building." The AP adds, "The renewed search for remains began in October after utility crews found bones in an abandoned manhole that had been paved over and forgotten along the western edge of the site."

WAR NEWS:

Saddam Hussein Is Dead, Executed By Nation He Once Ruled. Saddam Hussein al-Majid al-Tikriti, for a quarter-century the dictator of the Republic of Iraq, onetime master of the world's fourth-largest army, and twice the wartime foe of US-led coalitions, was executed by hanging at approximately 6:05 a.m. Baghdad time this morning, or 10:05 p.m. EST Friday night. He was 69 years old.

While the execution took place far too late for the network news broadcasts to cover it, speculation on the event dominated all television media throughout the day and evening Friday. Hussein's death receives saturation coverage in today's newspapers, with many running lengthy obituaries and multiple analyses in addition to front-page reports on the ex-dictator's demise. Headlines run from the understated (the Washington Post's "Saddam Hussein Put To Death," for example) to the emphatic ("Saddam Pays At The End Of A Rope" in the Washington Times; "Saddam Swings" in the New York Daily News).

DOJ_NMG_0111523

The Washington Post (12/30, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports Hussein "was hanged in the predawn hours of Saturday for crimes against humanity in the mass murder of Shiite men and boys in the 1980s, sent to the gallows by a government backed by the United States and led by Shiite Muslims who had been oppressed during his rule." In a statement, President Bush said Hussein "received 'the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime.' He added, 'Fair trials were unimaginable under Saddam Hussein's tyrannical rule. It is a testament to the Iraqi people's resolve to move forward after decades of oppression that, despite his terrible crimes against his own people, Saddam Hussein received a fair trial. This would not have been possible without the Iraqi people's determination to create a society governed by the rule of law.'" After the execution, "celebratory gunfire broke out in Baghdad," and "Iraqis across the nation sent text messages to their relatives and friends as soon as they heard" Hussein was dead. The AP (12/29) and CNN.com (12/30) also cover Bush's statement.

The New York Times (12/30, A1, Santora, Glanz, 1.16M) says the "dictator who led Iraq through three decades of brutality, war and bombast before American forces chased him from his capital city and captured him in a filthy pit near his hometown" was put to death "just before dawn Saturday during the morning call to prayer." The "final stages" for Hussein "came with terrible swiftness after he lost the appeal, five days ago, of his death sentence."

Fox News (12/29, Van Susteren) reported, "It's still dark there. Dawn hasn't broken in Baghdad, so many people haven't awakened to the news that their former president is dead." Fox News (MacDougall) added, "Right. When we spoke to you the other night, a few nights ago, it was about half an hour later than now, and it was already pretty light here. So dawn comes very quickly. We've already had the first call to prayer of the morning. And there was some speculation -- we were doing it ourselves through the night -- that, in fact, Saddam would be allowed to pray that one last time around 5:30, 5:35 in the morning, and then be taken off to the gallows."

While the execution came several hours after US network news broadcasts signed off Friday night, the lead-up to the event still received substantial coverage. Between them, ABC, CBS, and NBC devoted nearly 17 minutes to the story, and all three led with it. ABC World News (12/29, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) opened by saying, "It is such an extraordinary transition: Less than four years ago, he was the absolute ruler of Iraq, holding power by terror and brutality. And now, he's going to die a death at the end of a rope." ABC (McCarthy) said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, "who spent part of the day visiting relatives of some who died under Saddam, was not hiding his enthusiasm for the hanging." NBC Nightly News (12/29, lead story, 3:35, Brown, 9.87M) reported the execution would "truly mark the end of his violent and repressive reign, but by no means the end of violence in Iraq. US military forces are on a heightened state of alert, ready for whatever the reaction." The CBS Evening News (12/29, lead story, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) led with a report as well.

NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 2, 1:10, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush knows all about the plans for the execution of Saddam Hussein. Advisors describe it saying he was briefed about the entire process as a part of his intelligence briefing. They won't talk about timing or specifics, partly because they want it to be viewed as the work of the Iraqi government, and as an example Iraq is forming a new judicial system but US officials are braced for the possibility that Saddam's death could cause more violence. Advisors responded saying extremists would use any excuse."

Celebrations Break Out After News Of Execution Announced. CNN (12/29, Cooper) reported, "We want to show you the streets in the United States right now in Dearborn, Michigan, a heavily Muslim community, where you see people waving Iraqi flags. Large crowds have already gathered in the streets. The mood is celebratory. … Al Arabiya reporting that the execution took place at 10:05 Eastern Time in the United States, at five minutes past 6 a.m., just dawn in Baghdad." The Seattle Times (12/30, 118K) says in "Baghdad's Shiite enclave of Sadr City, people danced in the streets while others fired guns in the air."

The AP (12/30) reports "dozens of Iraqi-Americans gathered late Friday at a Detroit-area mosque to celebrate reports that Saddam Hussein had been executed, cheering and crying as drivers honked horns in jubilation." The San Francisco Chronicle (12/30, A9, Kuruvila, 384K) reports Iraqi émigrés in the San Francisco area said Hussein's death was "long overdue," while the St. Louis Post-Dispatch (12/30, O'Neil, Sultan, 297K) says Iraqi natives living in that city called the execution "a just punishment." However, the Los Angeles Times (12/30, Khalil, 850K) reports Iraq's "push to hang Hussein this morning, when much of the Muslim world was celebrating Eid, drew criticism from Islamic leaders in the Middle East and America."

DOJ_NMG_0111524

CNN (12/29, Raman) reported, "We're hearing from a witness who was at the execution who has just told CNN after the execution of Saddam Hussein, there was dancing around his body. Shia chants, as well, were being spoken in celebratory fashion. This has been confirmed now, as well, from the office of Iraq's prime minister. One can only imagine the emotions within that room as Saddam Hussein was executed."

MSNBC.com (12/30) reports, "Witnesses to the execution told NBC News' Richard Engel that they were cheering around the body of Saddam after the execution. NBC could hear cheers and celebrations in the background while talking to an official in the prime minister's office. 'This son of a bitch is lying under my feet. … I can't talk now because of all the cheers!' a witness said."

Just after the execution was confirmed, Iraqi Deputy Representative to the UN Faisal Al-Israbadi said on CNN (12/29, Cooper), "It's a very solemn moment for me. I can understand why some of my compatriots may be cheering. I mean, I have friends who -- particular people that I can think of who have lost 10, 15, 20 members of their family and more. But for me, it's a moment really of remembrance of the victims of Saddam Hussein. I understand that the nature of the news, there has been a tremendous focus on Saddam himself today. … This is a man who history will record is responsible for the deaths of two million Iraqis."

BBC.com (12/30) and Bloomberg (12/30, Morales, Mathewson) also report on the execution; NPR's All Things Considered (12/29) ran a report on Hussein's death sentence that ran over nine minutes.

Hussein Reportedly Looked Fearful As Execution Approached. Newsweek (12/30, Hastings, 3.12M) reports on its web site that Ali Al Massedy, the videographer who filmed the execution, said of Hussein, "I saw fear, he was afraid. … He was saying things about injustice, about resistance, about how these guys are terrorists." Ali added that on the way to the gallows, "Saddam said, 'Iraq without me is nothing.'" CNN.com (12/30) reports Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie, another witness, said, "He was a broken man. He was afraid. You could see fear in his face." Rubaie said that Hussein "carried with him a copy of the Quran and asked that it be given to 'a certain person.' Rubaie did not identify that person."

Hussein Warned Iraqis "Not To Trust The Iranian Coalition." AFP (12/30) reports Hussein climbed the gallows "calmly" and offered "a last defiant warning." Judge Moneer Haddad, who witnessed the execution, said, "He said 'I hope you will be united, and I warn you not to trust the Iranian coalition, because they are dangerous'. He said he was not afraid of anyone." Hussein's "taunt will be interpreted as a sideswipe at Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's Shiite-led ruling coalition, which many Iraqi Sunnis accuse of being a front for Iranian influence."

Hussein's Death Does Not End Problems For Bush. The New York Times (12/30, Zeleny, 1.16M) says Hussein's December 2003 capture "was a jubilant moment for the White House, hailed by President Bush in a televised address from the Cabinet Room," but the execution "seemed hardly to inspire the same sentiment." Over the past three years, Hussein "has gradually faded from view, save for his courtroom outbursts and writings from prison. The growing chaos and violence in Iraq has steadily overshadowed the torturous rule of Mr. Hussein. … Now, what could have been a triumphal bookend to the American invasion of Iraq has instead been dampened by the grim reality of conditions on the ground there." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Richter, 850K) also days that while "many Iraqis and Americans have looked forward to the day when justice would catch up with Saddam Hussein," when it arrived, "it seemed to be much less than the historic turning point many once had anticipated. With Iraq beset by violence and turmoil, the dictator's demise no longer appeared to signal the beginning of new order."

The Chicago Tribune (12/30, Silva, 617K) runs an analysis headlined "Hussein's Death Does Not Alter Bush's Problems," saying the "hanging of the longtime Iraqi strongman does not alter the fundamental problems that Bush faces: Reclaiming public support in the U.S. for a war that a majority of Americans now oppose, and charting a convincing course for the victory that Bush vows to achieve before withdrawing U.S. forces."

Hussein attorney Najeeb Al Nuami appeared on Fox News (12/29, Van Susteren) immediately following reports that the execution had taken place. He said, "He was expected to be executed today as a gift for Mr. Bush and al Maliki, especially Mr. Bush. I hope he's happy now by this execution, but I think Saddam is winning party and Bush Administration are the losing party."

DOJ_NMG_0111525

Western Diplomats Oppose Death Penalty But Respect Iraq's Decision. CNN.com (12/30) samples reactions around the world, focusing on the diplomatic response. British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said, "The British Government does not support the use of the death penalty, in Iraq or anywhere else. … We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation." The French Foreign Ministry said, "France, which like the rest of its European partners advocates the universal abolition of capital punishment, notes the execution of Saddam Hussein on Saturday. That decision was made by the people and the sovereign authorities of Iraq." Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said that while "Australia opposed the death penalty, Saddam had faced justice and a fair trial and had been found guilty of crimes against humanity. 'The people of Iraq now know that their brutal dictator will never come back to lead them.'"

Hussein Was Reportedly Issued "Red Card" Like Those He Once Dealt. The Financial Times (12/30, Sevastopulo, Negus) reports that before he was taken to the gallows, Hussein "was reportedly handed a 'red card' signaling his imminent death -- a reminder of the red cards dealt to those he had condemned to death during his time in power." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, A1, Hennessy-Fiske, Moore, 850K) says Hussein's death warrant "was signed today by the nation's two vice presidents and execution witnesses gathered in the heavily fortified Green Zone for the execution." Hussein "was dressed in a red jumpsuit…which has been the custom for death row prisoners in Iraq since before Hussein came to power." Defense lawyer Najib Naimi said, "He was writing his biography. But I don't think he had a chance to complete it."

News Reports Stress Hussein's Brutality. Many reports on the hanging bluntly comment on Hussein's brutality in their leads. The Washington Times (12/30, A1, Torchia, Abdul-Zahra, 88K) says Hussein "ruled Iraq with remorseless brutality for a quarter-century. … The man who came to a grim end at the end of a rope had vexed three U.S. presidents." The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/30, Youssef, 385K) calls Hussein a "dictator who terrorized a nation for nearly a quarter-century." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Daragahi, Lamb, 850K) says Hussein "ruled Iraq with ruthless force and led his people into three devastating wars while pursuing his goal of dominating the Arab world." Similarly, the Financial Times (12/30, Mallet) says Hussein "was responsible for bringing untold suffering to his country's people as he pursued a vain ambition to become the unchallenged leader of the Arab world." Gannett (12/30, Palmer) calls Hussein a "brutal dictator," while the Chicago Tribune (12/30, Madhani, 617K) calls him a "megalomaniac" who "earned the moniker Butcher of Baghdad by ruling with brute force, torture and cunning." The Boston Globe (12/30, Radin, 413K) says he was "ruthless in domestic affairs, reckless internationally, and flamboyant always." The New York Post (12/30, Lathem, Gittens, 631K) leads a story headlined "Saddam Is The King Of Swing" by saying "the Butcher of Baghdad is no more."

A Washington Post (12/30, A14, Partlow, 690K) report says the "autocratic Arab nationalist…led his nation into repeated wars." The man who "took power as a brutal young modernizer…cultivated a climate of fear in Iraq." The New York Times (12/30, Macfarquhar, 1.16M) calls Hussein a "defiant despot," saying the hanging "ended the life of one of the most brutal tyrants in recent history and negated the fiction that he himself maintained even as the gallows loomed -- that he remained president of Iraq." Another Washington Times (12/30, Behn, 88K) report says that "for those who met him, Saddam was both charming and intimidating, a ruthless ruler who had a vision of a modern, secular Arab nation." CNN.com (12/30) says Hussein's very name "conjures lengthy war, government autocracy and widespread cruelty," while BBC.com (12/30, Reynolds) states that he is "hated by many, mourned by few."

Hussein Moved From Poverty To Power. Newspapers also chart Hussein's rise from obscurity and poverty to the height of power. The Dallas Morning News (12/30, 500K) says the "most defiant Arab leader of his generation…was raised in abject poverty by an uncle who hated the West. His rise to power marked an impressive triumph over adversity. He was born in the dusty village of Tikrit, seemingly fated to a life of depravation." Newsday (12/30, Bazzi) says he "rose to power on a wave of nationalist, revolutionary sentiment sweeping the Middle East. … In a region filled with U.S.-allied dictators, many Arabs admired Hussein's willingness to challenge the world's sole superpower and his support for the Palestinians in their struggle with Israel." The Financial Times (12/30, Negus) runs a timeline of Hussein's life.

US Television Networks Played "Tense Waiting Game." The AP (12/29, Elber) says television networks "played a tense waiting game Friday as they ticked off the final hours of Saddam Hussein's life, replaying scenes from the former Iraqi dictator's reign as they waited for his death." The event itself "ended a day of TV reporting fraught with uncertainty and speculation about whether his execution was imminent." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Brownfield, 850K) reports networks "used the prospect of footage to create an all-day 'Dead Man Walking' scenario, as day became night became the morning call for prayer in Baghdad."

DOJ_NMG_0111526

Meanwhile, the New York Times (12/30, Carter, 1.16M) reports that while they waited, television news executives debated "how to handle any images of his execution that might be released." While there was "some question as to whether any video images would be issued, the network news divisions at ABC and CBS said that should the video become available, some visual documentation of Mr. Hussein's death might be broadcast, but no overly graphic images, and certainly not the complete execution. NBC News, however, indicated it might go further than its competitors. Steve Capus, the president of NBC News, said the network might show 'a wide shot of Saddam hanging.'"

US, Iraqi Officials Consider What To Do With Hussein's Body. The New York Times (12/30, Santora, 1.16M) reports that while the execution was "swift and unambiguous, it was much less clear on Saturday what would be done with his body. Privately, both American and Iraqi officials say that the subject has been raised at the highest levels, but no decisions have been made." The "most discussed options include sending his body out of the country to his family in Jordan, where two of his daughters live; burying him in a secret location never to be made public; burying him in a secret location but, after a period of time, having him disinterred and sent to his family or tribe; or sending him immediately to his hometown of Tikrit to be buried with members of his tribe." A "top Sunni politician even raised the prospect of holding a state funeral for Mr. Hussein. That idea, a Western official said, had very little chance of becoming reality."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, 850K) editorializes, "Once upon a time, the death of Saddam Hussein would have been an epochal event for Iraq, the Middle East and the world. Now there is some question whether it will even matter in Baghdad." But "no one really expects Hussein's execution…to change much in Iraq. … Nor can Hussein's death be expected to be much of a factor in Washington. Some will claim that it vindicates one of the original purposes of the war. But President Bush's deliberations about the 'way forward' in Iraq will continue apace, as will debate about troop levels, diplomatic overtures and other strategies to allow the U.S. to leave Iraq but continue the war against terrorism. The curious irrelevance of Hussein to today's Iraq could hardly have been predicted five years ago. It would be a mistake, however, to forget his terrible relevance to Iraq's history."

In a Los Angeles Times (12/30, 850K) op-ed, commentator Andrew Cockburn writes that while Hussein's death "seems certain to boost sectarian bloodletting between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq, he always posed as an Iraqi and Arab nationalist who could unite the rivalrous sects in his country -- an attribute that initially recommended him to Washington." Hussein "was for a period the prime example of the traditional U.S. means of control in the Middle East: quiet support for a repressive leader respectful of U.S. interests. That approach has now apparently been replaced by one that induces civil discord and breakdown (deliberately or otherwise), as evidenced by recent events in Iraq, Lebanon and Afghanistan. In his final hours, Saddam Hussein may have derived some satisfaction from the unpleasant surprises this change has produced for his former friends in Washington."

In a New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) op-ed, Najmaldin Karim writes, "My personal battle with Saddam Hussein -- which began in 1972 when I abandoned my medical career in Mosul, Iraq, and joined the Kurdish armed resistance -- is at an end. To execute such a criminal, a man who reveled in his atrocities, is an act of justice. The only issue for me is the timing -- executing him now is both too late and too early. Too late, because had Saddam Hussein been removed from the scene many years ago, many lives would have been saved. Killing Saddam now, however, for ordering the massacre at Dujail in 1982, means that he will not face justice for his greatest crimes."

Troops Braced For Post-Execution Violence In Iraq. ABC World News (12/29, story 2, 2:30, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "US forces are on high alert tonight. It's not that Saddam Hussein means much to insurgents anymore. Most experts say he doesn't. But officials fear his execution may be used as excuse for more attacks."

The AP (12/30, Baldor) reports, "The Pentagon said Friday that U.S. forces in Iraq are ready for any escalation of violence" associated with the execution of Saddam Hussein. DOD spokesman Bryan Whitman "wouldn't comment on troop movements to strengthen security for the execution, but he said the commanders in Iraq have the ability to move forces as they deem appropriate based on conditions on the ground."

DOJ_NMG_0111527

Batiste, Reed Doubt Explosion Of Violence Likely. The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 3, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) interviewed Gen. John Batiste, "a former commander of the US Army's 1st Infantry Division in Iraq, including Saddam's hometown of Tikrit," who "retired last year and then criticized the Pentagon's conduct of the war." Batiste said, "I'm not sure that his execution…will cause more violence in Iraq. But I think we can say with certainty that we won't see a decrease in violence until we have a couple of things happen. One is a unified United States strategy that fully employs all elements of our national power on all four cylinders. And the second would be the people of Iraq embrace change in their future together.

Sen. Jack Reed said on Fox News (12/29, Scott), "There's the possibility of a backlash, but, frankly, the situation of today with or without Saddam's execution has placed American forces in significant danger and significant proximity to violence. ... I think, at this juncture, Saddam is no longer a pivotal figure in Iraqi political life, and I think this will not cause a huge tipping point."

Iraq's Diversity Of Warring Groups Noted. In an analysis for UPI (12/29), Afghanistan veteran Lawrence Sellin writes, "If the situation in Iraq can be salvaged, it will not be done with troop surges alone or a single all-inclusive strategy applied uniformly across the country, but through the cumulative effect of a hundreds of tailored efforts, funded and executed bottom-up, city by city and region by region. ... The influence of Iraqi tribalism and the need to balance or leverage the differences between sub-groups in the ongoing stability and counterinsurgency operations in Iraq may still be underestimated. It is the product of lazy thinking to simply pigeon-hole Iraqis as Shiite, Sunni or Kurd."

December Is Deadliest Month Of 2006 For US Troops In Iraq. The AP (12/30, Frayer) reports, "Three more Marines and a soldier were killed in battle in Iraq, the military said Friday, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops with the toll reaching 108. The Marines, all assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5, died Thursday of wounds from fighting in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said. The soldier was killed in Karmah Thursday by small arms fire. ... Their deaths pushed the toll past the 105 U.S. service members killed in October. At least 2,997 members of the U.S. military have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an AP count." The AP adds about the civilian death toll, "Through Thursday, at least 2,139 Iraqis have been killed in war- related or sectarian violence, an average rate of about 76 people a day, according to an AP count." The Washington Post (12/30, A13, 690K) carries an abbreviated version of this article.

The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Moore, 850K) reports, "The Marine deaths reported Friday brought the number of U.S. military fatalities in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion to 2,996, icasualties.org said, with 816 of them occurring this year. Last year, 846 American service members died; in 2004, the figure was 848.

Pentagon Reviews Surge Plans. The AP (12/30, Baldor) reports, "Extending U.S. military units already in Iraq and moving troops from other locations, including Kuwait, are among options Pentagon planners are looking at if President Bush calls for an increase in troops on the battlefront. ... The most immediate and likely move would be to shift the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division from Kuwait — where it is expected to deploy early next month — into Iraq, said the officials, who requested anonymity because no decisions have been made. ... Another much-discussed option would be extending Marine units already in Iraq. ... A surge in troops would probably be coupled with other political and economic changes. While in Iraq last week, Defense Secretary Robert Gates talked about the importance of rebuilding neighborhoods and other Iraqi facilities more quickly in regions that had been cleared by troops and deemed secure."

Pentagon To Request "Annual Record" In War Spending. The New York Times (12/30, Cloud, 1.16M) reports in a critical article, "The Pentagon is seeking nearly $100 billion for operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, a request that, if approved by Congress, would set an annual record for war-related spending. ... The request would push the total for the 2007 fiscal year to nearly $170 billion, 45 percent more than Congress provided for 2006. ... some experts questioned whether the services were exploiting the must-pass nature of the supplemental bill to seek money for other purposes like the modernization of aircraft rather than just wartime replacements."

DOJ_NMG_0111528

Pentagon Creates New Office To Oversee Contractors. UPI (12/29) reports the Defense Department "has created a new office to oversee major service contracts. The office will monitor contracts such as the $15 billion Halliburton one in Iraq."

Iranians' Detention, Expulsion Said To Worsen US-Iraqi Relations. The New York Times (12/30, Tavernise, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "Under heavy American pressure, the Iraqi government ordered two Iranians who had been detained in an American military raid to leave the country, Iraqi officials said Friday, ending a bitter, nine-day political standoff." The Times says "the detention brought the increasingly strained relationship between the Iraqis who run this country and their American backers to one of its lowest ebbs." While Iraqi authorities "said Friday that it was clear that the men … had not been entirely forthcoming about what they were doing in Iraq," they "believed that the evidence against the men was mostly circumstantial and not as damning as the Americans had portrayed." The Times adds that "episode" has "deeply upset many Iraqi officials, who had been carefully building relations with Iran," and "demonstrated the deepening fissures between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and the United States."

The Washington Post (12/30, Raghavan, Wright, 690K) reports that the Iraqi decision "has angered U.S. military officials who say the operatives were seeking to foment instability here. ... Despite their frustration at the release of the Iranians, U.S. officials said a strong message has been sent to Iran that its operatives will be tracked down and that it will be held accountable for its activities in Iraq." The Post describes the alleged evidence against the men in more detail than does the Times, saying, "One of the commanders, identified by officials simply as Chizari, was the third-highest-ranking official of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards' al-Quds Brigade ... U.S. defense officials familiar with the raids said the captured Iranians had detailed weapons lists, documents pertaining to shipments of weapons into Iraq, organizational charts, telephone records and maps, among other sensitive intelligence information. Officials were particularly concerned by the fact that the Iranians had information about importing modern, specially shaped explosive charges," used in roadside bombs.

The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Moore, 850K) reports, "The military seized documents, maps, photographs and videos linking the two Iranians to illegal weapons shipments to armed groups in Iraq, Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said this week."

Poll Finds Plurality Of Troops Disapprove Of Bush's War Policy. In a piece for the AP (12/30), Military Times writer Robert Hodierne writes, "The American military, once a staunch supporter of President Bush and the Iraq war, has grown increasingly pessimistic about chances for victory. For the first time, more troops disapprove of the president's handling of the war than approve of it, according to the 2006 Military Times Poll. ... Only 35% of the military members polled this year said they approve of the way Bush is handling the war, and 42% said they disapprove. While approval of the president's war leadership has slumped, his overall approval remains high among the military. Just as telling, in this year's poll only 41% of the military said the U.S. should have gone to war in Iraq in the first place, down from 65% in 2003."

Kennedy Urges More Help For Iraqi Refugees. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/30, A21, 690K), Sen. Edward Kennedy writes, "Last year…America accepted only 202 Iraqi refugees, and next year we plan to accept approximately the same number. We and other nations of the world need to do far better. ... We need to do much more to help Iraqi refugees, especially those who have helped our troops. Our nation is spending $8 billion a month to wage the war in Iraq. Yet to meet the urgent humanitarian needs of the refugees who have fled the war, the State Department plans to spend only $20 million in the current fiscal year." Kennedy adds, "An essential first step could be to hold an international conference on the issue -- ideally sponsored by the countries in the region and the United Nations -- to begin to deal with the growing number and needs of Iraqi refugees and internally displaced persons. The United States should participate in the conference and provide substantial support for the refugees. Doing so would encourage other nations to address the crisis, help the refugees and displaced persons, and assist the countries shouldering the greatest burden."

Taliban Commander Vows Continued War Against US, Allies. The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 6, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Five years after US forces drove the Taliban into the mountains of Afghanistan, they're back on the attack and some say more dangerous than ever. Today their leader, Mullah Omar, vowed once again to force the US out of Afghanistan. And an even more ominous warning tonight from another Taliban terrorist in hiding." CBS (Logan): "He is the Taliban's most bloodthirsty commander, Mullah Dadullah. And there are few people in the world the US wants to capture more than him, seen here in an exclusive interview. … The one-legged leader promises to go beyond the battlefields of Afghanistan and hunt Americans down at home. 'Even if they go back to America, we will have to take revenge,' he said. 'America has humiliated our country and our people. We will never negotiate.' Mullah Dadullah is the military mastermind behind the bloodiest year ever for US forces in Afghanistan. His ultimate goal: to overthrow Afghanistan's pro-American government. And in spite of heavy casualties inflicted by US and NATO forces, Dadullah claims the Taliban's success has led to a surge in morale and strength in recent months."

DOJ_NMG_0111529

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Report Clears Jobs Of Options Wrongdoing. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A1, Wingfield, Stecklow, Forelle) reports, "Apple Computer Inc. acknowledged that it backdated stock options and that Steve Jobs recommended 'favorable' dates for some options awards. But the company said he was absolved of misconduct by a special internal investigation." The Journal continues, "Although the investigation found that CEO Steve Jobs was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates, he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications. The Special Committee also found that the investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants." The Journal adds, "The approval for the grant was improperly recorded as occurring at a special Board meeting on October 19, 2001. Such a special Board meeting did not occur. There was no evidence, however, that any current member of management was aware of this irregularity. Read more2. … Directors and others close to the Apple probe defended Mr. Jobs, the company's iconic chief executive, even as it detailed his part in a widespread pattern of options irregularities between 1997 and 2002. But Mr. Jobs and Apple, still under federal scrutiny as part of a broad investigation of options backdating, are not yet out of the woods."

The Financial Times (12/30, Waters) reports, "News that the Apple chief executive had been more directly involved in the options irregularities than previously disclosed came as the company admitted that a fictitious board meeting had supposedly approved some of Mr Jobs' own stock options in 2001. The affair, reported earlier this week in the FT, led to Mr Jobs receiving benefits worth $20m that were not disclosed at the time, Apple reported." The Times adds, "Apple said it had understated its expenses in previous years by a total of $105m, reflecting 6,428 separate options grants made on 42 dates. Backdating involves setting the exercise price on stock options at an earlier date. … While Apple revealed in a regulatory filing in October that Mr Jobs had been aware of some of these cases, it amended that on Friday to say that he had been 'aware or recommended the selection of some favourable grant dates'. … Friday's statement that Mr Jobs did not 'appreciate the accounting implications' of the options backdating, was also a change from its assertion in October that he was 'unaware of the accounting implications'. It added he did not 'financially benefit' from backdated grants of which he was aware, a change from its earlier statement stating he did not 'benefit'."

The Washington Post (12/30, A1, Sipress, Johnson) reports, "Apple's board, which includes former vice president Al Gore, gave Jobs its full support. 'The board of directors is confident that the Company has corrected the problems that led to the restatement, and it has complete confidence in Steve Jobs and the senior management team,' said the statement by Gore and Jerome York, who heads Apple's audit and finance committee." The Post adds, "Wall Street also rallied around Jobs, who is more closely identified with and central to the success of his company than any other executive at a major technology firm. The stock rose nearly 5 percent, and many industry analysts said investors could return their attention to Apple's sound fundamentals, which include strong sales of iPods and Macintosh computers. … But white-collar crime experts said the action may signal more serious issues. … 'The acknowledgment of greater involvement by Mr. Jobs than previously disclosed can only cause the government to use an even finer toothed comb in its own review of Mr. Jobs's conduct,' Washington defense lawyer Barry Pollack said. 'The government may ultimately come to share the company's conclusion that Mr. Jobs was unaware that the options were not properly handled, but not before putting him under their own magnifying glass.'"

DOJ_NMG_0111530

The New York Times (12/30, Markoff, Dash) reports, "In its summary of the findings of a six-month internal investigation, Apple said it had found that 6,428 option grants, or 15 percent of the 42,000 options it awarded, had been improperly dated from 1997 to 2002. Those included grants made on 42 separate dates to senior executives, new hires and ordinary employees. … Investigators, led by a committee of outside directors and the law firm Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges, raised 'serious questions' about the actions of two former company officers who were involved in the accounting and reporting of stock options, Apple said. But they absolved Mr. Jobs by concluding that there had been "no misconduct" by Apple's current management team." The Times adds, "The report did offer a subtle shift in Apple's description of Mr. Jobs's role in the option process. In October the company said that Mr. Jobs was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected, but that he did not benefit from those grants and was unaware of the accounting implications. But in the report issued Friday, Apple acknowledged that Mr. Jobs 'was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates.'"

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/30, Page A - 1, Guynn) reports, "Despite the exoneration, uncertainty remains for Jobs, the chief executive officer, and the company. Apple noted that it had informed the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Attorney's Office of the results of its probe. Federal authorities are presumed to be weighing whether to take action against the company or any individuals. The SEC and the U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment on the matter." The Chronicle adds, "Legal and corporate governance experts say federal authorities won't necessarily be swayed by the company's findings or by Jobs' prominence. … 'There is going to be a continuing level of uncertainty surrounding the company until or unless Jobs is exonerated by the SEC and others looking at this issue,' said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises investors on corporate governance issues. 'This was a major hurdle that the company has cleared for now, but it still has some obstacles in the road in front of it before it can put these issues behind it once and for all.'"

MetLife Unit Settles New York Commission Probe For $19 Million. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, B4, Bray, Kuykendall) reports, "MetLife Inc.'s life-insurance unit agreed to pay $19 million to settle allegations stemming from a New York state probe into the insurer's use of contingent commissions, which are offered by insurers to brokers who steer clients toward their company." The Journal continues, "The New York insurer agreed to pay $16.5 million in restitution to policyholders and $2.5 million in civil penalties, according to the state attorney general's office. MetLife will adopt a compensation structure that eliminates the payment of contingent commissions to its brokers for life, disability and group products, said Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who will be inaugurated governor Monday. It will provide full disclosure of broker compensation to employers at every stage of the insurance purchasing and renewal process, he said." The Journal adds, "Mr. Spitzer has said that contingent commissions are little more than kickbacks to insurance agents and brokers who send business to the insurers and that the hidden costs have driven up insurance prices. The attorney general alleged in part that MetLife instructed its sales personnel to "leverage" override agreements with its brokers by informing those brokers how close they were to meeting certain targets for business provided to MetLife. Those targets would trigger additional compensation to the brokers. … The settlement makes MetLife at least the seventh insurer to pay a fine in Mr. Spitzer's two-year-old investigation into how insurers compensate brokers that bring them business. Earlier agreements involved Prudential Financial Inc., UnumProvident Corp., American International Group Inc., St. Paul Travelers Cos., Zurich Financial Services' Zurich American Insurance Co., and most recently Chubb Corp."

Wachovia Fund To Settle Civil Allegations. The Wall Street Journal/AP (12/30, B4) reports, "Evergreen Investments, the mutual-fund arm of Wachovia Corp., will pay a $4.2 million civil penalty to settle allegations that it violated rules involving the sale of its funds through brokers." The AP continues, "Under the agreement with the NASD, formerly known as the National Association of Securities Dealers, Wachovia neither admitted nor denied the allegations. Evergreen Chief Executive Dennis Ferro wrote to investors that it was in the interest of the company and its investors 'to resolve these matters and move forward.'" The AP adds, "The agreement said Evergreen had a revenue-sharing arrangement with brokerage affiliate Wachovia Securities from 2001 to 2003, and directed to Wachovia Securities $25.7 million in commissions generated from trades in Evergreen's investment portfolio. The sum was tied to the amount of Evergreen funds sold by Wachovia Securities. … Evergreen also sponsored a sales-recognition program for Wachovia Securities representatives who sold Evergreen funds during the same period. The 'Medallion Club,' as it was called, treated brokers to meetings at luxury resorts if they sold a certain amount of Evergreen funds. NASD rules prohibit the direction of brokerage commissions to another firm and noncash compensation for selling mutual funds."

DOJ_NMG_0111531

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Alleges 96-Year-Old Man Is An Active Mafia Figure. The USA Today/AP (12/30, Anderson) reports, "Lucky Luciano, Meyer Lansky and Carlo Gambino are long gone. Murder Inc. is out of business. Las Vegas has been so cleaned up it resembles Disneyland. And Havana? Forget about it ever since Castro took over. But Albert 'Chinky' Facchiano, at 96, is still standing. And like Michael Corleone in The Godfather III, he is still very much involved in the family business, the FBI says. At an age when most people are long retired and happy just to be alive, the reputed mobster was indicted earlier this year in Florida and New York. He is accused, among other things, of trying to intimidate and possibly kill a witness against the powerful the Genovese family of New York in 2005. He is also accused of helping to run the rackets in Florida. … Facchiano, born in 1910, has been a 'made member' of the nation's largest and most powerful Mafia family for decades, but was a low-level figure, rising no higher than soldier, according to the FBI. His nickname is apparently a play on his last name.

Police Seek Clues In Two Virginia Attacks. The Washington Post (12/30, B1, Miroff) reports, "Fairfax County police said yesterday that they are investigating whether a Christmas Eve attack on a 62-year-old Springfield woman is related to the slayings of two elderly women in the area in the past five months." The Post continues, "Few details have been released about the incident Sunday, when a man forced his way into a home and stabbed a woman on the arm before fleeing. Police said the attack occurred less than two miles from the home where 74-year-old Marion J. Newman was robbed and beaten to death Nov. 21. … Police believe Newman's assailant also killed Marion B. Marshall, 72, in her home Aug. 14, two miles from Newman's home. Both women suffered blunt-force trauma injuries to the upper body." The Post adds, "The number of investigators and crime prevention officers working full time on the case has grown to 18, and police have developed a 'humongous' e-mail list to keep Springfield residents informed, said Lt. Richard J. Perez, a police spokesman. Fliers in English and Spanish are posted in the neighborhoods where the women were killed, and a $26,000 reward has been offered by the victims' families. … The slayings, and an increase in burglaries in some neighborhoods, are contributing to a climate of fear and frustration, some residents said. … Police believe that the slayings were crimes of opportunity, committed by someone with ties to the community who happened to see each woman alone and attacked her. There was no indication that the women knew each other, and Newman's diamond ring was the only item known to be stolen from either home."

NYTimes Argues Against Banishing Sexual Predators. The New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) editorializes, "Of all the places that sexual predators could end up after prison, the worst is out of sight, away from the scrutiny and treatment that could prevent them from committing new crimes. But communities around the country are taking that risk, with zoning laws that banish pedophiles to the literal edges of society. … As the areas off limits to sex offenders expand to encompass entire towns and cities, if not states, the places where they can live and work are shrinking fast. The unintended consequence is that offenders have been dispersed to rural nowhere zones, where they are much harder to track. In confined regions like Long Island, they have become concentrated in a handful of low-rent, few-questions-asked areas -- an unintended and unfair imposition on their wary neighbors."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Sues Over Alleged Small Business Fun Fraud. The Boston Globe/AP (12/30, Dale) reports, "Three investors, including a Connecticut attorney, are accused of defrauding a government program for small businesses out of $32 million, according to a lawsuit filed Friday by the U.S. Justice Department." The AP continues, "The government accuses the three defendants of cutting secret deals to hide their ownership stakes in a venture that received Small Business Administration funds. … The suit names Glastonbury-based attorney Daniel Beharry; John Torkelsen, who is in prison after pleading guilty to defrauding the agency; and Richard D. Propper, a physician from LaJolla, Calif. … They are accused of violating the False Claims Act, which allows the U.S. to seek treble damages plus penalties." The AP adds, "According to the lawsuit, the three defrauded the SBA's Small Business Investment Co. program by failing to disclose conflicts of interest and awarding themselves improper management fees. … Government lawyers say Torkelsen submitted an application for a firm called the Acorn Technology Fund, stating that he owned it with two other men. However, the application did not disclose that Acorn was also funded and controlled in part by Propper and Beharry, the suit states."

DOJ_NMG_0111532

Bloomberg (12/30) reports, "The department said the alleged fraud is the biggest ever perpetrated against the U.S.' Small Business Investment Company Program, which gives small private fund managers equity capital and long-term loans to invest in developing companies. Also named in the suit were Richard Propper, a California investor, and Daniel Beharry, a Connecticut lawyer." Bloomberg continues, "The Acorn fund received $32 million from the small-business program. According to the suit, Torkelsen and the other two investors engaged in multiple secret transactions that hid their ownership and control of companies that the fund invested in, contrary to U.S. rules against self-dealing. … Main Street Bank, prior to its acquisition by Sovereign, provided 'false and misleading' information to the Small Business Administration on a form confirming the Acorn fund's account balances, according to court papers. Sovereign, based in Philadelphia, acquired Main Street Bancorp Inc. in 2002."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/30, Fernandez) reports, "Sovereign spokesman Ed Shultz said the transactions related to the case were made before Sovereign acquired Main Street Bank in 2002. 'There were no Sovereign employees involved,' he said." The Inquirer adds, "The suit was filed in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania under the False Claims Act, and seeks to have the defendents repay money fraudulently obtained from the SBA. The government has said the fraud was the largest in history in its Small Business Investment Company program, which attempts to seed small companies with money. … The suit is the latest legal action against Torkelsen, who has already pleaded guilty to making false statements to the SBA, and his Acorn Technology Fund L.P. in Bucks County, which received SBA money. … The complaint alleges that Torkelsen recruited Propper and Beharry as investors into the Acorn Technology Fund without telling the government, in violation of SBA rules."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Asked To Probe Duke Lacrosse Prosecution. The Raleigh (NC) News & Observer (12/30) reports, "The latest flurry of news in the Duke lacrosse case prompted some concerned citizens to register a complaint with the U.S. Department of Justice on Friday, according to community activist Victoria Peterson, who said she helped pen the complaint with other, unnamed residents. … Officials with the Justice Department could not confirm Friday whether they had yet received the complaint." The N&O continues, "A statement distributed by Peterson alleges that the accuser's civil rights were violated when lacrosse players tossed racial epithets at her and another exotic dancer the night of the alleged assault. The complaint also contends that officials at Duke University have failed to prosecute several rapes reported on campus. … Peterson, an unsuccessful City Council candidate and political organizer, has been speaking publicly about the racial and political subtexts of the case since the allegations surfaced in March."

6th Circuit Backs Michigan Affirmative Action Ban. The Washington Post (12/30, A11, Martin, 690K) reports, "A federal appeals court ruled Friday that three Michigan universities should not have been given a six-month extension to comply with parts of a new state law banning some public affirmative action programs. Michigan voters in November approved Proposal 2, which bans the use of race and gender preferences in university admissions and in government hiring and contracting. The measure took effect Dec. 23, but U.S. District Judge David M. Lawson earlier this month provided an exception for admissions and financial aid decisions for incoming classes at the University of Michigan, Michigan State University and Wayne State University. A three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit said federal law does not warrant providing an exception. Although Lawson allowed the schools until July 1 to comply with Proposal 2, the appellate ruling means they will be expected to comply immediately."

Ford's Support For Affirmative Action Noted. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) Jeffrey Toobin, staff writer at The New Yorker and legal analyst for CNN, writes, "Gerald R. Ford kept his distance from political controversy after leaving office, but he retained a special interest in the workings of his alma mater. In 1999, the 86-year-old former varsity football star decided to make a public stand in support of affirmative action at the University of Michigan. He wrote an Op-Ed article on this page titled 'Inclusive America, Under Attack.' A pair of pending lawsuits, Mr. Ford wrote, would prohibit Michigan and other universities 'from even considering race as one of many factors weighed by admission counselors.' Such a move would condemn 'future college students to suffer the cultural and social impoverishment that afflicted my generation.'"

DOJ_NMG_0111533

ANTITRUST:

FCC Approves AT&T-BellSouth Deal After Seven-Month Impasse. The Washington Post (12/30, Sipress, Goo, 690K) reports on its front page that the FCC "yesterday overcame a seven-month deadlock and approved AT&T's $85 billion purchase of BellSouth, creating a new corporate giant that will stand astride the telecommunications industry like none other in the generation since the old AT&T empire was broken up in 1984." The new AT&T, "unequaled in capital and geographic reach," could be a "tough adversary for cable companies by offering television service over the Internet, possibly lowering rates for customers in its service area." The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A3, Sharma, Boles, 2.04M), which does not put the story on its front page, says the FCC "approved the deal, the largest ever in U.S. telecommunications history, by a unanimous 4-0 vote, after AT&T offered a series of major concessions to pacify consumer groups and regulators."

The Chicago Tribune (12/30, Van) reports, "A compromise proposed by AT&T Inc. to win federal approval of its $85 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. signals how much the impending takeover of Congress by Democrats has shifted telecom's regulatory landscape." The Tribune continues, "The Federal Communications Commission approved the acquisition Friday upon reviewing the proposal submitted Thursday night by AT&T. The companies closed the deal Friday after winning the FCC's OK. … After opposing restrictions on its ability to prioritize Internet traffic it carries, AT&T agreed to 'maintain neutral network and neutral routing in its wireline broadband Internet access service' for two years." The Tribune adds, "The concept of preserving 'net neutrality' has been the paramount telecom issue for consumer advocates all year. … While specific Internet traffic abuses have been rare, activists fear that the economic interests of big telecom and cable companies that own Internet infrastructure will compel them to discriminate against smaller competitors whose Internet-based voice and video services undermine the cash cows operated by the giants. … For their part, large telecom carriers contend that they need flexibility to manage the trillions of bits and bytes that flow across their lines daily. Government restrictions intended to ward off potential anti-competitive moves could stifle technologic innovation, say executives at big telecom concerns."

NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 7, 0:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On this last business day of the year, the federal government cleared the way for the biggest merger ever in the telecommunications industry. … AT&T had to make several major concessions to allow the deal to go through." The Financial Times (12/30, Taylor, Kirchgaessner) said the concessions "are seen as a significant climbdown by AT&T. It had wanted to complete the merger before the end of this year, but had been frustrated by the FCC." The New York Times (12/30, Bajaj, 1.16M) also reports on the approval.

LATimes Lauds AT&T's "Welcome Concession" On Net Neutrality. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, 850K) editorializes, "AT&T made a welcome concession to federal regulators this week that could help preserve the Internet's role as an engine for innovation and competition." The "reconstituted Ma Bell agreed Thursday to not offer for two years 'any service that privileges, degrades or prioritizes' any data transmitted over its broadband network. In other words, AT&T guaranteed what has come to be known as 'Net neutrality' — giving websites and services equal access to Internet users. The only exceptions are for AT&T's new TV service and the managed networks it sells to businesses."

Financial Services Firms Avail Themselves Of Patent Protections. The Financial Times (12/30, Wighton) reports, "The number of US patents issued for financial services has soared this year as banks have rushed to take advantage of a protection once seen as the preserve of technology and drug companies. Patents issued in the main US financial services category had risen more than threefold to 238 by the end of last week, with General Electric's finance arms heading the field with 11. Many financial companies have stepped up efforts to protect intellectual property in recent years. Innovations that would not have been tried previously are being pursued because they can now be patented."

DOJ_NMG_0111534

ENVIRONMENT:

DOJ Investigating Interior Official Over Oil Royalties. The New York Times (12/30, Andrews, 1.16M) reports the Justice Department "is investigating whether the director of a multibillion-dollar oil-trading program at the Interior Department has been paid as a consultant for oil companies hoping for contracts. The director of the program and three subordinates, all based in Denver, have been transferred to different jobs and have been ordered to cease all contacts with the oil industry until the investigation is completed some time next spring, according to officials involved. … If the allegations prove correct, they would constitute a major new blot on the Interior Department's much-criticized effort to properly collect royalties on vast amounts of oil and gas produced on land or in coastal waters. The Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which oversees royalty collections, is now the target of multiple investigations by Congress and the Interior Department's inspector general." According to the Times, "At issue is the 'royalty in kind' program, a fast-growing program under which companies pay their royalties in the form oil or gas rather than in the traditional form of cash. … The most prominent figure in the inquiry is Gregory W. Smith, who was director of the royalty-in-kind program at the Minerals Management Service in Denver."

Woolsey Encourages Development Of "Plug-In" Hybrid Autos. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (12/30, A10, 2.04M) former CIA Director James Woolsey writes, "If hybrid gasoline-electric cars are provided with advanced batteries (GM's announcement said its choice would be lithium-ion) having improved energy and power density -- variants of the ones in our computers and cell phones -- dozens of vehicle prototypes are now demonstrating that these 'plug-in hybrids' can more than double hybrids' overall (gasoline) mileage. With a plug-in, charging your car overnight from an ordinary 110-volt socket in your garage lets you drive 20 miles or more on the electricity stored in the topped-up battery before the car lapses into its normal hybrid mode. If you forget to charge or exceed 20 miles, no problem, you then just have a regular hybrid with the insurance of liquid fuel in the tank. And during those 20 all-electric miles you will be driving at a cost of between a penny and three cents a mile instead of the current 10-cent-a-mile cost of gasoline."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI And Coast Guard Reportedly Contested Responsibility For Hijacked Ferry During Drill. The New York Times (12/30, Lipton) reported, "A Coast Guard plan to combat terrorism by creating the maritime equivalent of an air traffic control system in the coastal waters here, a test for a nationwide effort, has fallen far short of expectations. The Coast Guard installed long-range surveillance cameras, coastal radar and devices that automatically identify approaching vessels to help search out possible threats. But the radar, it turns out, confuses waves with boats. The cameras cover just a sliver of the harbor and coasts. And only a small fraction of vessels can be identified automatically. Officials acknowledge the limited progress that the Department of Homeland Security and the Coast Guard have made toward creating a viable defense here in Miami or at harbors nationwide against a maritime attack, despite the billions of dollars invested in port security since 2001." The Times goes on to report, "The Coast Guard is also still struggling to settle on an approach to gather all the data it and other federal agencies collect about potential maritime threats globally and nationally. But the commitment to work together has not always been honored by all the federal agencies. During a drill in which officials pretended that a ferry had been hijacked by terrorists, the Coast Guard and the Federal Bureau of Investigation competed for the right to take charge, a contest that became so intense that the Coast Guard players manipulated the war game to cut the F.B.I. out, government auditors say. 'Unless such differences over roles and authorities are resolved,' a Justice Department report issued this year said, 'the response to a maritime incident could be confused and potentially disastrous.'"

Nixon-Ford Tapes' Release Revives Controversy Over FBI Surveillance. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/30, Alpert) reports, "It must have seemed peculiar on that April day 35 years ago when Rep. Hale Boggs took to the floor of the House of Representatives and accused the FBI of spying on the government it was supposed to protect. History would prove that Boggs, a congressman from New Orleans and the House's second-most-powerful Democrat, was right about the extent of the FBI's secret surveillance. But on April 6, 1971, Boggs' comments drew a different reaction from President Nixon and his successor, Gerald Ford: They thought Boggs must have been drinking. Transcripts of the taped conversations between Nixon and then-House Minority Leader Ford resurfaced after Ford's death Tuesday. The Washington Post published a piece Friday by journalist Bob Woodward based on interviews with Ford about the friendship between Nixon and the man to whom he would hand the presidency. Nixon recorded his office conversations and Woodward drew on transcripts to show how the two men regularly engaged in political gossip. Lindy Boggs, who went on to win election to her husband's New Orleans House seat after he was killed in a 1972 plane crash, said that while Nixon and Ford might have had their doubts, her husband knew exactly what he was talking about when he made his surprising allegations of FBI abuses under Director J. Edgar Hoover. … Lindy Boggs, 90, said that a surveillance truck was regularly positioned near the Boggs' family home shortly before her husband leveled his criticism and that she had been told that the FBI was recording their phone conversations. 'These were not happy times for our family,' Lindy Boggs said Friday. 'We were told the FBI was monitoring our phone conversations and to draw running water between you and the telephone to wipe out the monitors.' Her recollection is supported by a former House colleague, Rep. Cornelius Gallagher, D-N.J., who said Friday that the House, under bipartisan leadership that included Ford and Boggs, had commissioned an investigation and discovered members' phones had indeed been tapped by the FBI. But he said the report was never released."

DOJ_NMG_0111535

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Tornado Warning Forces President And Mrs. Bush To Move To Shelter. The AP (12/29) reports President Bush and First Lady Laura Bush "were moved to an armored vehicle on their ranch Friday when a tornado warning was issued in central Texas, the White House said. The vehicle was driven to a tornado shelter on the ranch at 1:30 p.m. CT, and the president, the first lady and their two Scottish terriers, Barney and Miss Beazley, sat inside until the weather cleared, deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said." The Washington Post (12/30, A3, 690K), the New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) and BBC.com (12/29) are among the other outlets carrying brief mentions of the tornado report.

All three broadcast networks also mentioned the tornado. ABC World News (12/29, story 6, 1:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was some rough weather in central Texas today, and that led to some apprehension for President and Mr. Bush and the people who keep them safe." The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 10, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "There was some wild weather in Texas today, when tornadoes swept through that state. The Secret Service had the President and Mrs. Bush ride out a tornado warning in an armored vehicle at their ranch in Crawford. The twisters, though, never made it to the ranch." NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 2, 1:10, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "The President, First Lady and their two dogs were moved out of their house and placed in an armored vehicle and taken to a tornado shelter."

Bush Said To Have Had Full Schedule During Trip To Crawford. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports "this has been a different and strange holiday in which Bush has been unable to leave behind reminders of the problems he faces, at a low point in public opinion polls after another deadly year in Iraq. The intelligence briefing Friday included an update on the execution of Saddam Hussein. On Thursday, Bush met with his senior national security advisors at his office on the ranch to work on a new strategy to deal with the insurgency and sectarian violence in Iraq. There also were details to work out on his role in former President Ford's funeral and memorial services. And outside the property, as usual, were anti-war demonstrators."

Cheney Expected To Be Focus Of Attention In 2007. In the Financial Times (12/30), Caroline Daniel writes that Vice President Cheney "has forged a reputation as the most powerful but also least visible vice-president in recent history. In the next few weeks, however, he will be forced to fight some of his battles in the open - in the courtroom and on Capitol Hill. The first test will come in the criminal trial of his former chief of staff, Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. … The trial, due to begin in two weeks, is likely to set an ignominious precedent when Mr Cheney becomes the first vice-president to testify in a trial. Mr Cheney's legal team are also steeling themselves for the launch of legislative investigations by the new Democrat-controlled Congress. In 2004 the vice-president felt confident enough to dismiss questions from Patrick Leahy, then a powerless Democrat, with a lewd invitation for him to do something sexually impossible. Now, he faces political revenge: Mr Leahy, the incoming chairman of the judiciary committee, has said he will issue subpoenas to secure documents that show whether the Bush administration authorised torture as part of its 'war on terror'. He also vowed to look into no-bid Iraq contracts, including those awarded to Halliburton, a company the vice-president once ran."

DOJ_NMG_0111536

Ford's Relationship With Cheney, Rumsfeld Examined. The New York Times (12/30, Shane, 1.16M) reports that both Vice President Cheney and former Defense Secretary Rumsfeld "have consciously sought to restore what they see as the constitutional powers of the presidency, which they believe were severely eroded under President Richard M. Nixon and President Ford. Some of their colleagues from three decades ago — evidently including Mr. Ford — have wondered if they have gone too far. … In all the intervening years, Mr. Ford maintained close and friendly relations with both his former chiefs of staff. When Mr. Bush selected Mr. Cheney as his running mate in 2000, Mr. Ford lauded the vice-presidential candidate in an Op-Ed article in The New York Times for 'a towering intelligence and probity, razor-sharp judgment and a seriousness of purpose that is the antithesis of modern political spin.' This year, when Mr. Rumsfeld came under fire from senior retired generals for his conduct of the war in Iraq, Mr. Ford issued a rare public statement defending his 'creativity, vision and courage' and rebuking his critics. But a private disillusionment appears to have been taking shape. In a 2004 interview with Bob Woodward, reported for the first time in The Washington Post this week, Mr. Ford singled out Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Cheney by name and sharply criticized the decision to go to war in Iraq."

Ninth Circuit Reportedly Investigating Federal Judge Appointed By Bush. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Goodman, 850K) reports, "The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco has launched an investigation of a federal judge who awarded more than $4.8 million in judgments and fees without apparently disclosing his personal, political and business ties to those who benefited, two sources close to the inquiry told The Times. U.S. District Judge James C. Mahan of Las Vegas, a popular state judge who joined the federal bench in 2002 after his nomination by President Bush, was the subject of Times investigative reports in June. … On Mahan, the articles detailed how he awarded fees in a dozen state and federal cases to a former client and business associate who twice served as his judicial campaign treasurer and who was instrumental in getting him appointed to the bench."

Democrats Expected To Seek Expansion Of Health Coverage For Children. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A4, Zhang, 2.04M) reports Congressional Democrats, "itching to expand health coverage, will likely start by tackling the most politically appealing group: uninsured children. … About 8.3 million children, or 11% of all children in the U.S., lack coverage. For Democrats, covering these youngsters has obvious appeal. It would allow lawmakers to champion solutions to problems of people who they say have been a low priority for Republicans. It also would be a step toward universal health coverage, an old and elusive goal of many in the party." The Journal notes, "Democrats have yet to offer specific proposals or to put a price tag on possible plans. But as with most health-care initiatives, any significant effort to extend and expand coverage will cost billions of dollars, and collide with budget realities, resistance from Republicans and Democrats' vow to be fiscally responsible."

Long-Term Elder-Care Costs Often Not Covered By Medicare. The New York Times (12/30, Gross, 1.16M) reports, "the legion of adult children — more than 15 million, according to various calculations — who take care of their aging parents, a responsibility that often includes paying for all or part of their housing, medical supplies and incidental expenses. Many costs are out of pocket and largely unnoticed: clothing, home repair, a cellular telephone. Adult children with the largest out-of-pocket expenses are those supervising care long distance, those who hire in-home help and those whose parents have too much money to qualify for government-subsidized Medicaid but not enough to pay for what could be a decade of frailty and dependence. The burden is compounded by ignorance, according to a study by AARP, released in mid-December, which found that most Americans have no idea how much long-term care costs and believe that Medicare pays for it, when it does not. … Costs are astronomical for long-term, low-tech care, the sort most often needed by those who linger with Alzheimer's disease or are too frail to get around on their own. Medicare is of almost no help."

WPost Urges Ethics Reforms In Wake Of Murtha Revelations. The New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) editorializes, "As the Democrats regain power in Congress next week they would be wise to look to one of their own — Representative John Murtha of Pennsylvania — for ironic inspiration in enacting the ethics reforms they promised voters. Even in the minority, Mr. Murtha made himself a legend at mastering the same quid pro quo culture that Democrats denounced in running against the Republicans' manipulations of Washington's money trough. His deliverance of masses of pork to favored campaign donors and lobbyists has been laid bare in a report by The Washington Post, detailing the sort of classic money churn that helped drive the Republicans from power. … Congressman Murtha's symbiotic prowess with defense contractors and power lobbyists was an open secret that drew no great attention until the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi, sought him as her majority leader. She was rebuffed by wiser colleagues. They must follow up that close call by striking at the heart of the easy-money culture that besmirches both sides of the aisle."

DOJ_NMG_0111537

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Ends Year Up 16% In Best Performance Since 2003. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, Lahart, 2.04M) reports on its front page that, "driven by a splurge of deal-making, a halt in the Federal Reserve's campaign of raising interest rates and continued profit growth," the Dow "completed its best year since 2003, gaining 16%. And having sailed through the second half of the year, investors now have a tailwind to continue their run into 2007. The Dow closed yesterday at 12463.15, 1,745.65 points higher than where it started 2006. The market's gains, which were across the board and on every index, came in the second half -- at one point in July the Dow was down on the year. The second-half's steady march was virtually uninterrupted." The Wall Street Journal (12/30, B1, Anand, 2.04M) says the "surprisingly strong year" ended with a quiet Friday session. NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 5, 0:45, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Stocks fell back a bit on this last trading day of the year, and a very good year it was."

The Washington Times (12/30, Bruno, 88K) runs a front-page report headlined "Stock Market Surged In 2006" that says that "by all accounts, 2006 ended up a very good year for stocks as bullish investors bounced back from a slumping housing market and the Federal Reserve's two-year campaign of interest-rate increases. The markets approached record levels in the spring, pulled back sharply in the summer, but found a clear direction in the fall to send the major indexes to multiyear highs." The Houston Chronicle (12/30, Patel, 530K) says the markets "had another bull year, making 2006 the fourth year in a row the three best-known indexes ended in positive territory. They pulled off greater returns than last, setting the stage for what investors expect will be a year of moderate growth in 2007." The AP (12/29) calls 2006 a "banner year" for stocks.

WSJournal Credits Derivatives For Providing Stability In US Markets. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A10,, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed yesterday near an all-time high, up 17% for the year. Long-term bond yields rose this year but remain remarkably low given the Federal Reserve's short-term rate ratchet to 5.25% from a low of 1%. Economic growth has slowed but remains solid. And by some measures financial market volatility is at lows not seen in a decade -- the Dow, for example, is still adding to its longest stretch (910 days) without a one-day decline of 2% or more since 1900. All of this stability naturally fills people with dread. It has led to a round of questioning about why, in an undeniably dangerous world, risk premiums seem to have drained out of whole classes of financial assets. Has Mr. Market become complacent, and so set himself up for a fall? What is everyone missing? … When it comes to the decline of risk premiums and financial stability, securitization and the use of derivatives have both played an unsung role."

Ford Mourning Underway After Understated California Services. The New York Times (12/30, Steinhauer, 1.16M) reports, "The first day of public mourning for former President Gerald R. Ford began Friday in this quiet desert community much the way his post-White House life did here 30 years ago — privately, absent of pomp, a small-town affair writ large by history more than family intent. The repose and prayer service here were the first of several events marking the life of the 38th president, which will include a state funeral in Washington and burial in Mr. Ford's hometown, Grand Rapids, Mich. Decidedly understated, the events here attracted more members of the news media than local mourners along the roadside outside the modest A-frame church, the Ford family's place of worship, where the coffin was placed."

The three broadcast networks gave a combined 18 and one-half minutes of coverage to the mourning for Ford and related stories. The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 4, 2:30,

DOJ_NMG_0111538

Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Six days of honors for America's 38th president began today with a prayer service in Palm Desert, California." ABC World News (12/29, story 3, 2:50, Rooney said, "The military honors belied what a simple affair it was for a man who did not stand on ceremony." NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 3, 2:40, Lewis, 9.87M) said, "President Ford lies in repose inside St. Margaret's church throughout tonight and into the morning. Thousands of people are expected to file past his casket. … Tomorrow the Ford family will accompany the casket to Washington D.C. And on Wednesday of next week Mr. Ford will be buried in Grand Rapids, Michigan."

The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Abrams, Ganga, 850K) reports, "Unlike past presidential obsequies, today's rites were marked by their simplicity. A hearse with two small flags and a tiny presidential seal carried the coffin. At the front of the church, a military honor guard, representing different military branches, stood at attention to receive the body. Former First Lady Ford, 88, her four grown children and several grandchildren moved to the front of the church as the body was carried with military precision into the church." The Washington Times (12/30, Wilson, 88K) reports, "The private family service was followed by a visitation for invited friends, including former Secretary of State George Shultz, former Rep. Jack Kemp and former California Gov. Pete Wilson." Rep. John Dingell said on CNN (12/29), "He was really a very simple, uncomplicated man. And during his time at the White House and also during his time in the Congress, was a man who was very friendly, very simple, very friendly." BBC.com (12/30) also describes the services.

The Washington Post (12/30, A1, Pomfret, Sheridan, 690K) reports, "As the quiet and simple service took place in California, a continent away, law enforcement agencies in Washington called in hundreds of officers to provide security for the second presidential funeral to take place in the nation's capital in three years. The authorities said that a section of the Inner Loop of the Capital Beltway, near the Suitland Parkway, will be shut down for a short time starting at about 5:30 p.m. on Saturday to allow the motorcade carrying Ford's casket to pass by. A number of streets in Alexandria and in Washington will also be temporarily closed." The Washington Post (12/30, A9, Ruane, 690K) reports, "There will be no military aircraft flyover tonight, officials said, unlike with Reagan's services, when a large flyover took place as the procession neared the Capitol. At the family's request, Ford's cortege is scheduled to make two special stops as it travels from Andrews Air Force Base, where it is set to arrive at 5:20 p.m., to the Capitol, where his body is to lie in state through Tuesday morning. The cortege will first pass through Alexandria, where Ford and his family lived as Washington suburbanites in a red-brick Colonial with a pool and a bay window. It will then pause at the World War II Memorial, on the Mall, in recognition of his Navy service during the war." The Washington Post (12/30, A8, Montes, 690K) reports on crowds attracted to the National Archives' exhibits on Ford.

ABC World News (12/29, story 4, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) and the CBS Evening News (12/29, story 5, 4:15, Couric, 7.66M) also ran reports on Ford's friendship with Richard Nixon, while NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 6, 3:00, Mitchell, 9.87M) previewed a 1995 interview with Ford that will be published for the first time in Newsweek next week, in which "the private Gerald Ford" was "critical of other Republicans -- Nixon, Reagan and the former President Bush."

Government Agencies, Stock Markets Will Observe Tuesday's Day Of Mourning. CNN.com (12/29) reports, "Ford's funeral service will be in Washington at the National Cathedral on Tuesday, which President Bush has designated as a day of mourning for Ford. Bush's order triggers the closure of all federal offices except those necessary for national security. Major U.S. stock exchanges also are expected to be closed Tuesday in Ford's honor. The U.S. Postal Service said it would suspend delivery that day." The Wall Street Journal (12/30, B2, Schroeder, 2.04M) reports, "It will be the longest closing of major U.S. stock markets since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks shut down trading for six days, including a weekend. On Friday, the New York Stock Exchange joined the Nasdaq Stock Market in announcing it would close on Tuesday, in observance of a national day of mourning for former President Gerald Ford. Nasdaq had made its announcement on Thursday." The Washington Post (12/30, D1, 690K) and the New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) also note the markets' closings.

Ford Portrayed As Champion Of Vietnamese Refugees. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/30, A21, 690K) Quang X. Pham, who was born in Saigon and served as a Marine pilot in the Persian Gulf War, writes, "Ford became the savior to those lucky enough to escape the taking of Saigon by the North Vietnamese army. 'I pray no American president is ever again faced with this grave option,' Ford said at a public forum on the legacy of the Vietnam War 25 years later. 'I still grieve over those we were unable to rescue.' He added that he was thankful America was able to relocate 130,000 Vietnamese refugees (less than 1 percent of South Vietnam's population) and that 'to do less would have added moral shame to humiliation.' … I am not aware of any other politicians, antiwar protesters, esteemed journalists or celebrities visiting Fort Chaffee, Ark., where my family was temporarily housed for two months. But Gerald Ford did."

DOJ_NMG_0111539

Experience In 2004 Seen As Having Improved Edwards Campaign. The Washington Post (12/30, A3, Balz, 690K) reports, "With overflow crowds and his populist economic message and his Internet-friendly campaign organization, John Edwards signaled this week that, if he has anything to say about it, the race for the Democratic presidential nomination will be about more than just Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama." Edwards "begins his second campaign for the White House with the kind of self-confidence that comes only from having tried and failed once before. … There are also critical adjustments in his candidacy that position him to compete against Clinton and Obama, the party's two unannounced glamour candidates of the moment. Edwards will be able to run to the left of Clinton in a party whose base has shifted leftward during the Bush presidency. And this time, questions about lack of experience will go first to Obama."

Edwards Warns Against Adopting "McCain Doctrine" In Iraq. Sen. John Edwards said on MSNBC's Hardball (12/29, Matthews), "I think it is a mistake to escalate this war. I think it is a mistake to have this McCain Doctrine adopted as a policy by the United States. I think what it does is it sends a signal that we are going be there forever, or for a long time. It takes responsibility away from the Iraqis and there is no military solution to what is happening in Iraq, the only solution is a political solution." Edwards, on CNN's The Situation Room (12/29, Henry), "I believe an escalation of our presence in Iraq is a enormous mistake. I think this McCain Doctrine doesn't make any sense. There is no military solution to what's happening in Iraq. Everyone knows that. The only potential solution is a political solution. The Iraqis are going to have to decide whether they're actually going to have a representative government that includes everybody, including the Sunnis. And that's the only way to ultimately tamp down this violence."

Pro-Obama Group To Air Ads In Iowa. RollCall.com (12/29, Kane) reports, "As Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) nears a decision on his presidential aspirations, an independent group of supporters is going back on the air to try to entice him into the 2008 White House campaign, this time with an ad campaign in the first-in-the-nation caucus state of Iowa. DraftObama.org, a political action committee founded by Democratic activists in the Washington, D.C., suburbs of Maryland and Virginia, has bought time on three major network affiliates in Iowa to air its 'Believe Again' ad, a 60-second spot that already has been shown on New Hampshire, Hawaii and D.C.-area TV stations."

Romney Considered Among "Top-Tier" GOP Presidential Candidates. The AP (12/30, Sidoti) reports, "When it comes to the presidency, the Republican Party has a long tradition of nominating the next guy in line. That's John McCain, and the failed GOP presidential aspirant of 2000 is positioning himself as the anointed 2008 nominee. Yet, a full year before the first primary contests, the Republican race is anything but wrapped up. The Arizona senator who once reveled in his reputation for bucking the party line is now running as the establishment candidate, but he faces serious challenges from Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. … Regardless of who has the early edge, McCain, Romney and Giuliani make up the top tier of the crowded GOP presidential field that includes a cast of other lesser-known potential candidates, most of whom would be long-shots should they decide to formally enter the race."

Congressional Democrats Voice Objections To FL13 Vote. The New York Times (12/30, Zernike, 1.16M) reports Congressional Democrats "said Friday that they would open the new Congress by formally objecting to the election result in Florida's 13th District, in the hope that the Democrat who is contesting the narrow outcome there," Christine Jennings, "will ultimately take the place of the Republican," Vern Buchanan, "whom the state has certified as the winner. The move will not prevent…Buchanan from taking office with the rest of the 110th Congress next Thursday. But Democrats say that because the House is the final certifier of House election results, they want to make certain that Mr. Buchanan's swearing-in does not prejudice a legal challenge mounted by" Jennings. Rep. Rush Holt is quoted as saying, "No one who's in a disputed election like this should get too comfortable in the House of Representatives. … The evidence will show that a revote is necessary."

DOJ_NMG_0111540

RollCall.com (12/29, Duran) reports, "Despite Democrats' concerns over the election results, incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) clearly did not want to open the first Democratic-led session in 12 years with an ugly House floor fight over whether Buchanan should be seated or not. The Florida secretary of state certified Buchanan as the winner Nov. 21. However, a majority of the House can refuse to seat any Member." On its web site, The Hill (12/29, Blake) reports, "Should Jennings's contentions be validated by the Florida courts, the House would have the power to remove Buchanan."

Kline Continues To Divide Kansas GOP. The Washington Post (12/30, A2, Slevin, 690K) reports, "Phill Kline is not one to slink away -- and the ideological wars inside the Kansas Republican Party show no sign of ending. The fiercely antiabortion Republican attorney general in Kansas lost his reelection bid in November when moderate Republicans voted in droves for Paul Morrison, a longtime Johnson County district attorney who became a Democrat in hopes of vanquishing Kline. Statewide, Kline got barely 4 in 10 votes. In Johnson County, the state's most populous county, his loss was more dramatic. That made it especially shocking after the election when Republican precinct leaders in the county chose Kline to finish the final two years of Morrison's term as prosecutor. Gov. Kathleen Sebelius (D), a vocal Kline foe, refused to sign his nomination papers, a ceremonial task, lambasting a 'small narrow group of partisan political operatives' for choosing him. … Kline's reincarnation as Johnson County prosecutor reveals the depth of the continuing Republican split in Kansas."

Schwarzenegger's Inauguration Festivities Described As "Lavish." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Halper, 850K) reports, "construction firms, insurance companies, developers and other private donors — most with business in the governor's office — will pick up the tab of at least $1.4 million for a lavish party to kick off Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's second term. Schwarzenegger's inaugural committee Friday announced the plans for next Friday's celebration, along with a list of donors. Campaign finance watchdogs have called the whole affair unseemly. Unlike other donations from special interests with business before the state, contributions to the inaugural committee are not subject to legal limits. Nine donors contributed at least $50,000 each to the event, which earned them the designation of 'Gold Sponsor.' Half the $1.4 million raised came in during the last two weeks."

Spitzer Plans "Modest" Inauguration. The New York Times (12/30, Confessore, 1.16M) reports, "Twelve years ago, Gov. George E. Pataki took office with one of the most lavish inaugural parties in New York State history: three days of food and celebration for thousands of supporters, paid for with money raised by a private corporation established solely for that purpose. But the extravaganza blossomed into a two-year headache after Mr. Pataki broke a promise to open the corporation's books to the public, plunging his administration into its first scandal. … Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer is aiming for a happier beginning. Mr. Spitzer has planned a comparatively modest celebration for himself."

States' Minimum Wage Boosts Effective Monday. The Washington Post (12/30, A4, Tanner, 690K) reports, "Jan. 1 brings new laws in many states, offering both a glimpse of what is on the voters' minds and a preview of some of the issues Washington might take up. Many states take action long before Congress does. Effective Monday, seven states -- Arizona, California, Delaware, Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina and Pennsylvania -- will raise their minimum wage. The federal minimum is $5.15 an hour. The new wages go as high as $7.50 an hour. … States also dealt with immigration (nurses from other countries must have English-language proficiency to practice in South Carolina), eminent domain (Illinois requires local governments to pay more and meet a higher legal threshold before seizing private property) and campaign finance (North Carolina and Pennsylvania set stricter rules)."

DC Memorials Commemorating International Figures Draw Controversy. The New York Times (12/30, Barringer, 1.16M) reports that the National Park Service and the National Capital Planning Commission are "the agencies most responsible for monitoring the conception, creation and placement of new museums and commemorative works in the federal city. 'I think there's a heightened sensitivity to where we place these memorials and museums, and whom we venerate,' said the planning commission's chairman, John V. Cogbill III. … 'We view ourselves as a world city, so I think in that respect you want to embrace something that is not indigenous to our own culture.' The language of the Commemorative Works Act of 1986, which set out procedures for the creation of memorials on federal land here, is a little less inclusive than Mr. Cogbill is. It envisions commemorative works that evoke 'the memory of an individual, group, event or other significant element of American history.' In the two decades since Congress enacted that law, about 30 memorials have been approved, four of which did not conform to the provision about American history."

DOJ_NMG_0111541

Somali Government Asserts Control, Imposes Martial Law. The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 7, 0:50, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "For the first time in 15 years, Somali forces appear to be in control of their capital, Mogadishu. Government forces, backed by heavily armed soldiers from neighboring Ethiopia, drove militia loyal to Islamist clerics from the capital they have controlled. There is the promise of stability here, but in this country, divided by clan loyalties and ruined by civil war, there is no certainty."

The Washington Post (12/30, A12, McCrummen, 690K) reports, "With Ethiopian tanks and soldiers guarding key sites in the exhausted Somali capital of Mogadishu, the country's long-exiled and long-powerless prime minister rolled into town Friday, promising that his government would establish order across the chaotic Horn of Africa nation in a matter of months." Despite Prime Minster Ali Mohamed Gedi's efforts, Somali protests against the Ethiopian forces raise "the question of how long Gedi's weak interim government can afford the protection of soldiers from a country that most Somalis consider an enemy or a proxy for the United States." The Post says "some analysts said that the Islamic militias' rapid retreat in the face of the Ethiopian offensive suggests that they were never the threat they were made out to be; others believe the Islamic fighters have faded back to wage a protracted guerrilla war, a scenario that has always been the most feared among regional leaders."

The Washington Times/AP (12/30, Neuhaus) notes Gedi "promised thousands of war-weary Somalis peace and stability yesterday as he formally took control of the battle-scarred capital." However, the AP adds, "the task facing Somalia's U.N.-backed, secular government is immense." The State Department "called for all Somalis to work for 'genuine national reconciliation' and reiterated support for an African peacekeeping force to be deployed in the country."

The Financial Times (12/30, England) reports Gedi "said the administration's priority was to restore law and order and begin the process of rebuilding the shattered country. But while his presence in the capital was symbolically important for the government, the challenges ahead are daunting as it seeks to impose its authority in a city awash with arms and beset by clan rivalries." BBC.com (12/29) cites experts saying Gedi's "arrival in Mogadishu marks the first time the country's transitional government has been in a position to exercise full authority in the capital."

Under the headline, "Somalis Split As Fighting Halts And Hint Of Insurgency Looms," the New York Times (12/30, Gettleman, 1.16M) adds, "Anti-Ethiopia riots erupted in Mogadishu … while masked gunmen emerged for the first time on the streets, a day after Ethiopian-backed troops captured the city from Islamist forces." The Times adds, "Mogadishu has plenty of gunmen, of every age and every clan, but gunmen hiding their identity is something new and may be a sign of a developing insurgency." Some experts believe "that if the Ethiopian troops … linger in the country too long and their intervention turns into a full-scale occupation, it will uncork a long and nasty guerilla war." For his part, Gedi "is wasting little time getting to work. He announced Friday that the transitional government … was imposing martial law for the next three months. He asked Mogadishu's various clan militias to turn in their weapons or face the consequences."

Chinese White Paper Pegs Military Buildup To Economic Development. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A4, Fairclough, 2.04M) details the Chinese State Council's release of report claiming "China's rapid economic growth and its dependence on international trade are driving major shifts in the country's military strategy." The white paper "outlines steps that appear aimed at improving China's ability to use armed force far from its own shores in order to protect increasingly global interests." According to the Journal, the policy "says China is pursuing 'a road of peaceful development' but adds that the country's military strength should increase 'in step' with its expanding economy." The report "provides a window into Chinese strategic thinkers' view of the international security environment and their apparent distrust of the U.S. and its motives. The paper's authors say they don't expect any large-scale conflicts between major countries in the 'foreseeable future.' But they expressed dissatisfaction with what they termed 'hegemonism and power politics.'" A focus on the outward projection of power "is a departure for China's People's Liberation Army, which … has been focused for much of its existence on domestic threats, territorial defense and conflicts on its borders." The Journal adds, "China's growing military strength and questions about its intentions have touched off a debate among U.S. defense-policy makers."

DOJ_NMG_0111542

The Washington Post (12/30, A17, Cody, 690K) notes Beijing "warned Friday that the military landscape in northeast Asia is getting 'more complicated and serious' because of North Korea's nuclear weapons program and tighter defense cooperation between Japan and the United States." The white paper "provided a rare glimpse into the strategic assessments that underlie decisions and priorities of the secretive Chinese military and the Communist Party's policymaking Central Military Commission." The Post says the report "was designed as a response to repeated complaints from the Bush administration that China has not explained the rationale behind its long-term military improvement program."

Under the headline, "China's Military Spending To Reach $36bn," the Financial Times (12/30, Yeh) reports the 15 percent annual military budget increase is "likely to heighten concerns over Beijing's military build-up." That enhanced spending "is aimed at modernising the 2.3m-strong People's Liberation Army (PLA) into a nimbler, more technologically-advanced entity, said a white paper released by the government yesterday."

Iranian UN Ambassador Pans Security Council Sanctions, Backs Cooperation. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (12/30, 850K), Iranian Ambassador to the UN M. Javad Zarif questions the "urgency" of the recent UN Security Council resolution "against" his nation's "nuclear program." Tehran "has categorically rejected the development, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons on both ideological and strategic grounds," and remains "committed to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty." Zarif cites "alarmist assessments" from opponents of Iran's nuclear program, and says even thy "concede that there is no actual evidence that Iran is trying to build a nuclear weapon and that, even if it wanted to do so, it would not be capable of developing one before 2010 or 2015." The Security Council sought ony "to punish Iran for refusing to suspend its peaceful and legal uranium enrichment activities." Tehran "has proposed real alternatives to ensure that its civilian nuclear program will remain exclusively and indefinitely peaceful," adding, "Neither suspension nor sanctions can achieve the stated objective of ensuring nonproliferation because Iran has now been compelled to develop nuclear technology on its own." Zarif concludes, "Iran remains eager to dispel any doubts. It is not too late to reach an agreement on meaningful measures that can serve our common objective of limiting the proliferation of nuclear weapons."

Turkmen Opposition Given Little Chance Of Ousting Interim President. The New York Times (12/30, Chivers, 1.16M) reports Turkmen Republican Party leader Nurmuhkammed Khanomov "demanded Friday that" interim President Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov "step down and allow for democratic elections in the authoritarian Central Asian nation. But there were signs of disorganization and discord in the opposition ranks." Khanomov's request "was almost certain to be ignored," and Berdymukhammedov and his allies "have been consolidating their hold on the country since the death of Saparmurat Niyazov, the Turkmen president, on Dec. 21." Niyazov's "death had been expected to set off a succession battle, but so far none has spilled into the public light," and, the Times adds, "the opposition has been marginalized by a combination of manipulation of the Constitution, amendments to election law and police action." Calling several government actions "manipulations," the Times notes the new election law bars "citizens who have lived outside of Turkmenistan in recent years from becoming candidates — a rule that blocked the best-known opposition figures from entering the race." One opposition leader "said that when the holiday season ended, the Turkmen people would be watching the United States closely. Washington has backed other democratic movements, he said, and publicly pushed for fair elections in several authoritarian states, including Belarus. He said he worried that because of Turkmenistan's energy reserves, it would not be treated the same way."

Russia, Belarus In Standoff Over Natural Gas. The New York Times (12/30, Kramer, 1.16M) reports Russian energy "monopoly" Gazprom is once again "in a dispute over prices and control of a pipeline in a neighboring country that is threatening the smooth flow of natural gas to Europe. But this time, the price increase was levied on a Russian ally, Belarus, a country whose foreign policy is aligned with Moscow in all but one important aspect: support for increasing cash flow at Gazprom." Belarus President Aleksandr Lukashenko "called Gazprom's position

DOJ_NMG_0111543

'blackmail' and said Belarussians would rather live in unheated dugouts than pay the higher price." Russian Deputy Prime Minister and Gazprom head Dmitri Medvedev "retorted that Belarus was 'blackmailing' Europe by threatening the transit pipelines that cross that country." The Times says Gazprom's "price increases have added to concerns about the reliability of the oil and natural gas flowing from Russia, which is a major supplier to Europe but has increasingly wielded its energy resources for political leverage." The Times notes some experts believe "that, beyond being merely a tool of Russian foreign policy, increasing the cash flow at Gazprom is an important, even central, tenet of Russian foreign policy in its own right. That interest may outweigh support for Belarus as a client state."

The Financial Times (12/30, Ostrovsky) notes Lukashenko "was on Friday defiant in the face of Russian threats to cut gas supplies to his country, just as his officials arrived in Moscow for last-minute talks aimed at resolving the dispute." Despite Minsk's claim "that the aim was to sign a contract," a Gazprom employee "said he was not feeling optimistic about a possible breakthrough in the dispute between the two countries."

Slovenia Will Join Euro Zone Monday. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A4, Lagorce, 2.04M) notes Slovenia "on Monday will become the first former communist state to adopt the euro, in what Prime Minister Janez Jansa has called the 'biggest national achievement' since the country joined the European Union in 2004." The Journal calls the move "no small victory for" Slovenia. "It is alone among the 10-member European Union accession class of 2004 in having fulfilled the rigorous economic criteria needed to join Europe's Economic and Monetary Union." The Journal says adopting the euro "is expected to bring macroeconomic stability to the country, increase its exports and yield productivity gains." However, "by giving up its ability to fix its interest rates, Slovenia exposes itself to the risk of a house-price boom such as those experienced by Ireland and Portugal after they joined."

Sinn Fein Conference Will Consider Supporting Ulster Police. The AP (12/29, Pogatchnik) reports the leadership of Sinn Fein "voted Friday to convene an emergency conference and confront a pivotal issue in Northern Ireland peacemaking — whether the IRA-linked party should support the police." Noting "months of stalemate" in Protestant-Catholic negotiations, the AP adds Gerry Adams "said the conference would proceed only if the move received a sufficiently positive response from the Democratic Unionists, the major Protestant-backed party." Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern is quoted calling the Sinn Fein meeting "a defining moment in the peace process. A successful outcome is vital to the continuing success of this process." AFP (12/29, Bushe) notes the "landmark" and "watershed" meeting, and calls Sinn Fein's historic refusal to recognize the police force "the main obstacle" and "a major stumbling block to restoring the power-sharing government." Bloomberg (12/29, Nesbitt) reports Sinn Fein's decision to hold an intra-party vote is "paving the way for a revival of the region's parliament after it was suspended four years ago."

Bush Eliminates Jackson-Vanik Trade Limits For Vietnam. AFP (12/29) reports President Bush "signed a proclamation formally extending full US-Vietnam trade ties and made the former foe eligible for US military aid, key steps in normalizing relations." Noting Bush's lifting of key restrictions, Scott Stanzel is quoted saying Washington "welcomes Vietnam's progress in enacting free-market reforms, and looks forward to Vietnam becoming the 150th member of the World Trade Organization on January 11."

Convicted US Marine Remanded To US Custody In Philippines. The AP (12/29, Gomez) reports US Marine Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith, who has been "convicted of raping a Filipino woman, was whisked away from a Manila jail to the U.S. Embassy Friday, a spokesman said, almost a month after the U.S. and Philippine governments urged a local court to transfer him to American custody during his appeal." Spokesman Matt Lussenhop is quoted saying, "The government of the Philippines made a decision to transfer Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith back to U.S. custody, consistent with the terms of the" Visiting Forces Agreement.

Reid Seeks To "Strengthen Relations" With Ecuador. The AP (12/29, Valdivieso) carries comments from Ecuador by visiting Sen. Harry Reid "that the United States wants to strengthen relations with Ecuador's leftist President-elect Rafael Correa and respects his intention to not extend the U.S. military's use of a coastal base." Reid and five Senate colleagues "met for almost an hour with Correa, who takes office on Jan. 15, and expressed a desire to build better bilateral relations." Reid also "said President Bush supports an extension" of the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act."

DOJ_NMG_0111544

Top Bangladeshi Women Politicians' Rivalry Said To Hamper Development. The Washington Times/AP (12/30, Rosenberg) reports, "For 15 years Bangladesh has been dominated by the revolving-door premiership of two women whose rivalry is among the most ferocious in the democratic world." The AP calls the relationship between Begum Khaleda Zia and Sheik Hasina Wajed "the stuff of political slapstick, except that this feud is rooted in the assassination of one woman's father and the other's husband, and the result today is anything but funny." Bangladeshis "will tell you the rivalry is the cause of all the country's problems of poverty and corruption." The Zia-Wajed "rivalry has done nothing to improve things. Bangladesh is deeply corrupt and, in many parts, barely governed, raising concerns about instability in this strategic Muslim country already contending with Islamist militancy." The AP adds, "As each serves a term and is replaced by the other, a well-worn pattern has emerged: one party wins the election, and the other spends the next five years doing its best to make the country ungovernable through strikes and protests."

Sub-Saharan Africa Faces Challenges Of Meeting Renewed Education Demand. A 1,839-word feature in the New York Times (12/30, Lafraniere, 1.16M) reports, "Finding places for millions of new students is one of sub-Saharan Africa's most overwhelming and gratifying missions. After two decades of sluggish growth in enrollment rates, the region's 45 countries find themselves with an embarrassment of eager schoolchildren." The Times says "wo trends have converged to produce such change: One is a new willingness by international donors and African governments to spend hundreds of millions of dollars more on basic education. That has fed a rising demand for education by the region's parents, who for perhaps the first time see a chance to give their children a future that they were denied." Despite the positive trend, the "challenges" of providing an adequate education "remain staggering. Foremost is a flood tide of school-age children in a region whose birth rate is nearly twice the world's average. … The region must absorb those newcomers while trying to lift itself from the subbasement of global education."

British Authorities Arrest Four Rwandan Nationals On Genocide Charges. The New York Times (12/30, Cowell, 1.16M) reports, "In a rare case evoking genocide in a distant land, four men accused of plotting or participating in the 1994 massacres of Rwanda's Tutsi minority appeared in a London court on Friday after their arrests overnight to face extradition proceedings." The suspects, who will be held until a court appearance next month, "were arrested under an unusual and previously secret memorandum of understanding between Britain and Rwanda that was supposed to prevent them from being executed if found guilty of crimes in their own country." British law forbids both their extradition to face a possible death penalty and their prosecution in the UK. The Times adds, "The four men … have denied the genocide charges and are expected to resist being sent to Rwanda, where rights groups like Amnesty International have raised questions about the quality of the judicial system."

Desmond Tutu's "Moral Leadership" Profiled. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A10, 2.04M) runs an extensive interview by Tunku Varadarajan of Archbishop Desmond Tutu. "Among his many essential arts -- those of persuasion, rhetoric, theology and politics -- there is one that stands out over all others when I meet Desmond Tutu in the flesh at a hotel in midtown Manhattan: the art of laughter." However, the Journal says, his "jollity" is "that of a serious, even grave, man, and it is this jollity, this very African capacity for mirth in darkness, that set him apart from the dour, adamant Afrikaners with whom he locked horns over a lifetime." Tutu "looks like nothing more than a mischievous, if well-fed, lemur, whose eyes twinkle irrepressibly behind plus-size glasses." Calling Tutu "the best known priest in the world (give or take a pope)," the Journal says his "renown derives not so much from his theology as from his moral leadership of the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa."

Global Warming Faulted For Arctic Ice Shelf Break. ABC World News (12/29, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "An ancient and enormous ice shelf, equivalent in size to 11,000 football fields has broken free from Canada's Arctic region. It is the largest event of its kind to happen in that area in 30 years. But some scientists say it's only the beginning. They predict big changes for the Arctic, and they point to unusually warm temperatures as the cause." The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 9, 0:40, Solorzano,

DOJ_NMG_0111545

7.66M) said scientists are "blaming global warming" for the breaking off of the ice shelf, which "froze 3,000 years ago and is the size of 11,000 football fields." NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 8, 2:05, Brown, 9.87M) also had the story as a lead-in to a report on the impact of global warming, and the Washington Post (12/30, A18, Gillies, 690K) carries an AP item on the break.

NYTimes Says EU, Not Turkey, To Blame For Accession Slowdown. In an editorial today, the New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) says "strained relations between Turkey and Cyprus" for Istanbul's inability to push EU accession talks forward. "What is surprising — and dismaying — is that the union is treating this as primarily a legal problem. That's a distortion." The "problem is mainly political, and of the union's own making. The E.U. blundered when it allowed a divided Cyprus to join the union in 2004" instead of demanding reunification, as Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots wanted. The Times adds, "Opposition to Turkey fails the test of Europe's values of tolerance and political compromise. It is also a failure on Europeans' part to discern their own self-interest." Calling Turkey "an underutilized resource" in fostering Muslim-Christian dialogue, the Times concludes, "it's up to the European Union to mend the Cyprus divide and clear the way for a dispassionate recognition of Turkey's vital role in Europe."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Violence Marked His Rise, Rule And Fall."
"A Test Of Faith In Strangers."
"Hussein Executed -- And Iraq Braces."
"Soaring Tourism, Hidden Dollars."
"Apple Report Fails To End Stock-Option Controversy."
"A Quiet, Personal Farewell."

New York Times:

"Dictator Who Ruled Iraq With Violence Is Hanged For Crimes Against Humanity."
"Joy Of Capture Muted At End."
"The Defiant Despot Oppressed Iraq For More Than 30 Years."
"New Job Title For Druggists: Diabetes Coach."
"Crowds Of Pupils But Little Else In African Schools."
"Elder-Care Costs Deplete Savings Of A Generation."
"Failure To Navigate: Security Effort By Coast Guard Is Falling Short."
"No Pomp For A President In Repose."
"U.S. And Iraq Dispute Role Of Iranians But Free Them."
Somalis Split As Fighting Halts And Hint Of Insurgency Looms."
"Apple Panel On Options Backs Chief."
"U.S. Official Overseeing Oil Program Faces Inquiry."
"Coaches' Word Rarely As Good As The Next Job."

Washington Post:

"Saddam Hussein Is Put To Death."
"Washington Prepares For Farewell To Ford."
"AT&T Completes BellSouth Takeover."
"An Overwhelmed D.C. Agency Loses Count of AIDS Cases.
"Apple Admits Wrongdoing But Rallies Around Leader."

Washington Times:

"Saddam Pays At The End Of A Rope."
"Six Days Of Mourning Begin."
"Bush Eager To Put '06 Behind."
"BWI Airport Leads Use-It-Again Trend."

Detroit Free Press:

"Hussein Hanged."
"Dearborn Crowd Celebrates For Justice."

Dallas Morning News:

"Saddam Dies On The Gallows."
"Rain Pounds Area, But Tornadoes Stay Away."
"Passengers Stuck On Plane Over 8 Hours."
"AT&T Buyout OK'd."
"Arlington Murder Suspect Arrested In Mississippi."
"Ford's Funeral Begins With Simple Ceremony."
"2 Dead In FW accident."
"Blizzard Pounds Colorado, Heads For Texas."

Houston Chronicle:

"Official: Saddam 'Totally Surrendered.'"
"NewsWatch: White House - Bush's Statement."
"Pentagon: U.S. ready for any surge in violence in Iraq."
"Scientists: Climate Change Behind Ice-Shelf Break."
"T-Mac Finds Form, Helps Rockets Down Hawks."
"Islamic Association Dismisses Katy Pig Races."
"Lawyer: Suspect In Houston Pot Bust 'No Drug Lord.'"
"Ex-Councilman Reyes Freed From Halfway House."
"Houston Conventions Chief Quits, To Be Consultant."
"Three Best-Known Market Indexes End '06 In Black."

DOJ_NMG_0111546

"Underage New Year's Drinkers Face Stiff Penalties."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: The Execution Of Saddam Hussein; Security In Iraq-Hussein Execution; Mourning For Former President Ford; Ford/ Nixon Enduring Friendship; Artic Ice Shelf Melts/ Breaks Free Into Ocean; Tornado Scare On President's Texas Ranch; Colorado Snowstorm.

CBS: Execution Of Saddam Hussein; Other Executions In Baghdad; Analysis Of Iraqi Reaction To Hussein Execution; Death Of Former President Ford; Ford/ Nixon Friendship; Taliban Gaining Power In Afghanistan; Somalian Civil War; Snowstorm In Denver; Scientists Blame Global Warming For Melting Ice Shelf; Tornado Swept Through Texas; Mourning Former President Ford.

NBC: Execution Of Saddam Hussein; President Bush's View Of Iraqi Reaction/ Texas Tornado; Mourning For Former President Ford; Snowstorm In Denver; Wall Street Report; Interview With Revelations From Ford About His Successors; AT&T/ BellSouth Merger; Global Warming Weather Trends.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule. In Crawford, Texas.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: FUNERAL SEVICES FOR FORMER PRESIDENT GERALD R. FORD. 5:20 p.m. Ford's body arrives at Andrews Air Force Base, and will be taken to the Capitol. The motorcade will pause at the World War II Memorial. Note: Only credentialed media will have access to this ceremony. All media are required to have credentials and government-issued picture identification, such as a drivers license, to access the air base. Credentialed media will report to the West Gate at Andrews at 3 p.m. for security processing and shuttle service to ceremony location. The West Gate can be accessed from I-495 to Maryland exit 9, Allentown Road, Andrews AFB, State Route 337. Media are encouraged to take a taxi, limousine or carpool to the West Gate because parking is limited. Press pre-set time: 3-4:30 p.m. at West Gate Entrance. Doors open at 3 p.m. and close at 4:30 p.m. Credentialing: Joint Task Force-National. Phone: 202-685-4644/4645/6248. Fax: 202-685-1999. 6:30 p.m. Rotunda arrival ceremony, open to President Ford's immediate family, members and members-elect of the House and Senate, visiting heads of state and invited government officials. After the arrival ceremony, the Rotunda will open to the public until midnight. The public waiting area will be at the southwest corner of the Capitol grounds, across from the U.S. Botanic Garden. 7 p.m. State funeral begins in the Capitol Rotunda. 8:20 p.m. Ford's body lies in state.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Antiterrorism Successes Seen As Some Of The Few 2006 Bright Spots For Bush ... 2
Circuit Court Panel Rejects Ex-Judges' Amicus Brief In Guantanamo Case ... 2

Homeland Response:
Proposed Port Security System Encounters Technology Snags .. 2
Crews To Excavate World Trade Center Service Road For Remains ... 3

War News:
Saddam Hussein Is Dead, Executed By Nation He Once Ruled .. 3
Troops Braced For Post-Execution Violence In Iraq ... 6
December Is Deadliest Month Of 2006 For US Troops In Iraq ... 7
Pentagon Reviews Surge Plans ... 7
Pentagon To Request "Annual Record" In War Spending ... 7
Iranians' Detention, Expulsion Said To Worsen US-Iraqi Relations ... 8
Poll Finds Plurality Of Troops Disapprove Of Bush's War Policy .. 8
Kennedy Urges More Help For Iraqi Refugees ... 8
Taliban Commander Vows Continued War Against US, Allies ... 8

Corporate Scandals:
Apple Report Clears Jobs Of Options Wrongdoing ... 9
MetLife Unit Settles New York Commission Probe For $19 Million ... 10
Wachovia Fund To Settle Civil Allegations ... 10

Criminal Law:
FBI Alleges 96-Year-Old Man Is An Active Mafia Figure ... 10
Police Seek Clues In Two Virginia Attacks ... 10
NYTimes Argues Against Banishing Sexual Predators ... 11

Civil Law:
DOJ Sues Over Alleged Small Business Fun Fraud ... 11

Civil Rights:
DOJ Asked To Probe Duke Lacrosse Prosecution ... 11
6th Circuit Backs Michigan Affirmative Action Ban ... 12

Antitrust:
FCC Approves AT&T-BellSouth Deal After Seven-Month Impasse ... 12
Financial Services Firms Avail Themselves Of Patent Protections ... 13

Environment:
DOJ Investigating Interior Official Over Oil Royalties ... 13
Woolsey Encourages Development Of "Plug-In" Hybrid Autos ... 13

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
FBI And Coast Guard Reportedly Contested Responsibility For Hijacked Ferry During Drill ... 13
Nixon-Ford Tapes' Release Revives Controversy Over FBI Surveillance ... 14

Congress-Administration:
Tornado Warning Forces President And Mrs. Bush To Move To Shelter ... 14
Cheney Expected To Be Focus Of Attention In 2007 ... 14
Ninth Circuit Reportedly Investigating Federal Judge Appointed By Bush ... 15
Democrats Expected To Seek Expansion Of Health Coverage For Children ... 15
Long-Term Elder-Care Costs Often Not Covered By Medicare .. 15
WPost Urges Ethics Reforms In Wake Of Murtha Revelations ... 15

Other News:
Dow Ends Year Up 16% In Best Performance Since 2003 ... 16
Ford Mourning Underway After Understated California Services 16
Experience In 2004 Seen As Having Improved Edwards Campaign ... 17
Pro-Obama Group To Air Ads In Iowa ... 18
Romney Considered Among "Top-Tier" GOP Presidential Candidates ... 18
Congressional Democrats Voice Objections To FL13 Vote ... 18
Kline Continues To Divide Kansas GOP ... 18
Schwarzenegger's Inauguration Festivities Described As "Lavish." ... 18
Spitzer Plans "Modest" Inauguration ... 19
States' Minimum Wage Boosts Effective Monday ... 19
DC Memorials Commemorating International Figures Draw Controversy ... 19
Somali Government Asserts Control, Imposes Martial Law ... 19
Chinese White Paper Pegs Military Buildup To Economic Development ... 20

Iranian UN Ambassador Pans Security Council Sanctions, Backs Cooperation 20
Turkmen Opposition Given Little Chance Of Ousting Interim President 20
Russia, Belarus In Standoff Over Natural Gas 21
Slovenia Will Join Euro Zone Monday 21
Sinn Fein Conference Will Consider Supporting Ulster Police 21
Bush Eliminates Jackson-Vanik Trade Limits For Vietnam 21
Convicted US Marine Remanded To US Custody In Philippines 21
Reid Seeks To "Strengthen Relations" With Ecuador 21
Top Bangladeshi Women Politicians' Rivalry Said To Hamper Development 22
Sub-Saharan Africa Faces Challenges Of Meeting Renewed Education Demand 22
British Authorities Arrest Four Rwandan Nationals On Genocide Charges 22
Desmond Tutu's "Moral Leadership" Profiled 22
Global Warming Faulted For Arctic Ice Shelf Break 22
NYTimes Says EU, Not Turkey, To Blame For Accession Slowdown 23

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 23

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 24

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Antiterrorism Successes Seen As Some Of The Few 2006 Bright Spots For Bush. The Washington Times (12/30, A1, Dinan, 88K), in a front-page article titled "Bush Eager To Put '06 Behind," reports 2006 saw President Bush's "poll approval ratings fall to new lows, saw Congress back him off his veto threat on the Dubai ports deal and forced him to issue his first veto, on stem-cell research, ended with Democrats' winning outright control of Congress." The Times adds, "But he also won confirmation of a second justice to the Supreme Court and won congressional approval of detention and military trials for detainees in the war on terror. Just as important, the United States helped Britain foil another major terrorist plot to hijack airplanes this past summer, and the fifth full year since September 11 is about to expire without another successful terrorist attack on U.S. soil. At the same time, though, the situation in Iraq deteriorated, and the administration made only halting progress in using diplomacy to try to contain Iran's and North Korea's nuclear programs."

Circuit Court Panel Rejects Ex-Judges' Amicus Brief In Guantanamo Case. The New York Times (12/30, Liptak, 1.16M) reports, "A divided panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which will soon decide an important case concerning detainees at Guantánamo Bay, rejected a friend-of-the-court brief submitted in the case by the retired judges. Two former chief judges of the court were among those rebuffed. … The unsigned majority decision, for Judges David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, said the brief violated a 1982 advisory opinion from a committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States, which is the administrative and policy-making body of the federal court system." However, "Judge Judith W. Rogers dissented," saying "the 1982 advisory opinion was meant to address situations in which former judges acting as lawyers are referred to by the honorific title 'Judge.'"

The Washington Times/AP (12/30) reports, "Seven federal judges from both political parties filed friend-of-the-court briefs in November urging the appeals court to declare key parts of the new law unconstitutional. They said the law, which sets up military commissions to hear terrorism cases, 'challenges the integrity of our judicial system' and effectively sanctions the use of torture." This AP story also appears in the Washington Post (12/30, A4, 690K).

WSJournal Pleased By Decision. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A10, 2.04M) editorializes, "Undeniably, former Judges Abner Mikva, Patricia Wald, Shirley Hufstedler, et al., are trying to throw the full weight of their former eminence against the new Gitmo detainee law passed by Congress this fall. … [F]orgive us for thinking that these amici expected their criticism of the new detainee law signed by President Bush to be seen, even admired, as the views of the magnificent seven, not the merely mortal thoughts of law professors. … We see little reason why that endless roster of former judges, ambassadors, generals and the like shouldn't approach the bench as do the rest of us. These seven should feel free to refile their opinions, as Mr., Ms., or whatever."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Proposed Port Security System Encounters Technology Snags. The New York Times (12/30, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "A Coast Guard plan to combat terrorism by creating the maritime equivalent of an air traffic control system in the coastal waters here, a test for a nationwide effort, has fallen far short of expectations." Initially tested in Miami's port, the system, which uses "long-range surveillance cameras, coastal radar and devices that automatically identify approaching vessels," has encountered difficulty: "[T]he radar, it turns out, confuses waves with boats. The cameras cover just a sliver of the harbor and coasts. And only a small fraction of vessels can be identified automatically." The Times adds, "A surveillance system similar to the one in Miami is supposed to be installed at as many as 35 ports. But given the challenges here, and the unwillingness of Congress to finance the still-unproven effort, the Coast Guard has delayed expanding the effort to other ports until at least 2014."

DOJ_NMG_0111549

Crews To Excavate World Trade Center Service Road For Remains. The New York Times (12/30, Dunlap, 1.16M) reports, "Most of the service road along the western edge of the World Trade Center site will be excavated as part of the expanded search for human remains at ground zero, the Bloomberg administration said yesterday. The overall effort — searching buildings, excavating the block where St. Nicholas Greek Orthodox Church stood, investigating 595 manholes and other underground structures — may cost as much as $30 million, Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler said in a memorandum yesterday to Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg. … Four remains were recovered yesterday from the haul road, said Ellen Borakove, a spokeswoman for the office of the chief medical examiner. They are regarded as potentially human, pending further testing."

The AP (12/29, Kugler) reports, "In a memo to Mayor Michael Bloomberg about the search for remains, Deputy Mayor Ed Skyler said debris believed to be from the towers had been dug up from under a service road on the site's western edge and said more of the road would be excavated. Crews sifting through the material have reported finding computer parts, office carpet, electrical wires and steel from the building." The AP adds, "The renewed search for remains began in October after utility crews found bones in an abandoned manhole that had been paved over and forgotten along the western edge of the site."

WAR NEWS:

Saddam Hussein Is Dead, Executed By Nation He Once Ruled. Saddam Hussein al-Majid al-Tikriti, for a quarter-century the dictator of the Republic of Iraq, onetime master of the world's fourth-largest army, and twice the wartime foe of US-led coalitions, was executed by hanging at approximately 6:05 a.m. Baghdad time this morning, or 10:05 p.m. EST Friday night. He was 69 years old.

While the execution took place far too late for the network news broadcasts to cover it, speculation on the event dominated all television media throughout the day and evening Friday. Hussein's death receives saturation coverage in today's newspapers, with many running lengthy obituaries and multiple analyses in addition to front-page reports on the ex-dictator's demise. Headlines run from the understated (the Washington Post's "Saddam Hussein Put To Death," for example) to the emphatic ("Saddam Pays At The End Of A Rope" in the Washington Times; "Saddam Swings" in the New York Daily News).

The Washington Post (12/30, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports Hussein "was hanged in the predawn hours of Saturday for crimes against humanity in the mass murder of Shiite men and boys in the 1980s, sent to the gallows by a government backed by the United States and led by Shiite Muslims who had been oppressed during his rule." In a statement, President Bush said Hussein "received 'the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime.' He added, 'Fair trials were unimaginable under Saddam Hussein's tyrannical rule. It is a testament to the Iraqi people's resolve to move forward after decades of oppression that, despite his terrible crimes against his own people, Saddam Hussein received a fair trial. This would not have been possible without the Iraqi people's determination to create a society governed by the rule of law.'" After the execution, "celebratory gunfire broke out in Baghdad," and "Iraqis across the nation sent text messages to their relatives and friends as soon as they heard" Hussein was dead. The AP (12/29) and CNN.com (12/30) also cover Bush's statement.

The New York Times (12/30, A1, Santora, Glanz, 1.16M) says the "dictator who led Iraq through three decades of brutality, war and bombast before American forces chased him from his capital city and captured him in a filthy pit near his hometown" was put to death "just before dawn Saturday during the morning call to prayer." The "final stages" for Hussein "came with terrible swiftness after he lost the appeal, five days ago, of his death sentence."

Fox News (12/29, Van Susteren) reported, "It's still dark there. Dawn hasn't broken in Baghdad, so many people haven't awakened to the news that their former president is dead." Fox News (MacDougall) added, "Right. When we spoke to you the other night, a few nights ago, it was about half an hour later than now, and it was already pretty light here. So dawn comes very quickly. We've already had the first call to prayer of the morning. And there was some speculation -- we were doing it ourselves through the night -- that, in fact, Saddam would be allowed to pray that one last time around 5:30, 5:35 in the morning, and then be taken off to the gallows."

While the execution came several hours after US network news broadcasts signed off Friday night, the lead-up to the event still received substantial coverage. Between them, ABC, CBS, and NBC devoted nearly 17 minutes to the story, and all three led with it. ABC World News (12/29, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) opened by saying, "It is such an extraordinary transition: Less than four years ago, he was the absolute ruler of Iraq, holding power by terror and brutality. And now, he's going to die a death at the end of a rope." ABC (McCarthy) said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, "who spent part of the day visiting relatives of some who died under Saddam, was not hiding his enthusiasm for the hanging." NBC Nightly News (12/29, lead story, 3:35, Brown, 9.87M) reported the execution would "truly mark the end of his violent and repressive reign, but by no means the end of violence in Iraq. US military forces are on a heightened state of alert, ready for whatever the reaction." The CBS Evening News (12/29, lead story, 2:35, Couric, 7.66M) led with a report as well.

DOJ_NMG_0111550

NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 2, 1:10, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush knows all about the plans for the execution of Saddam Hussein. Advisors describe it saying he was briefed about the entire process as a part of his intelligence briefing. They won't talk about timing or specifics, partly because they want it to be viewed as the work of the Iraqi government, and as an example Iraq is forming a new judicial system but US officials are braced for the possibility that Saddam's death could cause more violence. Advisors responded saying extremists would use any excuse."

Celebrations Break Out After News Of Execution Announced. CNN (12/29, Cooper) reported, "We want to show you the streets in the United States right now in Dearborn, Michigan, a heavily Muslim community, where you see people waving Iraqi flags. Large crowds have already gathered in the streets. The mood is celebratory. … Al Arabiya reporting that the execution took place at 10:05 Eastern Time in the United States, at five minutes past 6 a.m., just dawn in Baghdad." The Seattle Times (12/30, 118K) says in "Baghdad's Shiite enclave of Sadr City, people danced in the streets while others fired guns in the air."

The AP (12/30) reports "dozens of Iraqi-Americans gathered late Friday at a Detroit-area mosque to celebrate reports that Saddam Hussein had been executed, cheering and crying as drivers honked horns in jubilation." The San Francisco Chronicle (12/30, A9, Kuruvila, 384K) reports Iraqi émigrés in the San Francisco area said Hussein's death was "long overdue," while the St. Louis Post-Dispatch (12/30, O'Neil, Sultan, 297K) says Iraqi natives living in that city called the execution "a just punishment." However, the Los Angeles Times (12/30, Khalil, 850K) reports Iraq's "push to hang Hussein this morning, when much of the Muslim world was celebrating Eid, drew criticism from Islamic leaders in the Middle East and America."

CNN (12/29, Raman) reported, "We're hearing from a witness who was at the execution who has just told CNN after the execution of Saddam Hussein, there was dancing around his body. Shia chants, as well, were being spoken in celebratory fashion. This has been confirmed now, as well, from the office of Iraq's prime minister. One can only imagine the emotions within that room as Saddam Hussein was executed."

MSNBC.com (12/30) reports, "Witnesses to the execution told NBC News' Richard Engel that they were cheering around the body of Saddam after the execution. NBC could hear cheers and celebrations in the background while talking to an official in the prime minister's office. 'This son of a bitch is lying under my feet. … I can't talk now because of all the cheers!' a witness said."

Just after the execution was confirmed, Iraqi Deputy Representative to the UN Faisal Al-Israbadi said on CNN (12/29, Cooper), "It's a very solemn moment for me. I can understand why some of my compatriots may be cheering. I mean, I have friends who -- particular people that I can think of who have lost 10, 15, 20 members of their family and more. But for me, it's a moment really of remembrance of the victims of Saddam Hussein. I understand that the nature of the news, there has been a tremendous focus on Saddam himself today. … This is a man who history will record is responsible for the deaths of two million Iraqis."

BBC.com (12/30) and Bloomberg (12/30, Morales, Mathewson) also report on the execution; NPR's All Things Considered (12/29) ran a report on Hussein's death sentence that ran over nine minutes.

Hussein Reportedly Looked Fearful As Execution Approached. Newsweek (12/30, Hastings, 3.12M) reports on its web site that Ali Al Massedy, the videographer who filmed the execution, said of Hussein, "I saw fear, he was afraid. … He was saying things about injustice, about resistance, about how these guys are terrorists." Ali added that on the way to the gallows, "Saddam said, 'Iraq without me is nothing.'" CNN.com (12/30) reports Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie, another witness, said, "He was a broken man. He was afraid. You could see fear in his face." Rubaie said that Hussein "carried with him a copy of the Quran and asked that it be given to 'a certain person.' Rubaie did not identify that person."

Hussein Warned Iraqis "Not To Trust The Iranian Coalition." AFP (12/30) reports Hussein climbed the gallows "calmly" and offered "a last defiant warning." Judge Moneer Haddad, who witnessed the execution, said, "He said 'I hope you will be united, and I warn you not to trust the Iranian coalition, because they are dangerous'. He said he was not afraid of anyone." Hussein's "taunt will be interpreted as a sideswipe at Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's Shiite-led ruling coalition, which many Iraqi Sunnis accuse of being a front for Iranian influence."

Hussein's Death Does Not End Problems For Bush. The New York Times (12/30, Zeleny, 1.16M) says Hussein's

DOJ_NMG_0111551

December 2003 capture "was a jubilant moment for the White House, hailed by President Bush in a televised address from the Cabinet Room," but the execution "seemed hardly to inspire the same sentiment." Over the past three years, Hussein "has gradually faded from view, save for his courtroom outbursts and writings from prison. The growing chaos and violence in Iraq has steadily overshadowed the torturous rule of Mr. Hussein. … Now, what could have been a triumphal bookend to the American invasion of Iraq has instead been dampened by the grim reality of conditions on the ground there." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Richter, 850K) also days that while "many Iraqis and Americans have looked forward to the day when justice would catch up with Saddam Hussein," when it arrived, "it seemed to be much less than the historic turning point many once had anticipated. With Iraq beset by violence and turmoil, the dictator's demise no longer appeared to signal the beginning of new order."

The Chicago Tribune (12/30, Silva, 617K) runs an analysis headlined "Hussein's Death Does Not Alter Bush's Problems," saying the "hanging of the longtime Iraqi strongman does not alter the fundamental problems that Bush faces: Reclaiming public support in the U.S. for a war that a majority of Americans now oppose, and charting a convincing course for the victory that Bush vows to achieve before withdrawing U.S. forces."

Hussein attorney Najeeb Al Nuami appeared on Fox News (12/29, Van Susteren) immediately following reports that the execution had taken place. He said, "He was expected to be executed today as a gift for Mr. Bush and al Maliki, especially Mr. Bush. I hope he's happy now by this execution, but I think Saddam is winning party and Bush Administration are the losing party."

Western Diplomats Oppose Death Penalty But Respect Iraq's Decision. CNN.com (12/30) samples reactions around the world, focusing on the diplomatic response. British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said, "The British Government does not support the use of the death penalty, in Iraq or anywhere else. … We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation." The French Foreign Ministry said, "France, which like the rest of its European partners advocates the universal abolition of capital punishment, notes the execution of Saddam Hussein on Saturday. That decision was made by the people and the sovereign authorities of Iraq." Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said that while "Australia opposed the death penalty, Saddam had faced justice and a fair trial and had been found guilty of crimes against humanity. 'The people of Iraq now know that their brutal dictator will never come back to lead them.'"

Hussein Was Reportedly Issued "Red Card" Like Those He Once Dealt. The Financial Times (12/30, Sevastopulo, Negus) reports that before he was taken to the gallows, Hussein "was reportedly handed a 'red card' signaling his imminent death -- a reminder of the red cards dealt to those he had condemned to death during his time in power." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, A1, Hennessy-Fiske, Moore, 850K) says Hussein's death warrant "was signed today by the nation's two vice presidents and execution witnesses gathered in the heavily fortified Green Zone for the execution." Hussein "was dressed in a red jumpsuit…which has been the custom for death row prisoners in Iraq since before Hussein came to power." Defense lawyer Najib Naimi said, "He was writing his biography. But I don't think he had a chance to complete it."

News Reports Stress Hussein's Brutality. Many reports on the hanging bluntly comment on Hussein's brutality in their leads. The Washington Times (12/30, A1, Torchia, Abdul-Zahra, 88K) says Hussein "ruled Iraq with remorseless brutality for a quarter-century. … The man who came to a grim end at the end of a rope had vexed three U.S. presidents." The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/30, Youssef, 385K) calls Hussein a "dictator who terrorized a nation for nearly a quarter-century." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Daragahi, Lamb, 850K) says Hussein "ruled Iraq with ruthless force and led his people into three devastating wars while pursuing his goal of dominating the Arab world." Similarly, the Financial Times (12/30, Mallet) says Hussein "was responsible for bringing untold suffering to his country's people as he pursued a vain ambition to become the unchallenged leader of the Arab world." Gannett (12/30, Palmer) calls Hussein a "brutal dictator," while the Chicago Tribune (12/30, Madhani, 617K) calls him a "megalomaniac" who "earned the moniker Butcher of Baghdad by ruling with brute force, torture and cunning." The Boston Globe (12/30, Radin, 413K) says he was "ruthless in domestic affairs, reckless internationally, and flamboyant always." The New York Post (12/30, Lathem, Gittens, 631K) leads a story headlined "Saddam Is The King Of Swing" by saying "the Butcher of Baghdad is no more."

A Washington Post (12/30, A14, Partlow, 690K) report says the "autocratic Arab nationalist…led his nation into repeated wars." The man who "took power as a brutal young modernizer…cultivated a climate of fear in Iraq." The New York Times (12/30, Macfarquhar, 1.16M) calls Hussein a "defiant despot," saying the hanging "ended the life of one of the most brutal tyrants in recent history and negated the fiction that he himself maintained even as the gallows loomed -- that he remained president of Iraq." Another Washington Times (12/30, Behn, 88K) report says that "for those who met him, Saddam was both charming and intimidating, a ruthless ruler who had a vision of a modern, secular Arab nation." CNN.com (12/30) says Hussein's very name "conjures lengthy war, government autocracy and widespread cruelty," while BBC.com (12/30, Reynolds) states that he is "hated by many, mourned by few."

DOJ_NMG_0111552

Hussein Moved From Poverty To Power. Newspapers also chart Hussein's rise from obscurity and poverty to the height of power. The Dallas Morning News (12/30, 500K) says the "most defiant Arab leader of his generation…was raised in abject poverty by an uncle who hated the West. His rise to power marked an impressive triumph over adversity. He was born in the dusty village of Tikrit, seemingly fated to a life of depravation." Newsday (12/30, Bazzi) says he "rose to power on a wave of nationalist, revolutionary sentiment sweeping the Middle East. … In a region filled with U.S.-allied dictators, many Arabs admired Hussein's willingness to challenge the world's sole superpower and his support for the Palestinians in their struggle with Israel." The Financial Times (12/30, Negus) runs a timeline of Hussein's life.

US Television Networks Played "Tense Waiting Game." The AP (12/29, Elber) says television networks "played a tense waiting game Friday as they ticked off the final hours of Saddam Hussein's life, replaying scenes from the former Iraqi dictator's reign as they waited for his death." The event itself "ended a day of TV reporting fraught with uncertainty and speculation about whether his execution was imminent." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Brownfield, 850K) reports networks "used the prospect of footage to create an all-day 'Dead Man Walking' scenario, as day became night became the morning call for prayer in Baghdad."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (12/30, Carter, 1.16M) reports that while they waited, television news executives debated "how to handle any images of his execution that might be released." While there was "some question as to whether any video images would be issued, the network news divisions at ABC and CBS said that should the video become available, some visual documentation of Mr. Hussein's death might be broadcast, but no overly graphic images, and certainly not the complete execution. NBC News, however, indicated it might go further than its competitors. Steve Capus, the president of NBC News, said the network might show 'a wide shot of Saddam hanging.'"

US, Iraqi Officials Consider What To Do With Hussein's Body. The New York Times (12/30, Santora, 1.16M) reports that while the execution was "swift and unambiguous, it was much less clear on Saturday what would be done with his body. Privately, both American and Iraqi officials say that the subject has been raised at the highest levels, but no decisions have been made." The "most discussed options include sending his body out of the country to his family in Jordan, where two of his daughters live; burying him in a secret location never to be made public; burying him in a secret location but, after a period of time, having him disinterred and sent to his family or tribe; or sending him immediately to his hometown of Tikrit to be buried with members of his tribe." A "top Sunni politician even raised the prospect of holding a state funeral for Mr. Hussein. That idea, a Western official said, had very little chance of becoming reality."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, 850K) editorializes, "Once upon a time, the death of Saddam Hussein would have been an epochal event for Iraq, the Middle East and the world. Now there is some question whether it will even matter in Baghdad." But "no one really expects Hussein's execution…to change much in Iraq. … Nor can Hussein's death be expected to be much of a factor in Washington. Some will claim that it vindicates one of the original purposes of the war. But President Bush's deliberations about the 'way forward' in Iraq will continue apace, as will debate about troop levels, diplomatic overtures and other strategies to allow the U.S. to leave Iraq but continue the war against terrorism. The curious irrelevance of Hussein to today's Iraq could hardly have been predicted five years ago. It would be a mistake, however, to forget his terrible relevance to Iraq's history."

In a Los Angeles Times (12/30, 850K) op-ed, commentator Andrew Cockburn writes that while Hussein's death "seems certain to boost sectarian bloodletting between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq, he always posed as an Iraqi and Arab nationalist who could unite the rivalrous sects in his country -- an attribute that initially recommended him to Washington." Hussein "was for a period the prime example of the traditional U.S. means of control in the Middle East: quiet support for a repressive leader respectful of U.S. interests. That approach has now apparently been replaced by one that induces civil discord and breakdown (deliberately or otherwise), as evidenced by recent events in Iraq, Lebanon and Afghanistan. In his final hours, Saddam Hussein may have derived some satisfaction from the unpleasant surprises this change has produced for his former friends in Washington."

In a New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) op-ed, Najmaldin Karim writes, "My personal battle with Saddam Hussein -- which began in 1972 when I abandoned my medical career in Mosul, Iraq, and joined the Kurdish armed resistance -- is at an end. To execute such a criminal, a man who reveled in his atrocities, is an act of justice. The only issue for me is the timing -- executing him now is both too late and too early. Too late, because had Saddam Hussein been removed from the scene many years ago, many lives would have been saved. Killing Saddam now, however, for ordering the massacre at Dujail in 1982, means that he will not face justice for his greatest crimes."

Troops Braced For Post-Execution Violence In Iraq. ABC World News (12/29, story 2, 2:30, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "US forces are on high alert tonight. It's not that Saddam Hussein means much to insurgents anymore. Most experts say he doesn't. But officials fear his execution may be used as excuse for more attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0111553

The AP (12/30, Baldor) reports, "The Pentagon said Friday that U.S. forces in Iraq are ready for any escalation of violence" associated with the execution of Saddam Hussein. DOD spokesman Bryan Whitman "wouldn't comment on troop movements to strengthen security for the execution, but he said the commanders in Iraq have the ability to move forces as they deem appropriate based on conditions on the ground."

Batiste, Reed Doubt Explosion Of Violence Likely. The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 3, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) interviewed Gen. John Batiste, "a former commander of the US Army's 1st Infantry Division in Iraq, including Saddam's hometown of Tikrit," who "retired last year and then criticized the Pentagon's conduct of the war." Batiste said, "I'm not sure that his execution…will cause more violence in Iraq. But I think we can say with certainty that we won't see a decrease in violence until we have a couple of things happen. One is a unified United States strategy that fully employs all elements of our national power on all four cylinders. And the second would be the people of Iraq embrace change in their future together.

Sen. Jack Reed said on Fox News (12/29, Scott), "There's the possibility of a backlash, but, frankly, the situation of today with or without Saddam's execution has placed American forces in significant danger and significant proximity to violence. ... I think, at this juncture, Saddam is no longer a pivotal figure in Iraqi political life, and I think this will not cause a huge tipping point."

Iraq's Diversity Of Warring Groups Noted. In an analysis for UPI (12/29), Afghanistan veteran Lawrence Sellin writes, "If the situation in Iraq can be salvaged, it will not be done with troop surges alone or a single all-inclusive strategy applied uniformly across the country, but through the cumulative effect of a hundreds of tailored efforts, funded and executed bottom-up, city by city and region by region. ... The influence of Iraqi tribalism and the need to balance or leverage the differences between sub-groups in the ongoing stability and counterinsurgency operations in Iraq may still be underestimated. It is the product of lazy thinking to simply pigeon-hole Iraqis as Shiite, Sunni or Kurd."

December Is Deadliest Month Of 2006 For US Troops In Iraq. The AP (12/30, Frayer) reports, "Three more Marines and a soldier were killed in battle in Iraq, the military said Friday, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops with the toll reaching 108. The Marines, all assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5, died Thursday of wounds from fighting in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said. The soldier was killed in Karmah Thursday by small arms fire. ... Their deaths pushed the toll past the 105 U.S. service members killed in October. At least 2,997 members of the U.S. military have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an AP count." The AP adds about the civilian death toll, "Through Thursday, at least 2,139 Iraqis have been killed in war- related or sectarian violence, an average rate of about 76 people a day, according to an AP count." The Washington Post (12/30, A13, 690K) carries an abbreviated version of this article.

The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Moore, 850K) reports, "The Marine deaths reported Friday brought the number of U.S. military fatalities in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion to 2,996, icasualties.org said, with 816 of them occurring this year. Last year, 846 American service members died; in 2004, the figure was 848.

Pentagon Reviews Surge Plans. The AP (12/30, Baldor) reports, "Extending U.S. military units already in Iraq and moving troops from other locations, including Kuwait, are among options Pentagon planners are looking at if President Bush calls for an increase in troops on the battlefront. ... The most immediate and likely move would be to shift the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division from Kuwait — where it is expected to deploy early next month — into Iraq, said the officials, who requested anonymity because no decisions have been made. ... Another much-discussed option would be extending Marine units already in Iraq. ... A surge in troops would probably be coupled with other political and economic changes. While in Iraq last week, Defense Secretary Robert Gates talked about the importance of rebuilding neighborhoods and other Iraqi facilities more quickly in regions that had been cleared by troops and deemed secure."

Pentagon To Request "Annual Record" In War Spending. The New York Times (12/30, Cloud, 1.16M) reports in a critical article, "The Pentagon is seeking nearly $100 billion for operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, a request that, if approved by Congress, would set an annual record for war-related spending. ... The request would push the total for the 2007 fiscal year to nearly $170 billion, 45 percent more than Congress provided for 2006. ... some experts questioned whether the services were exploiting the must-pass nature of the supplemental bill to seek money for other purposes like the modernization of aircraft rather than just wartime replacements."

Pentagon Creates New Office To Oversee Contractors. UPI (12/29) reports the Defense Department "has created a new office to oversee major service contracts. The office will monitor contracts such as the $15 billion Halliburton one in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0111554

Iranians' Detention, Expulsion Said To Worsen US-Iraqi Relations. The New York Times (12/30, Tavernise, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "Under heavy American pressure, the Iraqi government ordered two Iranians who had been detained in an American military raid to leave the country, Iraqi officials said Friday, ending a bitter, nine-day political standoff." The Times says "the detention brought the increasingly strained relationship between the Iraqis who run this country and their American backers to one of its lowest ebbs." While Iraqi authorities "said Friday that it was clear that the men … had not been entirely forthcoming about what they were doing in Iraq," they "believed that the evidence against the men was mostly circumstantial and not as damning as the Americans had portrayed." The Times adds that "episode" has "deeply upset many Iraqi officials, who had been carefully building relations with Iran," and "demonstrated the deepening fissures between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and the United States."

The Washington Post (12/30, Raghavan, Wright, 690K) reports that the Iraqi decision "has angered U.S. military officials who say the operatives were seeking to foment instability here. ... Despite their frustration at the release of the Iranians, U.S. officials said a strong message has been sent to Iran that its operatives will be tracked down and that it will be held accountable for its activities in Iraq." The Post describes the alleged evidence against the men in more detail than does the Times, saying, "One of the commanders, identified by officials simply as Chizari, was the third-highest-ranking official of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards' al-Quds Brigade ... U.S. defense officials familiar with the raids said the captured Iranians had detailed weapons lists, documents pertaining to shipments of weapons into Iraq, organizational charts, telephone records and maps, among other sensitive intelligence information. Officials were particularly concerned by the fact that the Iranians had information about importing modern, specially shaped explosive charges," used in roadside bombs.

The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Moore, 850K) reports, "The military seized documents, maps, photographs and videos linking the two Iranians to illegal weapons shipments to armed groups in Iraq, Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said this week."

Poll Finds Plurality Of Troops Disapprove Of Bush's War Policy. In a piece for the AP (12/30), Military Times writer Robert Hodierne writes, "The American military, once a staunch supporter of President Bush and the Iraq war, has grown increasingly pessimistic about chances for victory. For the first time, more troops disapprove of the president's handling of the war than approve of it, according to the 2006 Military Times Poll. ... Only 35% of the military members polled this year said they approve of the way Bush is handling the war, and 42% said they disapprove. While approval of the president's war leadership has slumped, his overall approval remains high among the military. Just as telling, in this year's poll only 41% of the military said the U.S. should have gone to war in Iraq in the first place, down from 65% in 2003."

Kennedy Urges More Help For Iraqi Refugees. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/30, A21, 690K), Sen. Edward Kennedy writes, "Last year…America accepted only 202 Iraqi refugees, and next year we plan to accept approximately the same number. We and other nations of the world need to do far better. ... We need to do much more to help Iraqi refugees, especially those who have helped our troops. Our nation is spending $8 billion a month to wage the war in Iraq. Yet to meet the urgent humanitarian needs of the refugees who have fled the war, the State Department plans to spend only $20 million in the current fiscal year." Kennedy adds, "An essential first step could be to hold an international conference on the issue -- ideally sponsored by the countries in the region and the United Nations -- to begin to deal with the growing number and needs of Iraqi refugees and internally displaced persons. The United States should participate in the conference and provide substantial support for the refugees. Doing so would encourage other nations to address the crisis, help the refugees and displaced persons, and assist the countries shouldering the greatest burden."

Taliban Commander Vows Continued War Against US, Allies. The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 6, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Five years after US forces drove the Taliban into the mountains of Afghanistan, they're back on the attack and some say more dangerous than ever. Today their leader, Mullah Omar, vowed once again to force the US out of Afghanistan. And an even more ominous warning tonight from another Taliban terrorist in hiding." CBS (Logan): "He is the Taliban's most bloodthirsty commander, Mullah Dadullah. And there are few people in the world the US wants to capture more than him, seen here in an exclusive interview. … The one-legged leader promises to go beyond the battlefields of Afghanistan and hunt Americans down at home. 'Even if they go back to America, we will have to take revenge,' he said. 'America has humiliated our country and our people. We will never negotiate.' Mullah Dadullah is the military mastermind behind the bloodiest year ever for US forces in Afghanistan. His ultimate goal: to overthrow Afghanistan's pro-American government. And in spite of heavy casualties inflicted by US and NATO forces, Dadullah claims the Taliban's success has led to a surge in morale and strength in recent months."

DOJ_NMG_0111555

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Report Clears Jobs Of Options Wrongdoing. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A1, Wingfield, Stecklow, Forelle) reports, "Apple Computer Inc. acknowledged that it backdated stock options and that Steve Jobs recommended 'favorable' dates for some options awards. But the company said he was absolved of misconduct by a special internal investigation." The Journal continues, "Although the investigation found that CEO Steve Jobs was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates, he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications. The Special Committee also found that the investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants." The Journal adds, "The approval for the grant was improperly recorded as occurring at a special Board meeting on October 19, 2001. Such a special Board meeting did not occur. There was no evidence, however, that any current member of management was aware of this irregularity. Read more2. … Directors and others close to the Apple probe defended Mr. Jobs, the company's iconic chief executive, even as it detailed his part in a widespread pattern of options irregularities between 1997 and 2002. But Mr. Jobs and Apple, still under federal scrutiny as part of a broad investigation of options backdating, are not yet out of the woods."

The Financial Times (12/30, Waters) reports, "News that the Apple chief executive had been more directly involved in the options irregularities than previously disclosed came as the company admitted that a fictitious board meeting had supposedly approved some of Mr Jobs' own stock options in 2001. The affair, reported earlier this week in the FT, led to Mr Jobs receiving benefits worth $20m that were not disclosed at the time, Apple reported." The Times adds, "Apple said it had understated its expenses in previous years by a total of $105m, reflecting 6,428 separate options grants made on 42 dates. Backdating involves setting the exercise price on stock options at an earlier date. … While Apple revealed in a regulatory filing in October that Mr Jobs had been aware of some of these cases, it amended that on Friday to say that he had been 'aware or recommended the selection of some favourable grant dates'. … Friday's statement that Mr Jobs did not 'appreciate the accounting implications' of the options backdating, was also a change from its assertion in October that he was 'unaware of the accounting implications'. It added he did not 'financially benefit' from backdated grants of which he was aware, a change from its earlier statement stating he did not 'benefit'."

The Washington Post (12/30, A1, Sipress, Johnson) reports, "Apple's board, which includes former vice president Al Gore, gave Jobs its full support. 'The board of directors is confident that the Company has corrected the problems that led to the restatement, and it has complete confidence in Steve Jobs and the senior management team,' said the statement by Gore and Jerome York, who heads Apple's audit and finance committee." The Post adds, "Wall Street also rallied around Jobs, who is more closely identified with and central to the success of his company than any other executive at a major technology firm. The stock rose nearly 5 percent, and many industry analysts said investors could return their attention to Apple's sound fundamentals, which include strong sales of iPods and Macintosh computers. … But white-collar crime experts said the action may signal more serious issues. … 'The acknowledgment of greater involvement by Mr. Jobs than previously disclosed can only cause the government to use an even finer toothed comb in its own review of Mr. Jobs's conduct,' Washington defense lawyer Barry Pollack said. 'The government may ultimately come to share the company's conclusion that Mr. Jobs was unaware that the options were not properly handled, but not before putting him under their own magnifying glass.'"

The New York Times (12/30, Markoff, Dash) reports, "In its summary of the findings of a six-month internal investigation, Apple said it had found that 6,428 option grants, or 15 percent of the 42,000 options it awarded, had been improperly dated from 1997 to 2002. Those included grants made on 42 separate dates to senior executives, new hires and ordinary employees. … Investigators, led by a committee of outside directors and the law firm Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges, raised 'serious questions' about the actions of two former company officers who were involved in the accounting and reporting of stock options, Apple said. But they absolved Mr. Jobs by concluding that there had been "no misconduct" by Apple's current management team." The Times adds, "The report did offer a subtle shift in Apple's description of Mr. Jobs's role in the option process. In October the company said that Mr. Jobs was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected, but that he did not benefit from those grants and was unaware of the accounting implications. But in the report issued Friday, Apple acknowledged that Mr. Jobs 'was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates.'"

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/30, Page A - 1, Guynn) reports, "Despite the exoneration, uncertainty remains for Jobs, the chief executive officer, and the company. Apple noted that it had informed the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Attorney's Office of the results of its probe. Federal authorities are presumed to be weighing whether to take action against the company or any individuals. The SEC and the U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment on the matter." The Chronicle adds,

DOJ_NMG_0111556

"Legal and corporate governance experts say federal authorities won't necessarily be swayed by the company's findings or by Jobs' prominence. … 'There is going to be a continuing level of uncertainty surrounding the company until or unless Jobs is exonerated by the SEC and others looking at this issue,' said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises investors on corporate governance issues. 'This was a major hurdle that the company has cleared for now, but it still has some obstacles in the road in front of it before it can put these issues behind it once and for all.'"

MetLife Unit Settles New York Commission Probe For $19 Million. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, B4, Bray, Kuykendall) reports, "MetLife Inc.'s life-insurance unit agreed to pay $19 million to settle allegations stemming from a New York state probe into the insurer's use of contingent commissions, which are offered by insurers to brokers who steer clients toward their company." The Journal continues, "The New York insurer agreed to pay $16.5 million in restitution to policyholders and $2.5 million in civil penalties, according to the state attorney general's office. MetLife will adopt a compensation structure that eliminates the payment of contingent commissions to its brokers for life, disability and group products, said Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who will be inaugurated governor Monday. It will provide full disclosure of broker compensation to employers at every stage of the insurance purchasing and renewal process, he said." The Journal adds, "Mr. Spitzer has said that contingent commissions are little more than kickbacks to insurance agents and brokers who send business to the insurers and that the hidden costs have driven up insurance prices. The attorney general alleged in part that MetLife instructed its sales personnel to "leverage" override agreements with its brokers by informing those brokers how close they were to meeting certain targets for business provided to MetLife. Those targets would trigger additional compensation to the brokers. … The settlement makes MetLife at least the seventh insurer to pay a fine in Mr. Spitzer's two-year-old investigation into how insurers compensate brokers that bring them business. Earlier agreements involved Prudential Financial Inc., UnumProvident Corp., American International Group Inc., St. Paul Travelers Cos., Zurich Financial Services' Zurich American Insurance Co., and most recently Chubb Corp."

Wachovia Fund To Settle Civil Allegations. The Wall Street Journal/AP (12/30, B4) reports, "Evergreen Investments, the mutual-fund arm of Wachovia Corp., will pay a $4.2 million civil penalty to settle allegations that it violated rules involving the sale of its funds through brokers." The AP continues, "Under the agreement with the NASD, formerly known as the National Association of Securities Dealers, Wachovia neither admitted nor denied the allegations. Evergreen Chief Executive Dennis Ferro wrote to investors that it was in the interest of the company and its investors 'to resolve these matters and move forward.'" The AP adds, "The agreement said Evergreen had a revenue-sharing arrangement with brokerage affiliate Wachovia Securities from 2001 to 2003, and directed to Wachovia Securities $25.7 million in commissions generated from trades in Evergreen's investment portfolio. The sum was tied to the amount of Evergreen funds sold by Wachovia Securities. … Evergreen also sponsored a sales-recognition program for Wachovia Securities representatives who sold Evergreen funds during the same period. The 'Medallion Club,' as it was called, treated brokers to meetings at luxury resorts if they sold a certain amount of Evergreen funds. NASD rules prohibit the direction of brokerage commissions to another firm and noncash compensation for selling mutual funds."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Alleges 96-Year-Old Man Is An Active Mafia Figure. The USA Today/AP (12/30, Anderson) reports, "Lucky Luciano, Meyer Lansky and Carlo Gambino are long gone. Murder Inc. is out of business. Las Vegas has been so cleaned up it resembles Disneyland. And Havana? Forget about it ever since Castro took over. But Albert 'Chinky' Facchiano, at 96, is still standing. And like Michael Corleone in The Godfather III, he is still very much involved in the family business, the FBI says. At an age when most people are long retired and happy just to be alive, the reputed mobster was indicted earlier this year in Florida and New York. He is accused, among other things, of trying to intimidate and possibly kill a witness against the powerful the Genovese family of New York in 2005. He is also accused of helping to run the rackets in Florida. … Facchiano, born in 1910, has been a 'made member' of the nation's largest and most powerful Mafia family for decades, but was a low-level figure, rising no higher than soldier, according to the FBI. His nickname is apparently a play on his last name.

Police Seek Clues In Two Virginia Attacks. The Washington Post (12/30, B1, Miroff) reports, "Fairfax County police said yesterday that they are investigating whether a Christmas Eve attack on a 62-year-old Springfield woman is related to the slayings of two elderly women in the area in the past five months." The Post continues, "Few details have been released about the incident Sunday, when a man forced his way into a home and stabbed a woman on the arm before fleeing. Police said the attack occurred less than two miles from the home where 74-year-old Marion J. Newman was robbed and beaten to death Nov. 21. … Police believe Newman's assailant also killed Marion B. Marshall, 72, in her home Aug. 14, two miles from Newman's home. Both women suffered blunt-force trauma injuries to the upper body." The Post adds, "The number of investigators and crime prevention officers working full time on the case has grown to 18, and police have developed a 'humongous' e-mail list to keep Springfield residents informed, said Lt. Richard J. Perez, a police spokesman. Fliers in English and Spanish are posted in the neighborhoods where the women were killed, and a $26,000 reward has been offered by the victims' families. … The slayings, and an increase in burglaries in some neighborhoods, are contributing to a climate of fear and frustration, some residents said. … Police believe that the slayings were crimes of opportunity, committed by someone with ties to the community who happened to see each woman alone and attacked her. There was no indication that the women knew each other, and Newman's diamond ring was the only item known to be stolen from either home."

DOJ_NMG_0111557

NYTimes Argues Against Banishing Sexual Predators. The New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) editorializes, "Of all the places that sexual predators could end up after prison, the worst is out of sight, away from the scrutiny and treatment that could prevent them from committing new crimes. But communities around the country are taking that risk, with zoning laws that banish pedophiles to the literal edges of society. … As the areas off limits to sex offenders expand to encompass entire towns and cities, if not states, the places where they can live and work are shrinking fast. The unintended consequence is that offenders have been dispersed to rural nowhere zones, where they are much harder to track. In confined regions like Long Island, they have become concentrated in a handful of low-rent, few-questions-asked areas -- an unintended and unfair imposition on their wary neighbors."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Sues Over Alleged Small Business Fun Fraud. The Boston Globe/AP (12/30, Dale) reports, "Three investors, including a Connecticut attorney, are accused of defrauding a government program for small businesses out of $32 million, according to a lawsuit filed Friday by the U.S. Justice Department." The AP continues, "The government accuses the three defendants of cutting secret deals to hide their ownership stakes in a venture that received Small Business Administration funds. … The suit names Glastonbury-based attorney Daniel Beharry; John Torkelsen, who is in prison after pleading guilty to defrauding the agency; and Richard D. Propper, a physician from LaJolla, Calif. … They are accused of violating the False Claims Act, which allows the U.S. to seek treble damages plus penalties." The AP adds, "According to the lawsuit, the three defrauded the SBA's Small Business Investment Co. program by failing to disclose conflicts of interest and awarding themselves improper management fees. … Government lawyers say Torkelsen submitted an application for a firm called the Acorn Technology Fund, stating that he owned it with two other men. However, the application did not disclose that Acorn was also funded and controlled in part by Propper and Beharry, the suit states."

Bloomberg (12/30) reports, "The department said the alleged fraud is the biggest ever perpetrated against the U.S.' Small Business Investment Company Program, which gives small private fund managers equity capital and long-term loans to invest in developing companies. Also named in the suit were Richard Propper, a California investor, and Daniel Beharry, a Connecticut lawyer." Bloomberg continues, "The Acorn fund received $32 million from the small-business program. According to the suit, Torkelsen and the other two investors engaged in multiple secret transactions that hid their ownership and control of companies that the fund invested in, contrary to U.S. rules against self-dealing. … Main Street Bank, prior to its acquisition by Sovereign, provided 'false and misleading' information to the Small Business Administration on a form confirming the Acorn fund's account balances, according to court papers. Sovereign, based in Philadelphia, acquired Main Street Bancorp Inc. in 2002."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/30, Fernandez) reports, "Sovereign spokesman Ed Shultz said the transactions related to the case were made before Sovereign acquired Main Street Bank in 2002. 'There were no Sovereign employees involved,' he said." The Inquirer adds, "The suit was filed in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania under the False Claims Act, and seeks to have the defendents repay money fraudulently obtained from the SBA. The government has said the fraud was the largest in history in its Small Business Investment Company program, which attempts to seed small companies with money. … The suit is the latest legal action against Torkelsen, who has already pleaded guilty to making false statements to the SBA, and his Acorn Technology Fund L.P. in Bucks County, which received SBA money. … The complaint alleges that Torkelsen recruited Propper and Beharry as investors into the Acorn Technology Fund without telling the government, in violation of SBA rules."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Asked To Probe Duke Lacrosse Prosecution. The Raleigh (NC) News & Observer (12/30) reports, "The latest flurry of news in the Duke lacrosse case prompted some concerned citizens to register a complaint with the U.S. Department of Justice on Friday, according to community activist Victoria Peterson, who said she helped pen the complaint with other, unnamed residents. … Officials with the Justice Department could not confirm Friday whether they had yet received the complaint." The N&O continues, "A statement distributed by Peterson alleges that the accuser's civil rights were violated when lacrosse players tossed racial epithets at her and another exotic dancer the night of the alleged assault. The complaint also contends that officials at Duke University have failed to prosecute several rapes reported on campus. … Peterson, an unsuccessful City Council candidate and political organizer, has been speaking publicly about the racial and political subtexts of the case since the allegations surfaced in March."

DOJ_NMG_0111558

6th Circuit Backs Michigan Affirmative Action Ban. The Washington Post (12/30, A11, Martin, 690K) reports, "A federal appeals court ruled Friday that three Michigan universities should not have been given a six-month extension to comply with parts of a new state law banning some public affirmative action programs. Michigan voters in November approved Proposal 2, which bans the use of race and gender preferences in university admissions and in government hiring and contracting. The measure took effect Dec. 23, but U.S. District Judge David M. Lawson earlier this month provided an exception for admissions and financial aid decisions for incoming classes at the University of Michigan, Michigan State University and Wayne State University. A three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit said federal law does not warrant providing an exception. Although Lawson allowed the schools until July 1 to comply with Proposal 2, the appellate ruling means they will be expected to comply immediately."

Ford's Support For Affirmative Action Noted. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) Jeffrey Toobin, staff writer at The New Yorker and legal analyst for CNN, writes, "Gerald R. Ford kept his distance from political controversy after leaving office, but he retained a special interest in the workings of his alma mater. In 1999, the 86-year-old former varsity football star decided to make a public stand in support of affirmative action at the University of Michigan. He wrote an Op-Ed article on this page titled 'Inclusive America, Under Attack.' A pair of pending lawsuits, Mr. Ford wrote, would prohibit Michigan and other universities 'from even considering race as one of many factors weighed by admission counselors.' Such a move would condemn 'future college students to suffer the cultural and social impoverishment that afflicted my generation.'"

ANTITRUST:

FCC Approves AT&T-BellSouth Deal After Seven-Month Impasse. The Washington Post (12/30, Sipress, Goo, 690K) reports on its front page that the FCC "yesterday overcame a seven-month deadlock and approved AT&T's $85 billion purchase of BellSouth, creating a new corporate giant that will stand astride the telecommunications industry like none other in the generation since the old AT&T empire was broken up in 1984." The new AT&T, "unequaled in capital and geographic reach," could be a "tough adversary for cable companies by offering television service over the Internet, possibly lowering rates for customers in its service area." The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A3, Sharma, Boles, 2.04M), which does not put the story on its front page, says the FCC "approved the deal, the largest ever in U.S. telecommunications history, by a unanimous 4-0 vote, after AT&T offered a series of major concessions to pacify consumer groups and regulators."

The Chicago Tribune (12/30, Van) reports, "A compromise proposed by AT&T Inc. to win federal approval of its $85 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. signals how much the impending takeover of Congress by Democrats has shifted telecom's regulatory landscape." The Tribune continues, "The Federal Communications Commission approved the acquisition Friday upon reviewing the proposal submitted Thursday night by AT&T. The companies closed the deal Friday after winning the FCC's OK. … After opposing restrictions on its ability to prioritize Internet traffic it carries, AT&T agreed to 'maintain neutral network and neutral routing in its wireline broadband Internet access service' for two years." The Tribune adds, "The concept of preserving 'net neutrality' has been the paramount telecom issue for consumer advocates all year. … While specific Internet traffic abuses have been rare, activists fear that the economic interests of big telecom and cable companies that own Internet infrastructure will compel them to discriminate against smaller competitors whose Internet-based voice and video services undermine the cash cows operated by the giants. … For their part, large telecom carriers contend that they need flexibility to manage the trillions of bits and bytes that flow across their lines daily. Government restrictions intended to ward off potential anti-competitive moves could stifle technologic innovation, say executives at big telecom concerns."

NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 7, 0:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On this last business day of the year, the federal government cleared the way for the biggest merger ever in the telecommunications industry. … AT&T had to make several major concessions to allow the deal to go through." The Financial Times (12/30, Taylor, Kirchgaessner) said the concessions "are seen as a significant climbdown by AT&T. It had wanted to complete the merger before the end of this year, but had been frustrated by the FCC." The New York Times (12/30, Bajaj, 1.16M) also reports on the approval.

LATimes Lauds AT&T's "Welcome Concession" On Net Neutrality. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, 850K)

DOJ_NMG_0111559

editorializes, "AT&T made a welcome concession to federal regulators this week that could help preserve the Internet's role as an engine for innovation and competition." The "reconstituted Ma Bell agreed Thursday to not offer for two years 'any service that privileges, degrades or prioritizes' any data transmitted over its broadband network. In other words, AT&T guaranteed what has come to be known as 'Net neutrality' — giving websites and services equal access to Internet users. The only exceptions are for AT&T's new TV service and the managed networks it sells to businesses."

Financial Services Firms Avail Themselves Of Patent Protections. The Financial Times (12/30, Wighton) reports, "The number of US patents issued for financial services has soared this year as banks have rushed to take advantage of a protection once seen as the preserve of technology and drug companies. Patents issued in the main US financial services category had risen more than threefold to 238 by the end of last week, with General Electric's finance arms heading the field with 11. Many financial companies have stepped up efforts to protect intellectual property in recent years. Innovations that would not have been tried previously are being pursued because they can now be patented."

ENVIRONMENT:

DOJ Investigating Interior Official Over Oil Royalties. The New York Times (12/30, Andrews, 1.16M) reports the Justice Department "is investigating whether the director of a multibillion-dollar oil-trading program at the Interior Department has been paid as a consultant for oil companies hoping for contracts. The director of the program and three subordinates, all based in Denver, have been transferred to different jobs and have been ordered to cease all contacts with the oil industry until the investigation is completed some time next spring, according to officials involved. … If the allegations prove correct, they would constitute a major new blot on the Interior Department's much-criticized effort to properly collect royalties on vast amounts of oil and gas produced on land or in coastal waters. The Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which oversees royalty collections, is now the target of multiple investigations by Congress and the Interior Department's inspector general." According to the Times, "At issue is the 'royalty in kind' program, a fast-growing program under which companies pay their royalties in the form oil or gas rather than in the traditional form of cash. … The most prominent figure in the inquiry is Gregory W. Smith, who was director of the royalty-in-kind program at the Minerals Management Service in Denver."

Woolsey Encourages Development Of "Plug-In" Hybrid Autos. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (12/30, A10, 2.04M) former CIA Director James Woolsey writes, "If hybrid gasoline-electric cars are provided with advanced batteries (GM's announcement said its choice would be lithium-ion) having improved energy and power density -- variants of the ones in our computers and cell phones -- dozens of vehicle prototypes are now demonstrating that these 'plug-in hybrids' can more than double hybrids' overall (gasoline) mileage. With a plug-in, charging your car overnight from an ordinary 110-volt socket in your garage lets you drive 20 miles or more on the electricity stored in the topped-up battery before the car lapses into its normal hybrid mode. If you forget to charge or exceed 20 miles, no problem, you then just have a regular hybrid with the insurance of liquid fuel in the tank. And during those 20 all-electric miles you will be driving at a cost of between a penny and three cents a mile instead of the current 10-cent-a-mile cost of gasoline."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI And Coast Guard Reportedly Contested Responsibility For Hijacked Ferry During Drill. The New York Times (12/30, Lipton) reported, "A Coast Guard plan to combat terrorism by creating the maritime equivalent of an air traffic control system in the coastal waters here, a test for a nationwide effort, has fallen far short of expectations. The Coast Guard installed long-range surveillance cameras, coastal radar and devices that automatically identify approaching vessels to help search out possible threats. But the radar, it turns out, confuses waves with boats. The cameras cover just a sliver of the harbor and coasts. And only a small fraction of vessels can be identified automatically. Officials acknowledge the limited progress that the Department of Homeland Security and the Coast Guard have made toward creating a viable defense here in Miami or at harbors nationwide against a maritime attack, despite the billions of dollars invested in port security since 2001." The Times goes on to report, "The Coast Guard is also still struggling to settle on an approach to gather all the data it and other federal agencies collect about potential maritime threats globally and nationally. But the commitment to work together has not always been honored by all the federal agencies. During a drill in which officials pretended that a ferry had been hijacked by terrorists, the Coast Guard and the Federal Bureau of Investigation competed for the right to take charge, a contest that became so intense that the Coast Guard players manipulated the war game to cut the F.B.I. out, government auditors say. 'Unless such differences over roles and authorities are resolved,' a Justice Department report issued this year said, 'the response to a maritime incident could be confused and potentially disastrous.'"

DOJ_NMG_0111560

Nixon-Ford Tapes' Release Revives Controversy Over FBI Surveillance. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/30, Alpert) reports, "It must have seemed peculiar on that April day 35 years ago when Rep. Hale Boggs took to the floor of the House of Representatives and accused the FBI of spying on the government it was supposed to protect. History would prove that Boggs, a congressman from New Orleans and the House's second-most-powerful Democrat, was right about the extent of the FBI's secret surveillance. But on April 6, 1971, Boggs' comments drew a different reaction from President Nixon and his successor, Gerald Ford: They thought Boggs must have been drinking. Transcripts of the taped conversations between Nixon and then-House Minority Leader Ford resurfaced after Ford's death Tuesday. The Washington Post published a piece Friday by journalist Bob Woodward based on interviews with Ford about the friendship between Nixon and the man to whom he would hand the presidency. Nixon recorded his office conversations and Woodward drew on transcripts to show how the two men regularly engaged in political gossip. Lindy Boggs, who went on to win election to her husband's New Orleans House seat after he was killed in a 1972 plane crash, said that while Nixon and Ford might have had their doubts, her husband knew exactly what he was talking about when he made his surprising allegations of FBI abuses under Director J. Edgar Hoover. … Lindy Boggs, 90, said that a surveillance truck was regularly positioned near the Boggs' family home shortly before her husband leveled his criticism and that she had been told that the FBI was recording their phone conversations. 'These were not happy times for our family,' Lindy Boggs said Friday. 'We were told the FBI was monitoring our phone conversations and to draw running water between you and the telephone to wipe out the monitors.' Her recollection is supported by a former House colleague, Rep. Cornelius Gallagher, D-N.J., who said Friday that the House, under bipartisan leadership that included Ford and Boggs, had commissioned an investigation and discovered members' phones had indeed been tapped by the FBI. But he said the report was never released."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Tornado Warning Forces President And Mrs. Bush To Move To Shelter. The AP (12/29) reports President Bush and First Lady Laura Bush "were moved to an armored vehicle on their ranch Friday when a tornado warning was issued in central Texas, the White House said. The vehicle was driven to a tornado shelter on the ranch at 1:30 p.m. CT, and the president, the first lady and their two Scottish terriers, Barney and Miss Beazley, sat inside until the weather cleared, deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said." The Washington Post (12/30, A3, 690K), the New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) and BBC.com (12/29) are among the other outlets carrying brief mentions of the tornado report.

All three broadcast networks also mentioned the tornado. ABC World News (12/29, story 6, 1:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was some rough weather in central Texas today, and that led to some apprehension for President and Mr. Bush and the people who keep them safe." The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 10, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "There was some wild weather in Texas today, when tornadoes swept through that state. The Secret Service had the President and Mrs. Bush ride out a tornado warning in an armored vehicle at their ranch in Crawford. The twisters, though, never made it to the ranch." NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 2, 1:10, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "The President, First Lady and their two dogs were moved out of their house and placed in an armored vehicle and taken to a tornado shelter."

Bush Said To Have Had Full Schedule During Trip To Crawford. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports "this has been a different and strange holiday in which Bush has been unable to leave behind reminders of the problems he faces, at a low point in public opinion polls after another deadly year in Iraq. The intelligence briefing Friday included an update on the execution of Saddam Hussein. On Thursday, Bush met with his senior national security advisors at his office on the ranch to work on a new strategy to deal with the insurgency and sectarian violence in Iraq. There also were details to work out on his role in former President Ford's funeral and memorial services. And outside the property, as usual, were anti-war demonstrators."

Cheney Expected To Be Focus Of Attention In 2007. In the Financial Times (12/30), Caroline Daniel writes that Vice President Cheney "has forged a reputation as the most powerful but also least visible vice-president in recent history. In the next few weeks, however, he will be forced to fight some of his battles in the open - in the courtroom and on Capitol Hill. The first test will come in the criminal trial of his former chief of staff, Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. … The trial, due to begin in two weeks, is likely to set an ignominious precedent when Mr Cheney becomes the first vice-president to testify in a trial. Mr Cheney's legal team are also steeling themselves for the launch of legislative investigations by the new Democrat-controlled Congress. In 2004 the vice-president felt confident enough to dismiss questions from Patrick Leahy, then a powerless Democrat, with a lewd invitation for him to do something sexually impossible. Now, he faces political revenge: Mr Leahy, the incoming chairman of the judiciary committee, has said he will issue subpoenas to secure documents that show whether the Bush administration authorised torture as part of its 'war on terror'. He also vowed to look into no-bid Iraq contracts, including those awarded to Halliburton, a company the vice-president once ran."

DOJ_NMG_0111561

Ford's Relationship With Cheney, Rumsfeld Examined. The New York Times (12/30, Shane, 1.16M) reports that both Vice President Cheney and former Defense Secretary Rumsfeld "have consciously sought to restore what they see as the constitutional powers of the presidency, which they believe were severely eroded under President Richard M. Nixon and President Ford. Some of their colleagues from three decades ago — evidently including Mr. Ford — have wondered if they have gone too far. … In all the intervening years, Mr. Ford maintained close and friendly relations with both his former chiefs of staff. When Mr. Bush selected Mr. Cheney as his running mate in 2000, Mr. Ford lauded the vice-presidential candidate in an Op-Ed article in The New York Times for 'a towering intelligence and probity, razor-sharp judgment and a seriousness of purpose that is the antithesis of modern political spin.' This year, when Mr. Rumsfeld came under fire from senior retired generals for his conduct of the war in Iraq, Mr. Ford issued a rare public statement defending his 'creativity, vision and courage' and rebuking his critics. But a private disillusionment appears to have been taking shape. In a 2004 interview with Bob Woodward, reported for the first time in The Washington Post this week, Mr. Ford singled out Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Cheney by name and sharply criticized the decision to go to war in Iraq."

Ninth Circuit Reportedly Investigating Federal Judge Appointed By Bush. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Goodman, 850K) reports, "The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco has launched an investigation of a federal judge who awarded more than $4.8 million in judgments and fees without apparently disclosing his personal, political and business ties to those who benefited, two sources close to the inquiry told The Times. U.S. District Judge James C. Mahan of Las Vegas, a popular state judge who joined the federal bench in 2002 after his nomination by President Bush, was the subject of Times investigative reports in June. … On Mahan, the articles detailed how he awarded fees in a dozen state and federal cases to a former client and business associate who twice served as his judicial campaign treasurer and who was instrumental in getting him appointed to the bench."

Democrats Expected To Seek Expansion Of Health Coverage For Children. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A4, Zhang, 2.04M) reports Congressional Democrats, "itching to expand health coverage, will likely start by tackling the most politically appealing group: uninsured children. … About 8.3 million children, or 11% of all children in the U.S., lack coverage. For Democrats, covering these youngsters has obvious appeal. It would allow lawmakers to champion solutions to problems of people who they say have been a low priority for Republicans. It also would be a step toward universal health coverage, an old and elusive goal of many in the party." The Journal notes, "Democrats have yet to offer specific proposals or to put a price tag on possible plans. But as with most health-care initiatives, any significant effort to extend and expand coverage will cost billions of dollars, and collide with budget realities, resistance from Republicans and Democrats' vow to be fiscally responsible."

Long-Term Elder-Care Costs Often Not Covered By Medicare. The New York Times (12/30, Gross, 1.16M) reports, "the legion of adult children — more than 15 million, according to various calculations — who take care of their aging parents, a responsibility that often includes paying for all or part of their housing, medical supplies and incidental expenses. Many costs are out of pocket and largely unnoticed: clothing, home repair, a cellular telephone. Adult children with the largest out-of-pocket expenses are those supervising care long distance, those who hire in-home help and those whose parents have too much money to qualify for government-subsidized Medicaid but not enough to pay for what could be a decade of frailty and dependence. The burden is compounded by ignorance, according to a study by AARP, released in mid-December, which found that most Americans have no idea how much long-term care costs and believe that Medicare pays for it, when it does not. … Costs are astronomical for long-term, low-tech care, the sort most often needed by those who linger with Alzheimer's disease or are too frail to get around on their own. Medicare is of almost no help."

WPost Urges Ethics Reforms In Wake Of Murtha Revelations. The New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) editorializes, "As the Democrats regain power in Congress next week they would be wise to look to one of their own — Representative John Murtha of Pennsylvania — for ironic inspiration in enacting the ethics reforms they promised voters. Even in the minority, Mr. Murtha made himself a legend at mastering the same quid pro quo culture that Democrats denounced in running against the Republicans' manipulations of Washington's money trough. His deliverance of masses of pork to favored campaign donors and lobbyists has been laid bare in a report by The Washington Post, detailing the sort of classic money churn that helped drive the Republicans from power. …

DOJ_NMG_0111562

Congressman Murtha's symbiotic prowess with defense contractors and power lobbyists was an open secret that drew no great attention until the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi, sought him as her majority leader. She was rebuffed by wiser colleagues. They must follow up that close call by striking at the heart of the easy-money culture that besmirches both sides of the aisle."

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Ends Year Up 16% In Best Performance Since 2003. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, Lahart, 2.04M) reports on its front page that, "driven by a splurge of deal-making, a halt in the Federal Reserve's campaign of raising interest rates and continued profit growth," the Dow "completed its best year since 2003, gaining 16%. And having sailed through the second half of the year, investors now have a tailwind to continue their run into 2007. The Dow closed yesterday at 12463.15, 1,745.65 points higher than where it started 2006. The market's gains, which were across the board and on every index, came in the second half -- at one point in July the Dow was down on the year. The second-half's steady march was virtually uninterrupted." The Wall Street Journal (12/30, B1, Anand, 2.04M) says the "surprisingly strong year" ended with a quiet Friday session. NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 5, 0:45, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Stocks fell back a bit on this last trading day of the year, and a very good year it was."

The Washington Times (12/30, Bruno, 88K) runs a front-page report headlined "Stock Market Surged In 2006" that says that "by all accounts, 2006 ended up a very good year for stocks as bullish investors bounced back from a slumping housing market and the Federal Reserve's two-year campaign of interest-rate increases. The markets approached record levels in the spring, pulled back sharply in the summer, but found a clear direction in the fall to send the major indexes to multiyear highs." The Houston Chronicle (12/30, Patel, 530K) says the markets "had another bull year, making 2006 the fourth year in a row the three best-known indexes ended in positive territory. They pulled off greater returns than last, setting the stage for what investors expect will be a year of moderate growth in 2007." The AP (12/29) calls 2006 a "banner year" for stocks.

WSJournal Credits Derivatives For Providing Stability In US Markets. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A10,, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed yesterday near an all-time high, up 17% for the year. Long-term bond yields rose this year but remain remarkably low given the Federal Reserve's short-term rate ratchet to 5.25% from a low of 1%. Economic growth has slowed but remains solid. And by some measures financial market volatility is at lows not seen in a decade -- the Dow, for example, is still adding to its longest stretch (910 days) without a one-day decline of 2% or more since 1900. All of this stability naturally fills people with dread. It has led to a round of questioning about why, in an undeniably dangerous world, risk premiums seem to have drained out of whole classes of financial assets. Has Mr. Market become complacent, and so set himself up for a fall? What is everyone missing? … When it comes to the decline of risk premiums and financial stability, securitization and the use of derivatives have both played an unsung role."

Ford Mourning Underway After Understated California Services. The New York Times (12/30, Steinhauer, 1.16M) reports, "The first day of public mourning for former President Gerald R. Ford began Friday in this quiet desert community much the way his post-White House life did here 30 years ago — privately, absent of pomp, a small-town affair writ large by history more than family intent. The repose and prayer service here were the first of several events marking the life of the 38th president, which will include a state funeral in Washington and burial in Mr. Ford's hometown, Grand Rapids, Mich. Decidedly understated, the events here attracted more members of the news media than local mourners along the roadside outside the modest A-frame church, the Ford family's place of worship, where the coffin was placed."

The three broadcast networks gave a combined 18 and one-half minutes of coverage to the mourning for Ford and related stories. The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 4, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Six days of honors for America's 38th president began today with a prayer service in Palm Desert, California." ABC World News (12/29, story 3, 2:50, Rooney said, "The military honors belied what a simple affair it was for a man who did not stand on ceremony." NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 3, 2:40, Lewis, 9.87M) said, "President Ford lies in repose inside St. Margaret's church throughout tonight and into the morning. Thousands of people are expected to file past his casket. … Tomorrow the Ford family will accompany the casket to Washington D.C. And on Wednesday of next week Mr. Ford will be buried in Grand Rapids, Michigan."

The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Abrams, Ganga, 850K) reports, "Unlike past presidential obsequies, today's rites were marked by their simplicity. A hearse with two small flags and a tiny presidential seal carried the coffin. At the front of the church, a military honor guard, representing different military branches, stood at attention to receive the body. Former First Lady Ford, 88, her four grown children and several grandchildren moved to the front of the church as the body was carried with military precision into the church." The Washington Times (12/30, Wilson, 88K) reports, "The private family service was followed by a visitation for invited friends, including former Secretary of State George Shultz, former Rep. Jack Kemp and former California Gov. Pete Wilson." Rep. John Dingell said on CNN (12/29), "He was really a very simple, uncomplicated man. And during his time at the White House and also during his time in the Congress, was a man who was very friendly, very simple, very friendly." BBC.com (12/30) also describes the services.

DOJ_NMG_0111563

The Washington Post (12/30, A1, Pomfret, Sheridan, 690K) reports, "As the quiet and simple service took place in California, a continent away, law enforcement agencies in Washington called in hundreds of officers to provide security for the second presidential funeral to take place in the nation's capital in three years. The authorities said that a section of the Inner Loop of the Capital Beltway, near the Suitland Parkway, will be shut down for a short time starting at about 5:30 p.m. on Saturday to allow the motorcade carrying Ford's casket to pass by. A number of streets in Alexandria and in Washington will also be temporarily closed." The Washington Post (12/30, A9, Ruane, 690K) reports, "There will be no military aircraft flyover tonight, officials said, unlike with Reagan's services, when a large flyover took place as the procession neared the Capitol. At the family's request, Ford's cortege is scheduled to make two special stops as it travels from Andrews Air Force Base, where it is set to arrive at 5:20 p.m., to the Capitol, where his body is to lie in state through Tuesday morning. The cortege will first pass through Alexandria, where Ford and his family lived as Washington suburbanites in a red-brick Colonial with a pool and a bay window. It will then pause at the World War II Memorial, on the Mall, in recognition of his Navy service during the war." The Washington Post (12/30, A8, Montes, 690K) reports on crowds attracted to the National Archives' exhibits on Ford.

ABC World News (12/29, story 4, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) and the CBS Evening News (12/29, story 5, 4:15, Couric, 7.66M) also ran reports on Ford's friendship with Richard Nixon, while NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 6, 3:00, Mitchell, 9.87M) previewed a 1995 interview with Ford that will be published for the first time in Newsweek next week, in which "the private Gerald Ford" was "critical of other Republicans -- Nixon, Reagan and the former President Bush."

Government Agencies, Stock Markets Will Observe Tuesday's Day Of Mourning. CNN.com (12/29) reports, "Ford's funeral service will be in Washington at the National Cathedral on Tuesday, which President Bush has designated as a day of mourning for Ford. Bush's order triggers the closure of all federal offices except those necessary for national security. Major U.S. stock exchanges also are expected to be closed Tuesday in Ford's honor. The U.S. Postal Service said it would suspend delivery that day." The Wall Street Journal (12/30, B2, Schroeder, 2.04M) reports, "It will be the longest closing of major U.S. stock markets since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks shut down trading for six days, including a weekend. On Friday, the New York Stock Exchange joined the Nasdaq Stock Market in announcing it would close on Tuesday, in observance of a national day of mourning for former President Gerald Ford. Nasdaq had made its announcement on Thursday." The Washington Post (12/30, D1, 690K) and the New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) also note the markets' closings.

Ford Portrayed As Champion Of Vietnamese Refugees. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/30, A21, 690K) Quang X. Pham, who was born in Saigon and served as a Marine pilot in the Persian Gulf War, writes, "Ford became the savior to those lucky enough to escape the taking of Saigon by the North Vietnamese army. 'I pray no American president is ever again faced with this grave option,' Ford said at a public forum on the legacy of the Vietnam War 25 years later. 'I still grieve over those we were unable to rescue.' He added that he was thankful America was able to relocate 130,000 Vietnamese refugees (less than 1 percent of South Vietnam's population) and that 'to do less would have added moral shame to humiliation.' … I am not aware of any other politicians, antiwar protesters, esteemed journalists or celebrities visiting Fort Chaffee, Ark., where my family was temporarily housed for two months. But Gerald Ford did."

Experience In 2004 Seen As Having Improved Edwards Campaign. The Washington Post (12/30, A3, Balz, 690K) reports, "With overflow crowds and his populist economic message and his Internet-friendly campaign organization, John Edwards signaled this week that, if he has anything to say about it, the race for the Democratic presidential nomination will be about more than just Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama." Edwards "begins his second campaign for the White House with the kind of self-confidence that comes only from having tried and failed once before. … There are also critical adjustments in his candidacy that position him to compete against Clinton and Obama, the party's two unannounced glamour candidates of the moment. Edwards will be able to run to the left of Clinton in a party whose base has shifted leftward during the Bush presidency. And this time, questions about lack of experience will go first to Obama."

Edwards Warns Against Adopting "McCain Doctrine" In Iraq. Sen. John Edwards said on MSNBC's Hardball (12/29, Matthews), "I think it is a mistake to escalate this war. I think it is a mistake to have this McCain Doctrine adopted as a policy by the United States. I think what it does is it sends a signal that we are going be there forever, or for a long time. It takes responsibility away from the Iraqis and there is no military solution to what is happening in Iraq, the only solution is a political solution." Edwards, on CNN's The Situation Room (12/29, Henry), "I believe an escalation of our presence in Iraq is a enormous mistake. I think this McCain Doctrine doesn't make any sense. There is no military solution to what's happening in Iraq. Everyone knows that. The only potential solution is a political solution. The Iraqis are going to have to decide whether they're actually going to have a representative government that includes everybody, including the Sunnis. And that's the only way to ultimately tamp down this violence."

DOJ_NMG_0111564

Pro-Obama Group To Air Ads In Iowa. RollCall.com (12/29, Kane) reports, "As Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) nears a decision on his presidential aspirations, an independent group of supporters is going back on the air to try to entice him into the 2008 White House campaign, this time with an ad campaign in the first-in-the-nation caucus state of Iowa. DraftObama.org, a political action committee founded by Democratic activists in the Washington, D.C., suburbs of Maryland and Virginia, has bought time on three major network affiliates in Iowa to air its 'Believe Again' ad, a 60-second spot that already has been shown on New Hampshire, Hawaii and D.C.-area TV stations."

Romney Considered Among "Top-Tier" GOP Presidential Candidates. The AP (12/30, Sidoti) reports, "When it comes to the presidency, the Republican Party has a long tradition of nominating the next guy in line. That's John McCain, and the failed GOP presidential aspirant of 2000 is positioning himself as the anointed 2008 nominee. Yet, a full year before the first primary contests, the Republican race is anything but wrapped up. The Arizona senator who once reveled in his reputation for bucking the party line is now running as the establishment candidate, but he faces serious challenges from Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. … Regardless of who has the early edge, McCain, Romney and Giuliani make up the top tier of the crowded GOP presidential field that includes a cast of other lesser-known potential candidates, most of whom would be long-shots should they decide to formally enter the race."

Congressional Democrats Voice Objections To FL13 Vote. The New York Times (12/30, Zernike, 1.16M) reports Congressional Democrats "said Friday that they would open the new Congress by formally objecting to the election result in Florida's 13th District, in the hope that the Democrat who is contesting the narrow outcome there," Christine Jennings, "will ultimately take the place of the Republican," Vern Buchanan, "whom the state has certified as the winner. The move will not prevent…Buchanan from taking office with the rest of the 110th Congress next Thursday. But Democrats say that because the House is the final certifier of House election results, they want to make certain that Mr. Buchanan's swearing-in does not prejudice a legal challenge mounted by" Jennings. Rep. Rush Holt is quoted as saying, "No one who's in a disputed election like this should get too comfortable in the House of Representatives. … The evidence will show that a revote is necessary."

RollCall.com (12/29, Duran) reports, "Despite Democrats' concerns over the election results, incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) clearly did not want to open the first Democratic-led session in 12 years with an ugly House floor fight over whether Buchanan should be seated or not. The Florida secretary of state certified Buchanan as the winner Nov. 21. However, a majority of the House can refuse to seat any Member." On its web site, The Hill (12/29, Blake) reports, "Should Jennings's contentions be validated by the Florida courts, the House would have the power to remove Buchanan."

Kline Continues To Divide Kansas GOP. The Washington Post (12/30, A2, Slevin, 690K) reports, "Phill Kline is not one to slink away -- and the ideological wars inside the Kansas Republican Party show no sign of ending. The fiercely antiabortion Republican attorney general in Kansas lost his reelection bid in November when moderate Republicans voted in droves for Paul Morrison, a longtime Johnson County district attorney who became a Democrat in hopes of vanquishing Kline. Statewide, Kline got barely 4 in 10 votes. In Johnson County, the state's most populous county, his loss was more dramatic. That made it especially shocking after the election when Republican precinct leaders in the county chose Kline to finish the final two years of Morrison's term as prosecutor. Gov. Kathleen Sebelius (D), a vocal Kline foe, refused to sign his nomination papers, a ceremonial task, lambasting a 'small narrow group of partisan political operatives' for choosing him. … Kline's reincarnation as Johnson County prosecutor reveals the depth of the continuing Republican split in Kansas."

Schwarzenegger's Inauguration Festivities Described As "Lavish." The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Halper, 850K) reports, "construction firms, insurance companies, developers and other private donors — most with business in the governor's office — will pick up the tab of at least $1.4 million for a lavish party to kick off Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's second term. Schwarzenegger's inaugural committee Friday announced the plans for next Friday's celebration, along with a list of donors. Campaign finance watchdogs have called the whole affair unseemly. Unlike other donations from special interests with business before the state, contributions to the inaugural committee are not subject to legal limits. Nine donors contributed at least $50,000 each to the event, which earned them the designation of 'Gold Sponsor.' Half the $1.4 million raised came in during the last two weeks."

DOJ_NMG_0111565

Spitzer Plans "Modest" Inauguration. The New York Times (12/30, Confessore, 1.16M) reports, "Twelve years ago, Gov. George E. Pataki took office with one of the most lavish inaugural parties in New York State history: three days of food and celebration for thousands of supporters, paid for with money raised by a private corporation established solely for that purpose. But the extravaganza blossomed into a two-year headache after Mr. Pataki broke a promise to open the corporation's books to the public, plunging his administration into its first scandal. … Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer is aiming for a happier beginning. Mr. Spitzer has planned a comparatively modest celebration for himself."

States' Minimum Wage Boosts Effective Monday. The Washington Post (12/30, A4, Tanner, 690K) reports, "Jan. 1 brings new laws in many states, offering both a glimpse of what is on the voters' minds and a preview of some of the issues Washington might take up. Many states take action long before Congress does. Effective Monday, seven states -- Arizona, California, Delaware, Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina and Pennsylvania -- will raise their minimum wage. The federal minimum is $5.15 an hour. The new wages go as high as $7.50 an hour. … States also dealt with immigration (nurses from other countries must have English-language proficiency to practice in South Carolina), eminent domain (Illinois requires local governments to pay more and meet a higher legal threshold before seizing private property) and campaign finance (North Carolina and Pennsylvania set stricter rules)."

DC Memorials Commemorating International Figures Draw Controversy. The New York Times (12/30, Barringer, 1.16M) reports that the National Park Service and the National Capital Planning Commission are "the agencies most responsible for monitoring the conception, creation and placement of new museums and commemorative works in the federal city. 'I think there's a heightened sensitivity to where we place these memorials and museums, and whom we venerate,' said the planning commission's chairman, John V. Cogbill III. … 'We view ourselves as a world city, so I think in that respect you want to embrace something that is not indigenous to our own culture.' The language of the Commemorative Works Act of 1986, which set out procedures for the creation of memorials on federal land here, is a little less inclusive than Mr. Cogbill is. It envisions commemorative works that evoke 'the memory of an individual, group, event or other significant element of American history.' In the two decades since Congress enacted that law, about 30 memorials have been approved, four of which did not conform to the provision about American history."

Somali Government Asserts Control, Imposes Martial Law. The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 7, 0:50, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "For the first time in 15 years, Somali forces appear to be in control of their capital, Mogadishu. Government forces, backed by heavily armed soldiers from neighboring Ethiopia, drove militia loyal to Islamist clerics from the capital they have controlled. There is the promise of stability here, but in this country, divided by clan loyalties and ruined by civil war, there is no certainty."

The Washington Post (12/30, A12, McCrummen, 690K) reports, "With Ethiopian tanks and soldiers guarding key sites in the exhausted Somali capital of Mogadishu, the country's long-exiled and long-powerless prime minister rolled into town Friday, promising that his government would establish order across the chaotic Horn of Africa nation in a matter of months." Despite Prime Minster Ali Mohamed Gedi's efforts, Somali protests against the Ethiopian forces raise "the question of how long Gedi's weak interim government can afford the protection of soldiers from a country that most Somalis consider an enemy or a proxy for the United States." The Post says "some analysts said that the Islamic militias' rapid retreat in the face of the Ethiopian offensive suggests that they were never the threat they were made out to be; others believe the Islamic fighters have faded back to wage a protracted guerrilla war, a scenario that has always been the most feared among regional leaders."

The Washington Times/AP (12/30, Neuhaus) notes Gedi "promised thousands of war-weary Somalis peace and stability yesterday as he formally took control of the battle-scarred capital." However, the AP adds, "the task facing Somalia's U.N.-backed, secular government is immense." The State Department "called for all Somalis to work for 'genuine national reconciliation' and reiterated support for an African peacekeeping force to be deployed in the country."

The Financial Times (12/30, England) reports Gedi "said the administration's priority was to restore law and order and begin the process of rebuilding the shattered country. But while his presence in the capital was symbolically important for the government, the challenges ahead are daunting as it seeks to impose its authority in a city awash with arms and beset by clan rivalries." BBC.com (12/29) cites experts saying Gedi's "arrival in Mogadishu marks the first time the country's transitional government has been in a position to exercise full authority in the capital."

Under the headline, "Somalis Split As Fighting Halts And Hint Of Insurgency Looms," the New York Times (12/30, Gettleman, 1.16M) adds, "Anti-Ethiopia riots erupted in Mogadishu … while masked gunmen emerged for the first time on the streets, a day after Ethiopian-backed troops captured the city from Islamist forces." The Times adds, "Mogadishu has plenty of gunmen, of every age and every clan, but gunmen hiding their identity is something new and may be a sign of a developing insurgency." Some experts believe "that if the Ethiopian troops … linger in the country too long and their intervention turns into a full-scale occupation, it will uncork a long and nasty guerilla war." For his part, Gedi "is wasting little time getting to work. He announced Friday that the transitional government … was imposing martial law for the next three months. He asked Mogadishu's various clan militias to turn in their weapons or face the consequences."

DOJ_NMG_0111566

Chinese White Paper Pegs Military Buildup To Economic Development. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A4, Fairclough, 2.04M) details the Chinese State Council's release of report claiming "China's rapid economic growth and its dependence on international trade are driving major shifts in the country's military strategy." The white paper "outlines steps that appear aimed at improving China's ability to use armed force far from its own shores in order to protect increasingly global interests." According to the Journal, the policy "says China is pursuing 'a road of peaceful development' but adds that the country's military strength should increase 'in step' with its expanding economy." The report "provides a window into Chinese strategic thinkers' view of the international security environment and their apparent distrust of the U.S. and its motives. The paper's authors say they don't expect any large-scale conflicts between major countries in the 'foreseeable future.' But they expressed dissatisfaction with what they termed 'hegemonism and power politics.'" A focus on the outward projection of power "is a departure for China's People's Liberation Army, which … has been focused for much of its existence on domestic threats, territorial defense and conflicts on its borders." The Journal adds, "China's growing military strength and questions about its intentions have touched off a debate among U.S. defense-policy makers."

The Washington Post (12/30, A17, Cody, 690K) notes Beijing "warned Friday that the military landscape in northeast Asia is getting 'more complicated and serious' because of North Korea's nuclear weapons program and tighter defense cooperation between Japan and the United States." The white paper "provided a rare glimpse into the strategic assessments that underlie decisions and priorities of the secretive Chinese military and the Communist Party's policymaking Central Military Commission." The Post says the report "was designed as a response to repeated complaints from the Bush administration that China has not explained the rationale behind its long-term military improvement program."

Under the headline, "China's Military Spending To Reach $36bn," the Financial Times (12/30, Yeh) reports the 15 percent annual military budget increase is "likely to heighten concerns over Beijing's military build-up." That enhanced spending "is aimed at modernising the 2.3m-strong People's Liberation Army (PLA) into a nimbler, more technologically-advanced entity, said a white paper released by the government yesterday."

Iranian UN Ambassador Pans Security Council Sanctions, Backs Cooperation. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (12/30, 850K), Iranian Ambassador to the UN M. Javad Zarif questions the "urgency" of the recent UN Security Council resolution "against" his nation's "nuclear program." Tehran "has categorically rejected the development, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons on both ideological and strategic grounds," and remains "committed to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty." Zarif cites "alarmist assessments" from opponents of Iran's nuclear program, and says even thy "concede that there is no actual evidence that Iran is trying to build a nuclear weapon and that, even if it wanted to do so, it would not be capable of developing one before 2010 or 2015." The Security Council sought ony "to punish Iran for refusing to suspend its peaceful and legal uranium enrichment activities." Tehran "has proposed real alternatives to ensure that its civilian nuclear program will remain exclusively and indefinitely peaceful," adding, "Neither suspension nor sanctions can achieve the stated objective of ensuring nonproliferation because Iran has now been compelled to develop nuclear technology on its own." Zarif concludes, "Iran remains eager to dispel any doubts. It is not too late to reach an agreement on meaningful measures that can serve our common objective of limiting the proliferation of nuclear weapons."

Turkmen Opposition Given Little Chance Of Ousting Interim President. The New York Times (12/30, Chivers, 1.16M) reports Turkmen Republican Party leader Nurmuhkammed Khanomov "demanded Friday that" interim President Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov "step down and allow for democratic elections in the authoritarian Central Asian nation. But there were signs of disorganization and discord in the opposition ranks." Khanomov's request "was almost certain to be ignored," and Berdymukhammedov and his allies "have been consolidating their hold on the country since the death of Saparmurat Niyazov, the Turkmen president, on Dec. 21." Niyazov's "death had been expected to set off a succession battle, but so far none has spilled into the public light," and, the Times adds, "the opposition has been marginalized by a combination of manipulation of the Constitution, amendments to election law and police action." Calling several government actions "manipulations," the Times notes the new election law bars "citizens who have lived outside of Turkmenistan in recent years from becoming candidates — a rule that blocked the best-known opposition figures from entering the race." One opposition leader "said that when the holiday season ended, the Turkmen people would be watching the United States closely. Washington has backed other democratic movements, he said, and publicly pushed for fair elections in several authoritarian states, including Belarus. He said he worried that because of Turkmenistan's energy reserves, it would not be treated the same way."

DOJ_NMG_0111567

Russia, Belarus In Standoff Over Natural Gas. The New York Times (12/30, Kramer, 1.16M) reports Russian energy "monopoly" Gazprom is once again "in a dispute over prices and control of a pipeline in a neighboring country that is threatening the smooth flow of natural gas to Europe. But this time, the price increase was levied on a Russian ally, Belarus, a country whose foreign policy is aligned with Moscow in all but one important aspect: support for increasing cash flow at Gazprom." Belarus President Aleksandr Lukashenko "called Gazprom's position 'blackmail' and said Belarussians would rather live in unheated dugouts than pay the higher price." Russian Deputy Prime Minister and Gazprom head Dmitri Medvedev "retorted that Belarus was 'blackmailing' Europe by threatening the transit pipelines that cross that country." The Times says Gazprom's "price increases have added to concerns about the reliability of the oil and natural gas flowing from Russia, which is a major supplier to Europe but has increasingly wielded its energy resources for political leverage." The Times notes some experts believe "that, beyond being merely a tool of Russian foreign policy, increasing the cash flow at Gazprom is an important, even central, tenet of Russian foreign policy in its own right. That interest may outweigh support for Belarus as a client state."

The Financial Times (12/30, Ostrovsky) notes Lukashenko "was on Friday defiant in the face of Russian threats to cut gas supplies to his country, just as his officials arrived in Moscow for last-minute talks aimed at resolving the dispute." Despite Minsk's claim "that the aim was to sign a contract," a Gazprom employee "said he was not feeling optimistic about a possible breakthrough in the dispute between the two countries."

Slovenia Will Join Euro Zone Monday. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A4, Lagorce, 2.04M) notes Slovenia "on Monday will become the first former communist state to adopt the euro, in what Prime Minister Janez Jansa has called the 'biggest national achievement' since the country joined the European Union in 2004." The Journal calls the move "no small victory for" Slovenia. "It is alone among the 10-member European Union accession class of 2004 in having fulfilled the rigorous economic criteria needed to join Europe's Economic and Monetary Union." The Journal says adopting the euro "is expected to bring macroeconomic stability to the country, increase its exports and yield productivity gains." However, "by giving up its ability to fix its interest rates, Slovenia exposes itself to the risk of a house-price boom such as those experienced by Ireland and Portugal after they joined."

Sinn Fein Conference Will Consider Supporting Ulster Police. The AP (12/29, Pogatchnik) reports the leadership of Sinn Fein "voted Friday to convene an emergency conference and confront a pivotal issue in Northern Ireland peacemaking — whether the IRA-linked party should support the police." Noting "months of stalemate" in Protestant-Catholic negotiations, the AP adds Gerry Adams "said the conference would proceed only if the move received a sufficiently positive response from the Democratic Unionists, the major Protestant-backed party." Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern is quoted calling the Sinn Fein meeting "a defining moment in the peace process. A successful outcome is vital to the continuing success of this process." AFP (12/29, Bushe) notes the "landmark" and "watershed" meeting, and calls Sinn Fein's historic refusal to recognize the police force "the main obstacle" and "a major stumbling block to restoring the power-sharing government." Bloomberg (12/29, Nesbitt) reports Sinn Fein's decision to hold an intra-party vote is "paving the way for a revival of the region's parliament after it was suspended four years ago."

Bush Eliminates Jackson-Vanik Trade Limits For Vietnam. AFP (12/29) reports President Bush "signed a proclamation formally extending full US-Vietnam trade ties and made the former foe eligible for US military aid, key steps in normalizing relations." Noting Bush's lifting of key restrictions, Scott Stanzel is quoted saying Washington "welcomes Vietnam's progress in enacting free-market reforms, and looks forward to Vietnam becoming the 150th member of the World Trade Organization on January 11."

Convicted US Marine Remanded To US Custody In Philippines. The AP (12/29, Gomez) reports US Marine Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith, who has been "convicted of raping a Filipino woman, was whisked away from a Manila jail to the U.S. Embassy Friday, a spokesman said, almost a month after the U.S. and Philippine governments urged a local court to transfer him to American custody during his appeal." Spokesman Matt Lussenhop is quoted saying, "The government of the Philippines made a decision to transfer Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith back to U.S. custody, consistent with the terms of the" Visiting Forces Agreement.

Reid Seeks To "Strengthen Relations" With Ecuador. The AP (12/29, Valdivieso) carries comments from Ecuador by visiting Sen. Harry Reid "that the United States wants to strengthen relations with Ecuador's leftist President-elect Rafael Correa and respects his intention to not extend the U.S. military's use of a coastal base." Reid and five Senate colleagues "met for almost an hour with Correa, who takes office on Jan. 15, and expressed a desire to build better bilateral relations." Reid also "said President Bush supports an extension" of the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act."

DOJ_NMG_0111568

Top Bangladeshi Women Politicians' Rivalry Said To Hamper Development. The Washington Times/AP (12/30, Rosenberg) reports, "For 15 years Bangladesh has been dominated by the revolving-door premiership of two women whose rivalry is among the most ferocious in the democratic world." The AP calls the relationship between Begum Khaleda Zia and Sheik Hasina Wajed "the stuff of political slapstick, except that this feud is rooted in the assassination of one woman's father and the other's husband, and the result today is anything but funny." Bangladeshis "will tell you the rivalry is the cause of all the country's problems of poverty and corruption." The Zia-Wajed "rivalry has done nothing to improve things. Bangladesh is deeply corrupt and, in many parts, barely governed, raising concerns about instability in this strategic Muslim country already contending with Islamist militancy." The AP adds, "As each serves a term and is replaced by the other, a well-worn pattern has emerged: one party wins the election, and the other spends the next five years doing its best to make the country ungovernable through strikes and protests."

Sub-Saharan Africa Faces Challenges Of Meeting Renewed Education Demand. A 1,839-word feature in the New York Times (12/30, Lafraniere, 1.16M) reports, "Finding places for millions of new students is one of sub-Saharan Africa's most overwhelming and gratifying missions. After two decades of sluggish growth in enrollment rates, the region's 45 countries find themselves with an embarrassment of eager schoolchildren." The Times says "wo trends have converged to produce such change: One is a new willingness by international donors and African governments to spend hundreds of millions of dollars more on basic education. That has fed a rising demand for education by the region's parents, who for perhaps the first time see a chance to give their children a future that they were denied." Despite the positive trend, the "challenges" of providing an adequate education "remain staggering. Foremost is a flood tide of school-age children in a region whose birth rate is nearly twice the world's average. … The region must absorb those newcomers while trying to lift itself from the subbasement of global education."

British Authorities Arrest Four Rwandan Nationals On Genocide Charges. The New York Times (12/30, Cowell, 1.16M) reports, "In a rare case evoking genocide in a distant land, four men accused of plotting or participating in the 1994 massacres of Rwanda's Tutsi minority appeared in a London court on Friday after their arrests overnight to face extradition proceedings." The suspects, who will be held until a court appearance next month, "were arrested under an unusual and previously secret memorandum of understanding between Britain and Rwanda that was supposed to prevent them from being executed if found guilty of crimes in their own country." British law forbids both their extradition to face a possible death penalty and their prosecution in the UK. The Times adds, "The four men … have denied the genocide charges and are expected to resist being sent to Rwanda, where rights groups like Amnesty International have raised questions about the quality of the judicial system."

Desmond Tutu's "Moral Leadership" Profiled. The Wall Street Journal (12/30, A10, 2.04M) runs an extensive interview by Tunku Varadarajan of Archbishop Desmond Tutu. "Among his many essential arts -- those of persuasion, rhetoric, theology and politics -- there is one that stands out over all others when I meet Desmond Tutu in the flesh at a hotel in midtown Manhattan: the art of laughter." However, the Journal says, his "jollity" is "that of a serious, even grave, man, and it is this jollity, this very African capacity for mirth in darkness, that set him apart from the dour, adamant Afrikaners with whom he locked horns over a lifetime." Tutu "looks like nothing more than a mischievous, if well-fed, lemur, whose eyes twinkle irrepressibly behind plus-size glasses." Calling Tutu "the best known priest in the world (give or take a pope)," the Journal says his "renown derives not so much from his theology as from his moral leadership of the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa."

Global Warming Faulted For Arctic Ice Shelf Break. ABC World News (12/29, story 5, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "An ancient and enormous ice shelf, equivalent in size to 11,000 football fields has broken free from Canada's Arctic region. It is the largest event of its kind to happen in that area in 30 years. But some scientists say it's only the beginning. They predict big changes for the Arctic, and they point to unusually warm temperatures as the cause." The CBS Evening News (12/29, story 9, 0:40, Solorzano, 7.66M) said scientists are "blaming global warming" for the breaking off of the ice shelf, which "froze 3,000 years ago and is the size of 11,000 football fields." NBC Nightly News (12/29, story 8, 2:05, Brown, 9.87M) also had the story as a lead-in to a report on the impact of global warming, and the Washington Post (12/30, A18, Gillies, 690K) carries an AP item on the break.

DOJ_NMG_0111569

NYTimes Says EU, Not Turkey, To Blame For Accession Slowdown. In an editorial today, the New York Times (12/30, 1.16M) says "strained relations between Turkey and Cyprus" for Istanbul's inability to push EU accession talks forward. "What is surprising — and dismaying — is that the union is treating this as primarily a legal problem. That's a distortion." The "problem is mainly political, and of the union's own making. The E.U. blundered when it allowed a divided Cyprus to join the union in 2004" instead of demanding reunification, as Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots wanted. The Times adds, "Opposition to Turkey fails the test of Europe's values of tolerance and political compromise. It is also a failure on Europeans' part to discern their own self-interest." Calling Turkey "an underutilized resource" in fostering Muslim-Christian dialogue, the Times concludes, "it's up to the European Union to mend the Cyprus divide and clear the way for a dispassionate recognition of Turkey's vital role in Europe."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Violence Marked His Rise, Rule And Fall."
"A Test Of Faith In Strangers."
"Hussein Executed -- And Iraq Braces."
"Soaring Tourism, Hidden Dollars."
"Apple Report Fails To End Stock-Option Controversy."
"A Quiet, Personal Farewell."

New York Times:
"Dictator Who Ruled Iraq With Violence Is Hanged For Crimes Against Humanity."
"Joy Of Capture Muted At End."
"The Defiant Despot Oppressed Iraq For More Than 30 Years."
"New Job Title For Druggists: Diabetes Coach."
"Crowds Of Pupils But Little Else In African Schools."
"Elder-Care Costs Deplete Savings Of A Generation."
"Failure To Navigate: Security Effort By Coast Guard Is Falling Short."
"No Pomp For A President In Repose."
"U.S. And Iraq Dispute Role Of Iranians But Free Them."
Somalis Split As Fighting Halts And Hint Of Insurgency Looms."
"Apple Panel On Options Backs Chief."
"U.S. Official Overseeing Oil Program Faces Inquiry."
"Coaches' Word Rarely As Good As The Next Job."

Washington Post:
"Saddam Hussein Is Put To Death."
"Washington Prepares For Farewell To Ford."
"AT&T Completes BellSouth Takeover."
"An Overwhelmed D.C. Agency Loses Count of AIDS Cases.
"Apple Admits Wrongdoing But Rallies Around Leader."

Washington Times:
"Saddam Pays At The End Of A Rope."
"Six Days Of Mourning Begin."
"Bush Eager To Put '06 Behind."
"BWI Airport Leads Use-It-Again Trend."

Detroit Free Press:
"Hussein Hanged."
"Dearborn Crowd Celebrates For Justice."

Dallas Morning News:
"Saddam Dies On The Gallows."
"Rain Pounds Area, But Tornadoes Stay Away."
"Passengers Stuck On Plane Over 8 Hours."
"AT&T Buyout OK'd."
"Arlington Murder Suspect Arrested In Mississippi."
"Ford's Funeral Begins With Simple Ceremony."
"2 Dead In FW accident."
"Blizzard Pounds Colorado, Heads For Texas."

Houston Chronicle:
"Official: Saddam 'Totally Surrendered.'"
"NewsWatch: White House - Bush's Statement."
"Pentagon: U.S. ready for any surge in violence in Iraq."
"Scientists: Climate Change Behind Ice-Shelf Break."
"T-Mac Finds Form, Helps Rockets Down Hawks."
"Islamic Association Dismisses Katy Pig Races."
"Lawyer: Suspect In Houston Pot Bust 'No Drug Lord.'"
"Ex-Councilman Reyes Freed From Halfway House."
"Houston Conventions Chief Quits, To Be Consultant."
"Three Best-Known Market Indexes End '06 In Black."
"Underage New Year's Drinkers Face Stiff Penalties."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: The Execution Of Saddam Hussein; Security In Iraq- Hussein Execution; Mourning For Former President Ford; Ford/ Nixon Enduring Friendship; Artic Ice Shelf Melts/ Breaks Free Into Ocean; Tornado Scare On President's Texas Ranch; Colorado Snowstorm.
CBS: Execution Of Saddam Hussein; Other Executions In Baghdad; Analysis Of Iraqi Reaction To Hussein Execution; Death Of Former President Ford; Ford/ Nixon Friendship; Taliban Gaining Power In Afghanistan; Somalian Civil War; Snowstorm In Denver; Scientists Blame Global Warming For Melting Ice Shelf; Tornado Swept Through Texas; Mourning Former President Ford.
NBC: Execution Of Saddam Hussein; President Bush's View Of Iraqi Reaction/ Texas Tornado; Mourning For Former President Ford; Snowstorm In Denver; Wall Street Report;

DOJ_NMG_0111570

Interview With Revelations From Ford About His Successors; AT&T/ BellSouth Merger; Global Warming Weather Trends.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule. In Crawford, Texas.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: FUNERAL SEVICES FOR FORMER PRESIDENT GERALD R. FORD. 5:20 p.m. Ford's body arrives at Andrews Air Force Base, and will be taken to the Capitol. The motorcade will pause at the World War II Memorial. Note: Only credentialed media will have access to this ceremony. All media are required to have credentials and government-issued picture identification, such as a drivers license, to access the air base. Credentialed media will report to the West Gate at Andrews at 3 p.m. for security processing and shuttle service to ceremony location. The West Gate can be accessed from I-495 to Maryland exit 9, Allentown Road, Andrews AFB, State Route 337. Media are encouraged to take a taxi, limousine or carpool to the West Gate because parking is limited. Press pre-set time: 3-4:30 p.m. at West Gate Entrance. Doors open at 3 p.m. and close at 4:30 p.m. Credentialing: Joint Task Force-National. Phone: 202-685-4644/4645/6248. Fax: 202-685-1999. 6:30 p.m. Rotunda arrival ceremony, open to President Ford's immediate family, members and members-elect of the House and Senate, visiting heads of state and invited government officials. After the arrival ceremony, the Rotunda will open to the public until midnight. The public waiting area will be at the southwest corner of the Capitol grounds, across from the U.S. Botanic Garden. 7 p.m. State funeral begins in the Capitol Rotunda. 8:20 p.m. Ford's body lies in state.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0111571

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, January 03, 2007 8:21 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, December 30, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061230.pdf; dojclips061230.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bush Eager To Put '06 Behind (WT) 3
Appeals Court Rejects Brief Submitted By Ex-Judges (NYT) 4
Retired Judges' Opinions Shunned (WT/AP) 5
Opponents Of Law On Detainees Rebuffed (WP/AP) 6
The Former Magnificent Seven (WSJ) 6

Homeland Response:

Security Effort By Coast Guard Is Falling Short (NYT) 6
Road At Trade Center Site To Be Excavated For Remains (NYT) 9
Search For Human Remains Expands At World Trade Center (AP) 10

War News:

Saddam Hussein Put To Death (WP) 10
Bush: Execution Will Not Halt Violence (AP) 12
Bush: Credit Iraqis For Fair Trial Of Hussein (CNN) 14
Dictator Who Ruled Iraq With Violence Is Hanged For Crimes Against Humanity (NYT) 14
Iraqis Execute Saddam For Mass Killings (SEATIMES) 17
Iraqi-Americans Celebrate Saddam's Execution (AP) 19
Local Reaction: Iraqi Emigres In Bay Area Say It's Long Overdue (SFC) 19
Iraqi Natives Living In St. Louis Welcome The End For Saddam (SLPD) 20
Hanging On A Muslim Holiday Is Criticized (LAT) 21
Saddam Hussein Executed (MSNBC) 21
Saddam Hussein Executed In Iraq (BBC) 22
Saddam Hussein, Toppled By U.S., Is Hanged By Iraqis (BLOOM) 23
Exclusive: Videographer Of Saddam Execution (NSWK) 26
Hussein Executed With "Fear In His Face" (CNN) 27
Saddam Hussein Has Been Executed (AFP) 28
Joy Of Capture Muted At End (NYT) 30
Impact Of Hussein's Death Likely To Be Limited (LAT) 31
Hussein's Death Does Not Alter Bush's Problems (CHIT) 32
Hussein Execution: World Reaction (CNN) 33
Saddam Hussein Executed In Baghdad (FT) 34
Iraq Executes Saddam Hussein By Hanging (LAT) 35
Saddam Pays At The End Of A Rope (WT/AP) 36
Hussein Is Executed (PHI) 38
Former Iraqi Dictator Saddam Hussein Executed At 69 (LAT) 39
Obituary: Saddam Hussein (FT) 44
Saddam Hussein Executed, State-run TV Reports (GAN) 47
Hussein Legacy: Megalomaniac, Nationalist Leader (CHIT) 48
Ruthless Ex-dictator Forced The World To Reckon With Him (BOS) 52
Saddam Is The King Of Swing (NYPOST) 54
Arc Of Power Ends In Utter Ignominy (WP) 56
Defiant Despot Who Oppressed Iraq For More Than 30 Years (NYT) 58
Execution Ends Horrific Chapter In Iraqi History (WT) 65
Hussein Was Symbol Of Autocracy, Cruelty In Iraq (CNN) 67
Hated By Many, Mourned By Few (BBC) 70
Rise And Fall Of A Dictator (DMN) 71
The Portrait Of A Dictator (NSDY) 72
Saddam Hussein: From Humble Beginnings To International Infamy (FT) 75
TV Networks Hold Tense Death Watch For Condemned Iraqi Dictator (AP) 76
On TV, Death Watch For Dictator (LAT) 77
How Much Should Be Shown Of A Hanging? Network Executives Wonder And Wait (NYT) 77
With Hussein Dead, Iraqis Consider Fate Of His Body (NYT) 78
Death Of A Dictator (LAT) 79
So Long To "Our" Tyrant (LAT) 80
Justice, But No Reckoning (NYT) 81
U.S. Forces Ready For More Iraq Violence (AP) 82
Iraq Awash In A Multitude Of Warring Groups (UPI) 83
Dec. The Deadliest Month For U.S. Troops (AP) 84

U.S. Toll In Dec. Is Highest Of '06 (WP/AP) 85
Monthly U.S. Toll In Iraq At 2-year High (LAT) 85
Pentagon Maps Plans For Iraq Surge (AP) 86
Pentagon To Request Billions More In War Money (NYT) 87
DOD Lacks Personnel To Oversee Contractors (UPI) 88
U.S. And Iraq Dispute Role Of Iranians But Free Them (NYT) 88
Iraq Expels 2 Iranians Detained By U.S. (WP) 90
More Troops Unhappy With Bush's Course In Iraq, Poll Finds (USAT) 91
We Can't Ignore Iraq's Refugees (WP) 92

Corporate Scandals:

Jobs Helped Pick 'Favorable' Dates For Option Grants (WSJ) 93
Apple Reveals Jobs' Involvement (FT) 96
Apple Admits Wrongdoing But Rallies Around Leader (WP) ... 97
Apple Panel On Options Backs Chief (NYT) 99
Apple Inquiry Clears CEO Jobs Of Wrongdoing On Stock Options Wall Street Relieved, Shares Rise -- But Until Federal Authorities Weigh In, Uncertainty Remains (SFC) 100
MetLife Unit To Pay $19 Million In Settlement Over Commissions (WSJ) 101
Wachovia Fund Arm To Settle Civil Case (WSJ/AP) 102

Criminal Law:

Age No Shield From Prosecution For Alleged Mobster (USAT/AP) 102
Police Seek Clues Tying Va. Attack To Slayings (WP) 104
Sex Offenders In Exile (NYT) 105

Civil Law:

Justice Dept. Files Suit Over Alleged Small Business Fund Fraud (BOS/AP) 106
Sovereign, 3 Investors Sued In Program Fraud (BLOOM) 106
U.S. Sues To Regain Fraud Loss For SBA (PHI) 107

Civil Rights:

Pressure On Nifong In Duke Case (RN&O) 107
Court Backs Affirmative Action Ban In Michigan (WP/AP) 108
Gerald Ford's Affirmative Action (NYT) 108

Antitrust:

AT&T Completes BellSouth Takeover (WP) 109
AT&T Set To Take On Cable As Purchase Is Cleared (WSJ) 111
AT&T Bends, Wins Deal OK (CHIT) 112
AT&T Wins Backing On BellSouth Merger (FT) 113
BellSouth And AT&T Close Deal (NYT) 113
A Win For Net Neutrality (LAT) 115
US Patents For Financial Services Soar (FT) 116

Environment:

U.S. Official Overseeing Oil Program Faces Inquiry (NYT) .. 116
Gentlemen, Start Your Plug-Ins (WSJ) 117

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drunk Or Not, Boggs Was Right About Wiretaps (NOTP) 119

Congress-Administration:

President Takes Cover During Tornado Scare (AP) 120
First Couple Evacuated Amid Texas Tornado Warning (WP) 121
Texas: Tornadoes Kill One; President Waits Out Storm (NYT) 121
Bush Shelters Amid Tornado Alert (BBC) 121
After This Vacation, Bush Will Need Some Rest (LAT) 121
Cheney Faces New Year Of Testing Times (FT) 122
Recent Flexing Of Presidential Powers Had Personal Roots In Ford White House (NYT) 124
Las Vegas Judge Under Investigation (LAT) 125
Children Take Forefront Of Health-Care Plan (WSJ) 127
Elder-Care Costs Deplete Savings Of A Generation (NYT) .. 128
Dealing With Congressman Inc. (NYT) 131

Other News:

No Retreat How The Bulls Stole Wall Street (WSJ) 131
Strong 2006 Finishes Quietly With Slight Drop (WSJ) 133
Stock Market Surged In 2006 (WT/AP) 133
Markets Stay In Black In '06, And Growth Expected Ahead (HC) 135
Stocks Close Out Banner Year With Healthy Gains As Dow Soars 16% (AP) 136
The Risk Business (WSJ) 137
No Pomp For A President In Repose (NYT) 139
Nation Begins Mourning For Ford (LAT) 140
Six Days Of Mourning Begin (WT/AP) 142
Mourning Begins For Gerald Ford (BBC) 143
Washington Prepares For Farewell To Ford (WP) 144
Cortege Honors A Quiet Dignity (WP) 145
At Archives, A Sampling Of History On Display (WP) 146
California Mourners Say Farewell To Ford (CNN) 147
NYSE To Close In Ford's Honor (WSJ) 149
NYSE Joins Nasdaq, Will Close To Honor Ford (WP) 149
Big Board Plans To Close For Ford Funeral (NYT) 149
Ford's Finest Legacy (WP) 150
Edwards, Now Seasoned, Elbows His Way Into The Field (WP) 151
Supporters Try To Entice Obama With Another Round Of Ads (RC) 153
McCain, Romney, Giuliani Top GOP Names (AP) 153

DOJ_NMG_0111574

House Democrats To Object To Florida Election Outcome (NYT) 154
Democrats Will Allow Buchanan To Be Seated Jan. 4 (RC) 155
Buchanan Will Be Seated, But Dems Say Battle Continues (HILL) 156
Trounced At Polls, Kansas GOP Is Still Plagued By Infighting (WP) 157
No Lack Of Donors For Governor's Inaugural (LAT) 158
Spitzer Plans Inauguration Reflecting Vow Of Openness (NYT) 159
New Laws Show State Concerns (WP/AP) 160
A City Of Memorials Finds Itself Filling Up (NYT) 161
Somali Leader Promises Peace (WT/AP) 163
Somali PM Arrives With Pledge Of Rebuilding (FT) 163
Mogadishu Crowds Greet Somali PM (BBC) 164
Somalis Split As Fighting Halts And Hint Of Insurgency Looms (NYT) 165
China Seeks Wider Military Reach As Economy Grows (WSJ) 166
China Offers Glimpse Of Rationale Behind Its Military Policies (WP) 168
China's Military Spending To Reach $36bn (FT) 169
The Case For Iran (LAT) 170
Turkmen Exile Urges Interim President To Step Down (NYT) 171
Russia Gas Standoff With Belarus Intensifies (NYT) 172
Belarus Leader Defiant Ahead Of Gas Talks (FT) 173
Slovenia Adopts Euro On Monday; No Small Victory (WSJ) ..174
Sinn Fein To Discuss Backing Police (AP) 175
Sinn Fein Vote For Watershed Conference On N. Ireland Policing (AFP) 175
Sinn Fein Leaders Agree To Vote On Northern Ireland Policing (BLOOM) 176
Bush Signs US-Vietnam Trade Measure (AFP) 177
Convicted Marine Out Of Manila Jail (AP) 177
Reid: U.S. Seeks Good Ties With Ecuador (AP) 178
Female Leaders' Rivalry Seen Hurting Bangladesh (WT/AP) 178
Crowds Of Pupils But Little Else In African Schools (NYT) ...180
4 Suspects In '94 Massacres Of Rwanda Tutsi Are Held In London To Face Extradition (NYT) 182
Desmond Tutu The Archbishop (WSJ) 183
Giant Ice Shelf Breaks Free In Arctic; Climate Change Cited As Major Factor (WP/AP) 185
Obstacles In Turkey's Path (NYT) 186

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Eager To Put '06 Behind (WT)

By Stephen Dinan
The Washington Times, December 30, 2006

President Bush was so eager to be done with 2006 that he lopped off the final 10 days in his year-end press conference last week, answering one question as if it were already 2007 and he were already dealing with the new Democratic Congress.

The year that saw his poll approval ratings fall to new lows, saw Congress back him off his veto threat on the Dubai ports deal and forced him to issue his first veto, on stem-cell research, ended with Democrats' winning outright control of Congress.

But he also won confirmation of a second justice to the Supreme Court and won congressional approval of detention and military trials for detainees in the war on terror.

Just as important, the United States helped Britain foil another major terrorist plot to hijack airplanes this past summer, and the fifth full year since September 11 is about to expire without another successful terrorist attack on U.S. soil.

At the same time, though, the situation in Iraq deteriorated, and the administration made only halting progress in using diplomacy to try to contain Iran's and North Korea's nuclear programs.

Overall, it was a year of steps forward followed almost always by steps back, and vice versa, particularly on domestic matters:

DOJ_NMG_0111575

• On immigration, the president deployed thousands of National Guard troops to the border and signed the Secure Fence Act to build about 700 miles of wall along the U.S.-Mexico border, but his effort to win a broader immigration bill that included citizenship rights for most illegal aliens was stymied.

• On trade, the administration won passage of several smaller free-trade agreements -- with Bahrain and Oman -- but saw the Doha round of World Trade Organization talks break down over the summer.

• The Supreme Court ruled Mr. Bush did not have the unilateral authority to establish military commissions to try detainees in the war on terror, but in an election-season campaign-style push, the president wrangled the authority from Congress.

James Pfiffner, a professor at George Mason University who studies the presidency, said that represented a major victory for Mr. Bush and for the executive branch.

"No previous president has sought this type of power from Congress," Mr. Pfiffner said. "President Bush won another battle for executive power. Future court challenges may undermine part of this law, but in the meantime, President Bush can push his discretion to the limits with congressional approval."

Mr. Pfiffner said the congressional elections, in which the president's party lost control of both chambers and most of the candidates Mr. Bush campaigned for in the final days went down to defeat, is the biggest political setback for the president.

Looking back during his year-end press conference, Mr. Bush acknowledged it was "a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people," but said here at home the economy "continues to post strong gains."

Asked to look at his legacy, Mr. Bush did not find anything in 2006, and had to reach further back in his tenure, choosing to highlight 2003's overhaul of Medicare, 2001's No Child Left Behind education bill and the tax cuts of 2001 and 2003.

Mr. Bush had ended 2005 with approval ratings at about 45 percent, and with one December 2005 poll even putting him at the 50 percent mark.

And the new year began with some good news for the president when the Senate voted to confirm federal Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court.

But as 2006 went on, he stumbled, losing a battle with his own party in Congress over transferring management of six U.S. ports from a British company to a state-run company from Dubai.

Congress also forced him into his first veto, on a measure to expand federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research. That veto was sustained by a vote in the House.

His approval ratings slid steadily toward 30 percent, with just one sustained uptick in September as he went on the offensive to win new tools in the war on terror. That boost ended with the revelation that Republican Rep. Mark Foley of Florida sent sexually explicit messages to a male teen in the House page program.

Administration officials do list a series of accomplishments, including passage of bills to boost port security, preparations for a flu pandemic, increased Pell Grant funding, and renewal of the Magnuson-Stevens Act that governs marine conservation and the fishing industry.

The big-ticket items the administration points to are renewal of the Patriot Act, passage of the Secure Fence Act and the grant of authority for military tribunals for detainees.

Appeals Court Rejects Brief Submitted By Ex-Judges (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

Seven former federal judges were told yesterday that their views were not welcome at the federal appeals court in Washington.

A divided panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which will soon decide an important case concerning detainees at Guantánamo Bay, rejected a friend-of-the-court brief submitted in the case by the retired judges. Two former chief judges of the court were among those rebuffed.

The unsigned majority decision, for Judges David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, said the brief violated a 1982 advisory opinion from a committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States, which is the administrative and policy-making body of the federal court system.

DOJ_NMG_0111576

"Judges should insure that the title 'judge' is not used in the courtroom or in papers involved in litigation before them to designate a former judge," the advisory opinion said.

Briefs by former judges supporting one side or the other in significant cases are relatively common. The brief rejected yesterday urged the appeals court to allow Guantánamo detainees to challenge their detentions notwithstanding a new law, the Military Commissions Act, that the government says now bars the courthouse door.

Judge Judith W. Rogers dissented. She said the 1982 advisory opinion was meant to address situations in which former judges acting as lawyers are referred to by the honorific title "Judge." That practice, if allowed in court, could improperly influence juries, confuse people and make parties to lawsuits lose confidence in the judicial system.

But the situation here, with former judges submitting an appellate brief on their own behalf and with the government's consent, is different, Judge Rogers wrote. "Indeed, denying the unopposed motion for leave to file may itself create an appearance of partiality," she wrote.

David B. Rivkin, who was an official in the administrations of Ronald Reagan and the first President George Bush, said he detected a political undertone.

"It certainly tells you," Mr. Rivkin said, "how at least some of the D. C. Circuit judges feel about the anti-Bush-administration judicial activism by their former colleagues."

Judge Sentelle was appointed by Reagan, Judge Randolph by the first President Bush and Judge Rogers by President Bill Clinton. The two former chief judges on the brief, Abner J. Mikva and Patricia M. Wald, were appointed by President Jimmy Carter.

Mr. Mikva said the rejection of his brief was motivated by personal animus, not politics. "It's not political at all," he said in an interview. "This was clearly aimed at me."

The judges in the majority, Mr. Mikva said, were furious with him because he opposed allowing judges to accept free trips to resorts for seminars sponsored by private groups.

"They're so close to retirement age," Mr. Mikva said of the judges in the majority. "They really should grow up."

Experts in legal ethics were divided over yesterday's ruling. Ronald D. Rotunda, a law professor at George Mason University, said it was an unexceptional application of a sensible policy.

"There is no particular reason why former judges should be able to leverage their titles in litigation," Professor Rotunda said.

Stephen Gillers, a law professor at New York University, disagreed. "It's more than petty," Professor Gillers said of the brief's rejection. "It's unnecessary and insulting."

He added that the objection was an empty formality, as former judges remain free to submit briefs if they omit references to their prior judicial service.

Whatever its basis and wisdom, yesterday's order probably indicates that a ruling in the underlying case is near. In a 1994 libel case, a panel including Judges Mikva and Wald rejected a supporting brief that Kenneth W. Starr, a former judge on the court, had tried to submit on behalf of several news organizations. The panel decided the libel case the next day.

Retired Judges' Opinions Shunned (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, December 30, 2006

An appeals court considering whether Guantanamo Bay detainees have constitutional rights said yesterday that it will not accept arguments by seven retired federal judges who oppose a new U.S. anti-terrorism law.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit is examining whether enemy combatants should be allowed to challenge their detention in U.S. courts. President Bush signed a law this fall forbidding such challenges and the Justice Department says detainees are not protected by the Constitution.

Seven federal judges from both political parties filed friend-of-the-court briefs in November urging the appeals court to declare key parts of the new law unconstitutional. They said the law, which sets up military commissions to hear terrorism cases, "challenges the integrity of our judicial system" and effectively sanctions the use of torture.

DOJ_NMG_0111577

In a 2-1 decision yesterday, a panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit said it would not accept that brief on a legal technicality, saying the title "judge" should not be used to describe former judges in legal proceedings.

The panel's more conservative judges, David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, issued the opinion with Judge Judith W. Rogers, an appointee of President Clinton, dissenting.

Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor, said it's unusual for such briefs to be rejected. He said the ruling could indicate a decision in the detainee case is near.

Opponents Of Law On Detainees Rebuffed (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

An appeals court considering whether Guantanamo Bay detainees have constitutional rights said yesterday that it will not accept arguments by seven retired federal judges who oppose a new U.S. anti-terrorism law.

In a 2 to 1 decision yesterday, a panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit said it would not accept the judges' brief on a legal technicality, saying the title "judge" should not be used to describe former judges in legal proceedings. The court is examining whether "enemy combatants" should be allowed to challenge their detention in U.S. courts.

Seven retired federal judges from both political parties filed a friend-of-the-court brief in November, urging the appeals court to declare parts of the new law, which was signed by President Bush this fall, unconstitutional.

They said the law, which sets up military commissions to hear terrorism cases, "challenges the integrity of our judicial system" and effectively sanctions the use of torture.

The appeals panel's more conservative judges, David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, issued the opinion, with Judge Judith W. Rogers, an appointee of President Bill Clinton, dissenting.

Carl W. Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor, said it is unusual for such briefs to be rejected.

The Former Magnificent Seven (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 30, 2006

As the clock moved toward midnight in the judicial year yesterday, two federal appeals court judges issued an exquisite, brief ruling that should have members of the legal fraternity clucking from Manhattan to San Francisco.

Judges David Sentelle and Ray Randolph ruled that the amicus briefs filed by seven former federal judges on behalf of dozens of Guantanamo detainees in their lawsuits against the U.S. government were impermissible. Why? Because the erstwhile judicial seven had appended the title "judge" before their names in the filings and thereby stood, or sat, in violation of Advisory Opinion No. 72 of the Committee on Codes of Conduct, which holds that a former judge should forbear using the title "judge" in the courts.

Undeniably, former Judges Abner Mikva, Patricia Wald, Shirley Hufstedler, et al., are trying to throw the full weight of their former eminence against the new Gitmo detainee law passed by Congress this fall. Dissenting from the Sentelle-Randolph ruling, Judge Judith Rogers argued that the seven amici were no less entitled to comment as judges than, say, "law professors" or other interested parties.

Perhaps, but forgive us for thinking that these amici expected their criticism of the new detainee law signed by President Bush to be seen, even admired, as the views of the magnificent seven, not the merely mortal thoughts of law professors.

Indeed, a footnote to Friday's ruling quotes Advisory Opinion No. 72, warning against the special aura such amici may emit: "A litigant whose lawyer is called 'Mr.' and whose adversary's lawyer is called 'Judge,' may reasonably lose a degree of confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary."

To say the least. We see little reason why that endless roster of former judges, ambassadors, generals and the like shouldn't approach the bench as do the rest of us. These seven should feel free to refile their opinions, as Mr., Ms., or whatever.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Security Effort By Coast Guard Is Falling Short (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0111578

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

MIAMI, Dec. 29 — A Coast Guard plan to combat terrorism by creating the maritime equivalent of an air traffic control system in the coastal waters here, a test for a nationwide effort, has fallen far short of expectations.

The Coast Guard installed long-range surveillance cameras, coastal radar and devices that automatically identify approaching vessels to help search out possible threats.

But the radar, it turns out, confuses waves with boats. The cameras cover just a sliver of the harbor and coasts. And only a small fraction of vessels can be identified automatically.

Officials acknowledge the limited progress that the Department of Homeland Security and the Coast Guard have made toward creating a viable defense here in Miami or at harbors nationwide against a maritime attack, despite the billions of dollars invested since 2001.

"The more vigilant and alert you are, the less likely the adversary will decide this is a good way to strike at you," said Capt. Dana A. Goward, director of the Coast Guard project, called Maritime Domain Awareness. "For now, there are lots of cockpit doors that have not been reinforced."

In fact, the Coast Guard estimates that 14 boats smuggling drugs, guns or immigrants or engaged in other crimes reach United States shores every week.

In 2003, for example, a Cuban patrol boat, armed with two machine guns, landed at a Key West resort, its crew seeking to defect. The Coast Guard is often asked, "How in the world did they get through?" Captain Goward said. Quoting a former commandant, he responded, "With all due respect, how did they get through — what?"

The frustrating pace of progress is due to several factors, say officials, port security experts and government auditors:

¶The communications, boat tracking and surveillance equipment rarely lives up to its promised capacity; for the largest systems, work is far behind schedule and over budget.

¶Unlike the relatively unified command over the nation's skies, control of the waterways and coasts is divided among at least 15 federal agencies, which sometimes act more like rivals than partners.

¶Even if the federal government can successfully gather tips on vessels that might present a threat, it will be of little help because the Coast Guard does not have enough armed vessels or planes to take action before it is too late.

Miami was selected to serve as a laboratory for the Maritime Domain Awareness project.

The city not only has a major container port serving as a distribution point for much of Latin America, but it is also the world's largest cruise ship destination.

And the waterways are usually packed with hundreds, and sometimes thousands, of small boats, any of them capable of the sort of attack that damaged the Navy destroyer Cole in Yemen six years ago, killing 17 people and injuring 39.

Some progress has been made here and at other high-profile ports since 2001. Ships approaching the United States must provide notice 96 hours before they arrive. The Coast Guard then determines whether to board a vessel before it lands — it did that about 10,000 times in 2005.

At the Miami harbor, a protective zone around the cruise ship terminal is enforced by security guards on boats. The Coast Guard has significantly expanded its fleet of small, fast harbor patrol boats. And in Miami and a dozen other ports, the service has set up teams of officers to respond to a hostage crisis or other emergency.

The surveillance effort in Miami, known as Project Hawkeye, was intended to search out vessels that might present a threat, allowing the Coast Guard to try to foil an impending attack.

Using radar, the Coast Guard would track boats larger than 25 feet within 12 miles of shore. Smaller vessels — as little as a Jet Ski — would be tracked with infrared cameras up to five miles offshore. The surveillance would cover an area from Fort Lauderdale to the Florida Keys.

To identify which vessels among the thousands might pose a danger, the Coast Guard would rely on sophisticated software that would assemble and analyze all this data. Under the plan, Coast Guard officials would be alerted when boats entered restricted waters, loitered in a vulnerable spot or displayed an unusual course or speed.

DOJ_NMG_0111579

The cameras have at times proved helpful, allowing the Coast Guard to investigate how a ship went aground or to monitor security contractors at the cruise ship terminal, to make sure they are doing their job, said Capt. Liam Slein, deputy commander of the Miami sector.

But the cameras, it turns out, are not powerful enough or installed widely enough to track small boats approaching the many inlets in the Miami area. The radar system is so unreliable — mistaking waves for boats, splitting large ships in two or becoming confused by rain — Coast Guard staff personnel have been told not to waste much time looking at it.

And technology the Coast Guard has required for large ships and wants installed on commercial fishing vessels, devices that automatically identify an approaching ship's name, location and course, has also provoked concerns.

The Automated Identification System, as it is known, was first developed as a collision avoidance measure, not a security system, and was not made tamperproof. A captain or crew wanting to hide or disguise their location could simply turn the system off, or enter data that transmitted false information about the vessel's whereabouts and identity.

"This is a serious design flaw for a security system," wrote Jay Creech, a retired Coast Guard captain, and Capt. Joseph F. Ryan of the merchant marine, in an analysis of the system.

Most critically, the software system intended to make sense of all the collected data has not yet been installed in Miami. That means that very little of what the cameras are filming or the radar is tracking is ever used or even watched. The data is of such limited value that at least for now, the Coast Guard has assigned only volunteers to deal with it.

One recent day one of those volunteers, Eduardo Burbank, 68, a retiree and boat enthusiast, was sitting at a computer terminal using the Automated Identification signals to confirm the identity of container ships approaching the harbor. Anything smaller was ignored.

"Every little boat that comes in, we can't check all that," Mr. Burbank said.

A surveillance system similar to the one in Miami is supposed to be installed at as many as 35 ports. But given the challenges here, and the unwillingness of Congress to finance the still-unproven effort, the Coast Guard has delayed expanding the effort to other ports until at least 2014.

Some port security experts say it is Congress, not the Coast Guard, that deserves much of the blame for the slow pace of progress. The total spending to date on the Miami surveillance effort has been about $10 million, and similar projects nationwide total less than $100 million.

Elected officials remain fixated on costly plans to scan cargo containers for nuclear weapons or on measures like security fences at port terminals, critics say, instead of the greater threat presented by small boats packed with conventional bombs.

"The United States is wasting money by doling out millions of dollars in port security grants that are not adding much security," said James Jay Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation, who urged that spending on programs like the Miami surveillance project be accelerated.

The delays in the program are part of what has become a pattern for the Coast Guard, when it comes to high-tech initiatives to increase security or enhance maritime safety.

Rescue 21, a 911-like emergency call dispatch system considered a critical precursor to the Maritime Domain Awareness effort, was supposed to be installed nationwide by 2006, at a cost of $250 million, allowing faster and more reliable tracking of boats in distress.

Now estimated to cost as much as $872 million, the project will not be ready nationwide until 2011, Congressional auditors say. And it will not work as promised: the Coast Guard will not initially be able to use the system to track its own boats.

The Coast Guard is also still struggling to settle on an approach to gather all the data it and other federal agencies collect about potential maritime threats globally and nationally. But the commitment to work together has not always been honored by all the federal agencies.

During a drill in which officials pretended that a ferry had been hijacked by terrorists, the Coast Guard and the Federal Bureau of Investigation competed for the right to take charge, a contest that became so intense that the Coast Guard players manipulated the war game to cut the F.B.I. out, government auditors say.

"Unless such differences over roles and authorities are resolved," a Justice Department report issued this year said, "the response to a maritime incident could be confused and potentially disastrous."

DOJ_NMG_0111580

Here in South Florida and elsewhere across the United States, another obstacle exists to blocking possible threats.

Last month, the Coast Guard pulled from service 8 of its 10 patrol boats stationed at Key West, after the just-renovated boats suffered hull breaches and mechanical problems. Among the ships the service said it planned to use as a replacement were slow-moving buoy tenders.

Outside New York, the Coast Guard has used a 43-year-old ice-breaking tug boat to patrol around the Indian Point nuclear power plant. The ship has a top speed of 10 knots and no weapons, other than the handguns carried by some of the crew.

"I don't know how the Coast Guard intends to stop a high-speed boat, loaded with explosives," Representative Sue W. Kelly, Republican of New York, said at a recent hearing where she questioned a senior Coast Guard official.

Lt. Justin W. Noggle, chief of the Miami sector command center, said he recognized that many of the antiterror tools the Coast Guard had installed were falling far short of their goals. But it still is progress, Lieutenant Noggle said.

"We are just in the infancy of this effort here," he said. "But if you don't start somewhere, you don't get anywhere."

Road At Trade Center Site To Be Excavated For Remains (NYT)

By David W. Dunlap

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

Most of the service road along the western edge of the World Trade Center site will be excavated as part of the expanded search for human remains at ground zero, the Bloomberg administration said yesterday.

The overall effort — searching buildings, excavating the block where St. Nicholas Greek Orthodox Church stood, investigating 595 manholes and other underground structures — may cost as much as $30 million, Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler said in a memorandum yesterday to Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg.

It has long been suspected by those who knew the site during the recovery effort in 2001 and 2002 that debris from the twin towers, possibly including remains, would be found in the layer of fill under the asphalt service road, also known as the haul road. The road runs four blocks, from Vesey Street to Liberty Street.

Four remains were recovered yesterday from the haul road, said Ellen Borakove, a spokeswoman for the office of the chief medical examiner. They are regarded as potentially human, pending further testing.

More than 200 human remains have been identified since October from material taken out of seven abandoned Consolidated Edison manholes under the road. That included 202 remains found in one of the northern manholes, known as Manhole 1, which led to the city's expanded search.

A 5-foot-wide exploratory trench, 18 inches to 8 feet deep, was dug this month down the middle of the road. (The trench is covered with steel plates, allowing vehicles to pass over it.) The chief medical examiner has begun analyzing the material taken from the trench in a sifting center at 11 Water Street in Brooklyn, near the Brooklyn Bridge.

"Based on the appearance of what could be W.T.C.-related debris in the trench," Mr. Skyler said in his memorandum yesterday, "the majority of the haul road requires further excavation."

Possible trade center debris may include anything that does not belong in clean road fill: pieces of computer equipment, for example, or carpeting or furniture or wiring.

The haul road was built twice. Shortly after 9/11, a roadway of gravel and fill was laid down, followed in March 2002 by an asphalt road. Trade center debris may lie under this asphalt, which also covered the Con Ed manholes until recently.

The southern three-quarters of the haul road will be excavated, Mr. Skyler said, along with a small section of the northern part of the road.

Sally Regenhard, an advocate for victims' families, has never recovered her son, Christian, who was killed on 9/11. She and others have criticized the city's search as not being comprehensive enough. Learning that three-quarters of the road would be excavated, she said: "Please stop this incremental torture that families are going through. Just dig up the entire haul road."

Mr. Skyler said 766 remains had been recovered from the former Deutsche Bank building opposite ground zero. The first through fifth floors remain to be searched. The entire 41-story tower, which was damaged and badly contaminated on 9/11, is to be dismantled by December 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0111581

The medical examiner will also search Fiterman Hall of the Borough of Manhattan Community College and a building at 130 Cedar Street. Mr. Skyler added in a telephone interview that the city did not expect the search to interfere with the reconstruction of the trade center.

Search For Human Remains Expands At World Trade Center (AP)

By Sara Kugler

AP, December 29, 2006

NEW YORK — The search for human remains at the World Trade Center site will be expanded, a city official said Friday, hours before searchers found what may be more bone fragments at the site.

In a memo to Mayor Michael Bloomberg about the search for remains, Deputy Mayor Ed Skyler said debris believed to be from the towers had been dug up from under a service road on the site's western edge and said more of the road would be excavated.

Crews sifting through the material have reported finding computer parts, office carpet, electrical wires and steel from the building.

"Based on the appearance of what could be WTC-related debris in the trench, the majority of the haul road requires further excavation," Skyler wrote. He said officials had identified another 165 underground utility cavities in the streets around the site that need to be searched, bringing the total number to nearly 600.

Hours later, word came from the site that workers had found what appeared to be several more pieces of bone from the road excavation.

The renewed search for remains began in October after utility crews found bones in an abandoned manhole that had been paved over and forgotten along the western edge of the site.

In the hurry to finish cleaning up the site during the spring of 2002, that manhole and a number of other subterranean pockets were never searched for victims' remains.

Until Friday, the only remains turned up since the search resumed were some 200 bones in the initial manhole, plus a handful of fragments in three other manholes.

Some victims' families have pushed for a wider excavation under the service road, saying they believed crews in 2002 used rubble from the towers instead of clean soil when they were excavating the disaster site and building the road — a charge the city denies.

"Thank God. Thank God they're finally doing this," said Tim Sumner, whose brother-in-law, firefighter Joseph Leavey, was killed in the terrorist attacks.

Some 40% of the 2,749 people killed in the Sept. 11 attack there still have not had any remains identified. None of the new discoveries has been matched to any of the dead.

Skyler estimated in his letter that the year-long search effort would cost $30 million.

WAR NEWS:

Saddam Hussein Put To Death (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 30 -- Former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein was hanged in the predawn hours of Saturday for crimes against humanity in the mass murder of Shiite men and boys in the 1980s, sent to the gallows by a government backed by the United States and led by Shiite Muslims who had been oppressed during his rule, Iraqi and American officials said.

In the early morning, Hussein, 69, was escorted from his U.S. military prison cell at Camp Cropper, near the Baghdad airport, and handed over to Iraqi officials. He was executed on the day Sunni Muslims, of which Hussein was one, begin celebrating the Muslim festival of Eid al-Adha.

DOJ_NMG_0111582

Earlier, on Thursday, he had met with his two maternal half brothers in his prison cell and handed them personal messages, according to Iraqi officials. On Friday, his attorneys said, U.S. military officials asked that they take his personal belongings.

In Crawford, Tex., President Bush said in a statement that Hussein received "the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime." He added, "Fair trials were unimaginable under Saddam Hussein's tyrannical rule. It is a testament to the Iraqi people's resolve to move forward after decades of oppression that, despite his terrible crimes against his own people, Saddam Hussein received a fair trial. This would not have been possible without the Iraqi people's determination to create a society governed by the rule of law."

After the execution, celebratory gunfire broke out in Baghdad. Iraqis across the nation sent text messages to their relatives and friends as soon as they heard of Hussein's execution. Ali al-Hayeri, one of the witnesses who testified openly in the Dujail trial, said he received his first text message at 3:15 am. It read: "We congratulate you for the execution of the tyrant Saddam."

"This is what should happen," said Suad Shakir, 52, a resident of the Karrada district in Baghdad, and a Christian. "People will be relieved. I hope that it will bring good to Iraq." She said she wanted Hussein to be executed. "He hurt Iraqis," she said. "We haven't seen anything good from him."

In the southern city of Najaf, hundreds of Shiites stepped outside their houses and began firing guns in the air in joyous celebration. "Saddam executed seven of my relatives," said Muhammad Hussein Kamil, 45, a day laborer. "It is the end for any dictator, and he will be an example to every dictator in the world. They will know that any one who will insult his people will be facing the same fate."

"Saddam and his family are harvesting what they have planted of fear, and today, he and his family are paying a high price in front of the Iraqi people, and God's punishment will be more than this."

Ali Hameed Ridha 47, a government employee from Najaf, said he walked outside and handed out candies and sweets in the streets the moment he heard that Hussein was executed.

Also to be hanged are Hussein's half brother Barzan Ibrahim and Awad Haman Bander, the former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court, but they were not executed with him. Four other co-defendants received prison terms ranging from 15 years to life. On Tuesday, the appeals court upgraded former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan's life sentence to the death penalty.

Also Tuesday, the appeals court upheld Hussein's death sentence for the killings of 148 people after an attempt was made on his life in the northern Iraqi city of Dujail in 1982. The court said the former president should be hanged within 30 days. Since his capture by U.S. troops in December 2003, Hussein had legally been in Iraq's custody but remained under American watch at a military prison near one of his old palaces.

The Iraqi government, led by Shiite Muslims and northern Kurds, kept the impending execution a secret from its citizens. In doing so, government officials feared that even close to death, Hussein could cause additional chaos. Sunni Arab loyalists, who view him as a symbol of their resistance, had already vowed to take revenge.

"It's like God asking you to choose between Heaven and Hell," said Thamer al-Musawi, 47, a slim, salt-and-pepper-haired barber in Baghdad's Karrada neighborhood, speaking before the execution. "If Saddam gets executed, you go to Hell. If he doesn't, you go to Heaven. I will choose Hell just so Saddam is executed.

"He is not a human being. He does not deserve to be alive."

Hussein leaves a legacy of fear, poverty and a profound despair among Iraqis that their nation, rich in history and endowed with oil, crumbled under his watch, and has been engulfed in war since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 to overthrow Hussein. At the same time, many Iraqis, engulfed by sectarian violence and a lack of services, have expressed nostalgia for the security they enjoyed under Hussein, although they despised his rule.

Hussein's execution marks a shift in the fortunes of Iraq's Sunni Arabs, who formed the core of Iraq's bureaucracy under his rule and are struggling for a foothold in the country's political process. A central question is whether his death at the hands of a Shiite-led government will alienate more Sunnis and hinder efforts at national reconciliation.

Iraqi and U.S. officials also predicted an upsurge in violence, at least in the short term, as Hussein loyalists and former Baathists seek to avenge his death. But it is unclear how influential those groups are today. The goals of the insurgent groups that form the bulwark of the Sunni resistance have been to oust the U.S.-led occupation and gain political power rather than fight for Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0111583

Some Iraqis said that religious and sectarian symbolism guided the timing of the execution. Sunni Muslims consider Saturday the beginning of Eid, while Shiites start celebrating Sunday. Eid commemorates prophet Ibrahim's willingness to sacrifice his son to God. It also marks the end of the hajj pilgrimage to Mecca, a trip millions of Muslims worldwide make each year. In Eid, a sheep is usually slaughtered as a symbol of Ibrahim's sacrifice and its meat is shared among neighbors, relatives and the needy.

Hussein's final days were rife with controversy. Many human rights groups criticized his death sentence as unfair and marred by procedural flaws. There was failure to disclose key evidence to Hussein's attorneys, as well as violations of the basic rights of the defendants to confront witnesses, rights activists said. The first presiding judge resigned. Iraqi politicians routinely denounced the tribunal as weak. Three defense attorneys and a witness were assassinated. Outbursts by the second chief judge, Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman, undermined his impartiality, the activists said.

"The rushed execution of Saddam Hussein is simply wrong," said Larry Cox, the U.S. head of Amnesty International, in a statement. "It signifies justice denied for countless victims who endured unspeakable suffering during his regime, and now have been denied their right to see justice served. It is a failed opportunity to establish the rule of law in Iraq."

Iraqi and U.S. officials, in turn, angrily declared that the Iraqi government did not interfere in the judicial process. The verdict, they said, was just and would close the book on one of modern Iraq's most violent periods. Nevertheless, the year-long trial further deepened Iraq's sectarian divide, as Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds reacted to Hussein's case along the fault lines of sect and history.

Late Friday, a U.S. judge refused to halt the hanging.

Until his death, Hussein exhibited the same defiance that was synonymous with his rule. Even after U.S. forces captured him in a small northern village on the outskirts of his native Tikrit, Hussein insisted that he be referred to as Iraq's president. He turned the trial into a theater of the absurd in which he mocked judges, hurled political invective and walked out of the court. In one session, Ibrahim arrived in long underwear and sat with his back to the judges.

On Wednesday, a farewell letter posted on several Web sites in the name of Hussein declared that he was ready to die and urged Iraqis not to hate the people of the nations that had invaded Iraq, just their leaders. His attorneys said the letter was authentic and was written Nov. 5, the day his death sentence was delivered, because Hussein was not given a chance to make a final statement in the courtroom. A portion of it read:

"Here, I offer my soul to God as a sacrifice, and if God wants He will lift it up to where the first believers and martyrs are, and if His decision is postponed, then He is the most merciful." It was impossible to independently verify the letter's authenticity.

Hussein, who ordered the executions of thousands of Iraqis, in his final hours became a cause celebre for advocates against capital punishment. European leaders appealed to the Iraqi government not to impose the verdict. Cardinal Renato Martino, Pope Benedict XVI's top official on justice matters, told the Italian newspaper La Repubblica that executing Hussein would punish "a crime with another crime."

Many Kurds were disappointed that Hussein was executed for the Dujail killings, widely viewed as a test case for the larger, and more significant, Anfal genocide trial. That trial, which began in August, was chronicling, often in painful testimonies, the systematic killings of tens of thousands of Kurds with chemical weapons and poison gas. Hussein was scheduled to return to the courtroom Jan. 8.

Bush: Execution Will Not Halt Violence (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD, Texas (AP) -- President Bush said Friday that Saddam Hussein's execution marks the "end of a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops" and cautioned that his death will not halt the violence in Iraq.

Yet, Bush said in a statement issued from his ranch in Texas, "it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain and defend itself, and be an ally in the war on terror."

DOJ_NMG_0111584

In a message of assurance to the people of Iraq, Bush said the execution was a reminder of how far the Iraqi people have come since the end of Saddam's rule.

"The progress they have made would not have been possible without the continued service and sacrifice of our men and women in uniform," he said.

Bush, who has spent weeks crafting a new U.S. policy in Iraq, warned of more challenges for U.S. troops.

"Many difficult choices and further sacrifices lie ahead," he said. "Yet the safety and security of the American people require that we not relent in ensuring that Iraq's young democracy continues to progress."

When Saddam was apprehended in 2003, Bush promised that the deposed Iraqi leader would "face the justice he denied to millions." The administration blamed Saddam for hundreds of thousands of mass executions.

In November, Saddam was sentenced to death after being convicted of murder in the killings of 148 Shiite Muslims from an Iraqi town where assassins tried to kill him in 1982.

After three decades in power, Saddam was captured in December 2003 in an underground hideout on a farm near his hometown of Tikrit. Two days later, Bush remarked: "Good riddance. The world is better off without you, Mr. Saddam Hussein."

The president was briefed at 6:15 p.m. CST by National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley about the execution procedure, and that it would go forward in the next few hours. Hadley had been in touch with U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, who had been in contact with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Bush was asleep when the execution occurred.

"The president concluded his day knowing that the final phase of bringing Saddam Hussein to justice was under way," deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said.

As his execution drew near, Saddam's lawyers filed an appeal trying to stave it off.

However, U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, who heard arguments from attorneys by phone, rejected the challenge Friday night. She said U.S. courts do not have jurisdiction to interfere in another country's judicial process.

In the 21-page request filed Friday, Saddam's attorneys argued that because Saddam also faces a civil lawsuit in Washington, he has rights as a civil defendant that would be violated if he is executed. He has not received notice of those rights and the consequences that the lawsuit would have on his estate, his attorneys said.

"To protect those rights, defendant Saddam Hussein requests an order of this court providing a stay of his execution until further notice of this court," attorney Nicholas Gilman wrote.

In Iraq, U.S. forces were ready for any escalation of violence associated with the execution, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said several hours before Saddam was hanged.

Closer to home, Americans were warned by the FBI and the Homeland Security Department to be vigilant about the possibility of a terror attack. The advisory sent to local law enforcement did not cite a specific threat.

American sentiment about the war has changed dramatically since 2003, when jubilant crowds toppled a 40-foot statue of the dictator and a deshelved Saddam, in U.S. custody, was seen on television being examined by a doctor who probed his mouth with a tongue depressor.

Then, Saddam's capture helped Bush's political stature following months of rising casualties and growing doubts about his handling of Iraq. The months-long manhunt for Saddam had damaged U.S. prestige and claims of progress in Iraq.

Now, unrelenting violence and a U.S. death toll nearing 3,000 has sent Bush's approval ratings on the war plumeting to their lowest levels.

Seventy-one percent disapprove of his management of the war; almost two-thirds doubt that a stable, democratic government will ever be established in Iraq, according to early December AP-Ipsos polling.

Bush called the execution a historical moment in Iraq's road to democracy.

"Saddam Hussein's execution comes at the end of a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops," he saad. "Bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq, but it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain and defend itself, and be an ally in the war on terror."

DOJ_NMG_0111585

Among the U.S. lawmakers responding to word of Saddam's execution, Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said he hoped the families of Saddam's victims could now begin "the healing process."

"Iraq has closed one of the darkest chapters in its history and rid the world of a tyrant," Biden said in a statement. "Every effort was made to afford Saddam the judicial rights he denied to the 148 innocent victims of Dujail and to hundreds of thousands of other Iraqis during his brutal reign."

The Republican leader-elect of the Senate, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said Saddam had finally met justice.

"Today the world was rid of a brutal dictator," McConnell said. "The free people of Iraq must now go forward together to build a unified nation, and leave behind sectarian divisions."

Bush: Credit Iraqis For Fair Trial Of Hussein (CNN)

CNN.com, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- President Bush, able to claim few victories in the war in Iraq, issued a satisfied but measured statement about 90 minutes after former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was executed.

"Fair trials were unimaginable under Saddam Hussein's tyrannical rule," the president said. "It is a testament to the Iraqi people's resolve to move forward after decades of oppression that, despite his terrible crimes against his own people, Saddam Hussein received a fair trial. This would not have been possible without the Iraqi people's determination to create a society governed by the rule of law."

The White House said Bush was asleep at the time of the execution but was briefed by national security adviser Stephen Hadley before retiring.

In his statement, the president acknowledged that things have not gone well since Hussein was chased from power by coalition forces in 2003.

"Saddam Hussein's execution comes at the end of a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops," he said. "Bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq, but it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain, and defend itself, and be an ally in the war on terror."

The president praised the troops fighting the war and expressed optimism tempered by the reality of sectarian fighting and political problems in the United States and in Iraq.

"We are reminded today of how far the Iraqi people have come since the end of Saddam Hussein's rule -- and that the progress they have made would not have been possible without the continued service and sacrifice of our men and women in uniform," he said.

"Many difficult choices and further sacrifices lie ahead. Yet the safety and security of the American people require that we not relent in ensuring that Iraq's young democracy continues to progress."

Dictator Who Ruled Iraq With Violence Is Hanged For Crimes Against Humanity (NYT)

By Marc Santora, James Glanz

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Saturday, Dec. 30 — Saddam Hussein, the dictator who led Iraq through three decades of brutality, war and bombast before American forces chased him from his capital city and captured him in a filthy pit near his hometown, was hanged just before dawn Saturday during the morning call to prayer.

The final stages for Mr. Hussein, 69, came with terrible swiftness after he lost the appeal, five days ago, of his death sentence for the killings of 148 men and boys in the northern town of Dujail in 1982. He had received the sentence less than two months before from a special court set up to judge his reign as the almost unchallenged dictator of Iraq.

His execution at 6:10 a.m. was announced on state-run Iraqiya television, which said 14 Iraqi officials attended the hanging. The location was not announced but witnesses said Mr. Hussein was carrying a Koran and was compliant as the noose was draped around his neck.

“He just gave up,” said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq’s national security adviser. “We were astonished. It was strange. He just gave up.”

DOJ_NMG_0111586

He added: "Saddam Hussein is gone. All Iraqis will look to the future after the end of this era."

President Bush was notified about the execution in a telephone call late Friday to his Texas ranch. He said that the former Iraqi dictator "was executed after receiving a fair trial — the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime."

"Saddam Hussein's execution comes at the end of a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops," Mr. Bush said. "Bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq, but it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain, and defend itself, and be an ally in the war on terror."

There were conflicting accounts about whether two subordinates were hanged with Mr. Hussein. The Iraqi state television said his half-brother ,Barzan Ibrahim, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, the former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court, were hanged after Mr. Hussein. But Mr. Rubaie could not confirm this.

Even as the executions appeared inevitable, many were skeptical or disbelieving that the noose could drop around Mr. Hussein's neck so soon. One Western official said that some of the American legal advisers working on the case appeared stunned at the hasty pace of events late Friday as they walked through the corridors of the Republican Palace, once Mr. Hussein's grandiose center of power.

When Mr. Hussein came to power three years before the Dujail killings, he ruled over an oil-rich country that was an economic and technical powerhouse in the Middle East with rising cultural and political influence in the region. When he hurtled through the trap door of the gallows Saturday morning, the nation he left behind was a smashed and traumatized remnant of that early promise, desperately trying to restore the most basic diplomatic ties with its neighbors.

In between, Mr. Hussein invaded Iran and Kuwait in wars that cost over a million lives and left his military in a shambles, brutally suppressed a Shiite uprising in the south and saw his country become isolated and impoverished under the weight of United Nations-imposed sanctions. Finally, he was ousted by an American-led invasion force in 2003 and the country fell into a new round of internal violence as the rule of law disintegrated and the Western invaders proved unable to control a country in the aftermath of totalitarian rule.

Those developments, so unwelcome to the Americans who so easily conquered this nation, showed that Mr. Hussein was also a unifying force whose painful grip held together Iraq's many ethnicities and sects. Now, three years after his fall, Iraq has descended further and further into chaos.

As Iraqis across the country were trying to process the enormity of what had happened, early reactions mirrored the deep sectarian divide that has been driving much of that violence and threatens to tear the country apart.

"Today is the best day we have seen since the fall of Saddam's regime," said Ayad Jamal al-Deen, a moderate Shiite political leader. "The death of this man will help to release many Baathists from Saddam's mafia. The violence will be reduced."

As Mr. Hussein awaited the hangman early Saturday, he was apparently unaware that the American military was already making plans to dispose of his personal effects.

But Iraqi officials were vague to the end about when the execution would happen. "We will do it very soon," said Munir Haddad, a judge on the Iraqi High Tribunal who represented the body at the execution, Judge Haddad and a second designated witness to the execution said after midnight. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki was still conferring with American officials late Friday night to work out the timing and resolve key details such as what to do with Mr. Hussein's body, a Western official said.

But Mr. Maliki's comments on Friday to the families of people who were killed while Mr. Hussein ruled left no doubt about where the prime minister stood on the time frame of the execution.

"Anyone who rejects the execution of Saddam is undermining the martyrs of Iraq and their dignity," Mr. Maliki said. "Nobody can overrule the execution sentence issued against Saddam."

Without specifying a time, date or place, he said, "There is no review or delay in implementing the execution verdict against Saddam."

Esam al-Gazawi, another lawyer representing Mr. Hussein who is currently in Jordan, expressed the views of many by suggesting that the timing of the execution was determined by the highest levels of the American and Iraqi governments.

"No one knows when it's going to happen except God and President Bush," he said shortly before Mr. Hussein was executed.

DOJ_NMG_0111587

Mr. Hussein spent his final hours in a dreary cell on an American base near the Baghdad airport, and there were indications that he was unaware that the end was drawing near.

Iraqi and American officials kept outsiders, including his legal team, from contacting him all day, according to Najib al-Nauimi, one of Mr. Hussein's lawyers, who was in Qatar.

But the legal team received a request late Friday asking for formal requests from people who could receive Mr. Hussein's effects, another of his lawyers said.

"I gave them a request that my colleagues and I are authorized to get Saddam's personal stuff," said the lawyer, Wadood Fawzi.

In Washington, a United States District Court rejected an emergency motion filed Friday afternoon by lawyers for Mr. Hussein seeking to halt the execution on the grounds that it would interfere with pending civil litigations against him. Judge Kathleen Kollar-Kotelly ruled shortly after 9 p.m. that her court did not have jurisdiction to intercede.

Mr. Hussein's trial and conviction have been mostly welcomed by the Iraqi Shiites and Kurds who suffered under his rule, but it has angered Sunni Muslims, helped to fuel a Sunni-led insurgency and done nothing to calm the increasingly chaotic sectarian violence here.

Concerned that the execution could incite even more violence, United States forces were placed on stepped-up alert and Iraqi officials suggested that the daily curfews here may be extended throughout the weekend.

Iraqi officials said the execution would be filmed, both for the historical record and as proof for those who may doubt the word of both the Americans and Iraqis.

As of late Friday, some Iraqi officials remained engaged in a heated debate about how swiftly to carry out Mr. Hussein's death sentence.

An Iraqi official close to the negotiations expressed deep disappointment that, after years of forensic investigation, detailed litigation and careful deliberation, the process could be compromised in the final hours by politically driven haste.

"According to the law, no execution can be carried out during the holidays" said another official, "After all the hard work we have done, why would we break the law and ruin what we have built?"

The Muslim holiday of Id al-Adha begins Saturday for Sunnis and Sunday for Shiites, who now control the government.

Iraqi law seemed to indicate that executions were forbidden on the holiday.

But Judge Haddad was dismissive of those concerns, injecting some of the sectarian split that is pervading the country. "The official Id in Iraq is Sunday," he said.

As for Mr. Hussein's sect, he said, "Saddam is not Sunni. And he is not Shiite. He is not Muslim."

Mr. Gazawi, the lawyer, said he was told that Mr. Hussein had met with two half-brothers, who are also in custody, but no other family members.

"His sons are dead and his daughters are here in Amman," he said. Mr. Hussein's two sons, Uday and Qusay, were killed by American soldiers after the 2003 invasion.

After his government collapsed, Mr. Hussein went into hiding and was eventually found in an underground hide-out near his hometown of Tikrit.

Once in custody, there were three cases brought against Mr. Hussein for crimes against humanity.

The first case to begin hearings, and the simplest in terms of details, involved the executions of residents of Dujail after an attack on his motorcade there. Mr. Hussein was found guilty on Nov. 5 and sentenced to die by hanging. An appeals court upheld the ruling on Tuesday and said the sentence had to be carried out within 30 days.

A trial on the far more sweeping charges that he directed the killing of 50,000 Kurds in an organized ethnic-cleansing campaign is still under way and officials expected it to continue regardless of Mr. Hussein's fate.

The final case, involving the bloody suppression of a Shiite uprising in 1991, which left thousands dead, has yet to go to trial. That uprising followed the first American invasion of Iraq, directed by President Bush's father. The elder Bush had encouraged the Shiites to rise up, and America's subsequent failure to come to their aid was still remembered bitterly when the Americans returned in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0111588

The current President Bush, who keeps the pistol soldiers confiscated from Mr. Hussein when he was captured mounted in his private study off the Oval Office, did not say anything publicly about the impending execution.

Mr. Hussein, who had been held in American custody by a team known as Task Force 134 at Camp Cropper, near the Baghdad airport, was last heard from in a letter he composed when he was sentenced, asking Iraqis to unite and claiming to be at peace with his own death.

Iraqis Execute Saddam For Mass Killings (SEATIMES)

The Seattle Times, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein was hanged in the predawn hours today for crimes against humanity in the mass murder of Shiite men and boys in the 1980s, Iraqi and American officials said.

Saddam, 69, was escorted from his U.S. military prison cell at Camp Cropper, near the Baghdad airport, early in the morning and handed over to Iraqi officials. He was executed on the day Sunni Muslims, of which Saddam was a member, celebrate the Islamic festival of Eid al-Adha.

An anxious Iraq awoke to the news of Saddam's execution, wondering whether his death would galvanize insurgents to launch still more suicide assaults against their fellow countrymen or whether it would close an ugly chapter in the nation's history and allow the government to stave off a full-scale civil war.

At his ranch in Crawford, Texas, President Bush said the execution marks the "end of a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops" and cautioned that Saddam's death will not halt the violence in Iraq.

Yet, Bush said in a statement, "It is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain and defend itself, and be an ally in the war on terror."

U.S. and Iraqi forces braced for a possible surge in violence by Saddam's backers and those frustrated that an Arab leader was killed by what they consider to be an American-controlled government. Iraqi officials canceled leave for their police and army. The Pentagon announced that U.S. troops were at a high state of readiness.

The execution of a former head of state in his country after a trial by an internationally monitored tribunal is almost without precedent. But its political impact was undercut by what human-rights groups said was badly flawed procedure. Human Rights Watch charged that the trial didn't meet international standards of fairness and criticized the Iraqi government for actions that it said undermined the court's independence. It said the court was unfamiliar with the law.

The execution also didn't fully settle Iraqis' grievances against Saddam. The atrocity for which he was sentenced occurred a quarter-century ago and was of a far smaller dimension than his alleged crimes against Kurds in the late 1980s and against Shiites through the 1990s.

Throughout Friday evening, Iraqi state television broadcast footage of Saddam's atrocities, including photos of gassed babies and handcuffed men being tortured. Witnesses who had testified against Saddam and called for his death gathered in the heavily fortified Green Zone, which houses the government, to witness the execution. They were joined by a judge, a doctor and a cleric.

In Baghdad's Shiite enclave of Sadr City, people danced in the streets while others fired guns in the air.

Officials said they videotaped the execution but wouldn't air it publicly.

Sami al-Askari, the political adviser of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said Saddam struggled when taken from his cell but was composed in his last moments.

He said Saddam was clad completely in black, rather than prison garb.

Shortly before the execution, Saddam was asked if he wanted to say something, said al-Askari, who was present.

"No, I don't want to," al-Askari quoted Saddam as saying. Saddam repeated a prayer after a Sunni Muslim cleric.

"Saddam later was taken to the gallows and refused to have his head covered with a hood," al-Askari said. "Before the rope was put around his neck, Saddam shouted: 'God is great. The nation will be victorious, and Palestine is Arab.' "

There were conflicting reports about whether two of Saddam's co-defendants were executed with the former president. The Washington Post and state-run Iraqiya television reported that Saddam's half brother Barzan Ibrahim and Awad Haman

DOJ_NMG_0111589

Bander, former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court, also were hanged. However, three officials later told The Associated Press that only Saddam was executed.

On Tuesday, an appeals court upheld Saddam's death sentence for the killings of 148 people after an attempt was made on his life in the northern Iraqi city of Dujail in 1982. The court said the former president should be hanged within 30 days. Since his capture by U.S. troops in December 2003, Saddam had legally been in Iraq's custody but remained under American watch at a military prison.

On Thursday, Saddam met with his two maternal half brothers and handed them personal messages, according to Iraqi officials. On Friday, his attorneys said, U.S. military officials asked that they take his personal belongings.

The Iraqi government, led by Shiite Muslims and northern Kurds, kept the impending execution a secret from its citizens, fearing that, even close to death, Saddam could cause chaos. His Sunni Arab loyalists, who view him as a symbol of their resistance, already had vowed to take revenge.

"It's like God asking you to choose between heaven and hell," said Thamer al-Musawi, 47, a slim, salt-and-pepper-haired barber in Baghdad's Karrada neighborhood, speaking before the execution. "If Saddam gets executed, you go to hell. If he doesn't, you go to heaven. I will choose hell just so Saddam is executed."

Saddam leaves behind a legacy of fear, poverty and a profound despair among Iraqis. At the same time, many Iraqis have expressed nostalgia for the security they enjoyed under Saddam, although they despised his rule.

Saddam's execution marks a shift in the fortunes of Iraq's Sunni Arabs, who formed the core of Iraq's bureaucracy under his rule and are struggling for a foothold in the country's political process. A central question is whether his death at the hands of a Shiite-led government will alienate more Sunnis and hinder efforts at national reconciliation.

Iraqi and U.S. officials also predicted an upsurge in violence, at least in the short term, as Saddam loyalists and former Baath party members seek to avenge his death. But it is unclear how influential they are today. The goals of insurgent groups that form the bulwark of the Sunni resistance are to oust the U.S.-led occupation and gain political power rather than fight for Saddam.

Some Iraqis said religious and sectarian symbolism guided the timing of the execution. Today is considered the beginning of Eid by Sunni Muslims, while Shiites start celebrating Sunday. Eid commemorates prophet Ibrahim's willingness to sacrifice his son to God. It also marks the end of the hajj pilgrimage to Mecca, a trip millions of Muslims worldwide make each year.

Human-rights groups widely criticized Saddam's death sentence as unfair and his trial as marred by procedural flaws. There was failure to disclose key evidence to Saddam's attorneys, activists said.

The first presiding judge resigned. Three defense lawyers and a witness were assassinated. Outbursts by the second chief judge, Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman, undermined his impartiality, activists said.

Iraqi and U.S. officials, in turn, angrily declared that the Iraqi government did not interfere in the judicial process. Nevertheless, the nine-month trial further deepened Iraq's sectarian divide.

Under Iraq's constitution, President Jalal Talabani and his two vice presidents needed to ratify the decision of the appeals court. But until Saddam's final hours, there was confusion over whether a provision in the Iraqi High Tribunal statute could outweigh the constitutional requirement. Talabani, a Kurd, opposes the death penalty but in past cases has deputized a vice president to sign on his behalf. Early today, it was unclear whether the three men had signed off on the execution.

Late Friday, a U.S. judge refused to halt the hanging.

Until his death, Saddam exhibited the same defiance that was synonymous with his rule. During his trial, he mocked judges, hurled political invective and walked out of the court.

On Wednesday, a farewell letter posted on several Web sites in the name of Saddam declared that he was ready to die and urged Iraqis not to hate the people of the nations that had invaded Iraq, just their leaders. His attorneys said the letter was authentic and was written Nov. 5.

Saddam, who ordered executions of thousands of Iraqis, in his final hours became a cause célèbre for advocates against capital punishment. European leaders appealed to the Iraqi government not to impose the verdict. Cardinal Renato Martino, Pope Benedict XVI's top official on justice matters, told the Italian newspaper La Repubblica that executing Saddam would punish "a crime with another crime."

DOJ_NMG_0111590

Many Kurds were disappointed that Saddam was executed for the Dujail killings, widely viewed as a test case for the larger, and more significant, Anfal genocide trial. That trial began in August, and Saddam was scheduled to return to the courtroom Jan. 8.

Iraqi-Americans Celebrate Saddam's Execution (AP)

AP, December 30, 2006

DEARBORN, Mich. (AP) — Dozens of Iraqi-Americans gathered late Friday at a Detroit-area mosque to celebrate reports that Saddam Hussein had been executed, cheering and crying as drivers honked horns in jubilation.

Dave Alwatan wore an Iraqi flag around his shoulders and flashed a peace sign to everyone he passed at the Karbalaa Islamic Educational Center in this suburb of Detroit, a city that has one of the nation's largest concentrations of people with roots in the Middle East.

"Peace," he said, grinning and laughing. "Now there will be peace for my family."

Alwatan, 32, said Saddam's forces tortured and killed relatives that were left behind when Alwatan left Iraq in 1991.

A crowd of more than 150 men gathered in anticipation of the former Iraqi dictator's execution, singing and dancing and chanting "Now there's peace, Saddam is dead" in English and Arabic.

The center's director, Imam Husham Al-Husainy, said members prayed for Saddam's death. Outside, traffic slowed as people drove in circles around the mosque, honking horns.

"This is our celebration of the death of Saddam," Al-Husainy said while standing on top of a car following reports by Iraqi state-run television that Saddam had been hanged. "The gift of our New Year is the murder of Saddam Hussein."

Meanwhile, some local Arab-American leaders warned that Saddam's execution would increase violence in Iraq.

Osama Siblani, publisher of The Arab American News and chairman of several Arab-American groups, said the former dictator's death sentence was one more casualty in a war that has killed thousands. He said it will not end the power struggle among Iraqi religious groups.

"The execution might bring some amusement and accomplishment to the Bush administration, but it will not help the Iraqi people," Siblani said. "The problem we're facing in Iraq is going to multiply."

Rauf Naqishbendi, 53, an Iraqi Kurd who moved to the U.S. in 1977, said he was pleased that Hussein was being executed, but lamented the loss of family members who he said were gassed by the dictator's henchman in 1988.

"Psychologically, the execution is good news, and people will feel that justice has been served," said Naqishbendi, who lives a few miles south of San Francisco. "But the reality is that it's not going to bring back my family members who he killed."

The Detroit area's Iraqi community includes a group of Chaldean Christians, many of whom fled their homeland during Saddam's rule.

Joseph Kassab, executive director of the Chaldean Federation of America, based in the Detroit suburb of Farmington Hills, said his humanitarian organization is against the taking of human life. But, he said, the world must reflect on Saddam's execution, "so we never again relinquish our destiny to tyrants like him."

Imad Hamad, director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee in Dearborn, said the glee surrounding Saddam's death was laced with uncertainty about the future.

"The joy would have been complete if we were to see the healthy Iraq, the united Iraq, the safe Iraq," Hamad said. "Then everybody would be jumping up and down, celebrating."

Local Reaction: Iraqi Emigres In Bay Area Say It's Long Overdue (SFC)

By Matthai Chakko Kuruvila

San Francisco Chronicle, December 30, 2006

Mudhar Alhassen waited for decades for Saddam Hussein to die. Friday night, when news came of Hussein's execution, the Iraqi exile got his wish.

Hussein's henchmen had slain Alhassen's uncles. Hussein's jailors killed two cousins, including one who was tortured to death with chemicals, Alhassen says.

DOJ_NMG_0111591

Soon after watching an Iraqi news channel report about the impending execution, Alhassen began to celebrate in his Sunnyvale home. He called his father, a brother in Michigan and cousins back in Iraq.

"I feel great," said Alhassen, 39. "This is our dream for this guy to get the death penalty. It's a good day."

Across the Bay Area on Friday, Iraqi emigres exulted over Hussein's impending demise. They cited the deaths of friends, torture endured by relatives and the increasing dysfunction of a dictator who willingly disregarded and disposed of his people. Former Iraqis living in the Bay Area consider the dictator's death justice that did not come quick enough.

"This moment is past due," said Rob Shoubber, 51, of Santa Clara. "It should have been done a long time ago."

Several Iraqi Americans said Hussein's supporters have been sabotaging efforts toward democracy in Iraq. They believe his execution will bring peace and stability to Iraq, where hundreds of thousands of civilians -- and nearly 3,000 U.S. troops -- have died since the 2003 invasion.

"It won't be an immediate change, but it will be in the long run," Shoubber said.

The gravity of Hussein's tyranny requires the ultimate penalty, several Iraqi Americans said.

Imam Mehdi Khorasani, who leads a 200-member mosque in Fairfax, said he generally opposes capital punishment.

"Killing must be stopped, criminals or not," he said. "I believe in mercy and compassion."

But Hussein's unthinkable horrors demand something different.

"Saddam is a thug," said Khorasani, whose father was an imam in Karbala, Iraq. "He's a cancer, a microbe, a disaster for the world. He must be eliminated at any cost.

"He has used chemical weapons. He has committed mass murders, genocide."

Like many Iraqis in the Bay Area, Khorasani believes Hussein's followers are fueling the insurgencies.

"There are thousands of people who are allied with him," said Khorasani, who said dozens of his relatives have been killed, kidnapped or simply vanished under Hussein's rule. "He must be eliminated, because then all these thugs will be eliminated. He is evil -- real, real evil."

Even as Hussein's death brought relief to those interviewed, some felt like the pain of his rule could never be healed.

"If I go back to Iraq, there is no one I can see," said Kays Hussein, 58, who lives in San Bruno and is no relation to Saddam Hussein. "I don't even know where their graves are."

Since his days in college, Kays Hussein said many of his friends disappeared or were killed for opposing the government.

"We told people about the facts," he said. "We had the courage to say it, but we paid with our lives."

Kays Hussein said his worst memories include watching Iraqis starve during years of U.N. sanctions while Saddam Hussein lived in opulence. Iraqi television once showed one of the president's birthday gifts to himself: a carriage made of gold.

"Of course, there was money in Iraq, but he kept it for himself and didn't give us food," Kays Hussein said. "This is the most painful."

The execution won't erase those memories, he said.

"We will sit together and talk to forget our sad memories. These things live in our souls now. It can't be just a memory, these painful things."

Iraqi Natives Living In St. Louis Welcome The End For Saddam (SLPD)

By Tim O'Neil, Aisha Sultan

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, December 30, 2006

The television at the Kabob House was broadcasting a popular Iraqi comedy show via satellite. News updates on the fate of Saddam Hussein flashed across the bottom of the screen in Arabic.

Three friends, all natives of Iraq, chatted over coffee Friday, stopping on occasion to scan the report. It was 7 p.m. in St. Louis — 4 a.m. in Baghdad, with Saddam's execution by hanging considered imminent.

And a just punishment it is, said the three friends.

"It will make many mothers happy in Iraq — mothers whose sons were executed by Saddam Hussein," said Abdul Alsharafy, 48. "It will make every decent and honest Iraqi happy to have the era of Saddam gone forever."

DOJ_NMG_0111592

The Kabob House is an Iraqi restaurant at 4940 Christy Boulevard, just off South Kingshighway in south St. Louis. Iraqis come by for lamb kabobs; American-born customers prefer the chicken and beef orders.

Adnan Hadi, 42, said about 3,000 Iraqi nationals live in the St. Louis area, and most of them came here after fleeing the failed uprising that took place after the Persian Gulf War in 1991. Hadi, who is Sunni, said Saddam has few, if any, sympathizers among the Iraqis here. Hadi said one of his uncles, a general in the Iraqi army, was executed by Saddam's government.

"This is the beginning of a new day, a new time for Iraq," said Hadi. "We are trying to establish a democratic society in Iraq. Saddam still has many loyalists."

Hadi said there are many Sunnis who, like him, opposed Saddam and wanted to see him executed.

Jabbar Alabady, 38, the third man at the table, is Shiite, as is Alsharafy. Alabady called the execution a great thing.

"He murdered a lot of people. This is his punishment," Alabady said. "The people who make the bombs are hoping that Saddam will come back to power. This will show that he is gone for good."

As the three spoke, they rarely glanced at the television. After the trial of Saddam, the execution was inevitable, eliminating any suspense in the final hours.

"Iraqis knew he was a dead man the day he was arrested," said Alsharafy.

Hanging On A Muslim Holiday Is Criticized (LAT)

By Ashraf Khalil

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

The Muslim religious holiday Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice, is meant to commemorate Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son on God's orders.

But now the holiday could also be associated with something else: the execution of ousted Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein.

The Iraqi government's push to hang Hussein this morning, when much of the Muslim world was celebrating Eid, drew criticism from Islamic leaders in the Middle East and America.

"Executing any individual during this holiday period indicates poor judgment and a lack of sensitivity," the Muslim Public Affairs Council said in a statement.

As the Hussein drama played out Friday in Baghdad, millions of Muslims gathered in Saudi Arabia for the Hajj pilgrimage, a pillar of the Islamic faith that every Muslim is required to perform at least once if able.

"Connecting this to a religious occasion will just widen the gap between the factions in Iraq," said Muhammad Eissa, a University of Chicago professor of Arabic and an Islamic scholar. "This is a time when Muslims in particular are supposed to be forgiving, are supposed to be closer to God. Why are they using this occasion to take revenge? They couldn't wait one more week?"

On Friday, pilgrims performed a daylong vigil of outdoor prayer on Mt. Arafat outside Mecca. Traditionally Eid is meant to begin the following day, but disagreements over the Islamic calendar have created a dual holiday. Saudi religious scholars declared Eid to be today, with much of the Sunni Muslim world following suit. However, most Shiite Muslims and some Sunni groups consider Sunday the true start of the four-day holiday.

Some view the execution's timing as a deliberate slap by Iraq's Shiite-led government at the country's Sunnis, who benefited from the reign of Hussein, a Sunni, and who make up much of Iraq's insurgency.

"The Sunnis are going to see this as an insult," said Shakeel Syed, executive director of the Islamic Shura Council of Southern California. "The reaction is going to be very, very negative."

Sabih Maryati, a Shiite and a board member of Ahlul-Beyt Mosque in Pomona, also criticized the timing. "This is supposed to be a time of reconciliation. But this timing is definitely going to make the situation much worse. All it's going to do is increase the violence and make the country more unstable."

Saddam Hussein Executed (MSNBC)

MSNBC.com, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Three years after he was hauled from a hole in the ground by pursuing U.S. forces, Saddam Hussein was hanged Saturday under a sentence imposed by an Iraqi court, an Iraqi official told NBC News.

DOJ_NMG_0111593

The deposed president was found guilty over the killing of 148 members of the Shiite population of the town of Dujail after militants tried to assassinate him there in 1982, during Iraq's war with Shiite Iran.

Asked if Saddam were dead, the official in the Iraqi prime minister's office said, "Yes, the body of Saddam Hussein is in front of me."

Story continues below ? advertisement

"Criminal Saddam was hanged to death," state-run Iraqiya television said. The station played patriotic music and showed images of national monuments and other landmarks.

Witnesses to the execution told NBC News' Richard Engel that they were cheering around the body of Saddam after the execution.

NBC could hear cheers and celebrations in the background while talking to an official in the prime minister's office.

"This son of a bitch is lying under my feet.… I can't talk now because of all the cheers!" a witness said.

NBC News reported that gunfire, presumably celebratory, could be heard in Baghdad after the executions.

Three Iraqi officials who attended the execution said only he was executed on Saturday, and that his half-brother and another former regime official would hang after the weekend Islamic religious holiday. The holiday ends Tuesday for Sunnis and Wednesday for Shiites.

National security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie told state-run Iraqiya TV that only Saddam was executed Saturday. "We wanted him to be executed on a special day," he said.

Munir Haddad, a judge on the appeals court that upheld Saddam's death sentence, and Sami al-Askari, political adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, also told The AP that only Saddam was executed. Iraqi state TV originally had reported that all three men had been executed, Saddam followed by the other two.

Al-Rubaie said that the other two men "will be executed after the Eid."

Eid al-Adha, Islam's most important religious festival, began at dawn Saturday for Sunnis and will start Sunday for Iraqi Shiites.

It was a grim end for the 69-year-old leader who had vexed three U.S. presidents. Despite his ouster, Washington, its allies and the new Iraqi leaders remain mired in a fight to quell a stubborn insurgency by Saddam loyalists and a vicious sectarian conflict.

Bush: 'Executed after receiving a fair trial'

"Today, Saddam Hussein was executed after receiving a fair trial — the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime," President Bush said in a written statement released after the execution by the White House.

"Bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq," Bush continued, "but it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain, and defend itself, and be an ally in the War on Terror."

Mariam al-Rayes, a legal expert and former member of parliament, told Iraqiya television that the execution "was filmed and God willing it will be shown. There was one camera present, and a doctor was also present there." She did not attend.

Saddam Hussein Executed In Iraq (BBC)

BBC.com, December 30, 2006

Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has been executed by hanging at a secure facility in northern Baghdad for crimes against humanity.

The news was confirmed to the BBC by the Iraqi deputy foreign minister.

Iraqi TV said the execution took place just before 0600 local time (0300GMT). A representative of the prime minister and a Sunni Muslim cleric were present.

Two co-defendants, Saddam Hussein's half-brother and a former chief judge, are to be executed at a later date.

All three were sentenced to death by an Iraqi court on 5 November after a year-long trial over the 1982 killings of 148 Shias in the town of Dujail.

Saddam Hussein's rule

In pictures

DOJ_NMG_0111594

A small group of Iraqis witnessed the execution at an Iraqi compound known by the Americans as Camp Justice, a secure facility in the northern Baghdad suburb of Khadimeya.

They watched as a judge read out the sentence to Saddam Hussein. The former Iraqi leader was carrying a copy of the Koran and asked for it to be given to a friend.

The noose was then placed around his neck before the trap door was released. The execution took just a few minutes.

Video footage of the execution is expected to be released as final proof of Saddam Hussein's demise although it is expected to stop short of showing the actual death.

US troops and Iraqi security forces are on high alert for any violent backlash. The US State Department has urged all its embassies to increase security.

'End of a dark period'

News of Saddam Hussein's execution was broadcast on state-run Iraqiya television, as patriotic music and images of national monuments were played out.

Saddam Hussein was hanged first, followed by Barzan and then Bandar, it announced. However, an Iraqi national security advisor later said only Saddam Hussein was hanged.

"We wanted him to be executed on a special day," Mouwafak al-Rubaie told Iraqiya, adding that Saddam Hussein "totally surrendered" and did not resist.

Saddam Hussein's half-brother Barzan al-Tikriti and Iraq's former chief judge Awad Hamed al-Bandar are to be executed some time after the Eid festival ends next week, he said.

Other Arab TV stations aired live footage of the sunrise over Baghdad's Firdous Square, where US Marines pulled down a statue of Saddam Hussein, after he was deposed in April 2003.

The BBC's Peter Greste in Baghdad says Shias have generally welcomed Saddam Hussein's death and hailed the execution as justice for the suffering endured under his leadership.

But Saddam's own Sunni tribesman were angered by his treatment and may well protest once more, our correspondent adds.

'Held to account'

US President George W Bush hailed the execution as "an important milestone" on the road to building an Iraqi democracy, but warned it would not end the deadly violence there.

He said: "It is a testament to the Iraqi people's resolve to move forward after decades of oppression that, despite his terrible crimes against his own people, Saddam Hussein received a fair trial.

"It is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain, and defend itself, and be an ally in the War on Terror."

UK Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett welcomed the fact that Saddam Hussein had been tried by an Iraqi court "for at least some of the appalling crimes he committed" and said "he has now been held to account".

France called on Iraqis to "look towards the future and work towards reconciliation and national unity".

Saddam Hussein, Toppled By U.S., Is Hanged By Iraqis (BLOOM)

By Alex Morales, Judy Mathewson

Bloomberg, December 30, 2006

Dec. 30 - Saddam Hussein, who was accused of killing more than 100,000 civilians during his 23-year rule over oil-rich Iraq, was hanged in Baghdad for crimes against humanity for a 1982 massacre of Shiite Muslims. He was 69.

Hussein's execution today ``will not end the violence in Iraq, but it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy," U.S. President George W. Bush said in an e-mailed statement.

Hussein came to power in 1979 and was deposed in an invasion by U.S. and British forces ordered by President Bush in March 2003. Hussein led Iraq into three wars, and his government was accused by human rights groups of genocide.

``Saddam turned this country into an outlaw state in the eyes of the international community, and he squandered its wealth, which was used for the persecution of his own people and for launching wars against Iraq's neighbors," Iraqi Foreign Minister

DOJ_NMG_0111595

Hoshyar Zebari said in a Dec. 29 interview. ``The people of Iraq will remember that their darkest days were those during his reign of terror."

The dictator's victims included between 50,000 and 100,000 people who died in the Anfal military operation against Iraqi Kurds in 1987 and 1988 and tens of thousands of others who opposed him, according to New York-based Human Rights Watch.

Death Sentence

Hussein was given the death sentence by an Iraqi tribunal on Nov. 5 for his role in the killings of 148 Shiite Muslims in the northern village of Dujail following an attempt on his life there in 1982. He lost an appeal on Dec. 26, clearing the way for his execution.

A second trial, in which Hussein faced charges of genocide for his role in the Anfal campaign, began in August and wasn't concluded before his hanging.

``Very few Iraqis are going to waste their time mourning for Saddam," said Judith Yaphe, a Middle East specialist at the National Defense University in Washington. ``There are too many of them who would have rather been the executioner."

During his rule, Hussein developed a personality cult, building himself opulent palaces around the country and using his image to adorn public buildings such as hospitals and schools, as well as Iraq's currency. The April 9, 2003, toppling of his statue in Baghdad's Firdos Square -- as U.S. soldiers and armor occupied the city -- symbolized the end of Hussein's rule.

Peasant Roots

Saddam Hussein al-Majid al-Tikriti was born on April 28, 1937, into a peasant family in a village near the northern Iraqi city of Tikrit.

Hussein was raised by his mother and other relatives after his father left him or died, according to Nathan Brown of the Washington-based Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, who has researched his life.

``The shame of his humble origins was to become the driving force of his ambition," Con Coughlin, an editor of the U.K.'s Sunday Telegraph, wrote in ``Saddam: King of Terror." The harshness and insecurity of Hussein's early life also left him with a lifelong inability to trust even those closest to him, Coughlin wrote.

At 20, Hussein joined the pan-Arab socialist Baath Party, and in 1959 took part in a failed coup against Prime Minister Abdul Karim Qassem. Wounded in the attempt, Hussein fled to Egypt. The secular Baathists took power in 1963 following a series of military coups, only to be overthrown months later.

Rise to Power

In 1968, the party regained control of the country in another coup, and the following year, Hussein was appointed vice president by President Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr, a relative. Eleven years later, Hussein took over as president, formalizing the power he had gained during the intervening years.

Hussein built his authority by placing relatives in major positions in the army and putting others loyal to him in the security system.

Family ties weren't a barrier to Hussein's purges, and he had about 40 of his own relatives killed, according to the Bush administration.

``Not since Stalin or Hitler has there been such institutionalized violence in a country as there was in Saddam Hussein's Iraq," said Christopher Reid, a former U.S. Justice Department official. Reid served as regime crimes liaison between U.S. and Iraqi authorities during a 22-month stint at the Baghdad embassy that ended in January.

``There was a huge bureaucratic structure set up to oppress people," Reid said. ``There were execution chambers around Iraq, and they were used all day long most days."

Oil Power

The Baath Party had the good fortune to seize power in a country with the world's third-largest oil reserves just before an energy shortage in the early 1970s drove up world prices for crude.

Hussein ``ended up squandering those resources, though, in a way that undercut the country in a disastrous manner," including by waging wars, Brown said.

The first of Hussein's three wars began in 1980, when he abrogated a 1975 treaty with Iran that defined the border between the countries. Iraq's troops used mustard and nerve gases against Iranian soldiers and rebellious Kurds in northeastern Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0111596

It became a war of attrition with Iran, during which Hussein received the support of Western governments, including the U.S. The foes agreed to a truce in 1988.

The total dead from their conflict exceeds 300,000 and could be as many as 1 million, Brown said.

Invasion of Kuwait

The next war followed within three years. In August 1990, Iraqi troops invaded Kuwait and its oil fields, a month after Hussein accused Iraq's southern neighbor of violating the border to tap into an Iraqi oil field. The action was condemned by the United Nations Security Council and quickly opposed by the U.S., which began to build a coalition with Arab and European governments.

Iraq, which had long claimed territorial rights over Kuwait, declared the country a province and defied UN demands to leave.

A U.S.-led alliance, mobilized by President George H.W. Bush, began a UN-backed bombing campaign against Iraq in January 1991, and a land invasion the following month. Iraqi generals in March met with the allied commander, U.S. General Norman Schwarzkopf, leading up to a UN cease-fire in April.

Though his military was battered, Hussein, a Sunni Muslim, held on to power in the face of a revolt in the south by the majority Shiite Muslims after the U.S. and its allies removed their backing for the Shiites.

`No Fly' Zones

Hussein's capacity to send his forces against his Kurdish and Shiite enemies was constrained by so-called ``no fly'' zones set up in northern and southern Iraq and patrolled by U.S. and allied warplanes. The northern zone helped the Kurds establish a self-governing region in the 1990s.

Enmity between Hussein and Bush resurfaced more than two years after the Gulf war. In June 1993, U.S. cruise missiles hit Iraq's principal intelligence facility in retaliation for what the new administration of President Bill Clinton said was an Iraqi assassination attempt against the former president.

The U.S. said it had compelling evidence that Hussein's government was behind the plot to kill the elder Bush when he visited Kuwait in April 1993 -- an accusation the Iraqi government denied. Almost a decade later, President George W. Bush, his son, referred to the foiled plot as he sought congressional authority to attack Iraq.

``This is the man who tried to kill my dad,'' the younger Bush said in September 2002.

New Chapter

Throughout the 1990s, Iraq was under economic sanctions imposed after the invasion of Kuwait. In August 1998, Hussein ceased five years of cooperation with UN weapons inspectors, which led to a four-day bombing campaign by U.S. and U.K. aircraft. The inspectors, who withdrew before the bombing, weren't allowed back in.

The terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, opened a new chapter in the confrontation between the U.S. and Hussein.

Beginning in November 2001, President George W. Bush demanded Hussein let inspectors back into Iraq, and he urged the UN to compel Iraq to give up its illicit weapons. Bush said the attack to remove Hussein in 2003 was necessary because Iraq harbored chemical, biological or nuclear weapons, and he suggested such arms might be handed off to terrorists. The weapons haven't been found in Iraq.

Hussein's Capture

Hussein fled Baghdad as U.S.-led forces advanced from the south. He was captured on Dec. 13, 2003, hiding in a hole in a farm nine miles (14 kilometers) south of Tikrit. With a graying, bushy beard, Hussein was almost unrecognizable from the black-haired, mustachioed dictator who had ruled Iraq, usually sporting a tailored suit.

During his period in hiding, Hussein's sons Qusay and Uday were killed in a battle with U.S. soldiers in Mosul on July 22, 2003.

Hussein remained combative after being captured, and accused the U.S. military of abusing him, an allegation denied by the American government. Appearing in court to face charges in the Dujail trial on Oct. 19, 2005, he described himself as the president of Iraq and questioned the legitimacy of the tribunal.

DOJ_NMG_0111597

Hussein's court appearances were characterized by outbursts and political speeches as the judge struggled to contain him. The ousted dictator refused to attend court on one occasion, complaining he hadn't been able to change clothes, and at another point, he embarked on a hunger strike.

Chaotic Trial

The chaotic trial, which Human Rights Watch described as ``flawed," was beset by the killing of several members of Hussein's defense team.

Throughout the proceedings, the court heard accounts of brutality. Witnesses accused Hussein's regime of torturing them and killing their friends and relatives. Many witnesses appeared behind screens to protect their identities. It was their testimony that ultimately sent Hussein to the gallows.

Hussein was ``sentenced to death for one crime, and not for every crime, although he deserves" to be punished ``for all the crimes," according to Zebari, the Iraqi foreign minister, who said three of his own brothers were killed by Hussein's government.

``What we have seen is just the tip of the iceberg of what Saddam and his regime have inflicted on Iraq as a whole from the north to the south," Zebari said.

Reid said he interviewed more than 100 victims of Hussein's dictatorship, including ``people whose entire families were killed in front of their eyes in chemical attacks." While Dujail was one of the smaller massacres committed by the government under Hussein, ``it showed the tools of oppression that Saddam used over and over again," he said.

Hussein is survived by the three daughters he had with his first wife, Sajida, the mother of Uday and Qusay. With his second wife, Samira, he had another son, Ali, now in his 20s. All are on a list of relatives and former members of the dictatorship whose assets were ordered by the UN to be frozen.

Exclusive: Videographer Of Saddam Execution (NSWK)

By Michael Hastings

Newsweek, December 30, 2006

Dec. 30, 2006 - Ali Al Massedy was 3 feet away from Saddam Hussein when he died. The 38 year old, normally Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's official videographer, was the man responsible for filming the late dictator's execution at dawn on Saturday. "I saw fear, he was afraid," Ali told NEWSWEEK minutes after returning from the execution. Wearing a rumpled green suit and holding a Sony HDTV video camera in his right hand, Ali recalled the dictator's last moments. "He was saying things about injustice, about resistance, about how these guys are terrorists," he says. On the way to the gallows, according to Ali, "Saddam said, 'Iraq without me is nothing.'"

Ali says he followed Saddam up the gallows steps, escorted by two guards. He stood over the hole and filmed from close quarters as Saddam dropped through—from "me to you," he said, crouching down to show how he shot the scene. The distance, he said, was "about one meter," he said. "He died absolutely, he died instantly." Ali said Saddam's body twitched, "shaking, very shaking," but "no blood," he said, and "no spit." (Ali said he was not authorized to disclose the location, and did not give other details of the room.)

Ali said the videotape lasts about 15 minutes. When NEWSWEEK asked to see a copy, Ali said he had already handed the tape over to Maliki's chief of staff. "It is top secret," he said. He would not give the names of officials in attendance, though he estimates there were around 20 observers. One of them, Iraqi National Security Adviser Mouwaffak al-Rubaie, told CNN that Saddam clasped a Koran as the noose was tied around his neck, and refused to wear a hood. He also said that government officials had not decided whether or not to release the videotape. The execution reportedly took place at 6:05 a.m. local time. Prime Minister Maliki did not attend.

Ali was greeted as a hero when he returned from the execution a little after 7 a.m., flying in with other officials and landing in two helicopters in the Green Zone. A convoy of 20 or so GMCs and Toyota Land Cruisers waited outside to drive some of the Iraqi officials home.

The Iraqi bodyguards, mostly Shiites they said, had passed the time smoking and praying—some prayed on cardboard mats on the street.

DOJ_NMG_0111598

It was a cold morning in Baghdad, a few degrees above freezing, and in the post dawn light the guards' breaths could be seen in the air. When the thudding of helicopters began, the body guards rushed towards the entrance to the landing zone. They swarmed around Ali, snapping digital pictures on camera phones and cheering. "Saddam finished, Saddam finished," a guard who gave his name as Mohammed told NEWSWEEK. Ali looked somewhat stunned as he exited, carrying the camera.

"All Iraqis will be happy," he says. "This is the most important day for me [as a cameraman,]" he said. "This page [in history] is over, this page is over. All Iraqis will be happy from the north to the south to the east to the west." One of the judges who presided over the execution then came out to the street; Ali jumped in a car with him. The convoy of SUVs drove off, one after the other, with the occasional honk of the horn.

Hussein Executed With "Fear In His Face" (CNN)

CNN.com, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Saddam Hussein, the former Iraqi dictator who spent his last years in captivity after his ruthless regime was toppled by the U.S.-led coalition in 2003, was hanged before dawn Saturday for crimes committed in a brutal crackdown during his reign.

The execution took place shortly after 6 a.m. (10 p.m. Friday ET), Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, told Iraqi television.

"This dark page has been turned over," Rubaie said. "Saddam is gone. Today Iraq is an Iraq for all the Iraqis, and all the Iraqis are looking forward. ... The [Hussein] era has gone forever."

Rubaie, who witnessed the execution, said the former leader was "strangely submissive" to the process.

"He was a broken man," he said. "He was afraid. You could see fear in his face."

Rubaie said that Hussein carried with him a copy of the Quran and asked that it be given to "a certain person." Rubaie did not identify that person.

On Al-Arabiya television, Rubaie said the execution took place at the 5th Division intelligence office in Qadhimiya. He said Hussein refused to wear a black hood over his head before execution and told him "don't be afraid."

White House deputy press secretary Scott Stanzel said President Bush was asleep when the execution took place and was not awakened. The president had been briefed by national security adviser Stephen Hadley before retiring and was aware the hanging was imminent, Stanzel said.

The White House issued a statement praising the Iraqi people for giving Hussein a fair trial.

"Fair trials were unimaginable under Saddam Hussein's tyrannical rule," Bush's statement read. "It is a testament to the Iraqi people's resolve to move forward after decades of oppression that, despite his terrible crimes against his own people, Saddam Hussein received a fair trial."

The execution took place outside the heavily fortified Green Zone, Rubaie said, and no Americans were present.

"It was an Iraqi operation from A to Z," he said. "The Americans were not present during the hour of the execution. They weren't even in the building."

He added that "there were no Shiite or Sunni clerics present, only the witnesses and those who carried out the actual execution were present."

Hussein was hanged for his role in the 1982 Dujail massacre, in which 148 Iraqis were killed after a failed assassination attempt against the then-Iraqi president. (Watch what happened in Dujail)

Two other co-defendants -- Barzan Hassan, Hussein's half-brother, and Awwad Bandar, the former chief judge of the Revolutionary Court -- were also found guilty and had been expected to face execution with Hussein, but Rubaie said their executions were postponed.

"We chose to postpone Barzan and Awwad's execution to a later date because we wanted to have this day to have an historic distinction," he said. "We wanted to have one specific date for Saddam so people remember this date to be linked to Saddam's execution and nothing else."

Rubaie said the execution was videotaped and photographed extensively from the time Hussein was transferred from U.S. to Iraqi custody until he was dead.

DOJ_NMG_0111599

Many of those who witnessed the execution celebrated in the aftermath.

"Saddam's body is in front me," said an official in the prime minister's office when CNN telephoned. "It's over."

In the background, Shiite chanting could be heard. When asked about the chanting, the official said, "These are employees of the prime minister's office and government chanting in celebration."

He said that celebrations broke out after Hussein was dead, and that there was "dancing around the body."

Iraqi-Americans celebrated in the street in Dearborn, Michigan, home to the largest concentration of Iraqis in the United States.

Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki did not attend the execution, according to an adviser to the prime minister who was interviewed on state television.

"It's a very solemn moment for me," Feisal Istrabadi, Iraq's U.N. ambassador, said on CNN's "Anderson Cooper 360." "I can understand why some of my compatriots may be cheering. I have friends whose particular people I can think of who have lost 10, 15, 20 members of their family, more.

"But for me, it's a moment really of remembrance of the victims of Saddam Hussein."

Friday evening, a U.S. district judge refused a request to stay the execution.

Attorney Nicholas Gilman said in an application for a restraining order, filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Washington, that a stay would allow Hussein "to be informed of his rights and take whatever action he can and may wish to pursue."

Munir Haddad, a judge on the appeals court that upheld the former dictator's death sentence, called Gilman's filing "rubbish," and said, "It will not delay carrying out the sentence," which he called "final."

Throughout the day, there were conflicting reports about who had custody of Hussein. Giovanni di Stefano, one of Hussein's defense attorneys, told CNN the U.S. military officially informed him that the former Iraqi dictator had been transferred to Iraqi custody, but that the move in U.S. court could have meant that Hussein was back in U.S. custody.

There had been speculation that Hussein would be executed before Eid Al-Adha -- a holiday period that means Feast of the Sacrifice, celebrated by Muslims around the world at the climax of the hajj pilgrimage to Mecca. The law does not permit executions to be carried out during religious holidays.

Eid began Saturday for Sunnis and begins Sunday for Shiites. It lasts for four days. Hussein was a Sunni Muslim.Meeting with half-brothers

Another defense lawyer, Badie Aref, told CNN that Hussein met with two of his half-brothers in his cell on Thursday and passed on messages and instructions to his family.

"President Saddam was just bracing for the worst, so he wanted to see his brothers and pass on some messages and instructions to his family," Aref said. The half brothers who visited were Sabawi and Wathban Ibrahim Hassan al-Tikriti, he said.

He never asked to see anyone else -- not even his wife, said his lawyers. She was the mother of his five children.

Aref said the U.S. soldiers guarding Hussein on Tuesday took away a radio he kept in his cell so he could not hear news reports about his death sentence, which was confirmed that day.

"They did not want him to hear the news from the appeals court upholding the sentence," he said. "They gave him back the radio on Wednesday."

Aref said Saddam found out about the appeals court verdict "a few hours after it was announced."Crimes against humanity

Hussein was convicted on November 5 of crimes against humanity in connection with the killings of 148 people in the town of Dujail after an attempt on his life.

The dictator was found guilty of murder, torture and forced deportation.

The Dujail episode falls within 12 of the worst cases out of 500 documented "baskets of crimes" during the Hussein regime.

The U.S. State Department says torture and extrajudicial killings followed the Dujail killings and that 550 men, women and children were arrested without warrants.

Saddam Hussein Has Been Executed (AFP)

AFP, December 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0111600

BAGHDAD, Dec 30, 2006 (AFP) - Ousted Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was executed Saturday, officials said, the 69-year-old former strongman mounting the gallows calmly and accepting his fate with a last defiant warning.

"He said 'I hope you will be united, and I warn you not to trust the Iranian coalition, because they are dangerous'. He said he was not afraid of anyone," Judge Moneer Haddad, who witnessed Saddam's execution for crimes against humanity, told AFP.

Saddam's taunt will be interpreted as a sideswipe at Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's Shiite-led ruling coalition, which many Iraqi Sunnis accuse of being a front for Iranian influence.

Another witness, National Security Adviser Mowaffaq al-Rubaie, told state television the former strongman made no attempt to resist his executioners, as he was led to the noose with his hands bound behind him.

Neither official, members of a small group of dignitaries who formally witnessed the execution, would say exactly where the hanging took place except that it was outside Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone.

Rubaie said the Saddam's American jailers had handed him over to Iraqi officials and that there had been no US personnel in the building as the trapdoor dropped and the dictator's life was ended.

"We hope this great day will be a day for national unity and for the liberation of the Iraqi people," Rubaie told Al-Arabiya television, adding that the whole procedure had been filmed.

"Whether to screen it now or later is up to political leaders because this is a sensitive issue and we do not want to excite some of our people," he said, amid mounting sectarian tension.

"This issue is about establishing justice. I look to thousands of orphans and widows in Halabja, and the war with Iran and the invasion of Kuwait," he said, referring to some of Saddam's best known atrocities.

Saddam's and two co-accused -- his half brother and intelligence chief Barzan Hassan al-Tikriti and revolutionary court judge Awad Ahmed al-Bandar -- were convicted of crimes against humanity by an Iraqi court on November 5.

Officials said that the execution of Saddam's aides had been postponed.

Over several months, the Iraqi High Tribunal in Baghdad heard how they oversaw a campaign of collective punishment against the Shiite village of Dujail, north of Baghdad, where Saddam escaped an assassination bid in 1982.

Dujail's orchards were torn up and 148 men and boys were executed after being dragged through Bandar's kangaroo court.

More than 20 years later, Saddam was overthrown by a US-led invasion and later put on trial by a new Shiite-led government. The trio's death sentences were confirmed by a panel of appeal court judges on December 26.

The hangings then became inevitable, with Maliki's government determined to avenge Saddam's brutal 24-year reign and to strike a blow against a violent Sunni insurgency that still honours his name.

Saddam's Jordan-based defence team, which largely boycotted the year-long trial, made one last desperate shake of the dice by going to court in the United States to demand that the ousted despot remain in US military custody.

But US authorities in Baghdad insisted that the detainees have been under Iraqi legal authority for more than a year and were only being held in an American military base as a simple security precaution.

Saddam's trial was the subject of fierce criticism from Sunni Iraqis -- who accused the court of being a puppet of Iraq's US occupiers and the Maliki government's Iranian allies -- and from international rights groups.

Human Rights Watch complained that Maliki's government had pressured the judge to return guilty verdicts, and was quick to attack the execution.

"Saddam Hussein was responsible for horrific, widespread human rights violations, but those acts, however brutal, cannot justify his execution, a cruel and inhuman punishment," said the watchdog's Richard Dicker.

"The test of a government's commitment to human rights is measured by the way it treats its worst offenders. History will judge the deeply flawed Dujail trial and this execution harshly," he added.

But the hanging will be broadly welcomed among Iraq's majority Shiite population, which held noisy street parties to celebrate Saddam's arrest in December 2003 and conviction this year.

In the Shiite holy city of Najaf celebratory gunfire erupted around the city in the immediate aftermath of the verdict.

Security officials fear a backlash, however, from hardline factions among Iraq's Sunni minority, including the Islamist and nationalist militant groups that make up the deadliest elements of Iraq's violent insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0111601

Ahead of the verdict, the head of Iraq's interior ministry command centre, Brigadier General Abdel Karim Khalaf, told AFP that the country's beleaguered security forces were on high alert.

"Certainly, this is a big event, putting into effect the execution of this serial killer," he said. "We will take measures proportionate to this event. We will put all our forces on the streets so that no lives are jeopardised."

After Saddam's conviction in November, authorities imposed a three-day curfew across much of the country, shutting down all life in Baghdad and sealing Iraq's borders and airports in a bid to head off reprisals.

State television prepared the ground for Saddam's execution by showing gruesome footage of his soldiers mutilating and beating prisoners, throwing a detainee from a roof and filling mass graves.

Joy Of Capture Muted At End (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

CRAWFORD, Tex., Dec. 29 — The capture of Saddam Hussein three years ago was a jubilant moment for the White House, hailed by President Bush in a televised address from the Cabinet Room. The execution of Mr. Hussein, though, seemed hardly to inspire the same sentiment.

Since his arrest on Dec. 13, 2003, Mr. Hussein has gradually faded from view, save for his courtroom outbursts and writings from prison. The growing chaos and violence in Iraq has steadily overshadowed the torturous rule of Mr. Hussein, who for more than two decades held a unique place in the politics and psyche of the United States, a symbol of the manifestation of evil in the Middle East.

Now, what could have been a triumphal bookend to the American invasion of Iraq has instead been dampened by the grim reality of conditions on the ground there. Mr. Hussein's hanging means that the ousted leader has been held accountable for his misdeeds, fulfilling the American war aim most cited by the White House after Iraq's weapons of mass destruction proved nonexistent.

But that war is now edging toward its fifth year, and the sectarian violence that has surged independent of any old Sunni or Baathist allegiances to Mr. Hussein has raised questions about what change, if any, his death might bring.

"Saddam's face has been on this process from the beginning and here goes that face," said Bruce Buchanan, a professor of government at the University of Texas at Austin. "But in many respects, he's a bit player now."

Even as a bit player, though, the specter of Mr. Hussein remained intimately entwined with Mr. Bush and his father, George H. W. Bush. Two years after the Persian Gulf war, Mr. Hussein ordered an assassination attempt on the elder Bush, an act of spite that the 43rd president would never forget.

"There's no doubt his hatred is mainly directed at us," the current president said, speaking to a Republican fund-raising crowd in Houston on Sept. 26, 2002. "This is the man who tried to kill my dad."

For his part, Mr. Hussein referred to the younger Mr. Bush as "son of the viper." He delivered a famous snub of the 41st president, constructing a mosaic of the elder Bush's face on the floor of the Rashid Hotel, perfectly positioned to be repeatedly stepped on. After the American troops reached Baghdad, they crushed the mosaic.

When Mr. Hussein was captured, the president said: "Good riddance, the world is better off without you." But he dismissed suggestions that a family grudge played a role in shaping his Iraq policy or influenced his decision to go to war. "My personal views," he said, "aren't important in this matter."

But Mr. Buchanan, a longtime observer of the Bush political family in Texas, said that these were no ordinary archenemies and that setting aside personal views entirely seemed impossible.

"I think the president will see this as justice done and may well feel some sense of vindication, in part because of the attempt on his father's life," he said. "It's definitely part of the drama."

Here in Crawford, where the president is spending the week between Christmas and New Year's, aides planned for how the White House would respond to Mr. Hussein's execution. They quickly ruled out the idea of putting the president in front of television cameras, fearful of sending a message that Mr. Bush was crowing or that the United States was orchestrating the execution, which officially was carried out by the Iraqi government.

DOJ_NMG_0111602

But a senior administration official, speaking on condition of anonymity to discuss internal strategy, also acknowledged that the challenges in Iraq contributed to the president's decision to simply issue a brief written statement after the execution. The White House concluded that even a development as dramatic as Mr. Hussein's hanging could not be used to renew support for the war.

"Americans have already taken that into account," said Frank Newport, the editor in chief of the Gallup Poll. "The benefits of deposing Saddam Hussein are far exceeded by the cost of the war."

Indeed, a Gallup poll taken Dec. 8 to 10 showed that 64 percent of Americans said the costs of the war outweighed the benefits. Only 33 percent disagreed, saying the benefits — including the ouster of Mr. Hussein — outweighed the costs.

It is a striking change in thinking, Mr. Newport said, considering that since the first Gulf war a wide majority of Americans have supported the removal of Mr. Hussein. It was a chief reason, he said, that polls showed that more than 60 percent of Americans initially supported the war in Iraq.

In June 1993, after the failed attempt by Iraqi government agents on the life of the elder Bush, 53 percent of Americans said of Mr. Hussein in a Gallup Poll that they supported "the extreme action of having him assassinated to remove him from power," while 37 percent said they did not.

Those sentiments, of course, were expressed a full decade before the invasion that began the current war.

Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who ran against Mr. Bush in 2004 and has become increasingly vocal in his criticism of the war, said executing Mr. Hussein was hardly worth the cost.

"To go to war to kill one guy? Please," said Mr. Kerry, who recently returned from a visit to Iraq. He added that the execution had become "almost a sideshow to the fundamental dilemma and quandary of Iraq."

"What will not be resolved by his death is the political resolution that is critical to changing the direction and dynamic of the country," he added. "Those stakes remain fundamentally the same."

Impact Of Hussein's Death Likely To Be Limited (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

The execution only underscores lingering divisions in Iraq.

WASHINGTON — Many Iraqis and Americans have looked forward to the day when justice would catch up with Saddam Hussein. Yet, when it arrived today, it seemed to be much less than the historic turning point many once had anticipated.

With Iraq beset by violence and turmoil, the former dictator's demise no longer appeared to signal the beginning of new order. After a trial marked by disruption and controversy, the execution seemed only another reminder that the country's divisions remain deep and seemingly insoluble nearly four years after the U.S.-led invasion.

"If everything had followed the coalition plan, if everything were calm now, this could have been the biggest event of the year, maybe the biggest event in the post-invasion," said Henri J. Barkey, a former State Department official and Mideast specialist.

"This is not just a sideshow. But everyday existence is so grave and grim, it's not what it might have been."

Ever since Hussein was toppled from power, Bush administration officials have pinned their hopes on a procession of developments — the elections, the capture of the former leader and the killing of terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi, to name a few — to reshape opinions in the United States and Iraq about the American mission.

But though some of the events have affected public opinion, none has so far succeeded in convincing most Americans that things have fundamentally changed for the better.

"I just don't see this as a big turning point," said Daniel P. Serwer, a former U.S. diplomat and State Department official now at the U.S. Institute for Peace.

Even among some in the Bush administration, the potential for a positive reaction to Hussein 's death was considered limited.

One U.S. official said he believed that the execution would serve as a reminder that Hussein had been a danger to Iraqis as well as the region. But the official, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity of the subject, acknowledged that the development's effect was likely to be "limited," in part because of the continuing difficulties in Iraq, and in part because it had been foreseen for some time.

DOJ_NMG_0111603

Any positive reaction among Americans also is likely to muted by disenchantment over the number of U.S. troops who have died in Iraq.

In Iraq, the execution of Hussein has commanded attention, but it may not outlast the daily struggle faced by most Iraqis.

"People in Iraq today are concerned with very basic things these days. Will this put more food on the table, make the streets safer, put more electricity in the wires?" Serwer asked. "The answer is likely not. So many people will not see this as that big."

Two years ago, it appeared that Iraqis were beginning a dialogue about their common history and Hussein's place in it.

If the country had made greater steps toward a unified view of their history, Hussein's execution might have more weight, said Nathan Brown, a specialist in Arab politics at Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

But with the country increasingly fractured along sectarian lines, "this is a bit more of a sideshow than it would have been," Brown said.

Hussein's execution also would have carried more significance had his trial been carried out differently, some experts said.

Barkey, who is now at Lehigh University, believes the Iraqis made a major mistake in deciding to put Hussein on trial for the killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujayl after a 1982 assassination attempt there, rather than for the chemical weapons attacks in the country's north that are thought to have killed as many as 100,000 Kurds.

By executing Hussein for "a relatively minor crime … you're leaving this important chapter open," said Barkey. The attacks on Kurds were clear violations of international law, he said.

"It's one of the reasons the United States went to war, and yet they're leaving that unresolved," Barkey said. "It's very problematic."

He said that decision has left many Kurds feeling that "they are being cheated — they have not received justice."

Juan R. Cole, a Mideast specialist at the University of Michigan, said the nature of the trial also tended to further divide Iraqis, rather than heal wounds.

Because the charges concerned Hussein's reprisals against members of a revolutionary Shiite party, Dawa — which happens to be the party of the current and previous Iraqi prime ministers — the execution could appear to many Sunnis as simple score-settling.

"This can be read as the Dawa party and a Kurdish judge taking revenge on Saddam," Cole said. "To the Sunnis it will look like just one more slap in the face…. This is the opposite of national healing and will just deepen the divisions."

Cole said he expected adverse Sunni reaction to the execution, noting that about 20 demonstrators were killed in Sunni-dominated Baqubah after Hussein 's verdict was announced.

Even so, he agreed that the execution's political significance would be limited.

"It won't change anything on the ground," he said.

paul.richter@latimes.com

Hussein's Death Does Not Alter Bush's Problems (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The execution of Saddam Hussein closes an agonizing chapter in history that began with President Bush's vow to achieve a "regime change" with the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

Yet the hanging of the longtime Iraqi strongman does not alter the fundamental problems that Bush faces: Reclaiming public support in the U.S. for a war that a majority of Americans now oppose, and charting a convincing course for the victory that Bush vows to achieve before withdrawing U.S. forces.

The White House steadfastly averted any statements of direct satisfaction with either the conviction of or death sentence handed to Hussein. Instead, the president and his advisers portrayed them as signals of achievement by the new judiciary in Iraq.

Functioning courts are fundamental for any new government that would be capable of meeting the standards Bush has set for declaring victory in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0111604

Over the course of the war, Hussein at times served as a powerful symbol, often affecting Bush's popularity.

The toppling of the statue of the Iraqi leader as Baghdad fell on April 9, 2003, offered a significant image of hope soon after the invasion that Iraqis welcomed the U.S.-engineered overthrow.

Bush, whose job approval in public opinion polls had peaked at 90 percent after the terrorist assaults of Sept. 11, 2001, saw his approval slump to the 50s by the time of the U.S.-led invasion. But his job approval spiked to 71 percent in the Gallup Poll after the fall of Baghdad.

The capture of the toppled Iraqi leader 38 weeks after the invasion, when Hussein was found hiding in a spider-hole on a farm 10 miles southeast of Tikrit, provided a new but temporary boost for Bush.

Bush's job approval climbed to 63 percent in the Gallup Poll after the capture of Hussein in December 2003, a level of support the president has not achieved since.

But the potency of Hussein as a factor in American public opinion has been diminished by the fact the Iraqi leader did not prove to pose the threat to the outside world that Bush had maintained Hussein was before the invasion of Iraq.

In the final Gallup Poll of 2006, Bush's job-approval rested at 35 percent, the lowest level of support for any president midway through his second term since Harry Truman.

While the Hussein execution may bring another temporary boost for Bush, the long-term impact of the war on American public opinion will likely be unchanged.

For Bush, the key to regaining public confidence in his handling of the war is likely to lie in the success of "the new way forward" in Iraq that he promises to spell out with the arrival of the new year.

Hussein Execution: World Reaction (CNN)

CNN.com, December 30, 2006

LONDON, England (CNN) -- While many countries and rights groups around the world said they did not support the death penalty, most expressed the hope that the execution of Saddam Hussein would prove a turning point for the people of Iraq.

U.S. President George W. Bush

"Bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq, but it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain, and defend itself," Bush said in a statement from his Texas ranch. (Full story)

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett

"I welcome the fact that Saddam Hussein has been tried by an Iraqi court for at least some of the appalling crimes he committed against the Iraqi people. He has now been held to account. The British Government does not support the use of the death penalty, in Iraq or anywhere else ... We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation."

French Foreign Ministry

"France calls upon all Iraqis to look towards the future and work towards reconciliation and national unity. Now more than ever, the objective should be a return to full sovereignty and stability in Iraq," the French foreign ministry said in a statement. "France, which like the rest of its European partners advocates the universal abolition of capital punishment, notes the execution of Saddam Hussein on Saturday. That decision was made by the people and the sovereign authorities of Iraq."

Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer

Downer said while Australia opposed the death penalty, Saddam had faced justice and a fair trial and had been found guilty of crimes against humanity. "The people of Iraq now know that their brutal dictator will never come back to lead them," Downer said in a statement. "While many will continue to grieve over their personal loss under his rule, his death marks an important step in consigning his tyrannical regime to the judgment of history and pursuing a process of reconciliation now and in the future."

Indian Congress Party

"We hope this unfortunate event will not stand in the way of the process of restoring normalcy and reconciliation in Iraq," the party's general secretary, Janardhan Dwivedi, said in a statement. Former Indian foreign minister Natwar Singh, who was forced from office in 2005 over his alleged involvement in the U.N. oil-for-food scandal in Iraq, said the execution would lead to increased tension in the Middle East. "It will have a very adverse impact on the region for decades to come," he told CNN-IBN.

DOJ_NMG_0111605

Japanese Foreign Ministry Spokesman Tomohiko Taniguchi

"We have acknowledged that the judgment has been made according to due process and pay respect to the legal procedures that the Iraqi government has taken. That said, what is most important in our view is to make this sentence not a new source of conflict but of reconciliation between the Iraqi people."

Brazilian Foreign Ministry

"(Brazil) does not believe carrying out this sentence will contribute to bringing peace to Iraq."

Human Rights Watch Director Richard Dicker

"Saddam Hussein was responsible for massive human rights violations, but that can't justify giving him the death penalty, which is a cruel and inhuman punishment," Dicker told The Associated Press.

Amnesty International U.S.A. Director Larry Cox

"The rushed execution of Saddam Hussein is simply wrong. It signifies justice denied for countless victims who endured unspeakable suffering during his regime, and now have been denied their right to see justice served."

Saddam Hussein Executed In Baghdad (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo, Steve Negus

Financial Times, December 30, 2006

Saddam Hussein, the former Iraqi dictator, was put to death at dawn on Saturday, Baghdad time, just days after an Iraqi appeals court refused to commute his execution.

Before he was taken to the gallows in Baghdad, the former Iraqi president was reportedly handed a "red card" signaling his imminent death - a reminder of the red cards dealt to those he had condemned to death during his time in power.

Iraqi state television reported that Mr Hussein's execution was captured in still photographs and on video.

President George W. Bush welcomed the execution of Mr Hussein saying it came after a "fair trial - the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime".

"Saddam Hussein's execution comes at the end of a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops," Mr Bush said in a statement. "Bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq, but it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain, and defend itself, and be an ally in the war on terror."

US officials on Friday said they had been unaware of when Mr Hussein would be executed. But a White House spokeswoman later said Stephen Hadley, the White House national security adviser, had informed Mr Bush at 7.15pm Washington time that Mr Hussein was expected to be executed within hours. Mr Hadley received the news from Zalmai Khalilizad, the US ambassador to Iraq, who had been informed of the pending execution by Mr Maliki.

Margaret Beckett, the UK's foreign secretary, said in a statement she welcomed "the fact that Saddam Hussein has been tried by an Iraqi court for at least some of the appalling crimes he committed against the Iraqi people".

"He has now been held to account," Mrs Beckett said. "The British Government does not support the use of the death penalty, in Iraq or anywhere else. We advocate an end to the death penalty worldwide, regardless of the individual or the crime. We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation."

Mr Hussein, who was captured by United States forces in December 2003, was sentenced to death last month for ordering the massacre of Iraqi Shia civilians more than two decades ago.

While the execution of the former Iraqi strongman was long expected, it will be an emotional jolt to many Iraqis to hear that the man who dominated their nation's public life with an iron fist for nearly three decades has finally been put to death.

"It is a moment of remembrance for the victims of Saddam Hussein," Feisal al-Istrabadi, deputy Iraqi ambassador to the United Nations, told CNN. "This is a man who history will record as responsible for the deaths of two million Iraqis."

Mr Hussein's two sons, Uday and Qusay, were killed by US forces in 2003.

US officials on Friday were careful to avoid any appearance that they had played any role in the decision to proceed with his hanging. But the US military was placed on heightened alert ahead of the execution in case his death resulted in more attacks on US troops, or a spike in the sectarian violence that has engulfed Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0111606

Sunni Arabs may view his hanging as yet another aspect of Iraq's long national humiliation, even though many did not condone his regime's excesses. Some Iraqis fear that his execution will set back the chances of a political settlement between Iraq's Shia-led government and the country's Sunnis that could undercut support for the country's insurgency.

But the execution may bolster the government's standing among militant Shia groups, many of whom suspected that the former dictator might be able to strike a last-minute deal with the Americans to escape the gallows.

President George W. Bush justified the 2003 invasion of Iraq on the basis that Mr Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction. After US forces failed to find those weapons, the Bush administration argued that the invasion had still been justified because it had removed the dictator from power.

The execution comes as the Bush administration prepares to unveil a new policy to help stop the violence that has claimed the lives of tens of thousands of Iraqis and almost 3,000 US troops.

Iraqis had braced themselves for the execution of their former ruler on Friday following mounting speculation that Mr Hussein would be sent to the gallows before the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, which began on Saturday morning.

Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister, on Friday said nothing could overturn the death sentence.

"Our respect for human rights requires us to execute him, and there will be no review or delay in carrying out the sentence," he said.

Mr Hussein, 69, was sentenced to death by an Iraqi special tribunal on November 5 for his role in a campaign of reprisals ordered against the Shia village of Dujail, where he suffered a 1982 assassination attempt. The campaign led to scores being executed and many others subjected to torture and long-term detention.

His trial was marked by allegations of political interference and procedural errors, and some international organisations had called on the government not to go through with Mr Hussein's execution.

In Washington late on Friday night, a federal judge rejected a last-ditch petition by lawyers for Mr Hussein to block the US military from handing the former president over to Iraqi officials.

Democratic Senator Edward Kennedy said Mr Hussein had been "a brutal tyrant and murderous dictator". "Now it is time for the people of Iraq to work to reconcile their differences and to heal the wounds of the past. Only that process will end the violence that has prevented Iraq from moving forward," he said.

Pete Hoekstra, the outgoing Republican chairman of the House intelligence committee, said: "I do not support the death penalty, but Saddam Hussein's fate was determined by an Iraqi judicial system that was created by the free Iraqi people," Hoekstra said. "His sentence was delivered swiftly and the pain was minimised - the same cannot be said for his many hundreds of thousands of victims."

Iraq Executes Saddam Hussein By Hanging (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske, Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

Baghdad — Deposed Iraqi president Saddam Hussein was executed by hanging about 6 a.m. Saturday Baghdad time.

Hussein's death warrant was signed today by the nation's two vice presidents and execution witnesses gathered in the heavily fortified Green Zone for the execution, according to an Iraqi official with knowledge of the proceedings.

Hussein was hanged for his role in the deaths of 148 Shiite men and boys nearly a quarter-century ago.

U.S. officials said that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki met with cabinet officials and other politicians throughout the day to plan the event. Security plans were Iraqi leaders' main concern, as well as sorting through procedural requirements for the execution, including the signing of the death warrant and the timing of the execution.

U.S. military officials handed Hussein over to Iraqi officials around 8 p.m. today Baghdad time, according to one of Hussein's defense attorneys.

Maryam Rayis, a legal advisor to Maliki, said that Hussein's death warrant was signed by Vice Presidents Tariq Hashimi, a Sunni Arab politician, and Shiite politician, Adel Abdul Mehdi. President Jalal Talabani, a death penalty opponent, was out of Baghdad today and delegated his capital authority to Mehdi, Rayis said.

DOJ_NMG_0111607

Hussein was dressed in a red jumpsuit, Rayis said, which has been the custom for death row prisoners in Iraq since before Hussein came to power.

The gallows were set up by midnight Baghdad time, Rayis said, and Hussein was to be offered a last meal before being led to the scaffold.

Defense lawyer, Najib Naimi, said that U.S. military officials asked him this morning to send someone to pick up the former president's personal effects, such as clothing, books — including a Koran — and a manuscript Hussein had been writing.

"He was writing his biography," Naimi said. "But I don't think he had a chance to complete it."

Among the witnesses scheduled to watch Hussein's hanging were a representative from the Interior Ministry, Iraqi High Tribunal Judge Munir Haddad, Chief Prosecutor Munqith Fraoon, a physician and a cleric to read from the Koran, Rayis said.

Hussein's wife, who is in Qatar, and his daughter, who is in Jordan were allowed to attend since they are both fugitives from Iraqi justice, Rayis said. Hussein's lawyers were also barred from attending his execution, Rayis said.

Hussein was to allowed to offer final words, but they would not be broadcast live on television, Rayis said. Video footage will likely be shown in some abbreviated form after Hussein's execution, Rayis said.

Rayis' statements apparently put to rest conflicting reports about the timing of Hussein's execution and whether U.S. authorities had handed over custody to the Iraqi government that emerged today.

U.S. officials said that they were surprised both by the Justice Ministry's rejection of Hussein's capital appeal on Tuesday and by the Iraqi government's swift decision to push for Hussein's execution. Hussein also expressed surprise when he met with defense attorneys on Thursday, Naimi said, and had hoped to file additional legal petitions.

Hussein's lawyers filed a motion for a temporary restraining order at the Washington D.C. Court of Appeals in an effort to force the U.S. military to retain custody of Hussein, but it was denied.

Hussein's execution coincided with the end of the Hajj — or the season of Islamic pilgrimage to Mecca. Most Sunnis will begin Eid al-Adha at midnight Saturday. Most Shiites will begin 24 hours later.

Naimi claimed that Maliki was pushing for Hussein's execution during the holiday to "make a gift during Eid to his party."

Hussein "will be the sacrificial lamb for the Shiites, and the Iranians in particular," said Naimi, referring to the traditional practice of many Muslims, who slaughter lambs after pilgrimage for celebratory feasts.

U.S. officials expressed concern that news of the imminent execution, which began circulating on Thursday, would give insurgents time to plan attacks. U.S. military officials said that they were beefing up security in Baghdad in advance of the execution and possible retaliatory violence. Iraqi and U.S. officials said that the government would likely extend a customary Friday curfew indefinitely.

"U.S. forces in Iraq are obviously at a high state of alert…because of the environment that they operate in and because of the current security situation," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman at a morning briefing in Washington. "They'll obviously take into account social dimensions that could potentially lead to an increase in violence, which certainly would include carrying out the sentence of Saddam Hussein."

Hussein had been held at Camp Cropper a military base on Baghdad's outskirts, according to U.S. officials.

The site of the execution was kept secret for fear of insurgent attacks.

Naimi said that Hussein's family wants to bury him in his northern hometown of Tikrit and fear that the government will cremate him and scatter the ashes.

After his hanging, Hussein's body was to be wrapped in a white sheet for burial, Rayis said. The body will be buried by Iraq's Directorate of Social Welfare if it is not claimed by a family member, Rayis said.

Iraqi High Tribunal's rejection of Hussein's appeal Tuesday began a 30-day deadline for his execution, which would run out by the end of January.

His execution ended other legal proceedings against Hussein, including a current case against him involving his alleged involvement in the Anfal military campaign, which left tens of thousands of Kurds dead by gunfire, bomb blasts and poison gas.

Saddam Pays At The End Of A Rope (WT/AP)

By Christopher Torchia, Qassim Abdul-Zahra

DOJ_NMG_0111608

The Washington Times, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Saddam Hussein, who ruled Iraq with remorseless brutality for a quarter-century, was hanged early today.

The man who came to a grim end at the end of a rope had vexed three U.S. presidents. The 69-year-old dictator left the United States and a coalition of nations in a fight to quell a stubborn insurgency waged by Saddam loyalists.

On state-run Iraqiya television, a news announcer said, "Criminal Saddam was hanged to death."

The station earlier broadcast national songs after the first announcement and ran a tag on the screen that read "with Saddam's execution marks the end of a dark period of Iraq's history."

A U.S. judge yesterday declined to intervene in the execution.

Mariam al-Rayes, a legal expert and a former member of the Shi'ite bloc in parliament, told Iraqiya television that the execution "was filmed and, God willing, it will be shown. There was one camera present, and a doctor was also present there."

Miss Al-Rayes, an ally of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, did not attend the execution. She said Mr. Al-Maliki did not attend, but was represented by an aide.

Mr. Al-Maliki had rejected calls that Saddam be spared, telling families of people killed during the dictator's rule that would be an insult to the victims.

"Our respect for human rights requires us to execute him, and there will be no review or delay in carrying out the sentence," Mr. al-Maliki's office quoted him as saying during a meeting with relatives before the hanging.

In Crawford, Texas, President Bush said in a statement that Saddam's execution was "the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime."

In Dearborn, Mich., dozens of Iraqi Americans gathered late yesterday at a mosque to celebrate reports that Saddam had been executed, cheering and crying as drivers honked horns in jubilation.

Dave Alwatan wore an Iraqi flag around his shoulders and flashed a peace sign to everyone he passed at an Islamic educational center in the suburb of Detroit, a city that has one of the nation's largest concentrations of people with roots in the Middle East.

"Peace," he said, grinning and laughing. "Now there will be peace for my family."

Mr. Alwatan, 32, said Saddam's forces tortured and killed relatives that were left behind when he left Iraq in 1991.

At his death, Saddam was in the midst of a second trial, charged with genocide and other crimes for a 1987-88 military crackdown that killed an estimated 180,000 Kurds in northern Iraq. Experts said the trial of his co-defendants was likely to continue despite his execution.

Many in Iraq's Shi'ite majority were eager to see the execution of a man whose Sunni Arab-dominated regime oppressed them and Kurds. Before the hanging, a preacher in the Shi'ite holy city of Najaf on Friday called Saddam's execution "God's gift to Iraqis."

"Oh, God, you know what Saddam has done. He killed millions of Iraqis in prisons, in wars with neighboring countries, and he is responsible for mass graves. Oh, God, we ask you to take revenge on Saddam," said Sheik Sadralddin al-Qubanji, a member of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

On Thursday, two half brothers visited Saddam in his cell, a member of the former dictator's defense team, Badee Izzat Aref, told the Associated Press by telephone from the United Arab Emirates. He said the former dictator handed them his personal belongings.

A senior official at the Iraqi Defense Ministry said Saddam gave his will to one of his half brothers. The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to reporters.

In a farewell message to Iraqis posted Wednesday on the Internet, Saddam said he was giving his life for his country as part of the struggle against the United States. "Here, I offer my soul to God as a sacrifice, and if he wants, he will send it to heaven with the martyrs."

One of Saddam's attorneys, Issam Ghazzawi, said the letter was written by Saddam on Nov. 5, the day he was convicted by an Iraqi tribunal in the Dujail killings.

The message called on Iraqis to put aside the sectarian hatred that has bloodied their nation for a year and voiced support for the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency against U.S.-led forces, saying: "Long live jihad and the mujahedeen."

Saddam urged Iraqis to rely on God's help in fighting "against the unjust nations" that ousted his regime.

Najeeb al-Nauimi, a member of Saddam's legal team, said U.S. authorities maintained physical custody of Saddam until the execution to prevent his being humiliated publicly or his corpse mutilated, as has happened to previous Iraqi leaders deposed by force. Care would be taken to avoid inflaming Sunni public opinion.

"This is the end of an era in Iraq," Mr. al-Nauimi said from Doha, Qatar. "The Ba'ath regime ruled for 35 years. Saddam was vice president or president of Iraq during those years. For Iraqis, he will be very well remembered. Like a martyr, he died for the sake of his country."

While he wielded a heavy hand to maintain control, Saddam also sought to win public support with a personality cult that pervaded Iraqi society. Thousands of portraits, posters, statues and murals were erected in his honor all over Iraq. His face could be seen on the sides of office buildings, schools, airports and shops and on Iraq's currency.

Hussein Is Executed (PHI)

By Nancy A. Youssef

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD - Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi dictator who terrorized a nation for nearly a quarter-century until he was deposed and captured by U.S. troops, was hanged at dawn today for ordering the murders of 148 of his countrymen 24 years ago, Iraqi state-run television reported.

The execution took place about 6 a.m. Baghdad time, the state-owned Al-Iraqiya and two other stations reported. Two close aides to the 69-year-old Hussein also had been sentenced to die - his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim, former head of intelligence, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court.

An anxious nation awoke to the news of Hussein's execution wondering whether the death would galvanize insurgents to launch still more suicide assaults against Iraqis - or whether it would close an ugly chapter in the nation's history and allow the government to stave off a full-scale civil war.

U.S. and Iraqi forces braced for a possible surge in violence by Hussein supporters and those frustrated that an Arab leader was executed by what they consider an American-controlled government. Iraqi officials canceled leave for their police and army. The Pentagon announced that U.S. troops were at a high state of readiness.

The execution of a former head of state in his own country after a trial by an internationally monitored tribunal is almost without precedent. But its political impact was undercut by what human-rights groups said was badly flawed procedure. Human Rights Watch charged that the trial did not meet international standards of fairness and criticized the Iraqi government for actions it said undermined the court's independence. It said the court was unfamiliar with the law it was attempting to apply.

The execution also did not fully settle Iraqis' grievances against Hussein. The atrocity for which he was sentenced took place a quarter-century ago and was of far smaller dimensions than his alleged crimes against Kurds in the late 1980s and Shiites through the 1990s.

Yesterday evening, as the country waited news of his fate, Iraqi state television broadcast footage of Hussein's atrocities, including photos of gassed babies and of handcuffed men being tortured. Witnesses who had testified against him and called for his death gathered in the heavily fortified Green Zone, which houses the government, to witness the execution. They were joined by a judge, a doctor and a cleric.

Officials said they were videotaping the execution but would not air it publicly.

Earlier yesterday, there was a flurry of uncertainty over whether U.S. forces had handed Hussein over to Iraqi authorities for execution. Both sides said privately they were exasperated that the matter was being dealt with in such a climate of confusion and haste.

By early evening, Hussein's death appeared imminent, but officials were concerned about whether Iraqi law allowed them to execute a Muslim man on the eve of a major Muslim religious holiday. For Sunni Muslims, the Eid al-Adha, the Festival of the Sacrifice, was scheduled to begin today. Shiites begin the observance tomorrow.

Hussein was Sunni; the Iraqi government is largely Shiite.

A Christian Iraqi, Milad Kamal, from the southern city of Basra, questioned the timing of the execution.

DOJ_NMG_0111610

"I'm happy about Saddam's execution, because he didn't do anything good for us," Kamal said. "But the timing of it is stopping me from being joyful about it. It is Christmas and New Year's, a time for love and forgiveness. An execution contradicts that."

"Execution will not solve our problems," said Abdul Khadir Hadi, a Sunni teacher. "I will be sad about his execution, not out of any love for him, but because it will lead to more bloodshed in the form of retaliatory attacks."

Others, however, openly rejoiced.

"I am an orphan," said Sameer Redha, 23, an electronics-shop owner from Najaf. "I never saw my father. Mom said Saddam executed him because he was a member of the [opposition] Dawa Party. I had a terrible life because of Saddam. I will be able to enjoy life once he is executed."

Since December 2003, when American forces discovered Hussein hiding in a bunker near his hometown, many Iraqis said his execution was inevitable. But many also thought that he would face several more trials, including some over his alleged crimes during the Iran-Iraq War and the Persian Gulf War.

Instead, he was convicted by the Iraqi Special Tribunal of ordering the execution of 148 people after an assassination attempt in Dujail in 1982. The conviction was upheld Tuesday by an appeals court and, in accordance with Iraqi law, Hussein suddenly found himself facing imminent execution.

Former Iraqi Dictator Saddam Hussein Executed At 69 (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, David Lamb

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

Saddam Hussein, who ruled Iraq with ruthless force and led his people into three devastating wars while pursuing his goal of dominating the Arab world, was executed by hanging about 6 a.m. Saturday in Baghdad. He was 69.

Whether as president of Iraq, a self-proclaimed leader of the anti-American insurgency or rambunctious courtroom defendant, Hussein cast a large shadow over world events and the nation he controlled for most of the last 30 years.

Though never an army officer, he frequently wore military uniforms and styled himself as a fearless strategist and warrior. The wars he started cost more than 1 million lives, but he never won any of them and lived in constant fear, seldom sleeping in the same palace two nights in a row and employing look-alikes to foil assassination attempts.

Nearly four years after U.S.-led forces toppled his Baath Party regime and a little more than three years after he was caught hiding in a hole in the ground near his hometown, his death further shuts the door on an era of secular Arab nationalism, now being eclipsed throughout the Middle East by Islamist ideas and leaders.

Hussein took with him to the grave a trove of secrets. The former Iraqi leader allegedly ordered assassinations abroad and used his country's vast oil wealth to curry favor with Middle Eastern governments while maintaining undercover dealings with intelligence services throughout the region and the West.

One famous photograph shows Hussein in 1983 shaking hands with Donald H. Rumsfeld, the former Defense secretary who served as an informal envoy to Baghdad at a time when the United States was aiding Iraq in its eight-year war with Iran.

For his country, now convulsed in civil war, Hussein's most lasting and damaging legacy was the way his selective patronage and brutal violence divided Iraqis along lines that continue to haunt them.

Hussein moved rivers to reward Sunni Arab villagers loyal to his government and drained swamps to punish Shiite Muslims who rose up against him. He moved rebellious Kurds from the northern city of Kirkuk while selling cheap land in the city to Arabs to reward loyalists and upend the ethnic balance of the country's oil-rich north.

He imprisoned tens of thousands, ordered the killings of political enemies, real and imagined, including two of his sons-in-law, and used poison gas to wipe out whole villages in the Kurdish areas of northern Iraq. He granted construction contracts to favored Arab tribes, while depriving whole categories of people — such as Shiite Kurds — of their citizenship rights.

Such violence and manipulations may have established a semblance of stability. But they also built up a sense of entitlement by Sunnis and resentments on the part of Shiites and Kurds that fueled violence by death squads, militias and insurgents once the U.S. invasion of 2003 toppled his regime.

DOJ_NMG_0111611

Hussein fostered a grotesque cult of personality around himself as the embodiment of the Iraqi state and all of Iraqi history. As he consolidated absolute power in the 1980s, his face and figure went up all over the country. Here was Hussein on horseback. There he was in Kurdish costume. His likeness adorned the walls of every cafe, bank and government office. Hussein's initials were inscribed on the stones used to rebuild ancient archeological sites.

"With our souls, with our blood, we will sacrifice for you, Saddam," schoolchildren, old women and office workers chanted whenever Hussein arrived.

The result was a culture of dependence and subservience to the state that has plagued efforts to rebuild Iraq. To date, other than Muqtada Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric, not a single Iraqi who suffered through Hussein's final years of rule has emerged as a credible political leader. Perhaps the most telling illustration of Hussein's influence on Iraq is that nearly all of post-invasion Iraq's leadership has been culled from among exiles.

Humble origins

Saddam Hussein Abdul-Majid Tikriti was born into a poor Sunni household on April 28, 1937, to a family of peasants in the tiny mud-hut village of Al Auja, near the city of Tikrit on the Tigris River about 100 miles north of Baghdad. His father, Hussein Majid, died within a year of his birth, and his mother, Subha, married a man named Ibrahim Hassan.

Young Hussein earned money by selling watermelons to railroad passengers heading through town. When he was 10, apparently to escape his abusive stepfather, Hussein ran away from home and went to live with his uncle Khayrallah Tulfah, a former general who had been dismissed from the army for supporting a coup attempt.

By then, Tulfah was an embittered man, eking out an existence as a schoolteacher in Baghdad. He was also anti-Western, a fascist and a Sunni chauvinist. The influence he exerted over Hussein can be inferred in part from the title of a pamphlet the uncle wrote and Hussein had published years later: "Three Whom God Should Not Have Created: Persians, Jews and Flies."

At his uncle's instigation, Hussein committed his first killing while still in his teens. The victim was Saadoun Tikriti, a communist supporter of Gen. Abdul Karim Qassim, who later became Iraq's prime minister. He also happened to be Hussein's brother-in-law.

Hussein came of age in the late 1950s, a time of post-colonial change as Arab nationalism arose to challenge governments set up by the British and French. Like many Arabs, Hussein was inspired by the vision of a pan-Arab Middle East propagated by the charismatic Gamal Abdel Nasser, who became president of Egypt in 1956.

That same year, Hussein took part in a coup against Iraq's King Faisal II. The coup failed. But Hussein became a feared figure in the Iraqi political underground. In 1957, at age 20, he joined the Iraqi branch of the Baath Party, a secular, pan-Arab political movement founded in Syria in the 1940s that combined elements of socialism and Nazism.

In Baathism, Hussein found "an ideology that both justified his violent hatreds and harmonized his inner turmoil," according to the late Egyptian diplomat Tahseen Bashir. The party's promise of one strong, united Arab nation was imbued with a vision of grandeur and power perfectly suited to Hussein's ambitions. He rose quickly in the party's ranks.

"Saddam learned early on the first rule of street politics during that time in Baghdad," Bashir said. "In the context of Iraqi politics, survival of the fittest meant survival of the most brutal, the most cunning and, above all, the most violent."

In 1958, the Iraqi monarchy was overthrown by non-Baathist officers led by Qassim. King Faisal II was gunned down with his family and aides. Eighteen months later, the Baathists made their first grab for power, trying to assassinate Qassim by machine-gunning his car. Hussein, a member of the hit team, was slightly wounded. He disguised himself as a Bedouin and trekked across the desert to Syria, then moved on to Egypt.

The Baathists succeeded in overthrowing Qassim in 1963. The usurpers broadcast images of his corpse on television for several nights. In Iraqi politics, one Arab diplomat noted, "losers do not get the chance to retire gracefully."

Hussein returned to Baghdad immediately after the coup and became the new regime's chief enforcer. As head of an infamous interrogation center known as the Palace of the End, he allegedly oversaw the torture of the nascent regime's enemies.

But the Baathists were unable to retain power. Within months they were overthrown by the army, which jailed Hussein. Two years later, he escaped and resumed the task of building the party's internal security apparatus, employing carefully chosen Tikriti clansmen through whom he would gradually consolidate his control over the party, the army and, finally, the country.

Coming to power

DOJ_NMG_0111612

The Baathists seized power once and for all in 1968, this time with the help of the army. Gen. Ahmed Hassan Bakr, the party's secretary-general, became president. Hussein remained in the background as deputy chairman of the new Revolutionary Command Council but presided over a reign of terror that purged non-Baathists from power and quieted almost all of Iraq's quarrelsome clans, factions and sectarian groups.

He launched midnight raids on the homes of suspected opponents, organized show trials and staged public executions targeting select groups, including Jews, who at the time were a significant community in Baghdad.

"We do not need Stalinist ways to deal with traitors here," Hussein would later remark of the Soviet dictator Josef Stalin, whose rule of terror he admired and studied closely. "We need Baathist ways."

The regime's main tool to keep the country together was unbridled fear. One well-documented incident illustrates this principle.

In July 1979, Hussein eased Bakr out of office and assumed the presidency. In a meeting that was videotaped and later shown secretly to other Arab leaders, Hussein called senior Baathist officials together to listen to Muhyi Abd Husayn Mashhadi, a member of the Revolutionary Command Council, "confess" to taking part in a plot to overthrow the new government.

After the dramatic confession, Hussein lit a cigar and, between puffs, slowly read off the names of 21 other party officials who were asked to stand and leave the room.

"Everyone knew what was happening," said a senior Western diplomat. "Every time a name was called, the cadres in the room would begin shouting, 'Long live Saddam!' in the hopes that they would be spared. Every time the hysterical cheering died down, Saddam would take another puff on his cigar and call out another name."

The officials were later killed — the first batch of many executions that year.

Beyond fear, Hussein also employed money. During the 1970s, he and his Baath Party colleagues nationalized the oil industry. They used money from oil exports to build schools, hospitals, roads and housing, and to buy loyalty from the country's many tribes and clans.

But from the beginning, Hussein lavished his largess on some areas while ignoring others, building up resentment and hostility among Iraq's Shiite south, Sunni center and Kurdish north.

Hussein also spent handsomely on himself and his family. He favored finely tailored suits, expensive cars and Cuban cigars. Until the war, his family lived in splendor in palaces around the country. While his travels outside the Middle East were rare, his family members were known to take elaborate shopping vacations in Paris and New York.

Hussein was married to the same woman, Sajida, a former schoolteacher, from 1958 until the late 1980s, when they separated. Known to be a philanderer with numerous romantic liaisons, he took a second wife, Samira Shabandar, in the mid-1980s. They had a son, Ali, who was born about 1987. His two sons from his marriage to Sajida, Qusai and Uday, were known for their ruthlessness and played key roles in their father's rule. Hussein also had three daughters with Sajida, Raghad, Rana and Hala.

War without end

In 1980, Hussein invaded Iran, hoping to take advantage of that country's isolation after its Islamic revolution. The disastrous eight-year war that followed ultimately shaped Iraq's domestic politics and crushed its promising economy. Hussein's treatment of Iraqi Shiites and Kurds whom he considered agents of Iran sealed his fate and hardened Iraq's divisions.

Two years into the war, Hussein's motorcade came under fire during a visit to the Shiite town of Dujayl, a stronghold of the Iranian-backed Dawa Party. Hussein responded brutally, signing off on the deaths of at least 148 villagers, destroying the town as part of a "development" plan and banishing hundreds of families to desert encampments. Those were the acts on which his death sentence was based.

A few years later, it was Kurds who were massacred, as Iraqi air force helicopters dropped chemical weapons, believed to have been sarin and mustard gas, on villages in northern Iraq. The death toll is believed to have been in the tens of thousands, and hundreds of villages were destroyed.

In one attack, on the town of Halabja, as many as 5,000 men, women and children were believed to have been killed and perhaps twice that many wounded.

DOJ_NMG_0111613

Many in the West first became aware of Hussein's efforts to obtain weapons of mass destruction in 1981, when Israeli planes destroyed a nuclear reactor at Osirak, near Baghdad, that would have enabled Iraq to manufacture nuclear weapons. At least 25 pounds of enriched uranium was reported to have been on the site of the reactor, which was being built by Italian and French companies.

Hussein was celebrated across the Middle East for his strident stance against Israel. Through the years, he championed the Palestinian cause, providing support for the families of suicide bombers and housing and education to Palestinian refugees seeking shelter in Iraq.

But throughout the 1980s, his opposition to Israel remained largely rhetorical, as his army remained bogged down in the war with Iran. In 1988, Iraqi forces used poison gas to push back the Iranian army. Then, with both countries exhausted and hundreds of thousands dead on both sides, the United Nations mediated a cease-fire.

Soon, Hussein sought to restart his nuclear weapons program, but his reach for regional power was frustrated by $70 billion in war debt, including billions owed to the small, wealthy Persian Gulf nation of Kuwait, just south of Iraq.

Although most intelligence analysts missed the signals, a serious crisis was brewing between Iraq and Kuwait. Arab officials now concede they miscalculated and should have read the warnings in Hussein's public threats against Kuwait and boasts about chemical weapons. But no one miscalculated more than Hussein when, on Aug. 2, 1990, he ordered his troops to invade.

"What stood out most clearly about Saddam was his insulation," a Pentagon analyst later said. "He was an underground fighter with an intense suspicion of the outside world, a man who didn't know or understand the West. His misperceptions led him to miscalculations that made him a very difficult man to predict."

Even as the administration of President George H.W. Bush assembled a massive force to drive his army out of Kuwait, Hussein appeared to have no conception of what a modern military force could do. As his commanders later told U.S. officials, he had mastered the technology of a rifle but didn't understand the capabilities of a laser-guided bomb.

"The great duel, the mother of all battles, has begun," Hussein declared on government radio on Jan. 17, 1991, as the U.S. air campaign began. "The dawn of victory nears as this great showdown begins."

A miscalculation

Operation Desert Storm, a campaign led by the U.S. and generally supported by the Arab world, devastated Baghdad and Iraqi military facilities.

After a 100-hour ground war, the Kuwaiti monarchy was restored, with 175,000 Iraqi troops surrendering and an estimated 85,000 dead, one of the most lopsided defeats in modern military history.

In the months that followed, uprisings by Shiite forces in the south and Kurdish rebels in the north put added pressure on Hussein's regime. With Americans watching, the Shiite rebellion was put down brutally by elements of Hussein's Republican Guard. But a "no fly" zone over northern Iraq enforced by American and British pilots allowed Kurds to establish a largely autonomous region over the next several years.

U.N.-imposed sanctions on Iraq's oil devastated its economy, impoverishing the once-proud middle-class country. Iraq slid into further ruin, with hunger widespread, children dying because of a lack of medicine and the per capita income cut in half, to $1,200 a year.

During the next decade, Hussein turned to religion to bolster his regime. Although his Baathist ideology was socialist and secular, he built gargantuan mosques and put up billboards around Baghdad showing himself kneeling on a prayer mat.

Far from learning any lessons from his defeat in the war, Hussein continued to play cat-and-mouse with U.S. forces and the international community. He manipulated an "oil for food" program set up by the United Nations, using it to accumulate cash for weapons and patronage. His forces engaged in sporadic military incidents, many sparked by Hussein's refusal to give U.N. weapon inspectors full access to sensitive sites.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, neoconservative policymakers in Washington, who viewed Iraq as the primary stumbling block to U.S. interests in the Middle East, consolidated their hold on the U.S. foreign policy apparatus. President George W. Bush labeled Iraq as part of an "axis of evil," arming to threaten the world.

DOJ_NMG_0111614

Hussein called the Sept. 11 attacks "God's punishment" against the Americans, although there is no evidence he was involved.

"The United States reaps the thorns its rulers have planted in the world," he said the day after the attacks.

As diplomatic efforts to get Hussein to agree to U.N. weapon inspections resumed, Hussein's government denied that he had any weapons of mass destruction to show U.N. inspectors.

After the war, those denials proved to have been true. Iraq's weapons programs had deteriorated under the pressure of sanctions. But as Hussein's commanders told U.S. investigators after the invasion, their president had bluffed, not wanting to let the world, or his own generals, know that he lacked chemical or biological weapons out of fear the news would embolden his enemies, particularly Iran.

It also became clear after the fact that Hussein never believed the Americans would oust him. He expected a repeat of a 1998 bombing campaign, which had damaged his regime but not overthrown it.

But he hinted that even if he were toppled, that would not be the end of the fight.

"The battle will not be over until ... the guns stop, when the national will of the people completely succumbs to all that the aggressor wants to see done," Hussein told CBS News anchor Dan Rather in an interview shortly before the U.S. invasion.

"Air supremacy and missile supremacy are not enough," he said. "In the final analysis, guns will continue to tell the tale of a courageous people, defending itself with its own fighters."

The downfall

On March 17, 2003, Bush gave Hussein 48 hours to leave Iraq. Two days later, U.S. warplanes began bombing targets where Hussein and top aides were believed to be sleeping.

American and British troops entering from Kuwait took ground rapidly. Hussein, defying his military commanders' advice, devised a strategy that ensured quick defeat. His military commanders later told U.S. investigators that until the very end, Hussein was far more afraid of Iranian-backed Shiite rebels rising up against him in the south than American troops sacking his capital.

By April 9, Baghdad had fallen to American troops. Hussein and his sons, taking as much as $1 billion in cash, escaped into the Sunni homelands of northwest Iraq and began rallying tribesmen and former loyalists. In July, Uday and Qusai were killed in a shootout in Mosul. Hussein continued to evade capture, issuing occasional tape-recorded messages that called on Iraqis to resist the U.S.-led forces.

As the year wore on, a dramatic rise in insurgent attacks lent an air of urgency to finding Hussein. The U.S. government offered a reward of $25 million for information leading to his capture. Then, on Dec. 13, 2003, American forces caught him, secreted in an underground hide-out at a farmhouse near Tikrit.

During the last three years of his life, Hussein, along with former aides, was housed at Camp Cropper, the U.S. prison for important detainees, not far from one of his opulent former palaces. In 2005, he and seven others were placed on trial for the killings of the Dujayl villagers.

Neither Hussein's capture nor his trial slowed the country's descent into civil war. The number of U.S. troops and Iraqis killed continued to accelerate. Hussein himself, long despised and mistrusted by the rest of the Arab world, became a cause celebre worldwide as he condemned the trial as a farce and the U.S.-backed government of Iraq as a puppet.

"I am the president of Iraq," he declared forcefully during an early session of the trial. "I will not answer to this so-called court."

After a contentious, chaotic trial during which three defense lawyers were gunned down and a judge was removed for being too lenient toward the defense, the court, on Nov. 5, 2006, convicted and sentenced Hussein to hang along with his half brother Barzan Ibrahim Hasan and former judge Awad Hamed Bandar.

Despite criticism by human rights groups who said the trial was unfair, the verdict was upheld Tuesday, three weeks after the start of the appeals process.

Through his lawyers, Hussein released a letter, one he said he would have preferred to have read aloud in court. He called upon warring Iraqis to set aside their differences and depicted himself as gracefully resigned to his death.

"Here I am presenting myself as a sacrifice" he wrote. "If God wants this, he will take my soul up in heaven with martyrs and believers. And if not, he is the most merciful. He created us and we all will return to him."

DOJ_NMG_0111615

Obituary: Saddam Hussein (FT)

By Victor Mallet

Financial Times, December 30, 2006

The former Iraqi dictator showed early promise as an administrator. But two disastrous wars against Iran and Kuwait and an increasingly ruthless rule of terror inflicted isolation and misery on his country

Saddam Hussein, the former Iraqi dictator who was hanged aged 69, was responsible for bringing untold suffering to his country's people as he pursued a vain ambition to become the unchallenged leader of the Arab world.

Their travails continued after he was swiftly unseated by a US-led invasion of 2003 that only succeeded in deepening the many fissures in Iraqi society suppressed during his brutal quarter century in power. If few Iraqis mourned his fall, many were embittered by the signal failure of the subsequent military occupation to prevent Iraq from sliding into violent chaos.

Even before the allied attack, Saddam's long years of power had led to his country being fragmented, partially destroyed and plunged back into poverty just as it was starting to discover a modern, national identity.

Twice Saddam defied the might of his erstwhile friends in the West and twice he miscalculated the force and determination they would show in retaliating – for him, fatally so on the second occasion.

His defeats at the hands of the western allies followed his long and futile war with neighbouring Iran during the 1980s which cost 1m lives. To outsiders the wonder was that he survived as long as he did when he was so despised within Iraq itself for the death and devastation he had brought upon its citizenry.

Part of the answer was his ruthless use of terror. Yet he did not rule by fear alone. A master of deceit, he used a multitude of contrived personas to win the support of widely different groups. The photographs tell it all. They show him posing as a field marshal, though he had never been in the military; as a descendant of the Prophet Mohammed, though that claim was dubious in the extreme; or, most bizarre of all, as a westerner in a Homburg hat.

He had started out as a reformer. Yet by the end, nothing could disguise his personal viciousness or his failure to turn his country into the modern, prosperous Middle East state that its oil reserves, fertile land and rich cultural heritage should have made possible. Indeed, the tragedy for Iraq is that his legacy could have been vastly different.

Saddam Hussein was born in the humble farming village of al-Ouja, near Tikrit on the Tigris river. His mother Subha was the village fortune teller but he was brought up largely by his pro-Nazi uncle Khairallah Tulfah. Officially, his birthday was April 28, 1937, although the true date is unclear because births often went unregistered.

After an apparently unhappy childhood – little is known about his absent father but his stepfather beat him with a metal coated stick – his uncle took him to Baghdad where he was finally taught to read and write. He then lent his services to the fledgling Ba'ath movement with its loose ideology of Arab nationalism and socialism.

Iraq, a country formed from three chunks of the old Ottoman empire, had been ruled since the 1930s by Hashemite Kings imposed by British colonialists. The Ba'athists supported the 1958 revolution to overthrow the monarchy, but decided to kill Abdul-Karim Qassem, the country's new leader, the following year.

Saddam Hussein was in on the plot. Fouad Matar, an admittedly unreliable hagiographer, says: "Saddam was not supposed to fire, just to provide cover for his four comrades as they withdrew. But as the operation got under way, his excitement mounted and he drew his machine-gun from the folds of a long cloak and fired at Abdul-Karim Qassem's car." Qassem survived that bungled attempt, only to be overthrown in 1963.

A later plot, again involving Saddam , to kill Qassem's successor also failed. In 1962 Saddam became the main organiser of the civilian wing of the Ba'ath party but between 1964 and 1966 he was apparently jailed. In the coup of 1968 Ahmad Hassan Bakr, Saddam's cousin, became president, but Saddam himself soon emerged as the real power in the land.

When he came to power, Saddam initially used Iraq's fast growing oil wealth to finance a modernisation campaign. Becoming vice-president in 1968, he showed ability as an administrator, developing Iraq's industry, transforming Baghdad into a modern city, building a secular welfare state and launching an ambitious literacy programme.

A decade later, however, he had embarked on policies that would sap the country's economic strength and his own political capital. By the end of the 1970s Gamal Abdel-Nasser, the towering figure who had dominated Middle Eastern politics, was dead and Egypt had made peace with Israel. That left a a vacancy on the Arab stage and Saddam was only too willing to fill it. In 1979 he took over as President, following a bloody palace putsch in which he executed dozens of his government colleagues. He forced the remaining members of the Revolutionary Command Council to help him execute supposed plotters, thus creating a grim loyalty born of shared guilt among his colleagues. His next step was to declare war on Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0111616

The ousting of the Shah of Iran and the emergence of an Islamic fundamentalist government there was a potential threat to Saddam's regime. Although he himself was a Sunni Muslim, some 60 per cent of his people were Shia Muslims as were the vast majority of Iranians. He feared the Iranians would export their revolution – a fear shared by the west and by Gulf states such as Saudi Arabia. All of them looked to Saddam as a firewall against Iran's ayatollahs and backed him enthusiastically.

Yet he had underestimated the ability of the Iranians to rally their forces after the revolution. The war dragged on for eight years and despite the huge price paid in terms of both men and money, it ended with Saddam gaining nothing.

Meanwhile, he had been spending much of Iraq's oil earnings on costly programmes to develop nuclear, chemical, biological and other weapons, often with the help of European contractors. When peace was finally declared he felt that his erstwhile allies owed him – metaphorically and literally.

This sense of grievance festered not least because of the collapse in the oil price, caused, as Saddam saw it, by overproduction on the part of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. He felt they were “stealing” Iraq's revenues and he started eyeing the Rumaila oilfield on the Iraq/Kuwaiti border. He was emboldened by what he believed to be assurances from the Americans that they would regard any action as a purely inter-Arab dispute.

Saddam's miscalculation was to order his army to occupy the whole of Kuwait, a close ally of America. Taken aback by the international outrage which greeted the invasion of Kuwait, Saddam hinted 10 days later that he had acted in support of the Palestinian cause and might pull out in exchange for an Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories – although at the same time he annexed Kuwait and labelled it Iraq's 19th province for eternity.

Saddam knew that his condemnation of the West's hypocrisy – its determination to enforce UN resolutions against Iraq, but not those against Israel – would strike a chord in the Arab world. Why should Iraq withdraw from Kuwait when Israel would not withdraw from the West Bank? Why should Iraq not have nuclear weapons if Israel had them?

Many believed that Saddam had lost touch with reality by the time the elder President George Bush sent US bombers and cruise missiles into Iraq on January 17, 1991. Fortunately for him, though perhaps less fortunately for Iraq, Bush stuck to the UN mandate. This meant expelling Iraq from Kuwait and leaving Saddam's regime in place, in the expectation that it would soon fall.

The crushing of Saddam's forces by the US and its Western and Arab allies almost led to Iraq being dismembered when Kurds in the North and Shia Muslims in the South rebelled. But Saddam put down the uprisings with the utmost ruthlessness. He also declared the Gulf war a victory instead of a defeat on the grounds that his government remained in power.

After the war, he proceeded to play a game of cat-and-mouse with United Nations inspectors sent to scrutinise and dismantle his weapons programmes. Although the UN inspectors reckoned that some 90 per cent of his weapons had been accounted for by the time they were forced to withdraw in 1998, Saddam's strategy ensured that the economic sanctions that caused such hardship to Iraq's 24m people remained in place. His intransigence also meant that in early 2003, some 12 years after the inspections began, he finally faced a US-led invasion designed to replace his regime with something more palatable to Washington.

George W. Bush was determined to finish what his father had begun. Soon after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, on New York and Washington, Mr Bush bracketed Iraq with Iran and North Korea as an “axis of evil”.

Saddam, misled by the overwhelming opposition to war among both Muslims and non-Muslims throughout the world, appeared to underestimate the US government's resolve to disarm Iraq and overthrow the regime. Urged at the last minute by the Gulf rulers to step down and go into exile to avert war, he insisted he would rather die in Iraq. He had made the most serious and the last miscalculation of his long political career.

One reason Saddam Hussein survived for so long was because rivals, real or imagined, were eliminated before they could act. As he rose steadily towards a position of supreme power, he recruited gangs of thugs under the umbrella of the ruling Ba'ath party to turn Iraq into what was accurately called the “Republic of Fear”. His main victims were Communists, Kurds, Islamist Shia Muslims and leftist Ba'ath party members, but no one, not even relatives, lifelong friends and associates or London-based exiles, was immune from the savage killings inflicted on the Iraqi people over the years by the Iraqi state.

DOJ_NMG_0111617

Saddam showed his usual ruthlessness when it came to the embarrassing defections in 1995 of some of his closest relatives. His two sons-in-law, the brothers Lt-Gen Hussein Kamel Hassan and Lt-Col Saddam Kamel, in charge of military industry and the presidential guard respectively, fled to Jordan with their wives, Saddam's daughters Raghda and Rana. There the two men confirmed what UN officials and western governments already suspected, namely that Saddam had lied repeatedly after Iraq's defeat in Kuwait and failed to honour commitments made at the time of the 1991 ceasefire to dismantle and disclose details of his weapons programmes.

Astonishingly, given their intimate knowledge of how Saddam ran Iraq, the brothers returned home when they grew tired of exile, believing they would be pardoned. They were promptly killed after Saddam's daughters had been taken to safety.

Horrific anecdotes about Saddam and the terror he inspired in underlings from newspaper editors to nuclear scientists, can be found throughout his career. In 1972 he is said to have dropped a jailed member of the opposition Da'awa movement into an acid bath. When a health minister suggested at a cabinet meeting that the president might be taking too much power for himself, Saddam took him into the next room and shot him.

Torture and rape, or threatened rape, of family members were routinely used to force political suspects to confess real or imaginary treason plots. Informers were everywhere and Iraqis were so frightened that they turned even their own relatives over to the security forces.

In 1988, he gassed thousands of Kurdish civilians when they sided with Iran. He also awarded a medal to a man who had reportedly killed his own son for deserting during the Iran/Iraq war. Yet he indulged Uday, his own violent son, even when the latter had twice committed murder.

An admirer of Stalin's methods, Saddam encouraged a grotesque personality cult, likening himself to ancient Babylonian kings such as Nebuchadnezzar. For all his bombast, his disguises were part of the diplomatic skill that enabled him to persuade Saudi Arabia and Kuwait to give him billions of dollars to fight the ayatollahs. When he wanted good relations with the then Soviet Union and with the West, he presented himself as a secular leader the bulwark against Islamic fundamentalism who could hold together a fissiparous Iraq, who espoused moderation on the Arab-Israeli dispute and who favoured a Palestinian state alongside Israel. Yet by the time he invaded Kuwait and defied the world in August 1990, he was portraying himself as a devout Muslim fighting in a holy war; an irredentist who wanted to liberate the whole of Palestine from the Jews.

With high-flown Arab rhetoric, he appealed to Palestinians and other Arabs harbouring grievances against Israel, the West and the Gulf states. After the invasion of Kuwait he seemed to show them that he was both capable of firing missiles at their Jewish enemies in Tel Aviv and might one day build an Arab atomic bomb and achieve a balance of terror with Israel.

He displayed the same basic but effective diplomatic skills in the years after his humiliating defeat in the 1991 Gulf war. Exploiting the ever-present anti-Americanism of Middle Eastern Muslims, Saddam improved relations with his old adversaries Syria and Iran. And he waited patiently until he felt that world opinion was more hostile to US adventurism than to his own depredations on the Iraqi people.

Yet Saddam, who went to the west only once, on a visit to France in the 1970s to buy nuclear technology, never appreciated how demonic he appeared to many people. After invading Kuwait, he merely confirmed his international image as a coarse and brutal terrorist by taking thousands of foreign hostages as “human shields” and going on television to pat a cringing English boy with the memorable words: “Has Stuart had his milk today?”. (He finally released the hostages in the belief that their captivity would be an excuse for a US attack rather than a deterrent).

Saddam Hussein will be remembered for his belligerent ambitions to make Iraq into the dominant regional power and for his cruelty, rather than for his shortlived peacetime achievements in the 1970s. Ba'athist Iraq vied with pre-revolutionary Romania and with North Korea for the doubtful honour of being the most oppressive police state in the world.

The later years of Saddam Hussein's personal life can hardly be described as happy. Estranged from Sajida, his first wife and cousin, and his two eldest daughters over the murder of their husbands, Saddam married Samira Shabandar, the wife of the head of Iraqi Airways. She had long been his mistress, and her blonde hair had prompted Sajida to dye her own the same colour in a vain attempt to retain her husband's affections. In July 2003, his sons Uday and Qusay were killed by the occupying Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0111618

The final chapter of his own life began when he was dragged dazed by US troops from an underground hideout near his home town of Tikrit in December 2003. Pictures of a compliant Saddam submitting meekly to a medical examination were seen around the world. But if those images were humiliating, his defiant persona returned for his last appearances in public during his murder trial in 2006 which he used as a platform to berate court officials and his captors. He was sentenced to death on November 5 for ordering the execution of 148 people in 1982 in the town of Dujail. The sentence was confirmed by an appeals court on December 26, even as he awaited another trial for the mass killing of Kurds.

Saddam Hussein was a man of extraordinary political cunning, but he lacked compassion, had no clear ideological vision and failed to understand the world beyond the borders of the Arab world. The memories he leaves are not of the personal or even national glory he sought but of the blood of his victims on the battlefields of Iraq and the floors of its torture chambers.

Saddam Hussein Executed, State-run TV Reports (GAN)

By James Palmer

Gannett, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD — Saddam Hussein, the brutal dictator who ruled Iraq for nearly a quarter-century before being toppled by a United States-led coalition in 2003, was executed by hanging Saturday for crimes against humanity, state-run Iraqi television reported.

Al-Iraqiya, a government-backed network in Baghdad, said Hussein was executed by hanging at dawn Saturday. Hussein's death was witnessed by one of his lawyers, a doctor, and other government officials witnessed the execution, according to the network. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Malaki was not present at the execution.

"Criminal Saddam was hanged to death," an al-Iraqiya announcer said. The station played patriotic music and showed images of national monuments and other landmarks.

The Iraqi government banned the media from the execution but said they planned to release a videotape and still photos of the death.

A string of celebratory gunfire echoed in a predominately Shia neighborhood in south Baghdad shortly following the announcement of Hussein's death but the city's streets were relatively quiet.

The U.S.-supported Al-Hurra TV station in Baghdad showed video of Iraqi nationals waving Iraqi flags and chanting in Dearborn, Mich., following the announcement of Hussein's death.

An Iraqi court convicted Hussein of killing 148 Shia men and boys in the Iraqi town of Dujail following a failed assassination attempt in 1982.

State-run Iraqiya television initially said Saddam's co-defendants — his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, the former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court — also were hanged. But National Security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie, who attended the execution, later said that only Saddam had been executed and that the two other men would be hanged after an Islamic holiday that started Saturday and ends in the first week of January.

"We wanted (Saddam) to be executed on a special day," al-Rubaie told Iraqiya.

Asked if Saddam resisted, al-Rubaie said no. "He totally surrendered," he said.

He said a judge read the sentence to Saddam, who was taken in handcuffs to the execution room. When he stood in the execution room, photographs and video footage were taken, al-Rubaie said.

"He did not ask for anything. He was carrying a Quran and said: 'I want this Quran to be given to this person' a man he called Bander," he said. Al-Rubaie said he did not know who Bander was.

Mariam al-Rayes, a legal expert and a former member of the Shiite bloc in parliament, told Iraqiya television that the execution "was filmed and God willing it will be shown. There was one camera present, and a doctor was also present there."

Hussein and his two co-defendants were found guilty of the Dujail massacre on Nov. 5 and were sentenced to death by hanging.

In a statement, President Bush said Saddam " was executed after receiving a fair trial — the kind of justice he denied the victims of his brutal regime."

DOJ_NMG_0111619

"Bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq, but it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy that can govern, sustain and defend itself, and be an ally in the war on terror," Bush said.

The execution followed frantic hours of political and legal maneuvering, in which there were conflicting reports about whether Saddam had been transferred from U.S. to Iraqi custody. His physical transfer to Iraqi authorities was one of the last steps before his hanging.

A U.S. judge refused to stop his execution Friday, rejecting a last-minute court challenge by Saddam's attorneys.

The Iraqi government reinstated the death penalty by hanging in August 2004. Roughly 51 people have been executed since then.

The executions were carried out at the beginning of Eid-Al-Adha, an Islamic religious holiday marking the climax of the annual Hajj pilgrimage to Mecca. Eid begins today for Sunnis and tomorrow for Shias.

The Iraqi constitution prohibits executions during religious holidays.

The Iraqi government has not yet announced a daytime curfew. The government has imposed a daily curfew between 9 p.m. and 6 a.m. local time.

There had been disagreements among Iraqi officials in recent days as to whether Iraqi law dictates the execution must take place within 30 days and whether President Jalal Talabani and his two deputies had to approve it.

In a farewell message to Iraqis posted Wednesday on the Internet, Saddam said he was giving his life for his country as part of the struggle against the U.S. "Here, I offer my soul to God as a sacrifice, and if he wants, he will send it to heaven with the martyrs," he said.

One of Saddam's lawyers, Issam Ghazzawi, said the letter was written by Saddam on Nov. 5, the day he was convicted by an Iraqi tribunal in the Dujail killings.

Reports of Saddam's death also were cause of celebration among some Iraqi-Americans. "Now there will be peace for my family," said Dave Alwatan, who was among dozens of Iraqi-Americans to gather Friday at the Karbalaa Islamic Educational Center in Dearborn, Mich. Alwatan, 32, said Saddam's forces tortured and killed relatives that were left behind when Alwatan left Iraq in 1991.

Imad Hamad, director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee in Dearborn, said the glee surrounding Saddam's death was laced with uncertainty about the future.

"The joy would have been complete if we were to see the healthy Iraq, the united Iraq, the safe Iraq," Hamad said. "Then everybody would be jumping up and down, celebrating."

Hussein Legacy: Megalomaniac, Nationalist Leader (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani

Chicago Tribune, December 30, 2006

Over his 24 years as president of Iraq, Saddam Hussein earned the moniker Butcher of Baghdad by ruling with brute force, torture and cunning.

His regime murdered at least 300,000 of his countrymen, according to estimates by human-rights groups. During his reign, neighbors spied on each other and children were taught at school to tattle on their parents if they spoke against the regime. More than 1 million Iraqis were killed in wars against Iran, Kuwait and the United States on his watch.

Iraqis, by and large, say they suffered terribly at the hands of the dictator. But Hussein will also leave a legacy in his country and the Arab world as a sort of Mesopotamian revolutionary—a nationalist leader who stood up to the American superpower that deposed and later captured him.

Saddam Hussein Abd al-Majid al-Tikriti came from nothing—a fatherless, poor boy who ascended from a small village to rule Iraq. He was cruel and arguably maniacal in his quest for power. His behavior, many of his biographers concluded, was that of a megalomaniac.

When the U.S. Army's 4th Infantry Division captured him hiding in a "spider hole" eight months after the fall of his regime, a haggard Hussein could hardly believe the American soldiers did not immediately recognize him.

"I am Saddam Hussein, president of Iraq," Hussein declared.

DOJ_NMG_0111620

The moment of his capture on Dec. 13, 2003, underscored his monumental ego, rivaled only by his bravado. While he was in power, poets were ordered to write verse comparing Hussein to the Prophet Muhammad and artists were commissioned to paint regal portraits of the dictator that were nearly as common in public spaces as the Iraqi flag.

Hussein is also credited with writing several novels. His first told the story of a beneficent leader who sacrifices luxury for the sake of his people, while his last is the tale of a tribe living along the Euphrates River 1,500 years ago that repels foreign invaders from its land.

While he built garish, opulent palaces for himself and his family throughout the country in the 1980s, he mortgaged his country's wealth in that same decade on the Iran-Iraq war.

During his reign, speaking ill of Hussein or the regime was punishable by death. Baghdad cabdrivers feared him so much that they avoided even driving past the palaces because they didn't want to take any chances of angering Hussein or his associates.

Hussein was married, but he was rumored to have an insatiable desire for virgins, whom his henchmen would kidnap off the street. He was passionate about cigars, and Fidel Castro kept him stocked with Cuba's finest tobacco.

He intimidated his people, but he also feared them. During his last years in power, his public appearances were less frequent and he sometimes dispatched doubles to ceremonial events in places where he thought he could be vulnerable to assassination. He rarely slept in the same location two nights in a row.

Hussein had created a cult of personality based on coercion, but he knew that occasionally he had to show benevolence.

He earned credibility on the Arab street through his support of thousands of displaced Palestinians he invited to live in Iraq. He ordered the building of mosques to curry favor with Islamic clerics. In the weeks before the U.S. invaded Iraq, he issued amnesty to tens of thousands of Iraqis imprisoned for various crimes.

But Hussein's most horrific atrocities were the acts of brutality he meted out against fellow Iraqis. His henchmen amputated the tongues of those who criticized him. He ordered the systematic annihilation of tens of thousands of Kurds, including at least 5,000 in a notorious poison gas attack on the village of Halabja in 1988. Tens of thousands of Shiites were killed by forces loyal to Hussein during the uprisings in southern Iraq following the U.S.-led invasion in 1991.

The crime for which he was executed was the roundup and killings of dozens of Shiites in the village of Dujail in 1982 following a failed assassination attempt on Hussein there.

He and seven other members of the former regime stood trial before the Iraqi High Tribunal on charges of crimes against humanity.

In grim testimony, witnesses of the Dujail massacre recalled how Hussein's cronies, led by his half brother and former head of the secret police Barzan Ibrahim, tortured, imprisoned and humiliated hundreds of men, women and children. In all, 148 people died by execution or while under interrogation during the Dujail incident. Some 700 others were evicted from the village and cast off to live in the desert.

Hussein said in court that the executions were a lawful and necessary response to an assassination attempt on a head of state. Witnesses testified that the roundup was random and some of those taken in for questioning were children.

One of the tactics interrogators used on the Dujail victims was ripping their flesh by running them through a meat grinder, witnesses testified. One female witness described how she was stripped naked and sexually humiliated.

Hussein's confrontation with Iraqi justice marked the last chapter in an unlikely rise and fall.

He was born April 28, 1937, to a poor family in the village of al-Awja, near the city of Tikrit. His father died before he was born, and he was sent to live with his maternal uncle, Khairallah Tulfah, who was a father figure to the dictator and a sort of political mentor. Hussein later married Tulfah's daughter Sajida.

In 1957, he joined the Baath Party. That year Hussein was denied admission to the Baghdad Military Academy, a humiliating blow that was assuaged 19 years later when President Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr promoted him to general.

Two years after joining the Baath Party, he was found complicit in a failed assassination attempt against President Abdul Karim Qasim, and Hussein was forced to flee to Egypt, where he spent the next four years in exile. He narrowly escaped Qasim's men, and he later told King Hussein of Jordan that he considered every day of his life after the incident a gift, according to Andrew and Patrick Cockburn's biography, "Out of the Ashes."

DOJ_NMG_0111621

"I considered myself to die then," Hussein reportedly told the Jordanian king.

He returned to Iraq in 1963 after the country's first Baathist regime took power in a coup. Hussein took charge of organizing the party's security apparatus. In a second coup five years later, a faction inside the party overthrew the regime of President Abdul al-Rahman Aref. Al-Bakr, a relative of Hussein's, became president and chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council.

On July 16, 1979, Hussein forced al-Bakr to retire and was sworn in as Iraq's president.

Soon after he assumed the presidency, Hussein embarked on a purge in which party members were accused of being involved in a Syrian plot to place Iraq under Syrian authority. The purge offered Hussein a chance to remove all potential rivals. Hundreds of top-ranking Baathists and army officers were executed.

During the trial over the Dujail killings, an Iraqi television station repeatedly aired grainy black-and-white footage of an infamous meeting early in Hussein's reign in which dozens of party members were accused of treason.

In the video, Hussein sits calmly smoking a cigar and drinking from a glass of water as the accused are removed from the room one by one for their indiscretions. As their colleagues are being called out, the party members are nervous—some sweating profusely, presumably worried that they could be the next to be removed.

When the purge is completed, the surviving members of the party stand, applaud wildly and praise their new president.

From his ascension to the presidency in 1979, Western governments—including the United States—recognized Hussein as a ruthless strongman, but someone they could do business with.

By late 1983, before U.S. special envoy Donald Rumsfeld made a visit to Baghdad to hold talks with Hussein, the U.S. had intelligence that Hussein had used nerve gas to thwart an Iranian offensive earlier that year.

Hussein would later order the use of chemical weapons on Iraq's Kurdish people as part of the 1987-88 Anfal campaign, in which some 180,000 people were killed. He used poison gas against his own citizens more than a half-century after the civilized world had concluded that chemical weapons were too inhumane to use even against enemies. Hussein was still being tried on genocide and other charges related to Anfal when he was hanged.

During the 1980s, the U.S. government and other Western powers tolerated Hussein because they had a common enemy in the Shiite theocracy that ruled Iran.

Hussein's regime and Iran became increasingly hostile over issues that included control of the Shatt al-Arab waterway and two small islands. In September 1980, Hussein launched an invasion, setting off an eight-year war that left at least 1 million Iraqis and Iranians dead. Through the war, the U.S. supported Iraq by providing satellite intelligence and refusing to sell the Iranian military spare parts for its mostly American-made weaponry.

In August 1990, only two years after the war with Iran ended in a stalemate, Hussein's troops invaded another oil-rich neighbor, Kuwait. That act of aggression exhausted the U.S. government's patience with the Iraqi dictator.

The invasion was ostensibly spurred by the Kuwaiti government calling in loans that Iraq had taken to finance its war against Iran as well as accusations that the Kuwaitis were stealing oil from southern Iraq deposits through a method called slant drilling.

But Hussein might have taken the risk out of desperation—Iraq was ravaged by some $80 billion in debt from its war with Iran. Turning Kuwait into Iraq's 19th province, Hussein gambled, was an opportunity for him to refill his bare coffers.

President George H.W. Bush ordered Hussein to immediately withdraw from Kuwait, but the dictator refused. Soon the U.S. and its allies had about 660,000 troops assembled in the region, one of the largest gatherings of armed forces in history. Hussein exhorted his troops to prepare for victory in "the mother of all battles."

Even after Bush gave Hussein a deadline to pull his forces from Kuwait, the Iraqi leader behaved as if he still had the time and the opportunity to negotiate. U.S. pilots were perplexed to find the capital lit up like an amusement park when they flew in for the initial bombardment.

The air war went on for 37 days, and the ground war that followed lasted only 100 hours. Iraqi military resistance collapsed, but Bush chose not to send troops farther north to Baghdad to topple Hussein. In the years after the war, Bush came under criticism for failing to finish off Hussein—particularly from Shiites in southern Iraq who believed they had the White House's unequivocal support to overthrow him.

DOJ_NMG_0111622

A week before the ground war began, Bush had called on "the Iraqi military and the Iraqi people to take matters into their own hands and force Saddam Hussein, the dictator, to step aside." Shiite leaders latched on to the statement as affirmation that the American military would come to their aid if they attempted to oust Hussein.

A Shiite uprising ignited in southern Iraq, but troops loyal to Hussein squashed the intifada in a bloody assault that left tens of thousands dead. U.S. troops never intervened.

Bush and his advisers feared the U.S. would lose its coalition if it moved beyond the stated aim of the war, which was accomplished by flushing Iraqi troops out of Kuwait. There was also a hesitance to risk more U.S. lives in an assault on Baghdad.

Many Iraqis, particularly Shiites, concluded that White House officials had determined they would rather have the secular Sunni Hussein in power than an unknown Shiite.

From 1991 to the end of Hussein's regime in April 2003, Iraq lived under paralyzing United Nations sanctions that turned the oil-rich country into a Middle East backwater. Iraq, which in the 1990s still had stockpiles of chemical weapons, biological weapons and long-range missiles, was forced to submit to UN monitoring to ensure that it was complying with a mandate to rid itself of weapons of mass destruction.

The U.S. created no-fly zones in northern and southern Iraq, establishing areas in which Iraqi aircraft were forbidden to fly. Oil sales were to be tightly controlled through a program monitored by the United Nations.

The UN oil-for-food program, however, was undermined by corruption, allowing Hussein and his cronies to siphon off billions of dollars through oil smuggling and kickbacks from those selling goods to Iraq and buying oil from the country.

Meanwhile, his people slid into deep poverty. UNICEF said the first eight years of sanctions may have been responsible for 500,000 deaths of children under 5.

During President Bill Clinton's eight years in office, the U.S. military launched several air strikes against locations that were suspected of being used by Hussein to build arms. And in 1998, Clinton articulated for the first time that regime change was the cornerstone of U.S. policy regarding Iraq.

But it wasn't until the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that the U.S. truly focused on ousting Hussein. Soon after the planes crashed into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a field in Pennsylvania, President George W. Bush and his administration suspected Hussein might have had a hand in the incident.

But the attacks proved to be the work of Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, and the U.S. went to war to topple the Taliban government in Afghanistan that had long given bin Laden and his fighters refuge.

After the Taliban was ousted, the U.S. turned its focus on Hussein and Iraq. Bush insisted that Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, including active programs to build chemical, biological and nuclear weapons.

In his State of the Union address in January 2003, less than two months before the start of the war, Bush cited evidence that Iraq had attempted to buy weapons-grade uranium in Africa, underscoring the need to take swift action against Hussein.

The allegation later proved to be unfounded.

With Afghanistan, Bush had international support to go to war, but many in the international community found Bush's case for invading Iraq to be flimsy. Some critics of the war thought his motivation was personal: In 1993, Hussein had allegedly ordered an assassination attempt on Bush's father as he visited Kuwait. The plot was botched, but the younger Bush didn't forget. "After all," the U.S. president said in 2002, "this is the guy who tried to kill my dad."

Without UN backing and with a relatively small band of allies, the U.S. began the air assault on Baghdad on March 20, 2003, with targeted strikes on sites where they believed Hussein might have been hiding out. On April 9, a crowd of Iraqis gathered in Firdos Square in Baghdad surrounding a famous statue of Hussein. With help from Marines, the statue was brought down. The moment marked the symbolic end of Hussein's regime.

For more than eight months, Hussein remained on the lam, taking refuge in the small villages of his tribes surrounding the northern city of Tikrit. On Dec. 13, 2003, U.S. Army soldiers caught him in the village of Ad Dawr, crouched in a hole dug in the floor of a mud hut where he hid with a pistol and several hundred thousand dollars in cash.

The once-feared dictator gave up without a fight.

While he hadn't left as long a trail of dead as Adolf Hitler or Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge in Cambodia, Hussein and his cohorts represented one of the most diabolical regimes in modern history.

DOJ_NMG_0111623

The fear he inspired was palpable through his reign. And his cruelty served as an example to his sons Udai and Qusai.

Udai once bludgeoned to death one of his father's valets in front of a crowd at a party. Qusai would order his guards to grab women off the street whom he would rape, and he oversaw the tortures and mass executions of hundreds of Shiites.

Hussein's sons were killed in a shootout with U.S. forces in July 2003, months after the fall of his regime. He is survived by his daughters, Rana, Raghad and Hala, who along with Udai and Qusai were children of his first wife, Sajida Tulfah. She fled from Iraq in 2003, and her whereabouts are unknown. He was also married to Samira Shahbandar, with whom he had a third son, Ali. The two are thought to be living in Lebanon. He also reportedly took a third wife, Nidal al-Hamdani, whose whereabouts are also unknown.

Even with his family, Hussein could be merciless.

In August 1995, Rana and Raghad fled with their children and husbands—the brothers Hussein and Saddam Kamel al-Majid—to Jordan, an embarrassment to the strongman. After they fled, Hussein asked his children to return with their families to Iraq and promised that he would take no retaliation against them if they came back.

Several months after defecting, they agreed to return to Baghdad. Soon after they crossed into Iraqi territory from Jordan, the al-Majid brothers were attacked and killed.

Even among modern despots, Hussein's thirst for vengeance was unparalleled. Always suspicious, Hussein tended to keep what he was thinking close to his chest.

Soon after he was installed as president, Hussein explained that he saw his survival as a political leader as a shrewd game of staying ahead of his opponents by remaining feared and unpredictable.

"What is politics?" Hussein asked rhetorically. "Politics is when you say you are going to do one thing while intending to do another. Then you do neither what you said or what you intended."

Ruthless Ex-dictator Forced The World To Reckon With Him (BOS)

By Charles A. Radin

The Boston Globe, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD -- For more than a quarter of a century, Saddam Hussein was one of the most despised and admired, hated and loved, feared and respected men in the Arab world.

Ruthless in domestic affairs, reckless internationally, and flamboyant always, Hussein ruled Iraq with an iron fist from 1979 until he was deposed by US forces in 2003. He was responsible for at least three major wars and for hundreds of thousands of deaths -- on battlefields, in torture chambers, and in countless villages of the Iraqi countryside.

He also was responsible for building innumerable schools and hospitals -- many of which he named after himself -- and for bringing his country the longest period of stability in its modern history.

But in the end, his brutal past caught up with him. US forces captured him hiding in a dirt hole in December 2003, and Hussein was tried before an Iraqi court whose authority he refused to recognize. The court sentenced him to death in November for his role in the 1982 slayings of 148 Shi'ite Muslims from a town where assassins had tried to kill him.

Hussein was hanged shortly before 6 a.m. today in Baghdad, Iraqi and American officials said.

Like Egypt's Anwar Sadat , Libya's Moammar Khadafy , and Syria's Hafez al Assad , Hussein faced turbulent times, including pan-Arab nationalism, the rise of Israel, the Cold War, and globalization. More than any of them, he came to epitomize and speak for the anger and resentment felt by the Arab masses.

"He was a leader to be reckoned with," said Hermann Eilts , a longtime US diplomat in the Middle East who was ambassador to Saudi Arabia and Egypt and who served in both Iraq and Iran. "Whether the rest of the world liked it or not, it had to recognize and react to him."

Hussein was born into a peasant family in the tiny village of Auja , northwest of Baghdad near Tikrit. Historians differ over whether his father died just before or just after the birth, but agree that a maternal uncle, Kayrallah Talfah , was his primary boyhood influence. Starting at age 10, Hussein lived for a time in Talfah's house in Baghdad; at age 26, he married Talfah's daughter, Sajida .

DOJ_NMG_0111624

Talfah, a military officer driven out of the army and imprisoned by the British for participating in an abortive 1941 coup, taught the young Hussein about the enemies on whom he would build his career -- the West, the Iranians, and the Jews.

Hussein attended grade school armed with a pistol, joined the Ba'ath Party in high school, and, at age 22, engaged in his first known act of political violence -- an attempt to assassinate Iraq's military ruler, General Abdel Karim Qassem .

The assassins failed, but the adventure became a major chapter of Hussein's personal legend. He was wounded, arrested, escaped jail, and cut the bullet from his leg himself while fleeing on donkey-back to Syria. From Damascus, he went to Cairo at the invitation of President Gamal Abdel Nasser , the leading Arab nationalist of the day. There, he studied law.

Returning to Baghdad in 1963, he was arrested again after the Ba'athists seized control of the government and then lost it because of infighting and poor organization. He escaped again, and went underground.

Hussein developed a reputation as a talented revolutionary and became an organizer of the party police. When the Ba'ath Party retook the government in 1968, Hussein was number two in the formal power structure, with oversight of security. By some accounts, he already was in charge of the government, whose titular head was General Ahmed Hassan Bakr . By all accounts he was in control a few years later, but he waited until 1979 to move Bakr aside publicly and take the presidency for himself.

By then, he already had positioned Iraq, and himself, for leadership of the Arab world. The country was flush with oil profits after the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries asserted authority over the world's oil market in the 1970s.

The decision to go to war with neighboring Iran in 1980 was a classic Hussein move: In one swoop, the conflict occupied the restive army with external concerns, provided a vehicle for purging the upper ranks of the command hierarchy, and threw Iran's triumphant Islamist revolution onto the defensive.

But if the political tactics were brilliant, the military strategy was a disaster. The Iranians bent, but they did not break. Eventually, they counter attacked, and without the assistance Hussein received from the United States, enraged by the siege of the American Embassy in Tehran and fearful of the Islamic revolution, his regime might have been defeated.

As happened often in a long career of over reaching, Hussein was able to maneuver, recoup, and emerge with a draw. By the time the war ended, in 1988 , about 1.3 million Iraqis and Iranians were dead, millions more were wounded or impoverished , and Hussein was a hero to millions of Arabs angered and frustrated by the failure of Nasser and his inheritors to create a powerful, unified Arab nation.

Internally, Hussein approached the status of a god. His picture was in every public place, in every classroom, on every street, on every piece of currency. He had a costume and an incarnation for every imagination: Sometimes he was a military commander, sometimes a grandfather, and sometimes a sheik in flowing robes. He no longer referred to his birthplace as the poor village of Auja; he was now from Tikrit, birthplace of the great Arab conqueror Saladin.

But as the war ground to a halt, a much-weakened Hussein also was challenged both by internal rebellion and by discontent within his battered armed forces. His solution was to keep the military busy with repression of domestic opponents, particularly the Kurds of northern Iraq, against whom he dispatched his still-potent air force and deadly chemical weapons. The genocidal Anfal campaign killed an estimated 100,000 men, women, and children and wiped out as many as 2,000 Kurdish villages -- and formed the basis of one of the charges against him at his trial after his fall from power.

In August 1990, Hussein ordered Iraqi forces into the small, oil-rich sheikdom of Kuwait, which had backed Iran in the previous conflict and with which Iraq had long-standing disputes over oil and borders. The conquest was swift, but by January 1991 the United States amassed a huge international coalition and brought hundreds of thousands of troops to the Gulf region to liberate Kuwait.

In a ploy to break up the coalition and fragment Arab support for the United States, Hussein launched missiles against Israel and Saudi Arabia, a gambit that failed when allied forces were able to defeat Iraq's forces swifty.

With the Iraqi military fleeing Kuwait in disarray and rebellions against Hussein breaking out throughout the country, President George H. W. Bush declared victory and stopped the fighting. Hussein, Western analysts thought, finally was finished. They were wrong.

Hussein again regained his footing. While the coalition stood by, he crushed Kurdish rebels in the north and Shi'ite rebels in the south who had risen against him at Bush's urging. The perceived betrayal of Hussein foes by the first President Bush remains deeply ingrained in Iraqi political memory today.

DOJ_NMG_0111625

Realizing that the Hussein era was far from over, coalition forces established "no-fly" zones in which US and British aircraft prevented Iraqi Air Force operations in northern and southern Iraq, thus saving the anti-Hussein communities from annihilation. The coalition then attempted to bring Hussein to heel with a combination of tough enforcement of UN economic sanctions and inspections of military facilities where he was suspected of developing and storing weapons of mass destruction.

The no-fly zones stopped the slaughter, but nothing, it seemed, could stop Hussein. The UN oil-for-food program and other aspects of the sanctions regimen led to widespread suffering by the Iraqi people, but did not affect Hussein and his core supporters, who gained ever-more-absolute power over peoples' economic lives.

Two of Hussein's sons-in-law defected, with his daughters, to Jordan. Hussein sent his wife to assure them all would be forgiven if they returned to Iraq. They did, in 1996, and the sons-in-law were killed.

By the time the US-led coalition invaded in March 2003, Hussein was viewed by Iraqis as personally invincible. But his power quickly crumbled when US tanks swept into Baghdad, and he fled in early April 2003. He was captured in December 2003 by US soldiers who found him hiding, with a pistol, in a hole near Tikrit. The man who had vowed to go down fighting gave up without firing a shot.

His televised trial for the killings in Dujail was watched throughout Iraq and the Middle East as much for theater as for substance. Hussein, defiant to the end and insisting he still was Iraq's president, was ejected from the courtroom repeatedly for political harangues.

Saddam Is The King Of Swing (NYPOST)

By Niles Lathem, Hasani Gittens

The New York Post, December 30, 2006

December 30, 2006 -- The Butcher of Baghdad is no more.

Former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein - clutching a Koran as he was led to the gallows - was hanged today in the city he ruled with an iron fist for decades at 6 a.m. Baghdad time, officials said.

His death was greeted with elation by those present at the execution, which included dancing over Hussein's body, witnesses said.

A handcuffed Hussein was clad completely in black, with a jacket, trousers, hat and shoes - not the orange prison garb he was expected to wear.

Shortly before the execution, Hussein's hat was removed and he was asked if he wanted to say something, said Sami al-Askari, the political adviser of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

" 'No I don't want to,' " al-Askari, who was present at the execution, quoted the ousted despot as telling him.

He then repeated a prayer told to him by a Sunni Muslim cleric.

"Saddam later was taken to the gallows and refused to have his head covered with a hood," al-Askari said. "Before the rope was put around his neck, Saddam shouted: 'God is great. The nation will be victorious and Palestine is Arab.' "

The predawn hanging was necessary because Iraqi law prohibits executions on holy days. The Muslim holiday Eid al-Adha, the Festival of Sacrifice, began at sunrise.

In November, Hussein, 69, was convicted of crimes against humanity after ordering the murders of 148 Shiite villagers from Dujail after a failed assassination bid in 1982.

Saddam's two co-defendants, his half-brother Barzan al-Tikriti and former Iraqi chief judge Awad Hamed al-Bandar of the Revolutionary Court, will be hanged at a later time, officials said.

Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al- Maliki urged Saddam Hussein's fellow Sunni Baathists today to reconsider their tactics and join the political process.

"I urged followers of the ousted regime to reconsider their stance as the door is still open to anyone who has no innocent blood on his hands, to help in rebuilding an Iraq for all Iraqis," Maliki said in a statement issued hours after Saddam was executed.

Meanwhile, jubilant Shiites - oppressed under Saddam - danced in the streets of their holy city of Najaf while cars blared their horns in procession through Baghdad's Shiite-ruled Sadr City.

DOJ_NMG_0111626

The execution took place at a specially built gallows close to Camp Cropper, near Baghdad International Airport, where the former dictator was being held. It was reportedly overseen by at least seven witnesses, including the Iraqi National Security Advisor Mowaffeq al-Rubaie, Justice Minster Hashim al-Shilbli, the judge who presided over his trial, and a Sunni Muslim cleric.

Al-Rubaie told Iraqiya that Hussein appeared to be a "broken man" before he mounted the scaffold.

He said Hussein "totally surrendered" and did not resist.

When he stood in the execution room, photographs and video footage were taken, al-Rubaie said.

"He did not ask for anything. He was carrying a Koran and said: 'I want this Koran to be given to this person,' a man he called Bander," he said.

Al-Rubaie also said he did not know who Bander was.

"Saddam was treated with respect when he was alive and after his death," al-Rubaie said. "Saddam's execution was 100 percent Iraqi and the American side did not interfere."

"Saddam was taken by force to the gallows but he was composed when taken to execution," said al-Askari.

Then, "we heard his neck snap," said al-Askari at the exact moment of Saddam's death.

The officials said the government had not yet decided what to do with Saddam's body.

The Iraqiya television station aired national songs after the first announcement of Hussein's death and had a tag on the screen that read, "Saddam's execution marks the end of a dark period of Iraq's history."

In a farewell message to Iraqis posted Wednesday on the Internet, Saddam said he was giving his life for his country as part of the struggle against the U.S.

"Here, I offer my soul to God as a sacrifice, and if he wants, he will send it to heaven with the martyrs," he said.

Even as the brutal strongman's final moments ticked away, there was a torrent of activity in Baghdad and Washington in the hours proceeding Saddam's death:

* Hussein gave his will and personal belonging to two of his half-brothers in a final jailhouse meeting, one of his lawyers said.

* Hussein's daughter and a member of his defense team also asked for a chance to say goodbye but were denied.

"His daughter in Amman was crying, she said, 'Take me with you,' " lawyer Najeeb al-Nueimi said.

She later asked that "his body be buried in Yemen temporarily until Iraq is liberated and it can be reburied in Iraq," a source close to the family said.

* U.S. and Iraqi officials agreed during a meeting yesterday on an execution time after daylong speculation that it would be put off for religious or other reasons.

* U.S. and Iraqi forces were put on high alert and braced for violent reactions to the execution.

"We will put all our forces on the streets so that no lives are jeopardized," said Iraqi Brig. Gen. Abdel Karim Khalaf.

* The State Department cabled all U.S. embassies to warn them to be prepared for terrorist attacks. Although as of late last night there was little violence - just rejoicing.

* Defense lawyers filed papers at a federal appeals court in Washington seeking an emergency restraining order to block the execution.

* Nevertheless, Munir Haddad, a judge on the appeals court that upheld the death sentence, said all documents required for the execution were ready.

That includes the infamous "red card" - an order of condemnation that was created during Hussein's regime and was to be given to a death row inmate on his final day.

Hussein had been in U.S. custody since he was found in late 2003 hiding in a "spider hole" near Tikrit.

Nueimi said the U.S. wanted to prevent Hussein from being humiliated before his execution and want to prevent the mutilation of his corpse, as has happened to other deposed Iraqi leaders.

If Hussein is humiliated publicly or his corpse ill-treated "that could cause an uprising, and the Americans would be blamed," he said.

The identity of Hussein's hangman, who was be hooded, was a closely guarded secret.

A doctor was also present to certify Saddam's death.

DOJ_NMG_0111627

A photograph of Hussein's body is expected to be released later today to prevent rumors that he is still alive.

The death of Hussein, a Sunni, was greeted with rejoicing by Iraq's Shiite majority.

It is "God's gift to Iraqis," Sheik Sadralddin al-Qubanji said in his sermon yesterday in Najaf.

"Oh, God, you know what Saddam has done! He killed millions of Iraqis in prisons, in wars with neighboring countries, and he is responsible for mass graves."

But Hussein's death sentence has drawn condemnation from a wide range of critics, on political and moral grounds.

International human rights groups criticized the year-long trial, during which three defense lawyers were killed and a chief judge resigned complaining of political interference.

"The test of a government's commitment to human rights is measured by the way it treats its worst offenders," said Richard Dicker, Director of Human Rights Watch. "History will judge the deeply flawed Dujail trial and this execution harshly."

The United Nations and many of Washington's Western allies had called on Bush and Maliki not to go ahead with the execution.

Arc Of Power Ends In Utter Ignominy (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

Saddam Hussein, an autocratic Arab nationalist who ruled Iraq for 24 years, led his nation into repeated wars with its neighbors and was overthrown by a U.S.-led invasion, was hanged early today Baghdad time. He was 69.

Hussein took power as a brutal young modernizer who harnessed his nation's vast oil wealth to build roads and bridges, hospitals and schools, and was a hero to millions in the Middle East who saw him as a force for Arab resurgence. But in his latter years he squandered his legacy into one of near-constant wars.

He cultivated a climate of fear in Iraq, a place where political dissent was a capital offense. To many Iraqis, he was defined by his willful defiance -- a man whose first name could be translated as "he who confronts."

An Arab from his country's Sunni Muslim minority, Hussein had long repressed the majority Shiite Muslims and the Kurds of northern Iraq, and he remained reviled by both. In his final months, as the grim daily killings by roving militias and insurgents went on, some Sunnis vowed revenge on his behalf and many in Iraq expressed a yearning for the order and relative safety imposed by his firm hand.

After he was captured by U.S. troops three years ago, dirty and disheveled, in a hole not far from the village of his youth, Hussein mocked the tribunal set up to try him and declared himself Iraq's rightful ruler.

"I am still the president of the state," he told the judge in his first formal testimony in the year-long trial. "I am president."

To the U.S. government, Hussein was at one time an ally and bulwark in the Middle East against an Islamic government in neighboring Iran. He benefited from American weapons and funding in the 1980s before becoming a U.S. nemesis when he invaded Kuwait in 1990.

At his trial, Hussein described the Americans as "criminals" who came to Iraq "under the pretext of weapons of mass destruction and the pretext of democracy."

During Hussein's years in power, he strove to harness his country's bountiful supply of oil to build Iraq into a major power in the Middle East and reclaim the glory of past Arab civilizations. Throughout that time, he was ruthless in eliminating the political enemies of his Baath Socialist Party -- by execution, imprisonment or forced exile -- and increasingly paranoid about possible rivals or traitors.

"In the permanently beleaguered mind of Saddam, politics is a ceaseless struggle for survival," Efraim Karsh and Inari Rautsi wrote in their 1991 book, "Saddam Hussein, a Political Biography." "The ultimate goal of staying alive, and in power, justifies all means."

While Hussein was being held prisoner by the Americans, Adnan Pachachi, a Sunni legislator and onetime foreign minister whom Hussein had sent into exile, asked him why he had invaded neighboring Kuwait. It was a decision widely seen as a reckless miscalculation that sparked the Persian Gulf War, but Hussein portrayed it as a bid to reclaim part of his rightful domain and tap a source of funds to pay down the debts left by earlier wars.

DOJ_NMG_0111628

"When I get something in my head, I act," Hussein told Pachachi, according to "My Year in Iraq," a memoir by L. Paul Bremer, who ran the U.S.-led occupation government for 14 months. "That's just the way I am."Formative Years

Saddam Hussein al-Tikriti was born on April 28, 1937, in the village of Auja, a cluster of mud-brick huts outside Tikrit, north of Baghdad. His father, Hussein Majid, was a peasant who disappeared before his son was born. His mother, who remarried, entrusted Hussein to the care of an uncle, Khayrallah Tulfah, an army officer and opponent of the British-backed monarchy then ruling Iraq.

Hussein started elementary school when he was about 10. At 18, he moved to Baghdad with Tulfah and enrolled at the Karkh high school. Soon after, he joined the Baath (or Renaissance) Party, the Arab nationalist movement founded by a Syrian Christian in the 1940s. Its members were angered by what they saw as the subservience of Arab peoples under European colonialism, and they yearned to create a single socialist Arab state.

Hussein carved a niche for himself as a party strongman, and in 1959, at age 22, he participated in an attempt to assassinate Gen. Abdul Karim Qassem, the Iraqi ruler who had overthrown the monarchy with other military officers the year before.

The Baathist account of this coup attempt would later play up Hussein's role; according to one tale taught in Iraqi schools, he carved a bullet out of his own leg after being wounded. He then retreated to Syria and Egypt, returning to Iraq in 1963. While still in exile in Egypt, Hussein married a cousin, Sajida Khayrallah Tulfah, the daughter of his uncle. They had two sons -- Uday and Qusay, who were killed in a shootout with U.S. troops in July 2003 -- and three daughters, Rana, Raghad and Hala.

The Baath Party seized power in Iraq in 1968, under the leadership of Hussein's relative, Gen. Ahmed Hassan Bakr. Hussein used such family connections to help maneuver himself into position as the ruling government's No. 2 man, in charge of intelligence and security services.

Over time he developed a reputation as a man willing to go to brutal lengths to silence opposition and repress the Shiites and Kurds, as well as those within his own party he considered a threat. Charismatic and intimidating, he was known as "the deputy" but served in the role of a prime minister.

In 1975, a time when his associates said he had mellowed into middle age, Hussein struck Washington Post reporter Jim Hoagland as a man who "still moves with the tightly coiled violence and fluid grace of Vince Lombardi's best linebackers at Green Bay. Wariness flickers in his dark, expressive eyes throughout a meeting with a visitor."Reins of Power

Hussein's formal ascension to absolute rule occurred in 1979, when he pushed Bakr aside and simultaneously assumed the titles of president, prime minister, chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council, secretary general of the Baath Party's regional command and commander in chief of the armed forces.

"And he was only 42 years old," Karsh and Rautsi wrote. "Here was a man in his prime, full of ambitious plans and, above all, grim determination to keep his hold on the levers of power at all costs."

To solidify his position, Hussein presided over a firing squad that killed more than 20 officials for alleged disloyalty. Many of those executed were Hussein's close associates.

Hussein's rule brought a series of wars to Iraq, but also a period of relative internal stability, free from the frequent military coups that had characterized earlier decades. He created a secular Middle Eastern state known for its vibrant university and public health systems and relatively open to Western values, compared with countries in the region governed by strict religious codes. He also built roads and bridges, launched literacy campaigns and provided free hospital care for Iraqis.

To cultivate his image, Hussein lavished oil money on opulent palaces, sprawling monuments, statues and portraits. One painting depicted him wearing a business suit and smoking a cigar. Others showed him as a military commander in fatigues and a beret, as a devout Muslim praying in a mosque, or as an interlocutor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of ancient Babylonia, whom Hussein claimed as an ancestor.

In 1980, Hussein tried to take advantage of instability in neighboring Iran, where Ayatollah Khomeini's Islamic revolution had recently ousted the shah, by bombing Iranian airfields and sending his troops over the border. The eight-year Iran-Iraq war that ensued cost hundreds of thousands of lives on each side and left Iraq staggering under a debt estimated at $75 billion. It was in this war that Hussein first used the chemical weapons he would later turn on his own people in Kurdistan.

DOJ_NMG_0111629

Over the course of the war, the U.S. government under presidents Ronald Reagan and later George H.W. Bush sought to weaken Iraq's bonds with its rival, the Soviet Union, as well as to prevent Iran from expanding its power in the region. It provided Iraq with hundreds of millions of dollars in subsidies, along with weapons and military intelligence.

Near the end of the war, Hussein inaugurated another bloody campaign, this time against the Kurds in northern Iraq, who were aligned with Iran. During the 1987-88 Anfal campaign, a systematic effort to destroy rural Kurdish life, the Iraqi military dropped poison gas on villages, bulldozed homes and killed, tortured and displaced hundreds of thousands of people. The Kurdish government estimated that 182,000 people died in the campaign.

To carry out these exploits, Hussein built an army, including the elite Republican Guard, that became one of the world's largest.War and Retribution

After the financial and military strain of the Iran-Iraq war, Hussein decided to invade oil-rich Kuwait in August 1990. The invasion was immediately condemned by the United Nations, and in January 1991 a coalition led by the United States attacked Iraq. The coalition quickly liberated Kuwait and defeated Iraq but stopped short of removing Hussein from power.

Shiites and Kurds rebelled after the Gulf War in an attempt to overthrow Hussein. But in the absence of U.S. military support, they were brutally crushed. His forces killed thousands of Shiites in southern Iraq and forced waves of Kurds to flee north into the mountains of Turkey, where many died of exposure.

"Saddam's retribution was swift and terrible," former ambassador Peter W. Galbraith wrote. "Republican Guard tanks blasted apart ancient city centers. Shiite shrines became battlegrounds and then slaughterhouses as rebels, clerics, and unlucky civilians were massacred. The Republican Guard attached nooses to the gun barrels of their tanks, hanging Shiite men -- several at a time -- by elevating the gun."

Iraq entered a period of more than a decade of U.N. sanctions that restricted imports of sensitive materials and further impoverished the Iraqi people. The country's economy worsened, and shortages of food and medicine reportedly caused widespread suffering and malnutrition.

In the 1990s, U.S. and British aircraft enforced no-fly zones in northern and southern Iraq and bombed military targets in repeated attempts to destroy Hussein's weapons arsenal.Endgame

After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the United States moved again to attack Iraq, this time citing Hussein's arsenal of weapons of mass destruction, which U.S.-led forces failed to find after they invaded in March 2003.

The first salvo of the second Iraq war aimed straight at Hussein. Aircraft dropped cruise missiles and powerful bombs onto a group of houses in southern Baghdad where intelligence reports had suggested he was hiding. He survived that attack and eluded a massive manhunt for 38 weeks, until U.S. troops found him Dec. 13 in a cramped burrow on a farm near Dawr, a hamlet not far from his birthplace.

"I am Saddam Hussein, president of Iraq," he said in English upon emerging, according to Bremer's account. "I want to negotiate."

Hussein went on temporary hunger strikes while in custody and remained defiant during his first trial, on charges of crimes against humanity for orchestrating the killings of 148 Shiite Muslim men and boys in an Iraqi village in the 1980s.

On the day he was convicted and sentenced to death, Hussein wrote a letter to the Iraqi people, according to his attorneys.

In the document, he asked Iraqis not to hate the foreign peoples who had invaded their country, just their leaders, because hatred "will blind your vision and close all doors of thinking."

"I say goodbye to you, but I will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in Him, and God won't disappoint any honest believer," the letter said.

Hussein was hanged early today Baghdad time, the start of the Muslim festival of Eid al-Adha, while his country remained at war.

Defiant Despot Who Oppressed Iraq For More Than 30 Years (NYT)

By Neil Macfarquhar

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0111630

The hanging of Saddam Hussein ended the life of one of the most brutal tyrants in recent history and negated the fiction that he himself maintained even as the gallows loomed — that he remained president of Iraq despite being toppled by the United States military and that his power and his palaces would be restored to him in time.

The despot, known as Saddam, had oppressed Iraq for more than 30 years, unleashing devastating regional wars and reducing his once promising, oil-rich nation to a claustrophobic police state.

For decades, it had seemed that his unflinching hold on Iraq would endure, particularly after he lasted through disastrous military adventures against first Iran and then Kuwait, where an American-led coalition routed his unexpectedly timid military in 1991.

His own conviction that he was destined by God to rule Iraq forever was such that he refused to accept that he would be overthrown in April 2003, even as American tanks penetrated the Iraqi capital, Baghdad, in a war that has become a bitterly contentious, bloody occupation.

After eluding capture for eight months, Mr. Hussein became the American military's High Value Detainee No. 1. But he heaped scorn on the Iraqi judge who referred to him as the "former" president after asking him to identify himself on the first day of his trial for crimes against humanity, which ultimately lead to his execution.

"I didn't say 'former president,' I said 'president,' and I have rights according to the Constitution, among them immunity from prosecution," he growled from the docket. The outburst underscored the boundless egotism and self-delusion of a man who fostered such a fierce personality cult during the decades that he ran the Middle Eastern nation that joking about him or criticizing him in public could bring a death sentence.

If a man's life can be boiled down to one physical mark, Mr. Hussein's right wrist was tattooed with a line of three dark blue dots, commonly given to children in rural, tribal areas. Some urbanized Iraqis removed or at least bleached theirs, but Mr. Hussein's former confidants told The Atlantic Monthly that he never disguised his.

Ultimately, underneath all the socialist oratory, underneath the Koranic references, the tailored suits and the invocations of Iraq's glorious history, Mr. Hussein held onto the ethos of a village peasant who believed that the strongman was everything. He was trying to be a tribal leader on a grand scale. His rule was paramount, and sustaining it was his main goal behind all the talk of developing Iraq by harnessing its considerable wealth and manpower.

Mosques, airports, neighborhoods and entire cities were named after him. A military arch erected in Baghdad in 1989 was modeled on his forearms and then enlarged 40 times to hold two giant crossed swords. In school, pupils learned songs with lyrics like "Saddam, oh Saddam, you carry the nation's dawn in your eyes."

The entertainment at public events often consisted of outpourings of praise for Mr. Hussein. At the January 2003 inauguration of a recreational lake in Baghdad, poets spouted spontaneous verse and the official translators struggled to keep up with lines like, "We will stimulate ourselves by saying your name, Saddam Hussein, when we say Saddam Hussein, we stimulate ourselves."

While Mr. Hussein was in power, his statue guarded the entrance to every village, his portrait watched over each government office and he peered down from at least one wall in every home. His picture was so widespread that a joke quietly circulating among his detractors in 1988 put the country's population at 34 million — 17 million people and 17 million portraits of Saddam.

Battles and Bloodshed

Throughout his rule, he unsettled the ranks of the Baath Party with bloody purges and packed his jails with political prisoners to defuse real or imagined plots. In one of his most brutal acts, he rained poison gas on the northern Kurdish village of Halabja in 1988, killing an estimated 5,000 of his own citizens suspected of being disloyal and wounding 10,000 more.

Even at the end, he showed no remorse. When four Iraqi politicians visited him after his capture in December 2003, they asked about his more brutal acts. He called the Halabja attack Iran's handiwork; he said that Kuwait was rightfully part of Iraq and that the mass graves were filled with thieves who fled the battlefields, according to Adnan Pachachi, a former Iraqi foreign minister. Mr. Hussein declared that he had been "just but firm" because Iraqis needed a tough ruler, Mr. Pachachi said.

It was a favorite theme, one even espoused in a novel attributed to Mr. Hussein called "Zabibah and the King."

DOJ_NMG_0111631

At one point, the king asks the comely Zabibah whether the people needed strict measures from their leader. "Yes, Your Majesty," Zabibah replies. "The people need strict measures so that they can feel protected by this strictness."

Aside from his secret police, he held power by filling the government's upper ranks with members of his extended clan. Their Corleone-like feuds became the stuff of gory public soap operas. Mr. Hussein once sentenced his elder son, Uday, to be executed after he beat Mr. Hussein's food taster to death in front of scores of horrified party guests, but later rescinded the order. The husbands of his two eldest daughters, whom he had promoted to important military positions, were gunned down after they defected and then inexplicably returned to Iraq.

Continual wars sapped Iraq's wealth and decimated its people. In 1980, Mr. Hussein dragged his country into a disastrous attempt to overthrow the new Islamic government in neighboring Iran. By the time the war ended in stalemate in 1988, more than 200,000 Iraqis were dead and hundreds of thousands more wounded. Iran suffered a similar toll. Iraq's staggering war debt, pegged around $70 billion, soon had wealthy Arab neighbors demanding repayment. Enraged, he invaded Kuwait in August 1990, only to be expelled by an American-led coalition in the Persian Gulf war seven months later.

Yet in the language of his Orwellian government, Mr. Hussein never suffered a setback. After the gulf war ended with the deaths of an estimated 150,000 Iraqis, he called "the Mother of All Battles" his biggest victory and maintained that Iraq had actually repulsed an American attack.

"Iraq has punched a hole in the myth of American superiority and rubbed the nose of the United States in the dust," Mr. Hussein said.

His defeat in Kuwait, followed by more than a decade of tense confrontations with the West over his suspected weapons programs, ultimately led to his overthrow. The extended bloodbath that followed the invasion, with the monthly death toll of Iraqi civilians estimated roughly at 3,000 by the end of 2006, made some nostalgic for even the oppressive days of Mr. Hussein, when public security was not an issue. His repressive ways were credited with keeping the fractious population of 26 million — including 20 percent Sunni Muslims, who dominated; 55 percent Shiite Muslims; 20 percent Kurds plus several tiny minorities including Christians — from shattering along ethnic lines.

The Pathway to Politics

Saddam Hussein was born on April 28, 1937, in a mud hut on stilts near the banks of the Tigris River near the village of Tikrit, 100 miles northwest of Baghdad. He was raised by a clan of landless peasants, his father apparently deserting his mother before his birth. (Government accounts said the father died.)

"His birth was not a joyful occasion, and no roses or aromatic plants bedecked his cradle," his official biographer, Amir Iskander, wrote in "Saddam Hussein, the Fighter, the Thinker and the Man," published in 1981.

Mr. Hussein told his biographer that he did not miss his father growing up in an extended clan. But persistent stories suggest that Mr. Hussein's stepfather delighted in humiliating the boy and forced him to tend sheep. Eventually, he ran away to live with relatives who would let him go to school.

Mr. Hussein's first role in the rough world of Iraqi politics came in 1959, at age 22, when the Baath Party assigned him and nine others to assassinate Abdul Karim Kassem, the despotic general ruling Iraq. Violence was a quick way for a young man who grew up fatherless in an impoverished village to get ahead; bloodshed became the major theme of his life.

During the failed assassination, Mr. Hussein suffered a bullet wound to the leg. The official version portrayed him as a hero who dug the bullet out with a penknife, while the other version suggests that the plot failed because he opened fire prematurely.

He sought asylum in Egypt, where President Gamal Abdel Nasser nurtured the region's revolutionary movements. Soon after returning to Iraq, Mr. Hussein married his first cousin and the daughter of his political mentor, Sajida Khairallah Tulfah, on May 5, 1963. The couple had two sons, Uday and Qusay, and three daughters, Raghad, Rana and Hala. He had mistresses, including prominent Iraqi women, but never flaunted them.

His wife, three daughters and roughly a dozen grandchildren survive him. Uday and Qusay, along with Qusay's teenage son, Mustapha, died in July 2003 during a gun battle with American forces in a villa in the northern city of Mosul. Denounced by an informant, they had been the two most wanted men in Iraq after their father.

DOJ_NMG_0111632

The first years of Saddam Hussein's marriage coincided with political tumult in Iraq, with at least six coups or attempted revolts erupting between the assassination of King Faisal II in 1958 and the July 1968 putsch that brought the Baath Party to power.

Mr. Hussein's main role while still in his early 30s was organizing the party's militia, the seed of the dreaded security apparatus. By November 1969, he had eliminated rivals and dissidents to the extent that President Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr appointed him vice president and deputy chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council, as the cabinet was known. Mr. Hussein remained head of the intelligence and internal security agencies, in effect controlling Iraq.

The Arab Baath Socialist Party, whose name means "renaissance" in Arabic, had been formed in the 1930s to push a secular, socialist creed as the ideal path to achieving Arab unity. But that dogma proved a sinister excuse for the imprisonment, exile or execution of all potential rivals.

No other Arab despot matched the savagery of Mr. Hussein as he went about bending all state institutions to his whim. His opening act, in January 1969, was hanging around 17 so-called spies for Israel in a downtown Baghdad square. Hundreds of arrests and executions followed as the civilian wing of the Baath Party gradually eclipsed the Iraqi military.

Mr. Hussein staged perhaps his most macabre purge in 1979, when at age 42 he consolidated his hold on Iraq. Having pushed aside President Bakr, he called a gathering of several hundred top Baathists.

One senior official stepped forward to confess to having been part of a widespread plot to allow a Syrian takeover. After guards dragged the man away, Mr. Hussein took to the podium, weeping at first as he began reading a list of dozens implicated. Guards dragged away each of the accused. Mr. Hussein paused from reading occasionally to light his cigar, while the room erupted in almost hysterical chanting demanding death to traitors. The entire dark spectacle, designed to leave no doubt as to who controlled Iraq, was filmed and copies distributed around the country.

Firing squads consisting of cabinet members and other top officials initially gunned down 21 men, including five ministers. Iraq's state radio said the officials executed their colleagues while "cheering for the long life of the Party, the Revolution and the Leader, President, Struggler, Saddam Hussein."

Mr. Hussein invariably ensured that those around him were complicit in his bloody acts, which he masqueraded as patriotism, making certain that there would be no guiltless figure to rally opposition.

In an authoritative account of Mr. Hussein's government called "The Republic of Fear," the self-exiled Iraqi architect Kenaan Makiya (writing under the pseudonym Samir al-Khalil) estimated that at least 500 people died in the purge that consolidated Mr. Hussein's power.

Mr. Hussein's titles reflected his status as an absolute ruler modeled after one of his heroes, Josef Stalin of the former Soviet Union. They included president of the republic, commander in chief of the armed forces, field marshal and prime minister. In addition, the state-owned news media referred to him repeatedly as the Struggler, the Standard Bearer, the Knight of the Arab Nation and the Sword of the Arabs.

Mr. Hussein saw his first opportunity for Iraq to dominate the region in the turmoil that swept neighboring Iran immediately after its 1979 Islamic revolution. In September 1980, Mr. Hussein believed that by invading Iran he could both seize a disputed waterway along the border and inspire Iranians of Arab origin to revolt against their Persian rulers. Instead, they resisted fanatically. Mr. Hussein never acknowledged making a gross miscalculation; rather, he vilified the Iranian Arabs as traitors to the Arab cause.

Iraq fared badly in the war, not least because Mr. Hussein interfered in the battle plans despite a complete lack of military training, even issuing orders based on dreams. When strategies urged by Mr. Hussein failed, he often accused the commanders of betrayal, cowardice and incompetence and had them executed.

The Field Marshal

Mr. Hussein adored the macho trappings of the armed forces, appointing himself field marshal and dressing his ministers in olive-green fatigues. If he was a poor military strategist, he was fortunate in his first choice of enemy. The fear that an Islamic revolution would spread to an oil producer with estimated reserves second only to Saudi Arabia tipped the United States and its allies toward Baghdad and they provided weapons, technology and, most important, secret satellite images of Iran's military positions and intercepted communications.

DOJ_NMG_0111633

The war lasted for eight years until Iran accepted a cease-fire in July 1988, with both sides terrorizing each other's civilian populations by rocketing major cities. But the March 1988 mustard gas attack on the Iraqi village of Halabja by its own government was perhaps the most gruesome incident.

Mr. Hussein waged war while investing in massive development that markedly improved daily life. Rural villages were electrified and linked by modern highways. Iraq boasted some of the best universities and hospitals in the Arab world — all free. Its painters, musicians and other artists, helped by government subsidies, were also the most accomplished in the region. Mr. Hussein had his own development methods. Anyone who avoided mandatory adult literacy classes in rural areas faced three years in jail.

Official corruption was unknown in Iraq in the 1980s, and religious worship somewhat free. Mr. Hussein occasionally took populist measures to underscore the importance of the public welfare. Once, for example, he decided that his ministers were too fat and he demanded that they diet, publishing their real weights and their target weights in the news media. Mr. Hussein's own weight could fluctuate from chubby to relatively trim, although well tailored suits hid his paunch. Around six feet tall, he was stocky and wore a trademark moustache.

In keeping with a ruler who used violence to achieve and sustain power, Mr. Hussein's most widespread investments were in his military. He ended the Iran-Iraq war with one million men under arms.

By then Iraq had embarked on extensive projects to acquire a homegrown arsenal of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons. Iraq had also become a regional power, and Mr. Hussein expected to dominate the Arab world. In March 1990, he threatened to "burn half of Israel" if it ever acted against Iraq, even though the Israeli Air Force had humiliated the Iraqi leader by destroying his country's nuclear research center at Osirik in June 1981.

Mr. Hussein's next target was another neighbor, Kuwait, which Iraq had long considered part of Iraq and coveted for its deep-water port. On Aug. 2, 1990, his army swiftly occupied the tiny, immensely wealthy emirate, provoking an international crisis. Mr. Hussein declared the country Iraq's 19th province, installing a puppet government. Saudi Arabia and other conservative Arab states were shaken and outraged, while the United States and other Western countries feared for the oil fields ringing the Persian Gulf. The United Nations imposed a trade embargo and economic sanctions.

The United States and eventually 33 other nations deployed forces to the region and warned of a wider war if Mr. Hussein did not withdraw. He held onto Kuwait despite repeated threats from the United States, which dominated the military coalition by dispatching some 500,000 American soldiers. Mr. Hussein portrayed the invasion as the start of an Islamic holy war to liberate Jerusalem. He declared that the "throne dwarfs" of the gulf must be overthrown so their wealth could finance the Arab cause.

His public aims resonated among many Arabs in Jordan, Yemen and elsewhere, particularly because the brutality of Mr. Hussein's government had never been detailed by the state-controlled media of other Arab states. In addition, Mr. Hussein's Scud missiles crashing into Tel Aviv, however ineffective, created a stir in the Arab world.

Washington and its coalition allies hoped that the war would bring Mr. Hussein's downfall. Even before the war ended, President George H. W. Bush encouraged the Iraqi people to overthrow him, but there was no coherent plan. The ground offensive against Iraq ended after 100 hours, partly out of concern that American troops not occupy an Arab capital, partly because Arab allies feared the disintegration of Iraq and partly because a "100-hour war" made a good sound bite. Dick Cheney, then secretary of defense, warned that sending American forces to Baghdad would get them stuck in a "quagmire."

This decision enabled much of the elite Republican Guard to escape with minimal losses. The first Bush administration did little to support Shiite and Kurdish uprisings that erupted immediately after the war. Mr. Hussein crushed them.

Oil, Food and Weapons

For the next decade, Mr. Hussein repeatedly brought Iraq to the brink of renewed warfare by refusing United Nations weapons inspectors the access required to catalog and destroy Iraq's arsenal of unconventional weapons, as specified in the cease-fire agreement.

The United Nations maintained strict economic sanctions against Iraq until 1996, when some oil exports were allowed to pay for food, medicine and war reparations. The sanctions, devastating to Iraqis, proved a boon to Mr. Hussein and his subordinates. The Government Accountability Office in the United States Congress estimated that the Iraqi leader siphoned at least $10 billion from the program by making oil trades off the books and demanding kickbacks.

DOJ_NMG_0111634

Still, in an effort to end sanctions, Baghdad over the years offered at least five "full, final and complete" weapons disclosures, which the United Nations dismissed as incomplete. Some of the most extensive revelations emerged after the astonishing August 1995 defection of Mr. Hussein's two sons-in-law and his two eldest daughters to Jordan. The Iraqi government was apparently worried that Lt. Gen. Hussein Kamel al-Majid, a son-in-law and the minister in charge of weapons development, would disclose all that he knew. Six months later, the general and his brother abruptly declared they had accepted amnesty and returned. Within days, Mr. Hussein's daughters divorced them, and they died in a violent shootout.

Although family feuds often descended into bloodshed, Mr. Hussein tried to maintain strict control of his own image. He dyed his hair black and refused to wear his reading glasses in public, according to interviews with exiles published in The Atlantic Monthly in March 2002. Because a slipped disc caused him to limp slightly, he was never filmed walking more than a few steps. Each of his 20 palaces was kept fully staffed, with meals prepared daily as if he were in residence to disguise his whereabouts. Delicacies like imported lobster were first dispatched to nuclear scientists to be tested for radiation and poison.

His wine of choice was Portuguese, Mateus Rosé, but he never drank in public to maintain the conceit that he was a strict Muslim. He even had genealogists draw a family tree that linked him to Fatima, the daughter of the Prophet Muhammad.

He kept an immaculate desk, with reports from all the ministries neatly stacked. He usually read only the executive summaries, but would occasionally dig deeper and always complained that he was being deceived. He often was, with even his son Qusay telling military commanders to lie if Mr. Hussein thought something had been accomplished that was not.

He was particularly phobic about germs. Even top generals summoned to meet him were often ordered to strip to their underwear and their clothes were then washed, ironed and X-rayed before they could get dressed to see him. Mr. Hussein's American jailers reported that he tried to maintain those precautions, using baby wipes to clean meal trays, his table and utensils before eating.

Rarely traveling abroad, and surrounded by often uneducated cousins, he had a limited worldview. He once reacted with wonder when an American reporter told him that the United States had no law against insulting the president. Former officials portrayed him as a vain, paranoid loner who no longer believed he was a normal person and considered compromise a sign of weakness.

Saad al-Bazzaz, an Iraqi writer and editor, said that Mr. Hussein, having risen so far beyond the village and cheated death so often, believed that God anointed him.

Mr. Bazzaz told The Atlantic that even Mr. Hussein's speeches echoed Koranic texts. "In the Koran, Allah says, 'If you thank me, I will give you more,' " Mr. Bazzaz said. "In the early '90s, Saddam was on TV, presenting awards to military officers, and he said, 'If you thank me, I will give you more.' "

Controlling a Nation

Iraq under Mr. Hussein had a stifled quality. Imprisonment, torture, mutilation and execution were frequent occurrences, at least for those who chose to dabble in anything vaguely political. Simple information like the weather report was classified. There was no freedom of expression — even foreign newspapers were banned — and no freedom to travel. Contact with foreigners was proscribed.

There were widespread reports that Mr. Hussein himself periodically carried out the torture or even execution of those he felt had crossed him. In the summer of 1982, for example, Riyadh Ibrahim Hussein, the health minister, suggested during a cabinet meeting that Mr. Hussein step down to ease the negotiation of a cease-fire with Iran. Mr. Hussein recommended that the two retire to another room to discuss the proposal. When they did, a shot rang out. Mr. Hussein returned to the cabinet meeting alone, although in later interviews he denied killing anyone. The minister's widow was sent his dismembered corpse.

While assassinating Shiite Muslim religious leaders who opposed him, Mr. Hussein ordered mosques constructed around Baghdad on a scale not seen since it was the medieval capital of the Muslim caliphate. Perhaps the most striking was the Mother of All Battles mosque completed in 2001, the 10th anniversary of the Persian Gulf war. The minarets resembled Scud missiles, and the mosque held a Koran written with 28 gradually donated liters of Mr. Hussein's blood.

Evidence from inside Iraq after the invasion confirmed what United Nations weapons inspectors anticipated before — that Mr. Hussein abandoned the attempt to develop nuclear, biological and chemical weapons after his 1991 defeat. Orders from Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0111635

Hussein to destroy vestiges of the program, interpreted before the 2003 invasion as an attempt to hide their development, turned out to be an effort to comply with the ban.

The fatal controversy over whether Iraq was still developing unconventional weapons stemmed in part from Mr. Hussein's desire to convince different audiences of different things, a postwar study by the Defense Department concluded. He wanted the West to believe that he had abandoned the program, which he had. Yet he also wanted to instill fear in enemies like Iran and Israel, plus maintain the esteem of Arabs, by claiming that he possessed the weapons.

Some Bush administration critics argued that the accusations over unconventional weapons were a smoke screen, that government hawks were determined to topple Mr. Hussein as a way of reasserting American power. Richard Clarke, a former national security adviser to three presidents, described in his 2004 book "Against All Enemies" the scene in the White House in the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks against the United States, with President Bush and other senior officials trying to link Mr. Hussein directly to Al Qaeda, Osama bin Laden's organization. No such link was ever established.

Just before the invasion, Mr. Hussein, cigar in hand, appeared on television almost nightly, belittling American forces to small groups of Republican Guard commanders.

Yet his main concern was preserving his government, which the United States military discovered in interviews with his captured aides. Some of the unclassified results were published in a 2006 article in Foreign Affairs titled "Saddam's Delusions: The View From the Inside."

By 2003, Iraq's military was anemic, weakened by sanctions and constant changes in command, not to mention the fact that Mr. Hussein, suspicious of coup attempts, barred any rigorous maneuvers and repeatedly created new popular militias. Commanders also constantly lied to him about their state of preparedness. The United States report quoted Mr. Hussein's personal interpreter as saying that the president thought that his "superior" forces would put up a "heroic resistance and inflict such enormous losses on the Americans that they would stop their advance."

Mr. Hussein cited both Vietnam and the hasty American withdrawal from Somalia in 1994 as evidence, and did not take the threat of regime change seriously. He so much believed his own publicity about his success in fighting the first gulf war that he used it as a blueprint for the second. Hence, his main worry during the invasion was to avoid repeating the Shiite and Kurdish internal rebellions of 1991. He did not blow up the bridges over the Tigris and Euphrates to slow the American advance, for example, out of concern that he would need to rush troops south to quell any uprising.

The war plan as described in the 2006 book "Cobra II: The Inside Story of the Invasion and Occupation of Iraq" states that while Republican Guard troops were supposed to seal off the approaches to Baghdad, only the Special Republican Guard was permitted inside the capital, again as insurance against a coup. The collapse came so quickly that Mr. Hussein was still issuing orders to units that had ceased to exist.

After an April 9 sighting in public, he disappeared, apparently using up to 30 hiding places and the aid of loyal tribesmen to escape capture despite a $25 million reward. He often traveled as he had during the first gulf war, in a battered orange and white Baghdad taxi. He issued periodic messages encouraging the insurgency.

In a letter dated April 28 that was faxed to Al Quds al Arabi, an Arabic newspaper published in London, he blamed traitors for his ouster and urged Iraqis to rebel. "There are no priorities greater than expelling the infidel, criminal, cowardly occupier," he wrote.

A Leader's Legacy

In December 2003, his location was divulged by a clan member captured in a raid on a Baghdad house. Less than 11 hours later, 600 American soldiers and Special Operations forces supported by tanks, artillery and Apache helicopter gunships surrounded two farmhouses near the banks of the Tigris in Ad Dwar, a village about nine miles southeast of Tikrit, the tribal seat. The soldiers — no Iraqis were involved — found nothing on the first sweep. But on the second, more intensive search, under a trap door, Mr. Hussein was discovered lying at the bottom of an eight-foot-deep hole.

His first words when he emerged, nervous and disoriented, were, "I am Saddam Hussein, president of Iraq, and I am willing to negotiate," in halting English.

DOJ_NMG_0111636

A Special Operations soldier there shot back, "President Bush sends his regards," the military said later. The main indication that the filthy, dilapidated concrete hut close by had been used by the former Iraqi president was a battered green metal suitcase holding $750,000 in neatly bundled bills.

Mr. Hussein, sporting a bushy salt-and-pepper beard, was first shown on television undergoing a medical exam for head lice. The pictures electrified and shocked Iraqis and the larger Arab world, with some cheering and some appalled to see a captive Arab leader put on undignified display.

He was imprisoned at Camp Cropper, near the international airport some 10 miles from Baghdad, on the grounds of a former palace complex that the United States military turned into a prison for senior members of the government. The prison consisted of three rows of single-story buildings surrounded by a double ring of razor wire.

Mr. Hussein was kept in solitary confinement — letters and care packages including cigars sent via the Red Cross from his wife and daughters living in Qatar or Jordan were his main contact with the outside world. He lived in a relatively spartan cell consisting of a bed, a toilet, a chair, a towel, some books and a prayer rug.

Some of his former American guards, interviewed for a July 2005 story in GQ magazine, said he acted in a fatherly way, offering advice on finding a good wife — "neither too smart nor too dumb, not too old nor too young" — and invited them to hang out in one of his palaces after he was restored to power. He claimed that President Bush had always known he had no unconventional weapons. His favorite snack was Doritos corn chips, his guards said.

Mr. Hussein was combative throughout his trial, using it as a platform to encourage the insurgents. The proceedings frequently seemed to slide toward chaos, with the star defendant and the judges shouting at each other. The trial, held in one of the grandiose buildings erected not far from Mr. Hussein's former presidential palace, proved something of a security nightmare, with three defense lawyers assassinated.

At one point, something he said prompted guffaws from a spectator in an overhead gallery. Mr. Hussein turned and pointed a finger, saying, "The lion does not care about a monkey laughing at him from a tree."

Mr. Hussein often tried to draw parallels between himself and the famous leaders of Mesopotamia, the earliest civilization in the region, as well as Saladin, the 12th-century Kurdish Muslim military commander who expelled the crusaders from Jerusalem.

What preoccupied him, he said, was what people would be thinking about him in 500 years. To the horror of historic preservationists, he had the ancient walls of the former capital, Babylon, completely reconstructed using tens of thousands of newly fired bricks. An archaeologist had shown him bricks stamped with the name of Nebuchadnezzar II in 605 B.C.

After the reconstruction, the small Arabic script on thousands of bricks read in part, "In the reign of the victorious Saddam Hussein, the president of the Republic, may God keep him, the guardian of the great Iraq and the renovator of its renaissance and the builder of its great civilization, the rebuilding of the great city of Babylon was done."

Execution Ends Horrific Chapter In Iraqi History (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, December 30, 2006

The dark eyes that for years mesmerized and terrified a nation finally closed when Saddam Hussein was hanged early today local time for crimes against humanity during his 24-year regime. He was 69.

The Sunni Muslim dictator was born April 28, 1937, into a poor village family near the town of Tikrit, and was raised mainly by his uncle, Khayrallah Tulfah.

Less than 40 years later, Saddam became Iraq's most brutal and powerful president. He defied the world, started two regional wars, and goaded the United States into starting a third war with a 2003 invasion that led to his downfall.

To the end, he declared himself the only legitimate leader of Iraq.

Even after being dragged out of a small mud hole in the ground in December 2003, disheveled and disoriented, Saddam continued to insist that he was president -- an arrogance that continued throughout his trial.

For those who met him, Saddam was both charming and intimidating, a ruthless ruler who had a vision of a modern, secular Arab nation.

DOJ_NMG_0111637

Saddam's uncle was a nationalist army officer who opposed the British-backed monarchy that once ruled Iraq, and under his influence, in 1957 Saddam joined the underground pan-Arab Ba'ath Party.

In 1958, a group of army officers led by Gen. Abdul Karim Qassem toppled the monarchy, and turned the country toward a communist-style state.

A year later, a 22-year-old Saddam and fellow Ba'athists tried to assassinate Gen. Qassem in a botched ambush. Saddam was wounded in the leg and fled to Syria and Egypt -- reportedly with the help of the CIA.

Three years later, he returned to Iraq after a relative, Ahmad Hassan Bakr, had successfully overthrown Qassem. But the Ba'ath Party was once again driven into the underground -- and Saddam with it.

During the five years until the next coup, Saddam worked his way up the security apparatus of the clandestine movement.

In 1968, when the Ba'athists overthrew the government of then-President Abdul Salam Arif, Saddam was put in charge of Iraq's intelligence and security forces. From there, he began to eliminate all potential opposition, particularly among the Shi'ites in the south and the Kurds in the north.

He used Iraq's oil revenues to modernize Iraq, pushing the country to be one of the most modern in the Arab world, with universities and hospitals that were the envy of the region.

Women were encouraged to study and work, and Western-style music and dress prevailed in the cafes and clubs of Baghdad.

In 1979, he was sworn in as president. Weeks later, scores of opposition leaders he had personally identified were executed. The reign of terror had begun.

One of the first Western journalists to interview him in 1973, before he became president, was syndicated columnist Georgie Ann Geyer -- then a reporter with the Chicago Daily News.

"He was very handsome, not unlike what he looked like until his capture. He was in a French suit, with a silk shirt and a silk tie, very proper," she recalled, recounting how she talked with Saddam through an interpreter in a gilded room of a Baghdad palace.

"In the four hours there was never any change of expression. He never smiled, or laughed or got angry, no matter what I asked him. It was like he had a curtain over his face," Miss Geyer said.

"I asked him: 'Critics say you kill your enemies with your own hands. Why do you do that?' and he said: 'Sometimes when you are in an underground movement, you have to do things you don't want to do.' "

Saddam's presidency was marked by periods of ferocious brutality and public displays of charm that kept his enemies off balance and his supporters eager to please him. Hundreds of thousands of people were tortured and killed.

Several Iraqis have said it was the only possible combination to keep the tribally, religiously and ethnically fractured society together. To those who suffered under his sadistic regime, nothing could justify his actions.

Saddam was determined to be recognized as the regional leader, and he challenged Iraq's historical rival, Iran, by invading in 1980.

The United States tacitly supported Saddam at the time, and in 1983, then-special envoy Donald H. Rumsfeld shook hands with the Iraqi leader.

Two years into the fighting, Shi'ites from the small town of Dujail led a failed assassination attempt against Saddam. His response was typically swift and merciless: 148 persons were killed, many residents were jailed and tortured and the town was torn down and rebuilt later.

The war with Iran lasted eight years, and left almost half a million Iraqis dead and an estimated 300,000 Iranians dead. Iraq was weakened physically and financially.

In 1990, Saddam turned on oil-rival Kuwait, and in August of that year he invaded the tiny kingdom. A U.N.-backed coalition led by American troops threw him out of Kuwait and drove his forces back into Iraq.

Sensing another opening, the southern Shi'ites rebelled against Saddam, but the uprising was brutally crushed and thousands of Shi'ites were killed or imprisoned.

After more than 10 years of war and upheaval, as well as coalition bombing, the country's economy and infrastructure were badly damaged.

DOJ_NMG_0111638

An engineer involved in rebuilding Iraq at the time remembered Saddam visiting a number of engineers and workers at the Bayji oil refinery and rallying them to finish the work.

"He believed Iraqis were the best engineers and technicians, and he was proud of us, but he added that he wanted all Iraqi people to be happy on his birthday in 1991 and have enough gasoline, and he did not want to see any lines of cars at gas stations," said Abu Nour, who asked that his full name not be used.

Abu Nour -- a missile systems engineer who was later thrown into jail for punching an army officer who insulted his wife -- said he met Saddam one more time that year, in a building close to the Al-Rasheed hotel in Baghdad.

"We entered the meeting room before him, then he came and at first he sat and watched everybody, and gave permission to key persons to explain what they were planning," he said.

"As a man, he was very nice with strong eyes -- when he looked at you, it was as if he was reading what you had hidden inside your mind," Abu Nour recalled.

"He would not say anything if you made a mistake in your speech, but from his eyes you knew that you had disturbed him with your wrong words," he said.

"At the end, he always gave his best regards to our kids and families and said he apologized for making us work 16 to 18 hours a day, and he said we were heroes for working like that and our families were heroes for being patient with us.

"I really liked him because he is a real man, but I didn't like his attitude sometimes," Abu Nour said.

It was a sentiment echoed in many Arab countries that admired Saddam's defiance of the Western world while modernizing Iraq, but abhorred his methods. All were surprised at the easy surrender of Baghdad when U.S.-led troops invaded in 2003.

But it is Saddam's arrogant attitude and barbaric acts for which he will most be remembered: the gassing of thousands of civilian Kurds, the torture chambers he encouraged and the perverse excesses of his two sons, Uday and Qusai. Both were killed by coalition troops in July 2003.

After Saddam's invasion of Kuwait, the international community led by the United Nations moved to contain the dictator and destroy his weapons systems.

The U.N. slapped sanctions on Iraq, forcing the government to use its oil revenues only for food and other civil needs. The U.S. and Britain imposed two no-fly zones to protect the north and south of the country, restricting Saddam to the central area.

The United Nations also began to inspect and rid the country of its biological, chemical and missile weapons.

But in late 1998, Saddam refused to allow U.N. inspectors to go through his palaces. The United States and Britain responded by bombing several targets around the country.

It was only after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States that Washington began to push for renewed inspections of Iraq, and President Bush included Iraq in what he termed the world's "axis of evil."

Despite mounting evidence that the United States was preparing to invade Iraq, Saddam defiantly refused offers to surrender or leave.

"We will die here. We will die in this country, and we will maintain our honor," Saddam told Dan Rather of CBS News shortly before the invasion.

Ignoring strong international resistance to any military strikes against Iraq, Mr. Bush on March 20, 2003, invaded.

Nine months later, a bearded, bedraggled Saddam was pulled out of an underground hiding place and finally made to face those tortured under his rule.

Hussein Was Symbol Of Autocracy, Cruelty In Iraq (CNN)

CNN.com, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Saddam Hussein, the former dictator of Iraq who spent his last years in captivity after his ruthless Baathist regime was toppled from power by the U.S.-led coalition in 2003, has been executed -- hanged for crimes during a brutal crackdown during his reign.

Hussein was hanged before dawn Saturday in Iraq at about 6 a.m. (10 p.m. Friday ET), according to one of Hussein's lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0111639

Hussein -- whose name conjures lengthy war, government autocracy and widespread cruelty -- was found guilty in the killings of 148 people in Dujail, a mostly Shiite town north of Baghdad, after a 1982 attempt to assassinate him.

At the time of his death, he was being tried for genocide in the killings of up to 100,000 Kurds during the 1988 Anfal campaign against Kurdish rebels -- a campaign that included the use of poison gas against Kurdish towns in northern Iraq.

Hussein was the object of an intense manhunt after the U.S.-led coalition invaded Iraq in March 2003 with the aim of overthrowing his regime. The Bush administration and Britain claimed Iraq was harboring weapons of mass destruction and constituted a threat to their national security. After the invasion, Hussein disappeared from public view, surfacing only in tapes released to Arab television networks.

On December 13, 2003, coalition forces found Hussein tucked away in an underground bunker at a farmhouse near his hometown of Tikrit. His capture was one of the biggest coalition achievements in what many people say has been an ill-fated, mistake-filled expedition. (Watch U.S. troops explain how Hussein was captured)Humble beginnings

Hussein was born into a poor family on April 28, 1937, in a rural town outside Tikrit. He grew up without his biological father. His mother's brother [and Hussein's future father-in-law], Khairallah Talfah, an Iraqi army officer and Arab nationalist, was a major influence in Hussein's early years. (Watch Hussein work his way up from peasant to president)

Having moved to Baghdad as a teenager, Hussein joined the Arab Baath Socialist Party while a secondary school student. In 1958 he spent six months in prison for his political activities.

The next year Hussein and several others attempted to assassinate Gen. Abdul Karim Kassem, who came to power in 1958 in a military coup. Hussein was shot in the leg during the botched attempt, but he escaped and fled to Iraq. He was sentenced to death in absentia February 25, 1960, for his role in the plot.

After studying in Egypt, Hussein returned to Iraq in February 1963 following the Ramadan Revolution, in which Baath Party members overthrew Kassem. The following months of political turmoil culminated in another coup, and Hussein was arrested again on October 14, 1964.

He was elected deputy secretary-general of the Baath Party while in prison.

According to the prewar Iraqi News Agency's resume of Hussein, he escaped from jail in 1967. In July 1968 he played a leading role in a coup that led to the ascension of Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr, a fellow Baath member and Hussein's cousin, as Iraq's new ruler.'Considerable charm and ability to get things done'

As vice chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council -- in effect, al-Bakr's second-in-command -- Hussein promoted many progressive ideas in the late 1960s and early 1970s. He built a reputation as a progressive, effective politician.

"Saddam accumulated power over a period of 10 to 12 years," said Mark Bowden, a best-selling author who profiled Hussein's daily life in a May 2002 Atlantic Monthly article. "When you have evidenced considerable charm [and] an ability to get things done, even very idealistic and ambitious people begin to side with you."

The other side of Hussein was demonstrated in 1979, when al-Bakr stepped down -- officially because of illness -- and Hussein took over as president.

With a camera recording the event, Hussein told a room full of top officials that he had uncovered a conspiracy to overthrow the government. One by one he named the alleged traitors. Sixty-eight men were taken away, and 21 were executed.

"He essentially betrayed many of those people who had relied on him," Bowden said.

In 1980 Hussein entered a war with Iran that would last eight years and, according to some estimates, cost more than a million lives, before ending in a stalemate.Crimes against humanity

The killings in Dujail occurred in 1982 in the context and the shadow of the Iran-Iraq war. (Watch a joyous visit turn tragic)

The United Nations alleged Hussein ordered Iraqi forces to use mustard gas and nerve agents on Iranian soldiers and that in 1988 he unleashed chemical weapons on rebellious Kurds in northern Iraq.

Two years later he ordered troops and tanks to invade Kuwait, Iraq's oil-rich neighbor to the south. A U.N.-backed, U.S.-led coalition routed Iraq's forces and forced them out of Kuwait in early 1991.

Though Iraq emerged worse off from both the stalemate with Iran and the 1991 Persian Gulf War, Hussein declared victory after each.

DOJ_NMG_0111640

Hussein's resume, posted on the Web site of Iraq's U.N. mission before the war, claimed he led Iraq in confronting "the aggression launched by 33 countries led by the U.S. [as] Iraq stood strong against the invasion, maintaining its sovereignty and political system."

Sanctions imposed by the United Nations after the 1991 Gulf War brought more difficulties. Hussein, the United Nations and Western powers went back and forth on sanctions, airstrikes and Iraq's alleged chemical, biological and nuclear programs.

Charles Duelfer, a top official with the U.N. Special Commission on Iraq from 1993 until it was disbanded in 2000, said Iraq undermined U.N. efforts to enforce the cease-fire agreement, misleading inspectors and refusing access to sensitive buildings.

"It got to the point they knew that we knew that they knew that we knew," Duelfer said. "It was a great game, in a sense."

Hussein and his associates tried to lobby Middle Eastern nations to end the U.N.-imposed sanctions and support his policies, in particular his fervent opposition to the United States and Israel.

After years of hide and seek, the inspection system broke down in 1998. The United Nations pulled its inspectors from the country, and the United States and Great Britain launched Operation Desert Fox -- four days of airstrikes against military and political targets inside Iraq.A 'grave and gathering danger'

In 2002 the Bush administration accused Hussein of personally profiting from illicit oil sales as sanctions ravaged Iraq, and of developing weapons of mass destruction and brutally controlling his countrymen.

President Bush stepped up the pressure in a September 12, 2002, speech to the U.N. General Assembly, saying Hussein posed a "grave and gathering danger" and calling on the United Nations to move quickly to enforce its resolutions demanding Iraq's disarmament.

"Iraq has answered a decade of U.N. demands with a decade of defiance," Bush said.

"All the world now faces a test, and the United Nations a difficult and defining moment," he said. "Are Security Council resolutions to be honored and enforced or cast aside without consequence? Will the United Nations serve the purpose of its founding, or will it be irrelevant? "

On October 1 Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz said, "The things that Washington says are all untrue."

Other Iraqi officials claimed the October 2002 referendum -- in which Iraqis unanimously backed [officially 11,445,638 to 0] sole candidate Hussein -- proved the Iraqi leader's popularity.

"Why should anybody say 'no' to Saddam Hussein?" said Izzat Ibrahim, vice chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council, after the vote. "He is the symbol of our freedom and of our future."

Despite the military setbacks, a rash of assassination attempts and the years of devastating sanctions, Hussein appeared to have a firm grip on power.Weapons of mass destruction?

But under mounting pressure after Bush's speech, Iraq re-admitted U.N. weapons inspectors, who returned to Iraq in November 2002 with the prospect of war or peace hanging in the balance.

Inspectors found illegal Samoud missiles and destroyed them in February 2003.

The inspectors departed again in March 2003 after the United States advised the United Nations to remove its weapons inspectors from Iraq ahead of an expected U.S.-led attack.

The war began on March 19 with an unsuccessful "decapitation attack" aimed at killing Hussein and other top members of the country's leadership. Twenty-one days later, U.S. forces rolled into Baghdad as jubilant Iraqis defaced monuments and statues erected in honor of Hussein.

Eventually, the Bush administration conceded that there were no weapons of mass destruction, the primary reason it had cited for the invasion. It has since said that it launched the invasion to get rid of Hussein and spread democracy.

Even though some in the administration advanced the idea that there may have been a working relationship between the Hussein regime and al Qaeda, that theory was firmly refuted by the 9/11 commission report.

After Hussein was captured, the coalition and the post-Hussein Iraqis in power began setting the stage for war crimes tribunals.

After the Dujail trial began, Hussein took on a combative posture in the court, arguing with judges, attorneys and those testifying and insisting that he was still the country's leader.

DOJ_NMG_0111641

But he and two co-defendants were convicted of crimes against humanity, ensuring that Hussein's legacy will be his ruthless reign.

Hated By Many, Mourned By Few (BBC)

By Paul Reynolds

BBC.com, December 30, 2006

Some Iraqis will miss Saddam Hussein but many more will not mourn him.

He brought little but war and suffering to a people who should have been among the most prosperous in the Middle East, given the oil wealth the country sits on.

Two groups of Iraqis, the Kurds and the Shias, make up a majority of the population and since the US-led invasion of 2003, they have taken control of the government.

Before then, they were the oppressed as Saddam Hussein ruled with absolute ruthlessness through his Sunni-dominated military and intelligence services.

The Anfal

The plight of the Kurds became well known around the world in 1988 when the Kurdish town of Halabja in eastern Iraq was gassed.

The atrocity was but part of a wider campaign against the Kurds, which had its own name - the "Anfal". Saddam Hussein did not trust them. He accused them of wanting a separate state and of helping the Iranians with whom he was at war.

Reporters who penetrated the Kurdish region of northern Iraq after the defeat of Saddam Hussein in Kuwait in the first Gulf War of 1991 found a wasteland.

Village after village had been destroyed. Piles of rubble told where houses had been.

In the midst of the destruction there lay a splendid palace built by Saddam Hussein for himself.

Thousands of Kurds fled into the mountains of southern Turkey as Saddam Hussein fought to regain control. Tolerated but not welcomed by the Turks, they huddled in "safe havens" set up by British and American troops until they could return and try to rebuild.

Shias rise up

In the south, the Shias, encouraged by a call to arms by the then US President George Bush senior, rose up. But there was no help from outside and Iraqi helicopter gunships established the control by violence that was the hallmark of Saddam Hussein's rule.

It is no wonder therefore that the Kurds and the Shias will not shed tears for him.

Kurdish refugees from Saddam in 1991

Some, many even, among the Sunni population will. Saddam had his power base among them and they powerfully support the insurgency. To them he was an Iraqi hero who had overthrown the old ways and had given them pride.

Others, especially the middle classes of all backgrounds - might look back to the days when they could walk the streets and drive around the country with no fear of being blown up.

But these families too had suffered.

During the eight-year war Saddam Hussein had launched against Iran in 1980, hundreds of thousands of Iraqis (and probably even more Iranians) died. Then the Kuwait invasion was followed by years of deprivation and isolation under UN sanctions.

Never a proper peace

Saddam Hussein never ruled over a land at peace and at ease with its neighbours and the world.

His execution marks the end of a chapter. But it does not mark the end of the chaos that Iraq faces.

His fate has become almost a sideshow in the great struggle now unfolding in Iraq. His dying wish, expressed in a letter written in jail, called for Iraqis to unite.

They are unlikely to listen.

The Bush administration, struggling to set a new course in Iraq, will try to make capital out of Saddam Hussein's removal.

DOJ_NMG_0111642

But it was thought when he was captured in December 2003 ("We got him," declared the American administrator Paul Bremer) that it would demoralise the insurgency. It did not.

And nor will his death.

The future of Iraq and its place in the Middle East remains to be determined by players other than Saddam Hussein.

Rise And Fall Of A Dictator (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, December 30, 2006

Saddam Hussein was the most defiant Arab leader of his generation, a ruthless dictator who resorted to mass murder and the use of chemical weapons against his own people to remain in power in Iraq. He ruled the country as a police state for more than two decades, until until he was overthrown in April 2003 by invading U.S. and British forces. Mr. Hussein was executed by hanging early today in Baghdad. He was 69.

Poverty and exile on path to power

Mr. Hussein was raised in abject poverty by an uncle who hated the West. His rise to power marked an impressive triumph over adversity. He was born in the dusty village of Tikrit, seemingly fated to a life of depravation.

His family had no money, and his father died either before Saddam was born or shortly thereafter, depending on which of several accounts is believed.

His mother remarried, but Mr. Hussein's stepfather abused him, and the 10-year-old boy went to live with his uncle, a nationalist who taught his nephew to despise Britain, then the colonial power in Iraq, and the United States.

The uncle's lesson – that the Arab world could only rise again by defeating the British and the Americans – helped shape Mr. Hussein's worldview for the rest of his life.

As a young man, Mr. Hussein burst on the national political scene in 1959 when he took part in an unsuccessful effort to assassinate Abdul Karim Kassem, Iraq's military leader. The attempt failed, and Mr. Hussein was shot in the leg by Mr. Kassem's bodyguards.

The story of Mr. Hussein's escape into Syria has entered Iraqi lore. Some say he removed the bullet with a pen-knife; others say a friend removed it before Mr. Hussein stole a donkey and crossed the desert into Syria disguised as a Bedouin.

He spent several years in exile, but returned when the Baath Party took control of Iraq in the 1970s. Mr. Hussein, long a behind-the-scenes strongman, became president in 1979 and immediately ordered the execution of 21 members of his party's leadership.

Many supporters who had helped bring him to power were put to death, sending a chilling message to the populace.

When Mr. Hussein seized control of Iraq in 1979, the country's vast oil wealth – it was No. 2 in the world in proven reserves – had paid for creation of a relatively modern infrastructure of schools, highways and hospitals. There was a large, well-educated middle class, and hopes for the future were high as oil prices surged.

As president, personality changed abruptly

People who worked with Mr. Hussein both before and after he assumed the presidency said that his personality and behavior changed almost overnight.

Once he became president, Mr. Hussein became almost completely inaccessible and paranoid and surrounded himself with family members who knew little about the outside world.

"Saddam Hussein went through a transformation the likes of which I've never witnessed," said author Said Aburish, who at the time worked with an agency charged with evaluating foreign companies wanting to do business with Iraq. "When he took over, it went completely to his head. Within three or four months, he executed half the leadership of the party and replaced them with goons from Tikrit. He only trusted his family."

He said that Mr. Hussein was totally corrupted by power and capable of great cruelty. At the same time, he would sometimes show contradictory emotions, Mr. Aburish said.

"Psychologically Saddam is very interesting," Mr. Aburish said. "He executed his closest ally, then went into isolation for two days and came out with his eyes swollen because he had been weeping and then went to see the widow to offer condolences. He was not a normal man."

DOJ_NMG_0111643

Others who knew Mr. Hussein said that before he became president he was a jovial, hard-drinking man who enjoyed having a good time with friends. All that changed when he obtained national power, they say.

"Once he became president he put a physical distance between us, making us sit at the end of a long table," said journalist Adel Darwish, who interviewed Mr. Hussein many times. "He put a cultural distance between us, because he would not speak English any longer, even though he spoke it fairly well."

Mr. Hussein was fond of the Godfather movies, and was accustomed to a lavish lifestyle with easy access to alcohol, extra-long Cuban cigars and many women.

The dictator blamed his peoples' problems on economic sanctions imposed by the United Nations, and looked the other way as his family made millions of dollars importing smuggled goods. "For the majority of Iraqi people, he will be remembered as a mixture of Stalin and a Chicago gangster, that's how they knew him," Mr. Darwish said.

A taste for military adventurism brings him down

Once he consolidated power at home, Mr. Hussein turned his attention to the military endeavors that would ultimately lead to his undoing. In 1980, sensing weakness in neighboring Iran and receiving encouragement from Washington, he launched an invasion of that country that led to a costly eight-year stalemate.

His goal was to unseat the Islamic fundamentalist rulers of Iran, an aim that was welcomed by U.S. officials, but despite spending billions of dollars and using chemical weapons he was unable to win a military victory, and Iran remains on the same course today.

More than 1 million people died in the fighting, which drained Iraq's financial reserves and led to chronic underinvestment in the oil industry, which today depends on a dilapidated, nearly obsolete infrastructure.

The war ended with an inconclusive ceasefire in 1988 – Mr. Hussein called it a victory – but his taste for military adventurism was not yet slated. In 1990, Mr. Hussein launched an overnight invasion of the oil-rich sheikdom of Kuwait, putting him on a collision course with the United States.

Mr. Hussein, a secular leader who rejected radical Islamic movements, previously enjoyed mostly sound relations with the U.S. government, whose leaders saw him as a bulwark against the spreading fundamentalism and anti-Americanism in the region.

But President George Bush, father of the current president, said the invasion "would not stand" and set about building a broad international coalition to oust the Iraqi army from Kuwait.

The U.S.-led assault on Iraq quickly forced Mr. Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait, and a subsequent uprising inside Iraq nearly ousted him.

But the Iraqi dictator was able to stay in power, although Iraq's Kurdish population established control of large parts of the country, and U.S. and British jets established "no-fly" zones over other areas.

The Iraqi pullback was followed by 12 years of simmering confrontations with the United Nations over Mr. Hussein's suspected stockpiles of banned chemical and biological weapons and his clandestine efforts to obtain nuclear arms.

During that time, Mr. Hussein hatched a plan to assassinate the first President Bush, by then out of office, during a visit to Kuwait. The plan was foiled, and President Bill Clinton launched cruise missiles against Iraq in retaliation for the attempt to kill his predecessor.

The inability of the U.N. to force Iraq's leader to disarm eventually led President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair to threaten Mr. Hussein with an invasion if he refused to go into exile. Defiant to the end, Mr. Hussein stayed in place, facing up to a withering air and ground assault that finally forced him to go underground.

The dictator dropped from sight as thousands of citizens surged into the streets of Baghdad and other cities to loot his palaces and topple his statues. He later was captured in a hideout, his dream of leading the Arab world to its former glory in tatters. Instead of building a modern-day empire to rival those of the past, he had lost control of Iraq.

The Portrait Of A Dictator (NSDY)

By Mohamad Bazzi

Long Island Newsday, December 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0111644

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- For two decades, the most common feature of Iraq's barren landscape were heroic portraits of Saddam Hussein. He appeared as a Bedouin riding a white horse, a revolutionary in a black beret or a devout Muslim with his head bowed in prayer.

But the most popular image -- which hung along the sides of buildings, schools, airports, highways and desert roads -- was that of a smiling Hussein, wearing a fedora and firing an assault rifle into the air. In the more than 30 years he ruled Iraq, unchallenged and ever audacious, Hussein worked tirelessly to cultivate the persona embodied by that photograph: an urbane, modern and, above all, strong leader.

Hussein, 69, rose to power on a wave of nationalist, revolutionary sentiment sweeping the Middle East. With unprecedented oil revenue in the 1970s, he built Iraq into a modern state that became the envy of the Arab world. But he also ruthlessly suppressed all opposition, and dragged his country into two successive -- and spectacularly destructive -- wars with its neighbors. His regime executed, tortured, arrested or disappeared hundreds of thousands of Iraqis. His ruling Sunni Muslim minority persecuted the country's two largest communities: Shia Muslims and ethnic Kurds.

For much of his reign, and especially after he invaded Iran in 1980, Hussein was backed by the United States, Europe and most Arab governments. During the eight-year war with Iran, U.S. and other Western powers supplied him with weapons and military intelligence. It was only after he invaded Kuwait in 1990 that the West turned against him. Despite a disastrous loss to a U.S.-led alliance in the 1991 Gulf War, Hussein clung to power and survived more than a decade of United Nations sanctions and weapons inspections.

In 2003, Hussein became the first modern Arab leader to be deposed by a foreign power. After a trial punctuated by charges of U.S. interference and procedural flaws, he was convicted of ordering the killing of 148 Iraqi Shias in the town of Dujail and sentenced to death by hanging. That earned him another distinction: He was the first modern Arab ruler to be tried and executed for his crimes.

In a region filled with U.S.-allied dictators, many Arabs admired Hussein's willingness to challenge the world's sole superpower and his support for the Palestinians in their struggle with Israel. His rhetoric of "liberating" Jerusalem and restoring old Arab glories, much like his hero, the 12th century Muslim conqueror Salahuddin, resonated with the Arab masses. But some Arabs were repelled by Hussein's brutality at home and in wars with his neighbors.

"For a long time, Saddam was more popular in the Arab world than he was inside Iraq. That's because most Arabs did not grasp the full extent of his cruelty," said Zuheir Jazairy, a prominent Iraqi writer. "To them, he was an Arab leader who stood up to the West. To Iraqis, he was a tyrant."

Tough beginnings

Saddam Hussein's ascendance to power reflects the journey of a generation of Arab leaders: men from poor families and hardscrabble places who fought their way to the top. Hussein was born on April 28, 1937, to a peasant family in the village of Al Awja, about 100 miles north of Baghdad. Al Awja, which means "the crooked" in Arabic, is six miles from Tikrit, the regional capital from which Hussein drew his most trusted lieutenants.

To improve his social standing, Hussein claimed to have been from Tikrit -- and he was called Saddam Hussein al-Tikriti. He also understood the historical symbolism to declaring his roots in Tikrit: The city was the birthplace of Salahuddin, the revered Muslim warrior who recaptured Jerusalem from the Christian crusaders.

Hussein never knew his father, who left the family before his child's birth. After his mother remarried, Hussein spent much of his childhood under the care of a maternal uncle, Khairallah Talfah, a fervent Iraqi nationalist who pushed his nephew toward a life in revolutionary politics. At age 20, Hussein joined the pan-Arab Baath Party.

It was an era of upheaval throughout the Middle East, where the merchant and feudal elites that had been allied with the old European colonial powers were losing their grip on power. In Egypt, a young military officer named Gamal Abdel Nasser had led a revolt against the British-backed king. Nasser's revolution inspired a wave of rebellions in the 1950s and 60s, stretching from Libya to Syria to Iraq.

In 1959, Hussein was wounded in a failed attempt to assassinate Iraq's ruling general, Abdul-Karim Qassem. Hussein, who had fled to Syria and then Egypt, was sentenced to death in absentia for his involvement in the plot. He lived for four years in Cairo, where he became more steeped in Arab nationalist politics. When he returned to Iraq, he quickly rose through the ranks of the Baath Party. In 1968, he took part in a bloodless coup led by Ahmad Hassan al-Bakr, who was named president. Hussein was appointed al-Bakr's deputy and soon became the regime's power broker.

DOJ_NMG_0111645

In the early 1970s, Hussein oversaw the seizure of Iraqi oil assets from foreign companies just as oil prices were beginning to rise sharply. After nationalizing the oil industry, he used profits to modernize Iraq's countryside by distributing land to farmers and mechanizing agriculture production. He also led a campaign to expand free education and health care, build roads and highways and create new industries. Iraq became one of the richest and most developed countries in the Arab world.

By 1979, as he consolidated power through an elaborate web of security services answering directly to him, he forced al-Bakr to resign and appointed himself president. At the age of 42, Hussein "had triumphed by using the disconcerting combination of charm, generosity and ruthless terror that was to serve him so well in maintaining his position as ruler of Iraq for longer than any predecessor," wrote Charles Tripp, a British academic and leading historian of Iraq. "He incorporated all his associates into a web of obligation and surveillance to which he alone held the key."

Concentrated power

Because Hussein concentrated power among his closest relatives and distrusted those outside his Albu Nasir tribe, Tikritis formed the backbone of the Baathist regime and its military forces. In 2003, people named "al-Tikriti" peppered Washington's list of the most-wanted Iraqi leaders.

Worried about the 1979 Islamic revolution that brought Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to power in Iran, Hussein made the first major mistake of his rule in 1980 when he decided to invade his larger neighbor under the pretext of a border dispute. Hussein had feared that Khomeini would inspire the Shia majority in Iraq to rise up against the secular Baathist rule.

But despite weapons and intelligence support from the West, Iraqi forces became bogged down in one of the longest and deadliest wars of attrition of the late 20th century. On several occasions, Iraq used Western-supplied chemical weapons against Iranian forces. In March 1988, Iraqi troops attacked the town of Halabja -- in northern Iraq, where Kurdish separatists were waging an insurgency -- with a mix of mustard gas and nerve agents, killing about 5,000 civilians and injuring more than 10,000.

By the time the Iran-Iraq war ended in 1988, more than 1 million people were killed and both economies were in ruins. Hussein's government was also in debt for tens of billions of dollars to Arab countries, especially Kuwait.

For two years, Hussein negotiated with Kuwaiti leaders, urging them to forgive the debt and stop drilling for oil in a disputed border territory. He was also angry that Kuwait had increased its oil production at a time when Hussein wanted to reduce output and drive up oil prices to make up for his war losses.

After negotiations failed, Hussein invaded Kuwait on Aug. 2, 1990. The Iraqi military rolled through the kingdom in a matter of hours, and Hussein announced he was annexing his tiny neighbor. Other oil-rich Gulf countries, especially Saudi Arabia, worried that Hussein would continue his onslaught. The invasion brought UN condemnation, and the United States assembled an alliance in Saudi Arabia to push Iraq out of Kuwait.

In January 1991, U.S.-led forces quickly drove the Iraqi military out of Kuwait and occupied much of southern Iraq. As part of a cease-fire agreement, Hussein agreed to abandon all chemical and biological weapons programs and to allow UN inspectors into Iraq. In March 1991, with the Iraqi military in shambles and Hussein's grip on power teetering, popular uprisings erupted in the Kurdish-dominated north and Shia south of Iraq. President George H.W. Bush, who had urged Iraqis to rise up against Hussein, refused to assist the rebellions and then lifted no-fly zones imposed during the cease-fire. That allowed Iraqi forces to use helicopter gunships to crush the rebels. Tens of thousands of Kurds and Shias were killed by Iraqi forces in the purges that ensued.

After the Gulf War, Hussein remained in power but Iraq never recovered, either economically or militarily. Throughout the 1990s, Iraq was squeezed by UN sanctions that allowed it to export only limited amounts of oil, in exchange for food and medicines.

Hussein, a secular leader who long espoused the notion of pan-Arab unity instead of Islamic identity, began using religion to shore up his influence. During the 1991 war, he famously added the phrase "Allahu Akbar," ("God is great") to the red, white and black Iraqi flag, reportedly in his own handwriting.

Baghdad once was known in the Arab world for its freewheeling nightlife and open sales of alcohol. But by the mid-90s, as UN sanctions took their toll, more Iraqis began turning to religion. Mosques filled up and women began wearing headscarves and even full-length veils. Hussein banned the public consumption of alcohol, required students to study the Quran before graduating from high school and ordered the construction of dozens of mosques.

DOJ_NMG_0111646

At the Mother of All Battles Mosque in Baghdad, thousands of Iraqis used to visit a glass showcase displaying a 605-page copy of the Quran. Iraqi officials had proudly claimed that it was penned with 50 pints of Hussein's blood.

After the U.S. invasion in March 2003, Hussein evaded capture for eight months. Then, on Dec. 13, 2003, he was cornered in the village of Al Dour by U.S. forces who had been tipped off by one of his former bodyguards.

Hussein's underground hideout was near the banks of the Tigris River, opposite one of the ostentatious palaces he built for himself, in a village where he used to visit relatives and swim as a child. And his history might have hinted that he would be found there: It was to Al Dour that he fled in 1959 after being wounded in the attempt to assassinate Iraq's then-ruling general.

To convince Iraqis that the feared Hussein was indeed captured, U.S. officials aired a videotape of him being examined by a U.S. military doctor. The footage of a bearded Hussein having his head checked for lice was a humiliating counterpoint to the persona he had spent a lifetime cultivating -- as a Muslim warrior worthy of inheriting the mantle of Salahuddin.

With his penchant for historical symbolism, some Iraqis expected Hussein to die fighting before allowing himself to be captured.

"If he had fought and died, I would have considered him a hero," Abdullah Khirbit, a construction manager from the restive city of Fallujah, told Newsday at the time. "Now, he is a prisoner who has been humiliated by the Americans. He should have killed himself instead."

Saddam Hussein: From Humble Beginnings To International Infamy (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, December 30, 2006

Apr 28 1937: Saddam Hussein is born in the village al-Awja, near the town of Tikrit in north-central Iraq. His father disappeared shortly after his birth and he was raised by his stepfather and uncle. Some sources have suggested that Mr Hussein may have been born at a later date, but claimed to be older during his rise to power.

1959: The young Hussein, who has gravitated to the Arab nationalist Baath party, participates in an assassination attempt against Iraq's then-leader Abd al-Kareem Qassem. He is wounded in the attempt but escapes, allegedly displaying considerable resource and endurance. The incident later becomes a large part of Mr Hussein's cult of personality.

Feb 1963: The Baath party participates in a coup that overthrows Mr Qassem, but is edged out by other participants. Mr Hussein is imprisoned in 1964 but escapes in 1967.

Jul 1968: The Baath takes power in another coup, with Mr Hussein's cousin Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr becoming president and Mr Hussein becoming vice president. Mr Hussein presides over the nationalisation of the oil industry in 1972 and rapid economic growth fuelled by the oil boom, but the regime also begins to repress Shia religious celebrations in public.

Jul 16, 1979: Mr Hussein, who has upstaged Mr Bakr for much of the past decade, edges out the president in an internal coup and then purges the party.

Sep 22 1980: Iraq invades Iran, with which it has had a long-term border dispute. He cracks down on the Shia Islamist al-Dawa party, which has ties to Iran's revolutionary regime.

July 8 1982: Mr Hussein survives an assassination attempt at the hands of Dawa activists in the Shia village of Dujail. He allegedly orders a campaign of reprisals, which see 148 people condemned to death, many more including women and children deported to a remote desert prison, and the demolition of homes and palm groves in a wide swathe around the village. Mr Hussein was condemned to death on the basis of these allegations.

Feb 23 1988: The official beginning of the Anfal campaign, allegedly ordered by Mr Hussein to depopulate areas of the north which support Kurdish guerillas. Mr Hussein is currently being tried in a second trial for his role in Anfal and other counterinsurgency campaigns in the north, in which the Kurds claim some 180,000 of their kinsmen were killed.

Aug 2 1990: The Iraqi army invades Kuwait, and is ousted six months later by a US-led coalition. The country is placed under sanctions. In the aftermath of Mr Hussein's defeat the Shia south witnesses an uprising. The "intifada" fails, but Shia estimates of the dead begin at 300,000.

DOJ_NMG_0111647

Mar 19 2003: A US-led coalition invades Iraq with the intent of overthrowing Mr Hussein's regime. Mr Hussein last appears publicly as president on April 7, 2003, in the Sunni neighbourhood of Adhamiya, and goes into hiding.

Dec 13 2003: Mr Hussein is captured by US forces in a "spider hole" in a village in the town of al-Dawr, close to his birthplace in Awja. Photos of him undergoing a post-capture medical inspection are broadcast on Iraqi television. Both supporters and foes of the regime confess to have felt a sense of shock to see the man who dominated their country for over three decades brought low.

Jul 1 2004: Mr Hussein first appears in court before the Iraqi High Tribunal. His trial begins on October 19 2005.

Nov 5 2006: Mr Hussein is sentenced to death for crimes against humanity.

Dec 26 2006: An Iraqi appeals court upholds a ruling that Saddam Hussein should hang for crimes against humanity. Under the statute governing the Iraqi High Tribunal, the death sentence must be carried out within 30 days.

TV Networks Hold Tense Death Watch For Condemned Iraqi Dictator (AP)

By Lynn Elber

AP, December 29, 2006

TV news channels played a tense waiting game Friday as they ticked off the final hours of Saddam Hussein's life, replaying scenes from the former Iraqi dictator's reign as they waited for his death.

Saddam's hanging Friday night ended a day of TV reporting fraught with uncertainty and speculation about whether his execution was imminent.

"The situation seems to be one of tremendous flux, but you and your viewers already know that," Feisal al-Istrabadi, Iraq's deputy ambassador to the United Nations, said on CNN several hours before Saddam's death.

At about 7:15 p.m. PST, NBC broke into regular programming with a special report announcing the execution. NBC attributed the news to three "very credible" Arabic language news stations.

A few minutes later, Katie Couric made the announcement for CBS, also breaking into programming.

"Saddam Hussein is dead. We have just received word that the former president of Iraq has been executed. No details yet, but Iraqi authorities said they were planning to videotape the death," Couric said.

She then went to correspondent Randall Pinkston, who said the network was told by one of Saddam's lawyers that the execution was carried out just before 10 p.m. Eastern time.

ABC issued its report shortly before 7:30 p.m. PST, citing a senior military official in Baghdad.

Reports on cable channels Fox News Channel and CNN cited Arab language news stations.

After Saddam's death, the issue became whether footage, if made available, would be shown.

"American forces across Iraq are bracing for a possible violent reaction to the execution and we should say that NBC News is not going to broadcast videotape of the execution," newscaster Campbell Brown said.

But CNN's Anderson Cooper indicated the door was open.

"We will be bringing those images to you as appropriate," said Cooper. Video and still photos had been taken of the execution but would be reviewed by the channel before airing, he said.

"We won't be showing anything too graphic," Cooper said.

But in the hours after Saddam's death, the story was told in words and old footage. There was brief coverage of members of the Iraq community in Dearborn, Mich., celebrating his execution, but otherwise news channels relied on file film of Saddam and war-torn Iraq.

Before the execution, news executives were reluctant to discuss hypothetically what they might show if video or still pictures were made available. They said they would weigh questions of tastefulness with the need to illustrate an important story.

NBC News will use discretion in what it shows, but people have the right to see proof that Saddam was killed, said Phil Alongi, executive producer, NBC News special events.

"We're not going to do it just for the shock value," Alongi said earlier Friday.

CBS News discussed general guidelines in the days when it became clear that the execution was imminent.

DOJ_NMG_0111648

"We need to show Saddam being taken to his execution and we need to show the results of the execution, but we will not see any moving video of him actually being hanged," said Paul Friedman, CBS News executive.

Bob Murphy, ABC News senior vice president, recalled that when Saddam's two sons were killed, his network showed pictures of their faces after death but showed nothing of their bodies.

Several hours after the execution, Murphy said ABC would use its "editorial judgment" in reviewing any footage and deciding whether it was appropriate to air. Based on unconfirmed information, he said, the execution may have been taped in its entirety.

If Iraqi TV viewers were glued to their TV sets, as one channel reported, the broadcast networks apparently felt that the news bulletins would hold U.S. viewers for now: All switched back to regular programming Friday, although ABC followed the story on news magazine "20/20."

MSNBC, Fox News Channel and CNN stayed with Saddam coverage. Fox's Bill O'Reilly might have taken issue with the broadcast network's brief reports.

Saddam's execution represented a "big moment, much bigger than the press in America is portraying it," O'Reilly said earlier Friday, adding: "It's not at the level of (Osama) bin Laden. Bin Laden would be off the chart, great."

On TV, Death Watch For Dictator (LAT)

By Paul Brownfield

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

Predictions went from "today or tomorrow" to "in the next hours" to "by all accounts very soon" to "any moment now." Finally, it appeared that Saddam Hussein would die during "Larry King Live."

"Are a lot of people in Iraq going to miss him?" King asked colleague John Roberts.

Let no stone go unturned. Except this: Would American television networks, cable or broadcast, show the actual event? Would there be video?

A CBS news official was quoted expressing squeamishness; others, like CNN, Fox News and NBC, were taking more of a wait-and-see attitude. Networks used the prospect of footage to create an all-day "Dead Man Walking" scenario, as day became night became the morning call for prayer in Baghdad.

It was said that the execution would be filmed but not broadcast live on Iraqi TV, which has shown other executions, though some form of videotape of the Hussein hanging would be released, to affirm what many in the Arab world perhaps needed to see to believe.

On Al Jazeera English, journalist Nir Rosen was asked whether Iraqis would be glued to their sets waiting for news of the despot's death. "I think most Iraqis don't have electricity," Rosen noted dryly, "and their televisions don't work."

On cable news Friday, there was this weird, almost macabre, juxtaposition — news shows cutting between President Ford, lying in state in Palm Desert, and breathless coverage of when Hussein would be executed.

It's hard to remember, but the capture of a disheveled Hussein from his hole in the ground in Tikrit was a remarkable image. But his death, in its immediate moments, would be something else — a coda of sorts that analysts predicted would be quickly forgotten.

The issue of the unfairness of Hussein's trial was getting pointed coverage on Al Jazeera English. Meanwhile, after the execution was announced, CNN's Anderson Cooper assured viewers that the network would be judicious before splashing any imagery on the screen. It's this same judiciousness on an everyday basis that keeps the war distant, troubling and out of focus.

How Much Should Be Shown Of A Hanging? Network Executives Wonder And Wait (NYT)

By Bill Carter

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

In the hours before the hanging of Saddam Hussein television news executives were thrown into hurried consultations yesterday over how to handle any images of his execution that might be released.

DOJ_NMG_0111649

Though there was some question as to whether any video images would be issued, the network news divisions at ABC and CBS said that should the video become available, some visual documentation of Mr. Hussein's death might be broadcast, but no overly graphic images, and certainly not the complete execution.

NBC News, however, indicated it might go further than its competitors. Steve Capus, the president of NBC News, said the network might show "a wide shot of Saddam hanging." He said NBC would make its decision based on questions of taste and history.

"I think it might be appropriate at some point to see an image of Saddam after he is hanged," Mr. Capus said, citing previous historic images of dictators who had been killed. "I think about that iconic image of Nicolae Ceausescu in Romania, lying literally in the gutter. I want to do this with a measure of taste, but I don't want to stand in the way of history."

The cable channels CNN and Fox News were less definitive about what limits they might impose on any images of Mr. Hussein dead, saying they would decide what to display after they saw what was available. (MSNBC, the cable channel owned by NBC, will follow the policies of NBC News.)

Executives throughout the television news business said they fully expected such images to turn up at least on Web sites.

"Somehow it will get out," said Paul Friedman, the vice president of CBS News. "That video is going to be available somewhere on some channel or some site." Mr. Friedman said he had met with the CBS News staff yesterday and had told them, "There will be a lot of pressure to use the pictures" of the actual hanging. But, he added, "CBS will not show it, no matter what."

Bob Murphy, the senior vice president of ABC News, said, "I suspect there will be some form of video released that will confirm the death for the Iraqi people."

ABC will "fulfill our obligations as journalists in documenting the event," he said. But he emphasized: "We will absolutely not go too far in showing graphic images. Taste and propriety are the two key guidelines."

Mr. Murphy also stressed that ABC News would not allow its Web site, ABCNews.com, to show anything more than what was permitted on television. "The decision will be for all of ABC News," he said. "What is excluded for ABC News on television will be excluded for all ABC News outlets."

Mr. Friedman said editors from CBS's site, CBSNews.com, had also been told that they would be under the same restrictions as the broadcast network. Mr. Capus also said the choices of the MSNBC.com Web site would be governed by what the network decided.

David Rhodes, the vice president of news for the leading all-news cable network, the Fox News Channel, said questions of what the network might show were "still hypothetical at this point."

Of what the channel might eventually show, he said, "If you could tell me exactly what we were going to get, I could give you an answer."

As to whether the channel's Web site, FoxNews.com, might be permitted to show more images than what appeared on television, Mr. Rhodes said, "We haven't had the discussion yet about whether we should be doing anything different on the Web site."

CNN released only a statement saying, "We will make our final call once we see what the Iraqi government releases."

Most of the news outlets cited decisions they had made in the aftermath of the killing of the two sons of Mr. Hussein by United States troops. Mr. Murphy of ABC said the network had broadcast some still shots of the faces of the dead men but had excluded graphic video that showed multiple wounds.

A spokeswoman for CNN, Laurie Goldberg, noted that in the case of the sons, many questions were raised about their identities, and so more images were shown to make comparisons with previous pictures taken of the men.

Still unclear yesterday was what other news and video outlets might do if they gained access to video images of the hanging. Representatives for the Qatar-based news network Al Jazeera did not respond to telephone calls or e-mail messages. Jennifer Nielsen, the marketing manager for YouTube, said that that popular video Web site would not comment on videos it had not yet seen. In general, the site's policy is to prohibit content that is deemed inappropriate by its users.

With Hussein Dead, Iraqis Consider Fate Of His Body (NYT)

By Marc Santora

DOJ_NMG_0111650

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Saturday, Dec. 30 — After the hanging, the body remains.

While the verdict and death sentence for Saddam Hussein were swift and unambiguous, it was much less clear on Saturday what would be done with his body.

Privately, both American and Iraqi officials say that the subject has been raised at the highest levels, but no decisions have been made. There is wide disagreement on the subject of his body, according to interviews with several top Western and Iraqi officials, nearly all of whom insisted on anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject.

The most discussed options include sending his body out of the country to his family in Jordan, where two of his daughters live; burying him in a secret location never to be made public; burying him in a secret location but, after a period of time, having him disinterred and sent to his family or tribe; or sending him immediately to his hometown of Tikrit to be buried with members of his tribe.

In fact, a top Sunni politician even raised the prospect of holding a state funeral for Mr. Hussein. That idea, a Western official said, had very little chance of becoming reality.

Salahedeen Hamad Humood, the governor of Salahedeen Province, which includes Tikrit, said, "We demand an official funeral for Saddam Hussein; he is the ex-president of Iraq, and he should be buried next to his sons."

Mr. Hussein's sons, Uday and Qusay, were killed by American troops after the invasion of Iraq. To convince the public that they were actually dead, graphic images of their bloodied faces were made public.

Similarly, Iraqi officials had said that the hanging of Mr. Hussein would be taped, although it was unclear on Saturday whether that had been done, and if so, whether the tape would be made public.

If Mr. Hussein were allowed to be buried in Tikrit, which had been his main base of support, it would be out of character with the way the remains of some of the 20th century's other most notorious tyrants have been treated.

From Mussolini to Ceausescu, the vanquishers of the once powerful rulers have sought to ensure that memorials to them do not inspire the kind of passions they did in life.

Tojo, Japan's leader during World War II, was unceremoniously cremated after going to the gallows. The location of the ashes was kept secret for nearly three decades, until the urn with his remains was secretly placed in the Yasukuni Shrine in Tokyo, where it remains today. The former Romanian dictator, Nicolae Ceausescu, was buried secretly in a nondescript public graveyard. Although the grave markers bore fake names, the site was public knowledge within a year. He was killed by firing squad on Christmas Day in 1989.

Hitler's bones, the source of endless morbid fascination, were buried in secret, dug up, moved across East Germany, buried again and dug up once more only to be cremated. A piece of his skull is kept in Russia.

Mussolini's body traveled far after he was shot by a firing squad and then hanged upside down in a public square. Slivers of his brain were taken by American doctors to see if he had been driven mad by syphilis, while the rest of him was buried in an unmarked grave outside Milan. The site was soon discovered and a young neofascist dug up the remains, stuffed them in a steamer trunk and hid them in the mountains. Eventually, Mussolini was recovered and reburied in the Adriatic Sea town of Predappio, his home town.

Iraq's leaders are obviously wrestling with the same questions as the victors who deposed other rulers. But in this case, it is complicated by the state of lawlessness that rules this country.

While many people here seem more concerned with just staying alive than worrying about the resting place of Mr. Hussein, government officials in this country built on the worship of martyrs are keenly aware of death's ability to transform.

Death Of A Dictator (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

ONCE UPON A TIME, the death of Saddam Hussein would have been an epochal event for Iraq, the Middle East and the world. Now there is some question whether it will even matter in Baghdad.

No one really expects Hussein's execution, which took place today, to change much in Iraq. His hanging was carried out in haste and in secret, in part because Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and other officials were worried that Sunni or Shiite factions would use it as an occasion for attacks or bombings. Violence may indeed spike in the aftermath of Hussein's death, but he has become little more than a symbol to such insurgents, who do not lack for excuses to justify their viciousness.

DOJ_NMG_0111651

Nor can Hussein's death be expected to be much of a factor in Washington. Some will claim that it vindicates one of the original purposes of the war. But President Bush's deliberations about the "way forward" in Iraq will continue apace, as will debate about troop levels, diplomatic overtures and other strategies to allow the U.S. to leave Iraq but continue the war against terrorism.

The curious irrelevance of Hussein to today's Iraq could hardly have been predicted five years ago. It would be a mistake, however, to forget his terrible relevance to Iraq's history.

A student of Stalin, Hussein borrowed many of the Russian dictator's tactics, from assassinations and imprisonments of political enemies to ironclad control of the state security apparatus. On his hands are the death of countless Iraqis — hundreds of thousands in a disastrous and inconclusive war with Iran, untold numbers of others in attacks he ordered against his own citizens.

One of those massacres, the killing of 148 men and boys in a Shiite town after an attempt was made on his life there in 1982, sealed Hussein's fate. His execution followed his conviction for ordering their deaths, and though the trial was imperfect, Hussein freely admitted his responsibility for the murders. His death robs another trial, for the gassing of as many as 180,000 Kurds in 1987 and 1988, of its defendant.

It is absurd to regret the death of a man so brutal. His removal from power was heartening to defenders of human rights everywhere. Yet it's worth asking, as U.S. troops go on heightened alert in Baghdad, whether Hussein's death represents progress or yet another anticlimax for Iraq. When his regime was toppled in the spring of 2003, and again at his ignominious capture three years ago, Iraqis and U.S. troops — not to mention Washington policymakers — allowed themselves to hope that they had reached some kind of turning point in the war.

No one voices such unrealistic optimism anymore. Hussein's irrelevance was one of the main achievements of the war in Iraq. It is also one of the main reasons why that war continues.

So Long To "Our" Tyrant (LAT)

By Andrew Cockburn

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

AMONG THE MANY ironies of Saddam Hussein's execution is that, although his death seems certain to boost sectarian bloodletting between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq, he always posed as an Iraqi and Arab nationalist who could unite the rivalrous sects in his country — an attribute that initially recommended him to Washington.

Other qualities of the Iraqi dictator that appealed to U.S. policymakers included his sterling record in eliminating communists and his readiness to confront the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the militant Shiite leader of Iran.

Today of all days, the administration has no desire to be reminded of the era when the U.S. actively intervened on Iraq's side in the Iran-Iraq war, supplying credit, intelligence, helicopters and, finally, active combat assistance from the U.S. Navy.

But that is indeed what happened. Something of the flavor of the relationship is summed up in a March 1984 cable from Secretary of State George Shultz to Donald Rumsfeld, who was about to visit Baghdad for the second time as President Reagan's Middle East envoy. Although the U.S. had just publicly condemned Iraq's use of chemical weapons, Shultz told Rumsfeld that the condemnation had been more or less pro forma and that "our interests in 1) preventing an Iranian victory and 2) continuing to improve bilateral relations with Iraq, at a pace of Iraq's choosing, remain undiminished…. This message bears reinforcing during your discussions."

The key to the relationship between the U.S. and Hussein over the years was that they shared the same enemies. Hussein's early political career was as a hit man for the Baath party. In 1961, he fled into exile in Egypt after botching an assassination attempt against the then-leader of Iraq, Abdul Karim Qassim. Qassim, a leftist general who ruled with the support of the Communist Party, was regarded with extreme disfavor in Washington.

In fact, Hussein's exile ended in 1963, when his Baathist colleagues seized power with covert U.S. assistance. "We rode to power on a CIA train," the party's secretary general, Ali Saleh Saadi, admitted later.

DOJ_NMG_0111652

Once in power, Hussein and his party pursued a nationalist agenda that sometimes irked Washington — as when he masterminded the full nationalization of Iraq's oil assets. In the mid-1970s, the U.S. got so irritated with him that it briefly gave covert assistance to Kurdish insurgents. But the triumph of militant Shiism in Iran a few years later guaranteed Hussein a place among Washington's allies once again.

Initially, it wasn't clear that Hussein would have to go to war against Khomeini's Iran. That's because the Shiite religious leadership in Iraq posed little threat to Hussein's rule. But that began to change when the communists — who had commanded the allegiance of the Shiite masses — were crushed and liquidated. The Shiite religious hierarchy, encouraged by the success of the Islamic Revolution next door, then began asserting itself politically.

Panicked by this internal threat, Hussein decided on a preemptive attack against Iran in 1980, a move that came with covert U.S. encouragement.

Apart from the eccentric deviation of the Iran-Contra affair, Washington's support for Iraq against the militant Iranian Shiite regime remained firm during the eight-year Iran-Iraq war, despite Hussein's well-publicized use of poison gas against, as President Bush likes to remind us, his own people.

That consistent support, in fact, appears to have deluded Hussein into thinking that the U.S. would grant him concessions in return for withdrawing from Kuwait after his 1990 invasion of that country. Had he any experience of the outside world beyond his exile in Egypt and brief arms-shopping trips to Moscow and Paris — or had his advisors not been too frightened to tell him the truth — he might have understood that, with the Soviet Union's defeat in the Cold War, Third World dictators could no longer defy the U.S. and escape unpunished.

Though he was expelled from Kuwait and his economy wrecked by sanctions, Hussein was allowed to survive because Washington for a time continued to believe that he was useful as a bulwark against Iran abroad and militant Shiism at home in Iraq. When that policy was discarded by the neoconservatives after the 9/11 attacks, the dictator's days were numbered.

Hussein was for a period the prime example of the traditional U.S. means of control in the Middle East: quiet support for a repressive leader respectful of U.S. interests. That approach has now apparently been replaced by one that induces civil discord and breakdown (deliberately or otherwise), as evidenced by recent events in Iraq, Lebanon and Afghanistan.

In his final hours, Saddam Hussein may have derived some satisfaction from the unpleasant surprises this change has produced for his former friends in Washington.

Justice, But No Reckoning (NYT)

By Najmaldin Karim

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

MY personal battle with Saddam Hussein — which began in 1972 when I abandoned my medical career in Mosul, Iraq, and joined the Kurdish armed resistance — is at an end. To execute such a criminal, a man who reveled in his atrocities, is an act of justice.

The only issue for me is the timing — executing him now is both too late and too early. Too late, because had Saddam Hussein been removed from the scene many years ago, many lives would have been saved.

Killing Saddam now, however, for ordering the massacre at Dujail in 1982, means that he will not face justice for his greatest crimes: the so-called Anfal campaign against the Kurds in the late 1980s, the genocidal assault on the Marsh Arabs in the 1990s, and the slaughtering of the Shiite Arabs and Kurds who rose up against him, with American encouragement, in 1991.

The sight of a tyrant held to account, if only briefly, has been an important precedent for the Middle East. The shabby diplomacy that has allowed dictators to thrive is now discredited.

Sadly, however, we have not had full justice. Saddam Hussein did not confront the full horror of his crimes. Building on previous initiatives by Arab nationalist governments to persecute the Kurds, he turned ethnic engineering and murder into an industry in the 1970s. Hundreds of thousands were evicted from their homes and murdered. Swaths of Kurdish countryside were emptied of their population, men, women and children taken to shallow graves and shot.

DOJ_NMG_0111653

Initially, the United States backed those of us who took to the hills to save our lives and freedom, but in 1975 (and here is an irony) Gerald Ford agreed to stop financing us in order to settle a border dispute between Iraq and Iran. As so many times since, human rights were no match for a desire to keep the oil flowing.

During the 1980s, entire towns, including Qala Diza in Iraqi Kurdistan and Qasr-i-Shirin in neighboring Iranian Kurdistan, were destroyed. To ensure that survivors would never return to their homes, the mountains were laced with land mines. The widows and children were detained in settlements lacking fresh water and sewage disposal; these were called "mujammat" in Arabic, which translates, with all the dreadful implications, as "concentration areas."

While I escaped to America, my family was not so lucky. My brother-in-law and nephew were summarily executed. They never had anything remotely approaching a fair trial, never got to write a will, never got to say goodbye to my sister.

Saddam Hussein's trial shed new light on these tragic years. Documents came to light revealing that his regime coordinated with Turkey in its efforts to isolate Kurdish villages in 1988, in which he used chemical weapons. This should lead to some important soul searching in Turkey.

But the failure to put Saddam Hussein on trial for the Anfal offensive itself will cheat us of learning the full details — of investigating whether the Turks suppressed evidence of Iraq's use of chemical weapons by preventing foreign doctors from seeing Kurdish refugees; of knowing the extent to which Saudi Arabia and Egypt may have aided Saddam Hussein's weapons production.

Kurds aren't the only ones who will be cheated out of full reckoning. In 1991, as we all know, the retreating Iraqi army massacred Shiite Arabs as well as Kurds who had heeded President George H. W. Bush's call to overthrow the Baathist regime. According to the 2004 report of the Iraq Survey Group, the dictator used chemical weapons against Shiite Arab civilians in 1991. Without putting Saddam Hussein on trial for these offenses, or for his campaigns against the Marsh Arabs of the south, will we ever know what really happened?

For all the mistakes that the United States has made in Iraq — and I feel the betrayal of 1975 was the worst — I am a proud (naturalized) American because this country brought the murderous despot to trial. Still, it is a great shame that he will not be held accountable for all of his crimes, and a far greater tragedy that he was allowed, sometimes with American complicity, to commit them in the first place.

U.S. Forces Ready For More Iraq Violence (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor,

AP, December 30, 2006

The Pentagon said Friday that U.S. forces in Iraq are ready for any escalation of violence associated with the execution of former President Saddam Hussein. Saddam was hanged Friday night, Iraqi state-run television reported.

"U.S. forces in Iraq are obviously at a high state of alert anytime because of the environment that they operate in and because of the current security situation," Defense Department spokesman Bryan Whitman said Friday, hours before Saddam was hanged.

U.S. forces will take into account "social dimensions that could potentially led to an increase in violence, which certainly would include carrying out the sentence of Saddam Hussein," Whitman said.

Closer to home, Americans were warned to be vigilant about the possibility of a terror attack. But an advisory that the FBI and the Homeland Security Department sent to local law enforcement agencies and intelligence community figures on Friday was routine and did not cite a specific threat.

Saddam has been in U.S. custody since he was captured in December 2003. As his execution drew near, Saddam's lawyers filed an appeal trying to stave it off.

However, U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, who heard arguments from attorneys by phone, rejected the challenge Friday night. She said U.S. courts do not have jurisdiction to interfere in another country's judicial process.

In a 21-page request filed Friday, Saddam's attorneys argued that because Saddam also faces a civil lawsuit in Washington, he has rights as a civil defendant that would be violated if he is executed. He has not received notice of those rights and the consequences that the lawsuit would have on his estate, his attorneys said.

DOJ_NMG_0111654

"To protect those rights, defendant Saddam Hussein requests an order of this court providing a stay of his execution until further notice of this court," attorney Nicholas Gilman wrote.

A similar request by the former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamed al-Bandar, was denied Thursday — as was an appeal of that decision. Al-Bandar also faces execution. The Justice Department argued in that case that U.S. courts have no jurisdiction to interfere with the judicial process of another country.

The White House declined Friday to talk about the timing of Saddam's execution.

Deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel, talking to reporters from Crawford, Texas, where President Bush was vacationing, said the hanging of Saddam was a matter for the sovereign Iraqi government. Earlier, the White House said the appeals court decision to uphold the sentence marked an important milestone for the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law.

At the Pentagon, Whitman wouldn't comment on troop movements to strengthen security for the execution, but he said the commanders in Iraq have the ability to move forces as they deem appropriate based on conditions on the ground.

___

Associated Press Diplomatic Writer Barry Schweid and legal affairs reporter Matt Apuzzo contributed to this story.

Iraq Awash In A Multitude Of Warring Groups (UPI)

By Lawrence Sellin

UPI, December 30, 2006

If the situation in Iraq can be salvaged, it will not be done with troop surges alone or a single all-inclusive strategy applied uniformly across the country, but through the cumulative effect of a hundreds of tailored efforts, funded and executed bottom-up, city by city and region by region.

According to the U.S. Department of Defense's November 2006 Report to Congress,"Measuring Security and Stability in Iraq", programs for national reconciliation and disarmament are difficult to design and implement due to the presence of numerous illegal armed groups, whose personal loyalties to sub-national groups, such as tribe, sect, or political party, are often stronger than loyalty to Iraq as a nation-state and condone or maintain support for violent means as a source of political leverage.

This should come as a surprise to no one. More than three-quarters of the Iraqi population have ties to one of over a 100 tribes. With the current absence of strong central authority, the importance of local associations is amplified, acting as an alternative government by providing, not just cultural identity, but sometimes security and basic services

Even Saddam Hussein was required to make continuous adjustments in his power base, balancing the often competing interests of state tribalism, selected military and paramilitary organizations and Baath party ideology. The situation, where the United States now finds itself, is not unique, but a consequence of its destruction and not the rapid replacement of central authority.

Yet the influence of Iraqi tribalism and the need to balance or leverage the differences between sub-groups in the ongoing stability and counterinsurgency operations in Iraq may still be underestimated. It is the product of lazy thinking to simply pigeon-hole Iraqis as Shiite, Sunni or Kurd. It may also be dangerous thinking if a troop surge is used to challenge large sectarian armed groups on their own turf, like Mahdi Army. It may be better for the United States, when necessary, to operate along the political fault lines in Iraq or, simply put, divide and conquer.

In the December 2006 report, "Iraq's Sectarian and Ethnic Violence and the Evolving Insurgency", Anthony H. Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies states that there were 23 militias operated in Baghdad in the early fall and by mid-October militias in Baghdad were splintering into smaller, more radicalized cells. Even the large and exclusively Shiite Mahdi Army has a growing number of rogue elements operating outside of Moqtada al-Sadr's control.

Up until now the United States has largely fought the Iraq insurgency from the outside, rather than from the inside-out. That is, to become counterinsurgents inside the insurgency, controlling events rather than reacting to them. The United States needs to disrupt insurgent networks, sow confusion and disorder, and isolate them from the people and any outside basis of support. Doing nothing about locally-generated animosities or even leveraging them may be part of that equation.

DOJ_NMG_0111655

Inter-group rivalries that benefit American and Iraqi government goals is not without precedent. The Defense Department report identifies the types of political fault lines the United States needs to exploit. Such as:

"...attempts by al-Qaida in Iraq and affiliated Sunni extremists to intimidate the local population. These efforts provoked a backlash. Some tribal chiefs and Sunni Rejectionist leaders began localized efforts to retake control of their areas.

"In Diyala, and recently in Balad, the conflict between al-Qaida in Iraq and Jaysh al-Mahdi was a sectarian fight for power and influence.

"The conflict in Basrah, Amarah, and the south was characterized by tribal rivalry, increasing intra-Shi'a competition...."

It should be noted that over 75 percent of insurgent attacks occur in only four of Iraq's eighteen provinces with Anbar and Baghdad accounting for half of that total. That means the area of conflict is relatively well-defined.

Although the obstacles to stabilizing Iraq do not yet appear insurmountable, one should not underestimate the difficulties ahead, for the margin of error has significantly narrowed due to previous ineffective policies that have provided opportunities for the insurgents and prolonged the conflict.

Critical reconstruction efforts, the restoration of basic services, and the influx of private capital and economic growth have all been hindered by the lack of security. The resulting unemployment provides a fertile environment for militia recruiting, which is feeding the cycle of violence. A top-down effort is not the answer. Preventing corruption and political patronage and instituting proper managerial procedures at the Iraqi ministry level remains problematic. An alternative is giving primary authority to expert military-civilian interagency teams working with local authorities.

Success is possible only by providing lasting security to the Iraqi people, effective governance and economic development based on local needs and tradition, not imported notions of them. The task ahead will require a long, arduous, neighborhood by neighborhood effort. The question is whether or not the United States now has the political will and financial wherewithal to sustain it.

(Lawrence Sellin, Ph.D. is an Afghanistan veteran.)

Dec. The Deadliest Month For U.S. Troops (AP)

By Lauren Frayer

AP, December 30, 2006

Three more Marines and a soldier were killed in battle in Iraq, the military said Friday, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops with the toll reaching 108.

The Marines, all assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5, died Thursday of wounds from fighting in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said. The soldier was killed in Karmah Thursday by small arms fire, the military said. Separately, the family of another soldier said he died Wednesday in Texas of injuries suffered in Iraq.

Their deaths pushed the toll past the 105 U.S. service members killed in October. At least 2,997 members of the U.S. military have been killed since the Iraq war began in March 2003, according to an AP count. That count includes two soldiers the military has classified as Iraq casualties, but the AP has not confirmed as Iraq-related deaths.

Iraqis braced for possible violence as former dictator Saddam Hussein was executed for war crimes Saturday morning. Before the former Iraqi dictator was hanged, American and Iraqi officials expressed concern about the potential for a spike in unrest.

Friday's violence was not heavier than usual.

A suicide bomber killed at least nine people near a Shiite mosque in Baghdad, and 32 tortured bodies were found across the country.

American troops killed six people and destroyed a weapons cache in separate raids in Baghdad and northwest of the Iraqi capital, the U.S. military said. One of the raids targeted two buildings in the village of Thar Thar, where U.S. troops found 16 pounds of homemade explosives, two large bombs, a rocket-propelled grenade, suicide vests and multiple batteries, the military said.

Iraqi forces backed by U.S. troops entered a mosque southeast of Baghdad, capturing 13 suspects and confiscating weapons, the U.S. military also said.

DOJ_NMG_0111656

A suicide bomber wearing an explosives belt detonated himself near a Shiite mosque in Khalis, 50 miles north of Baghdad, killing nine people and wounding about a dozen, police said.

Twenty-two bodies showing signs of torture were found dumped on the streets of the Iraqi capital Friday, and 10 more were found in Baqouba northeast of Baghdad, police and morgue officials said.

December was shaping up to be one of the worst months for Iraqi civilian deaths since The Associated Press began keeping track in May 2005.

Through Thursday, at least 2,139 Iraqis have been killed in war- related or sectarian violence, an average rate of about 76 people a day, according to an AP count. That compares to at least 2,184 killed in November at an average of about 70 a day, the worst month for Iraqi civilians deaths since May 2005. In October, AP counted at least 1,216 civilians killed.

The AP count includes civilians, government officials and police and security forces, and is considered a minimum based on AP reporting. The actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported.

Also Friday, gunmen killed two oil company employees in Mosul, 225 miles northwest of Baghdad, police said. A civilian was shot dead near his home in another attack in the same area.

Two more civilians and a policeman died in separate attacks in Musayyib, about 40 miles south of Baghdad, police said.

A round of mortar shells slammed into al-Maidan square in central Baghdad, wounding 10 people and damaging shops and buildings in the area, a police officer at Rissafa police station said on condition of anonymity out of security concerns.

A roadside bomb wounded three civilians in Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, police said.

U.S. Toll In Dec. Is Highest Of '06 (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 29 -- Three more Marines were killed in battle in Iraq, the military said Friday, making December the year's deadliest month for U.S. troops, with the toll reaching 106.

The Marines, all assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5, died Thursday of wounds from fighting in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said. Their deaths pushed the toll past the 105 U.S. service members killed in October.

In violence Friday, a suicide bomber killed at least nine people near a Shiite mosque in Baghdad, and 32 tortured bodies were found across the country.

Monthly U.S. Toll In Iraq At 2-year High (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD — The monthly death toll for U.S. service members in Iraq hit a two-year high Friday.

Three Marines assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 were fatally wounded while fighting insurgents in Al Anbar province, bringing the December figure to 107, the military said. That is the highest monthly tally since January 2005, according to the website icasualties.org.

Forty-seven of the deaths occurred in Al Anbar, a western province that is a haven for Sunni Arab insurgents. The Baghdad area was next in number of deaths.

More than half the fatalities in December occurred during attacks involving improvised explosive devices, the website reported.

The remaining troops were killed by gunfire, mortar rounds, rocket-propelled grenades and in vehicle accidents, including a helicopter crash. Two servicemen died of illness.

The Marine deaths reported Friday brought the number of U.S. military fatalities in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion to 2,996, icasualties.org said, with 816 of them occurring this year. Last year, 846 American service members died; in 2004, the figure was 848.

The number of U.S. wounded is also down this year — 5,676 compared with 5,947 in 2005 and 8,001 in 2004.

Meanwhile, U.S. military officials said they had released the last two of five Iranian nationals detained by U.S. troops in raids Dec. 20-21 in Baghdad's central Jadriya neighborhood, according to Iraqi officials.

DOJ_NMG_0111657

When the two Iranians were taken into custody, they were at the office of Hadi Amiri, leader of the Badr Brigade Shiite militia, the Iraqi officials said.

The office is in the compound of Abdelaziz Hakim, who leads the Badr-affiliated Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

In the raid, the military seized documents, maps, photographs and videos linking the two Iranians to illegal weapons shipments to armed groups in Iraq, Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said this week.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said the two Iranians had diplomatic passports and therefore were entitled to immunity.

Iraqi officials said they would work with Iran to create better accountability for diplomatic visitors.

Zebari said the three other Iranians had been apprehended while driving from a mosque service.

Zebari said they were released two days ago and returned to work at the Iranian Embassy.

Army Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said the incidents were under investigation.

In Diyala province on Friday, a suicide bomber outside a Shiite mosque killed 10 people, including Sheik Kadhim Bayati.

Around Kirkuk, gunmen killed four Iraqi soldiers at a checkpoint about 40 miles south of the northern oil hub; U.S. military officials said troops killed a suspected insurgent in the area with "precision-guided munition"; and a roadside bomb killed two civilians in north Kirkuk.

Also, the body of a policeman was found about 40 miles southwest of the city, Iraqi officials said.

In Baghdad, U.S. troops killed six alleged insurgents in separate military operations, and in one operation they destroyed two buildings reportedly being used to produce improvised explosives, U.S. military officials said.

In the southern province of Babil, gunmen killed a police officer and two civilians, Iraqi authorities said.

Pentagon Maps Plans For Iraq Surge (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 30, 2006

Extending U.S. military units already in Iraq and moving troops from other locations, including Kuwait, are among options Pentagon planners are looking at if President Bush calls for an increase in troops on the battlefront.

Military planners are reviewing the status of various units to determine which ones would be available to either go into Iraq or stay longer if needed, according to Pentagon officials.

Bush is expected to announce a new strategy in his Iraq policy early next year, and one of the key elements under discussion is a short-term surge in troops.

The most immediate and likely move would be to shift the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division from Kuwait — where it is expected to deploy early next month — into Iraq, said the officials, who requested anonymity because no decisions have been made.

That brigade is being sent to Kuwait to serve as the reserve force, and military commanders have routinely moved the reserve force into Iraq when needed. A typical brigade is about 3,500 soldiers, and moving them in would give an instant boost of troops.

Several officials said military planners have been working on an array of options, but no one will know what units could be affected until the president decides how many troops he needs and how quickly they have to be in Iraq.

Another much-discussed option would be extending Marine units already in Iraq. Currently the 5th and 7th Regimental Combat Teams are serving in Western Iraq. Both are scheduled to move out early next year, but could be ordered to stay longer. Each regimental team has about 7,000 Marines.

The Army's 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division is scheduled to come home early next year, and that Army unit already has been extended for about 45 days. It probably would not be extended again, the officials said.

Several other Army brigades are scheduled to deploy to Iraq for the normal rotation of units to the battlefront and some of those could be moved in more quickly if needed, although some were in Iraq less than a year ago. The Pentagon has tried not to send any units back before they have had a year home.

DOJ_NMG_0111658

A surge in troops would probably be coupled with other political and economic changes.

While in Iraq last week, Defense Secretary Robert Gates talked about the importance of rebuilding neighborhoods and other Iraqi facilities more quickly in regions that had been cleared by troops and deemed secure.

Creating short-term jobs programs, offering micro business loans to Iraqis and reopening existing factories are among the ideas being discussed by reconstruction experts, but it's unclear which ideas Bush is embracing.

Frederick Barton, who co-directs the Center for Strategic and International Studies' post-conflict reconstruction project, said jobs programs have worked after past conflicts, but that they often are not matched with the needs of the people, creating a short-term positive effect but little civic pride. He said micro loans also work but might not be effective unless stability can be achieved in Iraq.

"The best economic step that they could take is to push the Iraqi government to produce a wealth-sharing agreement on oil," Barton said. "That would, by far, be the biggest contribution."

___

On the Net:

Defense Department: http://www.defenselink.mil

Pentagon To Request Billions More In War Money (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 29 — The Pentagon is seeking nearly $100 billion for operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, a request that, if approved by Congress, would set an annual record for war-related spending.

The $99.7 billion request, detailed in a 17-page internal Defense Department memorandum dated Dec. 7, would be in addition to $70 billion appropriated in September. The request would push the total for the 2007 fiscal year to nearly $170 billion, 45 percent more than Congress provided for 2006.

The request is likely to receive more scrutiny from Congress next year than previous supplemental spending bills, in part because Democrats now control both the House and Senate. Another reason for the scrutiny is that Pentagon officials encouraged the services to ask for “costs related to the longer war against terror,” not just continuing operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to a memorandum that became public earlier this year.

About $50 billion — most of the money — would go to the Army, which is conducting the bulk of the operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. The request also includes $3.8 billion for the Air Force and $3 billion for the Navy to buy or upgrade aircraft. Both services have argued in recent months that they need to replace planes used in combat operations.

But some experts questioned whether the services were exploiting the must-pass nature of the supplemental bill to seek money for other purposes like the modernization of aircraft rather than just wartime replacements. Loren Thompson, a defense analyst with the Lexington Institute, a policy analysis organization in Virginia, pointed to the Air Force request for $62 million for ballistic missiles, a weapon not being employed in Iraq or Afghanistan.

Mr. Thompson said the request, which is not described further in the memorandum, may be part of a continuing Air Force project to arm ballistic missiles with conventional warheads to be able to strike terrorist targets quickly if other weapons cannot be used.

Even so, he added, “there are a number of weapons systems in the supplemental request not normally associated with fighting terrorists but which the services say still should be covered as part of the global effort.”

Altogether, the four military services would receive $26.6 billion for “reconstitution,” a term that the memorandum said covered repair and replacement of equipment damaged in Iraq and Afghanistan. Along with the $50 billion already provided this year, that is more than double what Congress appropriated in 2006.

“There is a real question about how much of this is really related to the war,” said Steve Kosiak, a defense budget expert with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a Washington policy analysis group.

DOJ_NMG_0111659

The Pentagon is also seeking $9.7 billion for training Iraqi and Afghan security forces, almost as much as has been spent in total since 2001, according to a study by the Congressional Research Service. In a reflection of the worsening security situation in Afghanistan, more than half of the requested money would go to training the country's army and police forces.

The request also underscores the continuing strain that deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan are putting on ground forces. The request includes $3.7 billion to speed up its outfitting and training of two Army combat brigades and three Marine battalions.

Since 2001, Congress has approved $507 billion for Afghanistan, Iraq and other operations deemed part of combating terrorism. Even with the Democrats in control, there is unlikely to be much appetite for cutting the war-related spending requests, Mr. Kosiak said.

"No one seems to be saying we're going to make deep cuts in war-related expenditures," he said. "I don't see evidence that the Democrats are interested in cutting this."

But the incoming Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Budget Committees have said they will push the Bush administration to finance war costs in regular appropriations bills, not in supplemental spending measures, to make the costs clearer.

The request also includes $10 billion for protective equipment for troops and $2.5 billion for technology to defeat improvised bombs, the leading cause of American combat casualties in Iraq.

DOD Lacks Personnel To Oversee Contractors (UPI)

United Press International, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 29 (UPI) -- The Defense Department has created a new office to oversee major service contracts.

The office will monitor contracts such as the $15 billion Halliburton one in Iraq.

The news is contained in a Dec. 18 Government Accountability Office report.

The Pentagon has set up the office of the assistant deputy undersecretary of defense for program support to have primary responsibility for issues related to contractor support.

The Defense Department has more than 60,000 support contractors in Iraq but no accurate tally of how many and where they are, according to the report.

"By way of contrast, an estimated 9,200 contractor personnel supported military operations in the 1991 Gulf War," the report states.

The Pentagon increasingly relies on contractors to perform non-military functions in combat zones, a function of both budget restraints and the conviction that private companies can do the work more efficiently and free up uniformed personnel for combat roles.

However, the downsized military also lacks the personnel to oversee the contractors.

"The Army estimates that because of their limited visibility over contractors at deployed locations and the government services they are entitled to, about $43 million is lost every year on free meals being provided to contractor employees who are also receiving a per diem allowance for food," the report states.

Military officials assigned to oversee contractor support in Iraq are too few to ensure contract requirements are being met, the report states.

The logistics task order contract awarded to Halliburton subsidiary KBR for food and living services in Iraq in 2003 has cost more than $15.4 billion so far, according to the GAO.

U.S. And Iraq Dispute Role Of Iranians But Free Them (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise, James Glanz

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 29 — Under heavy American pressure, the Iraqi government ordered two Iranians who had been detained in an American military raid to leave the country, Iraqi officials said Friday, ending a bitter, nine-day political standoff.

The detention brought the increasingly strained relationship between the Iraqis who run this country and their American backers to one of its lowest ebbs.

DOJ_NMG_0111660

The Americans had insisted that the Iranians had been running guns and planning sectarian attacks and had pressed the Iraqis to expel them as intruders.

Iraqi officials said Friday that it was clear that the men, who were not publicly identified but were described as Iranian military officials by the Bush administration, had not been entirely forthcoming about what they were doing in Iraq.

Even so, the Iraqis said they believed that the evidence against the men was mostly circumstantial and not as damning as the Americans had portrayed. For that reason, the Iraqis said, the government decided to release them.

"There was some suspicions on their activities, but not in a red-handed way," Hoshyar Zebari, the Iraqi foreign minister, said in an interview. Still, he conceded, "the things they were doing were not consistent with their mission."

While the outcome was constructed to satisfy all sides, the episode, which began with an Iranian Embassy Mercedes being pulled over and led to a raid on the compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, a powerful Shiite leader, deeply upset many Iraqi officials, who had been carefully building relations with Iran.

Mr. Zebari said that the men were visitors, not accredited diplomats as some officials had initially asserted, but that they had entered the country legally. It remained unclear on Friday night whether they had come at the invitation of Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani. A spokesman has said the invitation was been extended during a visit to Tehran by Mr. Talabani this month.

The men were released from American custody sometime Friday morning, after days of backroom negotiations among the Americans, the Iranians and the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. Then they were driven overland into Iran shortly before noon, the Foreign Ministry said in a statement that appeared carefully worded so as not to offend this country's powerful neighbor.

The events demonstrated the deepening fissures between the Shiite-led Iraqi government and the United States. The government has been pressing for months for more autonomy from the Americans, asking for more control over its army and decision-making in the capital. The detention was a painful reminder of how little control Iraqis have over their own affairs.

"This is hurting what we call the Iraqi sovereignty," said one government official who had traveled to Tehran to help handle the diplomatic fallout. Iranian officials "have a question whether Iraq is a real sovereign country or not. This is a natural question."

An official in the Iranian Embassy confirmed the release, and echoed concerns expressed by some Iraqi officials earlier this week that the arrest seemed politically motivated. The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Saturday imposing mild sanctions on Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment, two days after the raid in Baghdad.

"It's a message from this American administration to the Iraqi government," said the official, who did not give his name because he is not authorized to speak to the news media. "It says you can't build any relationship with any country without our approval."

The Bush administration has rejected pressure to open talks with Iran about that country's action in Iraq, and some Iraqi officials said Friday that the raid had a political tinge.

"We get delegates from Turkey and Syria, but when we have delegates from Iran, this is what happens," the government official said.

The official said the men were released in good health. He said the release was evidence that the suspicions against them were groundless.

The American military has said it has detailed evidence collected in the raid that linked the Iranians to illicit weapons shipments to Shiite militia groups, and to attacks on American and Iraqi forces. The Americans declined comment on why they went along with the deal.

Whatever the case, the behind-the-scenes discussions were intense. An Iraqi politician familiar with the case said the Americans had been trying to get the Iraqis to expel the men and declare them persona non grata.

But the Iraqis pushed back. They agreed to release a statement that condemned interference by neighboring countries in general, but stopped short of capitulating fully to American wishes and declaring the men intruders.

The delicately worded statement said the government "emphasizes to Iraqi neighboring countries the necessity of respecting the independence of Iraq."

But it added that Iraq wants "to continue good relations with its neighbor Iran and hopes that such incidents will not be repeated in the future, which may disturb these relations."

DOJ_NMG_0111661

American officials have long asserted that Iran is sending weapons and money into Iraq to fuel violence here, but the episode last week was the first one in which they made such high-level arrests. A number of Iranians have been arrested here but most entered the country illegally and none had been directly tied to the government.

The American military did not publicly present the evidence it said was found in the raid. Some of it was believed to have included receipts for sniper rifles and sophisticated bombs as well as maps of Baghdad identifying neighborhoods as Sunni, Shiite or mixed — the primary preoccupation of militias in Iraq's deepening sectarian war.

But the Iraqis said that the arrest had been more of a blunder and that if the suspected crimes had been serious, the Americans would never have released them.

The politician said that the men were supposed to be let go on Thursday morning, but that the release had been delayed over the American insistence on declaring the men intruders. "There was nothing to hold them on," the Iraqi politician familiar with the case said. "It speaks to the general confusion."

American officials have released people its military ground commanders believe have committed crimes. This fall, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. intervened in the arrest of a sheik from the northern neighborhood of Shuala. The military believed that the man, known as Sheik Mazin, was involved in death squads and kidnapping rings. But he was a close ally of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who exerts vast influence over the Iraqi government, and General Casey said later that the political gain from releasing him outweighed the military loss.

General Casey, as well as other senior American and Iraqi officials, took part in negotiating the terms of the release of the Iranians, Iraqis said.

Iraq Expels 2 Iranians Detained By U.S. (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan, Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 29 -- Two senior Iranian operatives who were detained by U.S. forces in Iraq and were strongly suspected of planning attacks against American military forces and Iraqi targets were expelled to Iran on Friday, according to U.S. and Iraqi officials.

The decision to free the men was made by the Iraqi government and has angered U.S. military officials who say the operatives were seeking to foment instability here.

"These are really serious people," said one U.S. defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity. "They were the target of a very focused raid based on intelligence, and it would be hard for one to believe that their activities weren't endorsed by the Iranian government. It's a situation that is obviously troubling."

One of the commanders, identified by officials simply as Chizari, was the third-highest-ranking official of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards' al-Quds Brigade, the unit most active in aiding, arming and training groups outside Iran, including Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, U.S. officials said. The other commander was described as equally significant to Iran's support of foreign militaries but not as high-ranking.

American military forces nabbed the two men in raids last week. Their capture, U.S. officials said, represents the strongest evidence yet that Tehran's Shiite theocracy is meddling in Iraq's affairs and strengthening its relationship with the government in Baghdad.

U.S. defense officials familiar with the raids said the captured Iranians had detailed weapons lists, documents pertaining to shipments of weapons into Iraq, organizational charts, telephone records and maps, among other sensitive intelligence information. Officials were particularly concerned by the fact that the Iranians had information about importing modern, specially shaped explosive charges into Iraq, weapons that have been used in roadside bombs to target U.S. military armored vehicles.

Shaped charges focus the energy of a blast, allowing shrapnel to burst through vehicles, sometimes even if they are heavily armored. U.S. military officials have long said they believed Iran was responsible for sending such weapons -- along with others, such as advanced sniper rifles -- into Iraq to help insurgents and militia groups.

"The evidence shows that they were exactly up to the things our suspicions indicated," said one U.S. defense official.

DOJ_NMG_0111662

Adding to the political sensitivity of the situation, the two men were detained while inside the compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, one of the most powerful Shiite leaders in Iraq. The Bush administration is hoping Hakim can build a moderate coalition of Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish parties that can bring national reconciliation to a fractured Iraq.

The Iraqi government decided to honor Tehran's claims that the two detainees had diplomatic immunity. U.S. officials had argued that although the men had diplomatic passports, they were operating under aliases and therefore not immune.

Despite their frustration at the release of the Iranians, U.S. officials said a strong message has been sent to Iran that its operatives will be tracked down and that it will be held accountable for its activities in Iraq.

"Iranians have been pushing the envelope in Iraq and elsewhere, and it's a good thing they learn there are consequences," a U.S. official said, on condition of anonymity.

U.S. officials said they now had a treasure trove of data from computers and documents and the lists of weaponry recently shipped to Iraq.

"The materials they had will factor into additional planning for operations and will likely be very helpful," said a U.S. defense official. "But with weapons and advanced IEDs [improvised explosive devices] coming into the country, we've identified a major problem."

In a raid last week, U.S. forces stopped a vehicle in central Baghdad and detained three Iranians and one Iraqi, said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq. Those detained had legitimate diplomatic credentials and were released.

In a second raid, U.S. forces entered Hakim's compound and detained 10 men, including Chizari and the other al-Quds commander. The eight other men were Iraqis, U.S. officials said.

According to a Bush administration official, Chizari or the other commander gave up his identity when talking to the Americans. The U.S. forces apparently were not aware whom they had caught, the official said.

Although the men were captured in Hakim's compound, U.S. officials said Hakim cooperated with the American military operation.

The raids deeply angered officials in the Iraqi government, which is hoping that building ties with Iran could help stem the violence in Iraq. They set in motion a flurry of diplomatic moves to secure the release of the two men.

"The story the Americans said is not true," said Sami al-Askari, a member of parliament and a close adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "They said these were military men with diplomatic status. But they failed to prove anything."

"Iraq is trying to have a solid relationship with its neighbors."

Iran has been providing arms and aid to the two largest Shiite political parties, Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) and the Dawa party, as well as renegade leader Moqtada al-Sadr and Shiite militias, U.S. officials say. The officials are sorting through the evidence to link the material and intelligence to attacks on U.S. forces. SCIRI and Dawa politicians have said Iran does not back them now.

Last month, Hakim met with President Bush and other administration officials. He said that his Badr Organization militia, which was formed in Iran, no longer operated as an independent militia and that SCIRI no longer received military aid from Iran.

Some U.S. officials on Friday saw the decision by Iraq to expel the two men as a positive development that reflected Iraq's independence.

More Troops Unhappy With Bush's Course In Iraq, Poll Finds (USAT)

By Robert Hodierne, Military Times

USA Today, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — The American military, once a staunch supporter of President Bush and the Iraq war, has grown increasingly pessimistic about chances for victory.

For the first time, more troops disapprove of the president's handling of the war than approve of it, according to the 2006 Military Times Poll.

When the military was feeling most optimistic about the war — in 2004 — 83% of poll respondents thought success in Iraq was likely. This year, that number has shrunk to 50%.

DOJ_NMG_0111663

Only 35% of the military members polled this year said they approve of the way Bush is handling the war, and 42% said they disapprove. While approval of the president's war leadership has slumped, his overall approval remains high among the military.

Just as telling, in this year's poll only 41% of the military said the U.S. should have gone to war in Iraq in the first place, down from 65% in 2003. That closely reflects the beliefs of the general population — 45% agreed in a recent USA TODAY-Gallup poll.

IRAQ WAR: U.S. more pessimistic

Professor David Segal, director of the Center for Research on Military Organization at the University of Maryland, was not surprised by the changing attitude within the military.

"They're seeing more casualties and fatalities and less progress," Segal said. "Part of what we're seeing is a recognition that the intelligence that led to the war was wrong."

The survey, conducted by mail Nov. 13 through Dec. 22, is the fourth annual gauge of active-duty military subscribers to the Military Times newspapers. The results are not representative of the military as a whole. The survey's respondents, 945 this year, are on average older, more experienced, more likely to be officers and more career-oriented than the overall military population.

The poll's margin of error is plus or minus three percentage points.

Among the respondents, 66% have deployed at least once to Iraq or Afghanistan. That number is 72% in the overall active-duty force, according to the Department of Defense.

The poll has come to be viewed by some as a barometer of the professional career military. It is the only independent poll done on an annual basis.

Segal said he believes that military opinion often mirrors that of the civilian population, even though it might lag in time. He also said the military "will always be more pro-military and pro-war than the civilians. That's why they are in this line of work."

Whatever war plan the president announces next month, its ultimate goal likely will be to replace American troops with Iraqis. The military is not optimistic that will happen soon.

Only about one in five service members said large numbers of American troops can be replaced with Iraqi troops within the next two years. More than one-third think it will take more than five years. And more than half think the U.S. will have to stay in Iraq more than five years to achieve its goals.

Almost half of those responding think the United States needs more troops in Iraq. A surprising 13% said the U.S. should have no troops there.

As for Afghanistan force levels, 39% think we need more troops there. But while they want more troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, nearly three-quarters of the respondents think the military is stretched too thin to be effective.

Approval for Bush's overall performance as president remains high, at 52%. That's down from his high of 71% in 2004, but still far above the approval ratings of the general population, where that number has fallen into the 30s.

We Can't Ignore Iraq's Refugees (WP)

By Edward M. Kennedy

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

With the nation still at war in Iraq, each of us is deeply grateful to the brave men and women in our armed forces who celebrated the holidays this year with half their hearts at home and half in Iraq. But this year especially it is essential that we also reflect on another human cost of the war -- the hundreds of thousands of innocent Iraqi men, women and children who have fled their homes and often their country to escape the violence of a nation increasingly at war with itself.

The refugees are witnesses to the cruelty that stains our age, and they cannot be overlooked. America bears heavy responsibility for their plight. We have a clear obligation to stop ignoring it and help chart a sensible course to ease the refugee crisis. Time is not on our side. We must act quickly and effectively.

Today, within Iraq, 1.6 million people have already fled or been expelled from their homes. An additional 1.8 million, fleeing sectarian violence, kidnappings, extortion, death threats and carnage, have sought refuge in neighboring countries. At least 700,000 are in Jordan, 600,000 in Syria, 100,000 in Egypt, 54,000 in Iran and 20,000 in Lebanon. Typically they are not living in refugee camps but have relocated in urban areas, where they must draw on their own meager resources to pay for food and shelter, and must depend on the good graces of the host governments.

DOJ_NMG_0111664

The neighboring countries, in turn, are under enormous financial stress from the rapidly increasing needs of the refugees. In Jordan, they now make up more than 10 percent of the population -- the equivalent of 30 million people flooding America's shores. These countries are increasingly unable to meet the refugees' basic needs.

Borders are being closed to more and more of these men, women and children, with the result that many who are most in need or in danger are trapped in the Iraqi caldron of violence. As it continues to boil, the humanitarian crisis will only worsen.

The recent report of the Iraq Study Group rightly concluded that if this refugee situation "is not addressed, Iraq and the region could be further destabilized, and the humanitarian suffering could be severe." Sadly, as with so many other aspects of the Iraq war -- from the growing threat of the insurgency to the need to provide adequate armor for our troops -- the administration has failed to recognize the breadth of the crisis and to adjust our policy to address the plain facts on the ground.

There is an overwhelming need for temporary relief and permanent resettlement. Last year, however, America accepted only 202 Iraqi refugees, and next year we plan to accept approximately the same number. We and other nations of the world need to do far better.

Thousands of these refugees are fleeing because they have been affiliated in some way with the United States. Cooks, drivers and translators have been called traitors for cooperating with the United States. They know all too well that the fate of those who work with U.S. civilians or military forces can be sudden death. Yet, beyond a congressionally mandated program that accepts 50 Iraqi translators from Iraq and Afghanistan each year, the administration has done nothing to resettle brave Iraqis who provided assistance in some way to our military. This lack of conscience is fundamentally unfair. We need to do much more to help Iraqi refugees, especially those who have helped our troops.

Our nation is spending $8 billion a month to wage the war in Iraq. Yet to meet the urgent humanitarian needs of the refugees who have fled the war, the State Department plans to spend only $20 million in the current fiscal year.

America needs to lead, but we cannot adequately respond to this overwhelming crisis alone. Because of the magnitude of the problem, we also need action by Iraq's neighbors and the rest of the world. An essential first step could be to hold an international conference on the issue -- ideally sponsored by the countries in the region and the United Nations -- to begin to deal with the growing number and needs of Iraqi refugees and internally displaced persons. The United States should participate in the conference and provide substantial support for the refugees. Doing so would encourage other nations to address the crisis, help the refugees and displaced persons, and assist the countries shouldering the greatest burden.

Working with Iraq's neighbors and the United Nations, we can encourage rapid action to relieve suffering and save lives. And a productive conference could lead in turn to broader discussions and greater progress on the future of Iraq.

Clearly, in the long term we need to work together to find a way to end the violence and stop the hemorrhaging of lives. In the short term, America needs to respond far more effectively to the needs of the millions of refugees and displaced persons who are suffering so much from the war. Failure to act quickly and cooperatively with other nations will only result in more carnage, chaos and instability in the region.

The writer is a Democratic senator from Massachusetts and incoming chairman of the Senate immigration, border security and refugee subcommittee.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jobs Helped Pick 'Favorable' Dates For Option Grants (WSJ)

By Nick Wingfield, Steve Stecklow And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, December 30, 2006

Apple Report Clears the CEO Of Wrongdoing, Blames Ex-Executives in Backdating

Apple Computer Inc. acknowledged that it backdated stock options and that Steve Jobs recommended "favorable" dates for some options awards. But the company said he was absolved of misconduct by a special internal investigation.

FOCUS ON JOBS

Apple's filings this morning reveal details of the company's options probe. Some excerpts:

On options dating:

Although the investigation found that CEO Steve Jobs was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates, he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications. The Special Committee also found that the investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants. Read more1.

On Jobs's October 2001 grant:

The approval for the grant was improperly recorded as occurring at a special Board meeting on October 19, 2001. Such a special Board meeting did not occur. There was no evidence, however, that any current member of management was aware of this irregularity. Read more2.

Directors and others close to the Apple probe defended Mr. Jobs, the company's iconic chief executive, even as it detailed his part in a widespread pattern of options irregularities between 1997 and 2002. But Mr. Jobs and Apple, still under federal scrutiny as part of a broad investigation of options backdating, are not yet out of the woods.

Some options and corporate-governance experts said yesterday that they couldn't reconcile Apple's statements defending Mr. Jobs with the facts the company disclosed, and called on the company to seek recovery from him for a giant grant he received that the company yesterday acknowledged was backdated.

Apple has previously said that two of its former executives were responsible for improper options-granting practices, without identifying the pair. Yesterday, people familiar with the matter said the internal investigation had raised questions about Nancy Heinen, Apple's former general counsel and board secretary, and Fred Anderson, a former chief financial officer and board member. Attorneys for both former Apple executives deny their clients did anything wrong.

An option gives its holder the right to buy a stock at a fixed, or exercise price, usually for up to 10 years after the date of the grant. By backdating the exercise price -- or pretending it was granted on a date before the award was made -- the employee gets an instant boost to the possible profits from the award. The practice can violate securities laws and accounting rules. The U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco and the Securities and Exchange Commission are examining Apple's options practices.

FURTHER READING

• Law Blog: Roundup of iLawsuits3

• Jobs Knew About Options Backdating4

10/05/06

• Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny5

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage6

The disclosure yesterday by Apple in filings with the SEC said that 6,428 grants of options at Apple on 42 dates between 1997 and 2002 were improperly dated, resulting in charges to earnings for those years. Apple restated its financial results between 1998 and 2006 to recognize a new after-tax, noncash expense of $84 million in connection with the improperly dated options. (See details of Apple's filings.7)

Since these charges -- essentially, previously unreported compensation to employees -- generally are only mandated in case of backdating, the restatement represents an acknowledgement that grants were backdated on a large scale.

Since Apple first disclosed in June that it had discovered irregularities with past option grants, the key question has been whether the investigation would jeopardize the position of Mr. Jobs, the co-founder of Apple who is widely credited with reviving the company in the late 1990s and turning it once again into an arbiter of popular technologies with products such as the iPod portable music device. Investors interpreted Apple's latest disclosures and the board's support for Mr. Jobs as a sign that his status at the company is secure, sending its shares up 5% to $84.84.

Mr. Jobs could come under further scrutiny because of a series of fortunately timed option grants when he was chairman at Pixar Animation Studios that are also being probed by federal investigators. As chairman during the time when favorably priced options were granted, Mr. Jobs was also effectively in charge of administering options plans, since the full board performed the functions of a compensation committee year after year.

Pixar granted options to executives at the lowest closing prices of 1997, 1998, 2000 and 2003 -- a highly improbable pattern. Mr. Jobs wasn't among the executives who received options. Walt Disney Co., which subsequently bought Pixar, said in November that its board, on which Mr. Jobs sits, was conducting an independent review of Pixar's option grants after inquiries from the SEC and Department of Justice.

DOJ_NMG_0111666

Former Vice President Al Gore and Jerome York, two of the three Apple directors who oversaw the internal probe, said in a statement that the board "is confident that the company has corrected the problems" that led to the options irregularities and that "it has complete confidence in Steve Jobs and the senior management team."

But David Yermack, a finance professor at New York University who has studied options issues, said he was perplexed about directors' expressions of confidence in Mr. Jobs. "They have pretty much admitted that he was directly involved in a fraud," Mr. Yermack said, pointing to Apple's statement that Mr. Jobs "recommended" the selection of favorable grant dates. "If he had directly participated in altering depreciation schedules, or booking revenue that wasn't yet earned, would they have full confidence in him?"

In response, Apple spokesman Steve Dowling said: "Following an exhaustive independent investigation, the special committee found no misconduct by Steve Jobs or any other current management. The board has expressed complete confidence in Steve and senior management."

The Cupertino, Calif., company is one of the highest-profile companies to be caught up in the probes over backdated stock options. To date, at least 130 U.S. corporations are under investigation for possible options backdating. Some have admitted to the practice, and more than 60 executives and directors of public companies have lost their jobs.

It remains unclear in which cases Mr. Jobs "recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates," as Apple's filing states. The company's internal probe, conducted by the law firm Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges, didn't find evidence that Mr. Jobs recommended backdating any of the options grants he received himself, according to people familiar with the matter. "To the extent it occurred, it was pretty limited," one person said. "These were episodic, limited, isolated."

Among the most potentially serious discoveries of the investigation, Apple said company records improperly showed that approval of a grant of 7.5 million options to Mr. Jobs on Oct. 19, 2001, occurred at a special meeting of its board of directors. The company's investigation found that the meeting didn't actually occur.

In its filing, Apple said the grant was "originally approved" at a board meeting on Aug. 29 at an exercise price of $17.83, before stock splits. But it said the terms of the grant weren't finalized until Dec. 18, a day when Apple's share closed at $21.01. The grant was then dated back to Oct. 19 with an exercise price of $18.30.

Apple in its statement said it was taking a $20 million charge, before taxes, related to this grant. But it echoed earlier defenses of Mr. Jobs, saying that "he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications."

But Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises on corporate governance, says that "clearly, there was a benefit from the options that Jobs received...There was some fruit from those options, and it's clear because there's a $20 million charge," says Mr. McGurn. In 2003, Mr. Jobs returned the 2001 options grant and another granted to him in 2000 for five million shares of restricted Apple stock then worth over $70 million. Mr. Jobs's restricted shares "generally vest in full" three years after the grant date, according to Apple filings.

"I can't understand why they're [the board] not recouping those shares," Mr. McGurn said, adding that the cloud hanging over Apple isn't cleared by the filing because "there's a risk though that some other body [of regulators or others] will reach a different conclusion about this matter based on exactly the same set of facts."

According to a person familiar with the internal investigation, Apple believes it has evidence that Ms. Heinen, as corporate secretary, was aware of improper documentation that said a board meeting occurred on Oct. 19. Cristina Arguedas, Ms. Heinen's attorney, couldn't be reached for comment following the Apple filing, but earlier this week said: "Nancy's reputation is rock-solid and long-standing as a person of high integrity and honesty. Rumors and innuendo to the contrary are without foundation."

As it had previously, Apple said yesterday that its "investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants." An Apple spokesman yesterday declined to confirm whether Mr. Anderson and Ms. Heinen are the two unnamed former officers.

DOJ_NMG_0111667

Apple may argue to federal investigators that as CFO, Mr. Anderson should have been responsible for proper accounting of the backdated options, according to a person familiar with the company's thinking. Mr. Anderson was CFO at Apple between 1996 and 2004.

Jerome Roth, an attorney for Mr. Anderson, who is now a partner at Silicon Valley private-equity firm Elevation Partners, said his client was "disappointed to learn that during part of his tenure" as CFO "the company apparently was not strictly complying with its processes for granting stock options. As CFO, Fred did not play any day-to-day role in the granting, reporting and accounting of stock options and he was not involved in any knowing manipulation of the process."

Federal prosecutors have already brought two criminal cases in the stock-options backdating scandal. In one case, the former CEO of Brocade Communications Systems Inc. was charged with fraud and accused of altering the dates of option grants to hundreds of employees and concealing millions of dollars in compensation expenses from shareholders. The executive, Gregory Reyes, who didn't receive any of the backdated grants himself, has denied any wrongdoing.

Apple believes the case against Mr. Reyes can't be compared to Mr. Jobs's involvement in the backdated options at Apple, according to a person familiar with the matter. "This is not the Reyes model by a long stretch of the imagination," the person said. "The government says Reyes systematically and routinely backdated options and knew the implications."

In 2003, Mr. Jobs canceled the 2001 option, along with a massive 2000 grant, and in exchange received five million shares of restricted stock (the figure is before adjustment for splits). An Apple spokesman wouldn't say how the company arrived at the five-million share figure.

Warren Miller, an analyst at Beckmill Research of Lexington, Va., which values options and other equity instruments, calculates that the 2001 option was worth about $76 million when it was exchanged in 2003, about $2 million higher than it would have been had it not been backdated. All told, Mr. Miller figures the two options together were worth about $200 million when they were swapped for restricted stock that Apple valued at $74.8 million.

Mr. Miller says executives typically prefer to receive restricted shares, and hence value them more, because there is less risk involved than there is with an option.

Frederick W. Lambert, a law professor and an expert in securities law at the University of California's Hastings law school in San Francisco, says Mr. Jobs will likely escape any criminal or civil charges stemming from this matter. "In proving a criminal case, it would have to be beyond a reasonable doubt, and intent would play an element in this." A lack of knowledge about accounting implications "would constitute some kind of defense here," Mr. Lambert says.

Aitan Goelman, a lawyer at Zuckerman Spaeder LLP in Washington, says prosecutors and regulators, flooded with backdating cases, have to triage and pick the most promising ones to pursue. For criminal fraud cases, he says, prosecutors need to establish that a defendant intentionally defrauded or deceived someone; the SEC, bringing civil charges, has a lower threshold. He says the apparently phony board records at Apple might well draw federal officials' scrutiny to the company or former executives.

-- Pui-Wing Tam contributed to this article.

Write to Nick Wingfield at nick.wingfield@wsj.com8, Steve Stecklow at steve.stecklow@wsj.com9 and Charles Forelle at charles.forelle@wsj.com10

Apple Reveals Jobs' Involvement (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, December 30, 2006

Steve Jobs personally recommended some instances of stock options backdating at Apple, the computer company revealed on Friday, though it continued to stand behind an earlier statement that it had found "no misconduct" by current executives over the affair.

Apple also appeared to back away from an earlier assertion that its chief executive had been unaware of the accounting failures that arose from the backdating, saying instead only that he did not "appreciate the accounting implications" at the time.

News that the Apple chief executive had been more directly involved in the options irregularities than previously disclosed came as the company admitted that a fictitious board meeting had supposedly approved some of Mr Jobs' own stock options in 2001. The affair, reported earlier this week in the FT, led to Mr Jobs receiving benefits worth $20m that were not disclosed at the time, Apple reported.

DOJ_NMG_0111668

Apple's shares bounced 4.9 per cent on Friday on relief that the company had not uncovered deeper problems.

Apple said it had understated its expenses in previous years by a total of $105m, reflecting 6,428 separate options grants made on 42 dates. Backdating involves setting the exercise price on stock options at an earlier date.

While Apple revealed in a regulatory filing in October that Mr Jobs had been aware of some of these cases, it amended that on Friday to say that he had been "aware or recommended the selection of some favourable grant dates".

Friday's statement that Mr Jobs did not "appreciate the accounting implications" of the options backdating, was also a change from its assertion in October that he was "unaware of the accounting implications". It added he did not "financially benefit" from backdated grants of which he was aware, a change from its earlier statement stating he did not "benefit".

Apple also detailed benefits that Mr Jobs received from backdating. A grant of 7.5m options, dated October 19 2001, was not finalised until December 18 of that year. In spite of that, approval for the grant was "improperly recorded as occurring at a special board meeting on October 19. Such a board meeting did not occur", it said.

However, Apple said that the option grant had originally been approved at a board meeting in August, when its share price had been lower. Apple continued to lay the blame on two unnamed former officers of the company.

A lawyer for Fred Anderson, a former chief financial officer who stepped down from Apple's board at the time of its October announcement, said his client "did not play any day to day role in the granting, reporting and accounting of stock options and he was not involved in any knowing manipulation of the process."

Apple Admits Wrongdoing But Rallies Around Leader (WP)

By Alan Sipress And Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

Apple Computer disclosed yesterday that it had falsified approval of 7.5 million stock options for its chief executive and innovative co-founder, Steve Jobs, raising new questions about the role he may have played in a scandal that has swirled around the dynamic technology company for months.

Apple said in a pair of overdue earnings filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission that it had recorded a fictitious meeting at which Jobs's options were ratified and that he may have recommended the dates for some of the stock options issued to company employees. The company repeated yesterday that Jobs did not benefit from the options.

Apple's board, which includes former vice president Al Gore, gave Jobs its full support. "The board of directors is confident that the Company has corrected the problems that led to the restatement, and it has complete confidence in Steve Jobs and the senior management team," said the statement by Gore and Jerome York, who heads Apple's audit and finance committee.

Wall Street also rallied around Jobs, who is more closely identified with and central to the success of his company than any other executive at a major technology firm. The stock rose nearly 5 percent, and many industry analysts said investors could return their attention to Apple's sound fundamentals, which include strong sales of iPods and Macintosh computers.

But white-collar crime experts said the action may signal more serious issues.

"The acknowledgment of greater involvement by Mr. Jobs than previously disclosed can only cause the government to use an even finer toothed comb in its own review of Mr. Jobs's conduct," Washington defense lawyer Barry Pollack said. "The government may ultimately come to share the company's conclusion that Mr. Jobs was unaware that the options were not properly handled, but not before putting him under their own magnifying glass."

Peter J. Henning, a law professor at Wayne State University in Detroit and co-author of a blog on white-collar crime, went further, saying Apple appeared to be minimizing Jobs's role in the options imbroglio. He cited Apple's admission that Jobs may have recommended some of the dates that would have allowed employees to make a larger profit when they sold their stock.

"Steve Jobs's plausible deniability is being narrowed here," Henning said. "This is serious. This has cost people their jobs. Admittedly he didn't get any money out of it, but that's not the criteria for judging a chief executive."

In previous investigations, Henning said, prosecutors and securities regulators have relied on accounts from corporate insiders to build cases against high-ranking executives. Apple has blamed two former executives, identified as former financial chief Fred Anderson and former general counsel Nancy Heinen, for the options misconduct. It is unclear whether either of the executives, who left Apple this year, are talking to law enforcement authorities.

Spokesmen for the SEC and the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco said they would not discuss any investigation concerning Apple. Apple yesterday confirmed that it had responded to "informal inquiries" from authorities.

Yesterday's disclosures tie Jobs more closely to improprieties than Apple acknowledged this summer when it said some options had been granted improperly.

In its regulatory filings, Apple said its board of directors never met in October 2001 to ratify stock options for Jobs, as previously claimed. While company records indicated that the options were ratified at a special board meeting, no such session was held and the grant was not finalized until two months later.

As a result, the company improperly inflated the potential value of Jobs's stock options by $20 million by incorrectly reporting their exercise price -- the price at which he would be entitled to buy the underlying stocks. The reported price of the options, reflecting the market value in October 2001, was $18.30; their price when they were finalized two months later was $21.01. By misreporting the exercise price, the company gave Jobs the opportunity to make more money if he sold the stock.

"There was no evidence, however, that any current member of management was aware of this irregularity," Apple said in its filing to the SEC.

Apple is among the largest of nearly 200 companies that have acknowledged or are being investigated in connection with the practice. Backdating stock options is not illegal, but not disclosing the practice to investors or falsifying documents to cover it up may be a crime.

The discovery of irregular practices at Apple came during a three-month internal investigation the company conducted earlier this year, which found that grants made on 15 occasions between 1997 and 2002 bore dates prior to the dates the grants were approved. In outlining its findings two months ago, the company said it had uncovered "serious concerns" about the conduct of two unidentified former officers in connection with their accounting, recording and reporting of the grants. These findings were turned over to the SEC and the Justice Department.

Apple said at the time that Jobs was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected in a few instances. In its filing the company went further, saying that Jobs may have recommended the favorable dates, but added that he did not "appreciate the accounting implications."

The company also said yesterday that the board had given initial approval to an options grant for Jobs in August 2001, and that action had been sufficient under its guidelines to lock in the exercise price.

The company reported, as it had previously, that Jobs never exercised his options. Along with an earlier set of 10 million options, the 7.5 million options from 2001 were canceled in March 2003, when Jobs was instead given 5 million shares of restricted stock, the company said.

Acknowledging that the grant approval for Jobs had been improperly recorded, the company said it would take a $20 million charge. Overall, Apple said, it would restate its financial data back to 2002 and take a charge of $84 million to reflect the actual expenses of backdated options given to Jobs and others.

Regulators also have contacted Pixar Animation Studios, which Jobs once headed before selling it to the Walt Disney Co., regarding possible stock-option problems.

After the SEC filings, Gore, who chaired the special committee that conducted the internal inquiry, said it was an "exhaustive investigation" into Apple's practices for granting stock options.

Some analysts agreed that Jobs could remain atop the company he co-founded. "It seems the whole issue should just be put to bed," said Charles Wolf, a principal and securities analyst at Needham & Co. He said the amount of money involved in the misreporting was trivial for Apple and Jobs. "It would be foolish to think Steve Jobs is involved, given the difference between October and December came to $20 million. At the time, Steve was a multibillionaire."

But Prudential Equity Group was measured in an update issued yesterday: "For Apple investors, the question remains whether or not Steve Jobs will be held liable for Apple's options irregularities. While we do not believe this is a likely scenario, we don't think this is out of the realm of possibility."

DOJ_NMG_0111670

Longtime UnitedHealth Group Inc. chief executive William W. McGuire earlier this year agreed to leave the company and to re-price his stock options after an internal probe linked his skyrocketing pay to questionable options practices.

Gregory L. Reyes, the former chief of Brocade Communications Systems Inc., faces criminal securities fraud charges over options backdating even though he contends he did not benefit financially from the maneuvers. Prosecutors accuse Reyes and others of doctoring company records and misleading auditors.

Staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

Apple Panel On Options Backs Chief (NYT)

By JOHN MARKOFF And ERIC DASH

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 29 — Apple Computer said Friday that a special committee of its board had found that its chief executive, Steven P. Jobs, was not responsible for improper dating of stock options at the company. To account for the backdating, Apple restated its financial reporting back to 2002 and took an $84 million charge.

Investors were cheered by the news, which was contained in the annual report Apple filed with securities regulators; Apple's stock rose 4.9 percent to close at $84.84. But the report failed to completely remove a cloud hanging over the company as a result of the backdating of options and improper record keeping, especially concerning two large option grants made to Mr. Jobs in 2000 and 2001.

In its summary of the findings of a six-month internal investigation, Apple said it had found that 6,428 option grants, or 15 percent of the 42,000 options it awarded, had been improperly dated from 1997 to 2002. Those included grants made on 42 separate dates to senior executives, new hires and ordinary employees.

Investigators, led by a committee of outside directors and the law firm Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges, raised "serious questions" about the actions of two former company officers who were involved in the accounting and reporting of stock options, Apple said. But they absolved Mr. Jobs by concluding that there had been "no misconduct" by Apple's current management team.

The report did offer a subtle shift in Apple's description of Mr. Jobs's role in the option process. In October the company said that Mr. Jobs was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected, but that he did not benefit from those grants and was unaware of the accounting implications. But in the report issued Friday, Apple acknowledged that Mr. Jobs "was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates."

Some accounting experts questioned the company's explanation of the part Mr. Jobs played in the grants.

"It appears as if Jobs is playing the role of a monkey: See no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil," said Lynn E. Turner, a former chief accountant at the Securities and Exchange Commission. "If he truly were fulfilling his role as C.E.O., it is highly questionable as to why he didn't know about such poor management and oversight of the option granting process."

An Apple spokesman, Steve Dowling, said the company would have no comment beyond the report. Apple still faces investigations by the Justice Department and the S.E.C.

Apple is perhaps the most high-profile company to be entangled in backdating problems, which became the year's biggest financial scandal, and Mr. Jobs is the best-known business leader to be pulled into it to date. So far, the S.E.C. is looking at the practices of more than 120 companies, and the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are conducting separate investigations. Dozens of chief executives have been fired or forced out.

Backdating involves retroactively setting a stock option's grant price to a date when the stock price was lower in order to build in a profit. It is not necessarily illegal, but it can have serious accounting, tax and disclosure consequences and is generally frowned upon by corporate governance experts.

The discussion of stock option practices in Apple's report was mostly focused on the accounting implications, and it offered few details on the potential tax and disclosure issues. It also did not address what appear to have been lax controls at the company.

Mr. Turner said it appeared that Apple had practiced "pick a date, any date" accounting. He added: "Their disclosures provide less than transparent reasons for why certain dates were picked."

DOJ_NMG_0111671

The special committee that looked into the options practices included an outside director who was responsible for handing out some of the options during the period in question. Jerome B. York, an I.B.M. and Chrysler executive who served on Apple's compensation committee from August 2001 through November 2002, was joined on the committee by Eric E. Schmidt, the chief executive of Google, and Al Gore, the former vice president, who served as chair of the group. Mr. York recused himself from the committee at times when he felt that his own actions were under scrutiny.

The report points the finger at two former officers who are not named, but they are believed to be Nancy R. Heinen, Apple's former general counsel who left the company in May, and Fred D. Anderson, the former chief financial officer and a former member of Apple's board. Mr. Anderson left the company in 2004 to join an investment firm and left the board in October, the same day Apple released some details about its options investigation.

Jerome Roth, a lawyer representing Mr. Anderson, said in a statement that his client was "disappointed to learn" that during part of his tenure at Apple, the company "was not strictly complying" with its option granting processes.

Apple Inquiry Clears CEO Jobs Of Wrongdoing On Stock Options Wall Street Relieved, Shares Rise -- But Until Federal Authorities Weigh In, Uncertainty Remains (SFC)

By Jessica Guynn, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 30, 2006

Apple Computer Inc. cleared CEO Steve Jobs of wrongdoing in the company's stock options scandal, assuring -- for the time being at least -- the continued stewardship of a Silicon Valley legend.

Wall Street heaved a huge sigh of relief. Jobs is widely considered crucial to Apple's success, a brilliant innovator who returned from exile a decade ago to restore Apple's polish, introducing such hit products as the iPod digital music player.

The company's shares rose nearly 5 percent after release of the anxiously awaited annual report, which gave the most detailed account yet of what an internal investigation found about irregularities in awards of stock options to executives.

Apple's investigation, led by a special committee of board members that included former Vice President Al Gore, discovered thousands of cases in which the company handed out stock options improperly, often by assigning a date to the awards different from the day on which they were actually granted. The practice, known as backdating, potentially boosts the profits of recipients but is illegal if not disclosed and properly accounted for.

At the same time, the investigation found "no misconduct by current management," according to the report. In a separate statement, Gore and another member of the investigative committee said they had "complete confidence in Steve Jobs and the senior management team" and that the company "has corrected the problems."

Cupertino's Apple also restated financial results for 1997 through 2002 to recognize a total of $84 million in additional options-related compensation expenses.

Despite the exoneration, uncertainty remains for Jobs, the chief executive officer, and the company. Apple noted that it had informed the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Attorney's Office of the results of its probe. Federal authorities are presumed to be weighing whether to take action against the company or any individuals. The SEC and the U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment on the matter.

Legal and corporate governance experts say federal authorities won't necessarily be swayed by the company's findings or by Jobs' prominence.

"There is going to be a continuing level of uncertainty surrounding the company until or unless Jobs is exonerated by the SEC and others looking at this issue," said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises investors on corporate governance issues. "This was a major hurdle that the company has cleared for now, but it still has some obstacles in the road in front of it before it can put these issues behind it once and for all."

McGurn said the number of instances in which the company improperly granted options raises serious concerns.

"It does not jibe with the bill of good health the board gave itself and the company several months ago when the issues first came to light," he said.

Matthew Jacobs, a former assistant U.S. attorney in San Francisco now in private practice, said he expects federal prosecutors to look closely at Apple's findings.

DOJ_NMG_0111672

"All internal investigations are subject to scrutiny to see if they were thorough, complete and done correctly or if there is an attempt to whitewash the findings," he said. "It is still an open question how the government is going to decide which of the multitude of (backdating) cases to focus on. This is certainly not the end of the story for Apple."

Most Wall Street analysts took the view that Apple and Jobs are now putting their options problems behind them.

"As time goes by, this will slowly fade away," said Gene Munster, a financial analyst with Piper Jaffray, an investment bank. "It's important to put the stock option issue to rest so ultimately people can consider the fundamentals (of the company) again."

Options give holders the right to buy company stock at a preset price, usually the price on the day the options are granted. If the stock price rises, holders can cash in their options to buy stock at the preset price and then sell those shares on the open market at a profit.

Backdating options involves picking dates for awards when shares were trading at a lower price to boost the potential windfall to recipients. That isn't necessarily illegal, but companies must disclose and account for the practice. Many failed to do so.

Backdating was common in Silicon Valley, and dozens of companies have had to restate earnings or remove executives because of options-related misconduct. Apple is among the most prominent of about 200 companies that have come under scrutiny this year in the stock-options scandal.

For its part, Apple has worked to shield Jobs, who co-founded the company three decades ago.

Jobs has since become synonymous with its success and is credited with overseeing Apple's transformation into a consumer electronics and entertainment powerhouse. Analysts have said that if Jobs were forced to leave the company, his departure could cause a plunge in Apple's stock price and jeopardize its dominance in key markets.

In its regulatory filings Friday, Apple disclosed that a 2001 award of 7.5 million options to Jobs was recorded as having been approved at a special board meeting that never actually took place. The company also acknowledged that documents connected with the grant were falsified to make it look like the required board approval had occurred.

Apple said Jobs was aware of some instances of backdating and even recommended favorable dates to grant options. But, the company said, Jobs did not financially benefit from these grants and did not understand the accounting implications.

If regulators or prosecutors were to take action against Jobs, they would have to show that he knew that backdating options would distort the company's financial results or falsify its records, said Columbia Law School Professor John Coffee. Whoever did falsify records about the 2001 board meeting could face criminal prosecution, Coffee said.

Apple's investigation concluded that responsibility for some irregularities rested with two unnamed former officers. Their actions raise "serious concerns," the company said in its filing.

Fred Anderson, Apple's former chief financial officer, resigned from the board in October at the same time Apple announced preliminary findings of its stock-options probe.

Nancy Heinen, Apple's former general counsel, left the company in May before the options probe came to light.

Cristina Arguedas, the attorney who represents Heinen, said her client has a "rock solid" reputation for honesty and integrity.

Anderson's lawyer, Jerome Roth, released a statement Friday saying his client had no day-to-day involvement in the granting, reporting or accounting of stock options and was not involved in any "knowing manipulation" of the process. Roth also noted that Anderson was not a member of the board of directors at the time of the 2001 option grant to Jobs and knew nothing of any impropriety.

On the 2001 options award to Jobs, Apple said it found no evidence that any current member of management was aware of the false board records. The company placed the compensation cost of the grant at $20 million.

Jobs received another grant in January 2000 for 10 million options. That grant and the 2001 award were canceled in 2003 when Jobs received 5 million shares of restricted stock.

In October, Jobs apologized for options backdating that happened "on my watch" but has made no further public statements.

MetLife Unit To Pay $19 Million In Settlement Over Commissions (WSJ)

By Chad Bray And Lavonne Kuykendall

DOJ_NMG_0111673

The Wall Street Journal, December 30, 2006

MetLife Inc.'s life-insurance unit agreed to pay $19 million to settle allegations stemming from a New York state probe into the insurer's use of contingent commissions, which are offered by insurers to brokers who steer clients toward their company.

The New York insurer agreed to pay $16.5 million in restitution to policyholders and $2.5 million in civil penalties, according to the state attorney general's office. MetLife will adopt a compensation structure that eliminates the payment of contingent commissions to its brokers for life, disability and group products, said Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who will be inaugurated governor Monday. It will provide full disclosure of broker compensation to employers at every stage of the insurance purchasing and renewal process, he said.

Mr. Spitzer has said that contingent commissions are little more than kickbacks to insurance agents and brokers who send business to the insurers and that the hidden costs have driven up insurance prices. The attorney general alleged in part that MetLife instructed its sales personnel to "leverage" override agreements with its brokers by informing those brokers how close they were to meeting certain targets for business provided to MetLife. Those targets would trigger additional compensation to the brokers.

The settlement makes MetLife at least the seventh insurer to pay a fine in Mr. Spitzer's two-year-old investigation into how insurers compensate brokers that bring them business. Earlier agreements involved Prudential Financial Inc., UnumProvident Corp., American International Group Inc., St. Paul Travelers Cos., Zurich Financial Services' Zurich American Insurance Co., and most recently Chubb Corp.

In the announcement of its Chubb settlement, the attorney general's office said that contingent commissions "need not be a part of the insurance business," and Chubb promised to forgo the payments, but MetLife's agreement stopped short of a complete ban on the commissions.

MetLife said it has agreed to "certain business reforms relating to compensation of producers of group insurance, compensation disclosures to group insurance clients and the adoption of related standards of conduct." In its settlement, MetLife said it didn't admit liability as to any issue in fact or law and said it didn't expect the settlement to adversely affect its business.

Write to Chad Bray at chad.bray@dowjones.com1 and Lavonne Kuykendall at lavonne.kuykendall@dowjones.com2

Wachovia Fund Arm To Settle Civil Case (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, December 30, 2006

CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- Evergreen Investments, the mutual-fund arm of Wachovia Corp., will pay a $4.2 million civil penalty to settle allegations that it violated rules involving the sale of its funds through brokers.

Under the agreement with the NASD, formerly known as the National Association of Securities Dealers, Wachovia neither admitted nor denied the allegations. Evergreen Chief Executive Dennis Ferro wrote to investors that it was in the interest of the company and its investors "to resolve these matters and move forward."

The agreement said Evergreen had a revenue-sharing arrangement with brokerage affiliate Wachovia Securities from 2001 to 2003, and directed to Wachovia Securities $25.7 million in commissions generated from trades in Evergreen's investment portfolio. The sum was tied to the amount of Evergreen funds sold by Wachovia Securities.

Evergreen also sponsored a sales-recognition program for Wachovia Securities representatives who sold Evergreen funds during the same period. The "Medallion Club," as it was called, treated brokers to meetings at luxury resorts if they sold a certain amount of Evergreen funds. NASD rules prohibit the direction of brokerage commissions to another firm and noncash compensation for selling mutual funds.

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

CRIMINAL LAW:

Age No Shield From Prosecution For Alleged Mobster (USAT/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

USA Today, December 30, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE — Lucky Luciano, Meyer Lansky and Carlo Gambino are long gone. Murder Inc. is out of business. Las Vegas has been so cleaned up it resembles Disneyland. And Havana? Forget about it ever since Castro took over.

But Albert "Chinky" Facchiano, at 96, is still standing. And like Michael Corleone in The Godfather III, he is still very much involved in the family business, the FBI says.

At an age when most people are long retired and happy just to be alive, the reputed mobster was indicted earlier this year in Florida and New York. He is accused, among other things, of trying to intimidate and possibly kill a witness against the powerful the Genovese family of New York in 2005. He is also accused of helping to run the rackets in Florida.

It was unclear whether Facchiano intended to break legs with his own hands.

There have been plenty of elderly Mafia defendants, including an 86-year-old Genovese family member Matthew "Matty the Horse" Ianniello, who pleaded guilty to federal charges recently in Connecticut. But prosecutors, defense lawyers and Mafia experts say they can't remember someone Facchiano's age facing crimes of such recent vintage.

"I don't think there's anybody older than him," said Jerry Capeci, author of several books on organized crime and operator of the Internet site ganglandnews.com. "The rule is, you go in alive and you go out dead. You're not allowed to quit."

It appears that Facchiano, also known as "The Old Man," lived up to that Mafia credo, according to prosecutors.

Facchiano, born in 1910, has been a "made member" of the nation's largest and most powerful Mafia family for decades, but was a low-level figure, rising no higher than soldier, according to the FBI. His nickname is apparently a play on his last name.

He was a boy when Arnold Rothstein supposedly fixed the 1919 World Series. He was a young man during the Depression when he took his first arrest. He was entering middle age during La Cosa Nostra's go-go years in the 1940s and '50s, when the Mafia skimmed its share of America's postwar prosperity. And he was a senior citizen in the 1980s and '90s when John Gotti and other bosses were taken down by the FBI.

In Florida, Facchiano was indicted along with the reputed Genovese chief in the Miami area and several others on charges of extortion and racketeering. Prosecutors say Facchiano from 1994 to 2006 mainly supervised associates who committed such crimes as robbery, money laundering, bank fraud and possession of stolen property.

The New York indictment accuses Facchiano and more than 30 other alleged Genovese members, including acting family boss Liborio "Barney" Bellomo, of a range of mob-related crimes. Facchiano is accused specifically of trying in 2005 to locate and intimidate a government witness known as "Victim-5" in court papers.

In one conversation picked up on an FBI listening device, Genovese associate John Ardito said he and Facchiano were "the hit men" who were looking for Victim-5, according to federal prosecutors. Ardito traveled from New York to Florida to meet with Facchiano about Victim-5, who had "gone wrong," according to an FBI transcript.

Facchiano pleaded not guilty and is free on bail, and living at a condominium in swank Bal Harbor with a daughter.

Facchiano's lawyer in the Florida case, Brian McComb, would not discuss the charges. He said his client is in reasonably good health, apart from a bad back and difficulty hearing.

"He's got the typical ailments of an almost 97-year-old man," McComb said. "From day to day, who knows? He seems like a very nice gentleman."

Facchiano's first arrest came in 1932, on robbery and receiving stolen goods charges out of Pittsburgh, according to an FBI rap sheet. He got a sentence of two to five years, then was arrested again in 1936 in New York on grand larceny charges and yet again in 1944 on a bookmaking count. The records do not show how much prison time he did, if any.

He stayed relatively clean until 1979, when he was arrested on federal racketeering charges and got a 25-year sentence. He served eight years, winning release at age 79. Then, nothing until his twin arrests on the 2006 indictments.

If convicted on all charges, Facchiano could be looking at a sentence of well over 60 years in prison. Given the slow pace of federal prosecutions, he could be nearly 100 by the time he is sentenced.

U.S. Bureau of Prisons records show that as of the end of 2003 — the last year complete records are available — there were 30 inmates 80 and older. Officials could not say whether anyone as old as Facchiano is behind bars in the federal system.

DOJ_NMG_0111675

As for his chances of actually being sent to prison, Ryan King, policy analyst with the Sentencing Project, a non-profit organization that promotes alternatives to incarceration, said: "A judge might look at someone in their 90s and consider the likelihood of re-offending. Are they really going to go out and commit another crime?"

Capeci, the Mafia expert, said someone Facchiano's age might have some difficulty keeping up with the younger wiseguys if he does go free.

"There's no way a guy at age 96 can threaten people, break legs, do the normal routine that guys 50 and 60 years younger can do," he said. "But the guy is, according to the rules of the Mafia, still a made guy. He still has to take orders from the superiors and do what they tell him."

Police Seek Clues Tying Va. Attack To Slayings (WP)

By Nick Miroff, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

In Springfield, Fear Rises Among Elderly

Fairfax County police said yesterday that they are investigating whether a Christmas Eve attack on a 62-year-old Springfield woman is related to the slayings of two elderly women in the area in the past five months.

Few details have been released about the incident Sunday, when a man forced his way into a home and stabbed a woman on the arm before fleeing. Police said the attack occurred less than two miles from the home where 74-year-old Marion J. Newman was robbed and beaten to death Nov. 21.

Police believe Newman's assailant also killed Marion B. Marshall, 72, in her home Aug. 14, two miles from Newman's home. Both women suffered blunt-force trauma injuries to the upper body.

The number of investigators and crime prevention officers working full time on the case has grown to 18, and police have developed a "humongous" e-mail list to keep Springfield residents informed, said Lt. Richard J. Perez, a police spokesman. Fliers in English and Spanish are posted in the neighborhoods where the women were killed, and a $26,000 reward has been offered by the victims' families.

The slayings, and an increase in burglaries in some neighborhoods, are contributing to a climate of fear and frustration, some residents said.

"People are angry that our community has come to this and that crime has come this far," said Pam Boaz, who lives two doors down from Marshall's home.

Boaz said that old-fashioned neighborly concern is the best way to keep people safe, and she fears that is being lost. "What makes it easy for these guys is that our communities are so fractured. Our neighbors don't really know each other.

"The police can only do so much," she said.

Police believe that the slayings were crimes of opportunity, committed by someone with ties to the community who happened to see each woman alone and attacked her. There was no indication that the women knew each other, and Newman's diamond ring was the only item known to be stolen from either home.

Although police believe that the homicides were related, they have yet to conclude that the Christmas Eve attack is linked. "Our detectives have been scrutinizing and analyzing the incident of Dec. 24 in an effort to determine if this incident is related to the Aug. 14 or Nov. 21 homicides or any other incident," Perez said. "But no definitive connection has been made."

For many senior citizens and other Springfield residents, though, the pattern is cause for concern. In the past month, Fairfax police have conducted home security inspections for 75 seniors in the Springfield area at their request, doing a walk-through evaluation of locks, lighting and landscaping conditions that could increase vulnerability.

Police have also organized safety seminars at schools and senior centers, drawing hundreds of participants, and mobilized Neighborhood Watch programs to increase vigilance, especially by reaching out to elderly residents.

"Part of our efforts have been to network with seniors to create a buddy watch system, so neighbors are watching out for each other," Lt. Charlie Bond said. Police have also asked Postal Service employees and delivery drivers to keep an eye on residents, particularly seniors who live alone.

DOJ_NMG_0111676

The homicide victims lived by themselves, and though the woman who was attacked Sunday does not, she was alone at the time of the incident. A family member returned home and found her after the attacker had fled. She was treated at Inova Fairfax Hospital for injuries that weren't life-threatening.

The only description of the attacker released by police is that of "a man wearing white or gray clothing." No robbery was reported, and police said that they are withholding additional details because of the investigation.

At the same time, they have launched a large-scale public safety and community policing campaign to reassure residents and heighten awareness.

"We understand that there's a level of fear," Bond said. "But we want to proactively approach seniors rather than have them sit at home and worry."

Calls to police from senior citizens have soared since the slayings, he said -- and that's exactly what police want. "All they need to do is call, and we'll respond to them. In that regard, I think the community is as safe as it can be under the circumstances."

Fears raised by the attacks have spread beyond seniors, though, and at Baldino's Lock and Key in Springfield, business has been brisk, said manager Darrin Benson. "I've noticed a lot more people coming in worried about the security of their places," he said. "There's been a rash of people coming in."

Deadbolt locks and new alarm systems have been big sellers, Benson said.

Sex Offenders In Exile (NYT)

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

Of all the places that sexual predators could end up after prison, the worst is out of sight, away from the scrutiny and treatment that could prevent them from committing new crimes. But communities around the country are taking that risk, with zoning laws that banish pedophiles to the literal edges of society.

There is a powerful and wholly understandable impulse behind laws that forbid sex offenders to live within certain distances of schools, day care centers and other places that children gather. Scores of states and municipalities have created such buffer zones, then continued adding layer upon layer to the enforcement blanket.

This has placed a heavy burden on law enforcement agencies, which already must struggle to meet exacting federal and state requirements for registering and monitoring the ever-growing population of released sex offenders, many of whom must be tracked for life. Lawmakers have shown no hesitation in piling on the administrative load, but frequently are less quick to pay for additional people to do the work.

As the areas off limits to sex offenders expand to encompass entire towns and cities, if not states, the places where they can live and work are shrinking fast. The unintended consequence is that offenders have been dispersed to rural nowhere zones, where they are much harder to track. In confined regions like Long Island, they have become concentrated in a handful of low-rent, few-questions-asked areas — an unintended and unfair imposition on their wary neighbors.

Many offenders respond by going underground. In Iowa, the number of registered sex offenders who went missing soared after the state passed a law forbidding offenders to live within 2,000 feet of a school or day care center. The county prosecutors' association has urged that the law be repealed, for the simple reasons that it drives offenders out of sight, requires "the huge draining of scant law enforcement resources" and doesn't provide the protection intended.

The prosecutors are right that any sense of security that such laws provide is vague at best and probably false. Just as it would feel foolish to forbid muggers to live near A.T.M.'s, it is hard to imagine how a 1,000-foot buffer zone around a bus stop, say, would keep a determined pedophile at bay. If children feel secure enough to drop their wariness of strangers, that would be a dangerous outcome. And of course, no buffer against a faceless predator will be any help to the overwhelming majority of child victims — those secretly abused by stepfathers, uncles and other people they know.

The problem with residency restrictions is that they fulfill an emotional need but not a rational one. It's in everyone's interest for registered sex offenders to lead stable lives, near the watchful eyes of family and law enforcement and regular psychiatric treatment. Exile by zoning threatens to create just the opposite phenomenon — a subpopulation of unhinged nomads off their meds with no fixed address and no one keeping tabs on them. This may satisfy many a town's thirst for retributive justice, but as a sensible law enforcement policy designed to make children safer, it smacks of thoughtlessness and failure.

DOJ_NMG_0111677

CIVIL LAW:

Justice Dept. Files Suit Over Alleged Small Business Fund Fraud (BOS/AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, December 30, 2006

PHILADELPHIA --Three investors, including a Connecticut attorney, are accused of defrauding a government program for small businesses out of $32 million, according to a lawsuit filed Friday by the U.S. Justice Department.

The government accuses the three defendants of cutting secret deals to hide their ownership stakes in a venture that received Small Business Administration funds.

The suit names Glastonbury-based attorney Daniel Beharry; John Torkelsen, who is in prison after pleading guilty to defrauding the agency; and Richard D. Propper, a physician from LaJolla, Calif.

They are accused of violating the False Claims Act, which allows the U.S. to seek treble damages plus penalties.

According to the lawsuit, the three defrauded the SBA's Small Business Investment Co. program by failing to disclose conflicts of interest and awarding themselves improper management fees.

Government lawyers say Torkelsen submitted an application for a firm called the Acorn Technology Fund, stating that he owned it with two other men. However, the application did not disclose that Acorn was also funded and controlled in part by Propper and Beharry, the suit states.

Beharry denied the accusations.

"We'll defend it very vigorously, but other than that I have no comment," he said Friday.

Propper was the subject of a 1996 consent decree with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the suit states. Had his name been listed as a fund manager, the SBA would have rejected Acorn's application, the government said.

Neither a home nor business listing for Propper in California could be determined on Friday.

The lawsuit also names Sovereign Bancorp Inc. as a defendant. Prosecutors said that an employee at a bank that Sovereign bought, Main Street Bank, did not properly describe Acorn's account balances in a form filed with the Small Business Administration six years ago.

Sovereign, 3 Investors Sued In Program Fraud (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, December 30, 2006

The Justice Department has sued Sovereign Bancorp. Inc. and three venture capital investors, accusing them of defrauding a Small Business Administration program of $32 million.

The investors, including John Torkelsen, former manager of Acorn Technology Fund in New Jersey, evaded conflict-of-interest rules that would have prevented them from obtaining funds from the government, the Justice Department said. The U.S. alleged that the bank overstated the fund's assets to help get funding from the small-business agency.

The department said the alleged fraud is the biggest ever perpetrated against the U.S.' Small Business Investment Company Program, which gives small private fund managers equity capital and long-term loans to invest in developing companies. Also named in the suit were Richard Propper, a California investor, and Daniel Beharry, a Connecticut lawyer.

The Acorn fund received $32 million from the small-business program. According to the suit, Torkelsen and the other two investors engaged in multiple secret transactions that hid their ownership and control of companies that the fund invested in, contrary to U.S. rules against self-dealing.

Main Street Bank, prior to its acquisition by Sovereign, provided "false and misleading" information to the Small Business Administration on a form confirming the Acorn fund's account balances, according to court papers. Sovereign, based in Philadelphia, acquired Main Street Bancorp Inc. in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0111678

The Justice Department filed suit under the False Claims Act, which lets the U.S. collect up to three times the amount of its losses plus civil penalties.

Ed Shultz, a spokesman for Sovereign, said the bank "had no involvement with these transactions." They occurred at a branch office of Main Street before the bank was acquired by Sovereign, he said.

Torkelsen was sentenced in March to a 70-month prison sentence for defrauding the Small Business Administration in connection with the Acorn Fund. His attorney, Ralph Caccia, was out of town and didn't return a call seeking comment. Propper and Beharry also couldn't immediately be reached.

U.S. Sues To Regain Fraud Loss For SBA (PHI)

By Bob Fernandez

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 30, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department filed a civil lawsuit in Philadelphia yesterday against imprisoned Princeton financier John B. Torkelsen, California businessman Richard D. Propper, and Connecticut lawyer Daniel P. Beharry for allegedly defrauding the Small Business Administration of $32 million.

The former Main Street Bank in Philadelphia, predecessor to Sovereign Bank, also was named as a defendant.

Sovereign spokesman Ed Shultz said the transactions related to the case were made before Sovereign acquired Main Street Bank in 2002. "There were no Sovereign employees involved," he said.

The suit was filed in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania under the False Claims Act, and seeks to have the defendents repay money fraudulently obtained from the SBA. The government has said the fraud was the largest in history in its Small Business Investment Company program, which attempts to seed small companies with money.

The suit is the latest legal action against Torkelsen, who has already pleaded guilty to making false statements to the SBA, and his Acorn Technology Fund L.P. in Bucks County, which received SBA money.

The complaint alleges that Torkelsen recruited Propper and Beharry as investors into the Acorn Technology Fund without telling the government, in violation of SBA rules.

Propper and Beharry then funneled investments from the fund into companies they partly owned, the court documents allege. Those companies were identified as Medibuy.com, Fresh Roast Inc., Endo Surgical Services Inc. and Infant Advantage/Parentech.

Torkelsen paid "excessive" management fees to himself and Beharry and Propper, the suit states. Torkelsen also used Acorn Technology to funnel millions of dollars into two companies he partly owned, SemiSystems Inc. and VeriVoice Inc.

Torkelsen has pleaded guilty to making false statements to the SBA in a related criminal case. He is serving a 70-month sentence in the federal penitentiary in Morgantown, W. Va. As part of that case, he has been ordered to pay restitution of $1.9 million.

A phone message to Torkelsen's attorney was not returned.

A phone call to Beharry was not returned. Propper could not be reached.

Main Street Bank's role stems from a $2 million loan to Torkelsen in July 2000. The loan allegedly was used to artificially inflate Acorn's balance sheet so it could obtain more money from the SBA.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Pressure On Nifong In Duke Case (RN&O)

Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, December 30, 2006

DURHAM - The latest flurry of news in the Duke lacrosse case prompted some concerned citizens to register a complaint with the U.S. Department of Justice on Friday, according to community activist Victoria Peterson, who said she helped pen the complaint with other, unnamed residents.

Officials with the Justice Department could not confirm Friday whether they had yet received the complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0111679

A statement distributed by Peterson alleges that the accuser's civil rights were violated when lacrosse players tossed racial epithets at her and another exotic dancer the night of the alleged assault. The complaint also contends that officials at Duke University have failed to prosecute several rapes reported on campus.

Peterson, an unsuccessful City Council candidate and political organizer, has been speaking publicly about the racial and political subtexts of the case since the allegations surfaced in March.

Court Backs Affirmative Action Ban In Michigan (WP/AP)

By Tim Martin

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

LANSING, Mich., Dec. 29 -- A federal appeals court ruled Friday that three Michigan universities should not have been given a six-month extension to comply with parts of a new state law banning some public affirmative action programs.

Michigan voters in November approved Proposal 2, which bans the use of race and gender preferences in university admissions and in government hiring and contracting.

The measure took effect Dec. 23, but U.S. District Judge David M. Lawson earlier this month provided an exception for admissions and financial aid decisions for incoming classes at the University of Michigan, Michigan State University and Wayne State University.

A three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit said federal law does not warrant providing an exception. Although Lawson allowed the schools until July 1 to comply with Proposal 2, the appellate ruling means they will be expected to comply immediately.

The universities asked for the extension because they had already begun the admissions cycles for those students before voters approved the proposal. Lawyers for Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm (D) and Attorney General Mike Cox (R) signed off on the extension.

Kelly Cunningham, a spokeswoman for the University of Michigan, said Friday night that the school is reviewing the ruling.

A pro-affirmative-action group called By Any Means Necessary is considering appeals, lawyer George Washington said.

But Eric Russell, a University of Michigan Law School applicant who is represented by a backer of the measure, the Center for Individual Rights, called the ruling "a victory for all the people in Michigan who voted 'yes' on Proposal 2."

Gerald Ford's Affirmative Action (NYT)

By Jeffrey Toobin

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

GERALD R. FORD kept his distance from political controversy after leaving office, but he retained a special interest in the workings of his alma mater. In 1999, the 86-year-old former varsity football star decided to make a public stand in support of affirmative action at the University of Michigan.

He wrote an Op-Ed article on this page titled "Inclusive America, Under Attack." A pair of pending lawsuits, Mr. Ford wrote, would prohibit Michigan and other universities "from even considering race as one of many factors weighed by admission counselors." Such a move would condemn "future college students to suffer the cultural and social impoverishment that afflicted my generation."

As it happened, on Sept. 15, 1999, a month after the article ran, Mr. Ford had dinner with James M. Cannon, one of his former White House aides, in Grand Rapids, Mich. The men were in town to hear a speech at Mr. Ford's presidential museum by his only nominee to the Supreme Court, John Paul Stevens.

By that point, Justice Stevens had long since proved a great disappointment to conservatives. But his nomination remained one of Mr. Ford's proudest achievements as president, for Justice Stevens' moderate-to-liberal record reflected Mr. Ford's own later views, as his stand on affirmative action illustrated. At the dinner, Mr. Ford encouraged Mr. Cannon to do what he could to help the university in the lawsuit, which was heading for the Supreme Court.

Mr. Cannon had served on the Board of Visitors of the Naval Academy, and both he and Mr. Ford knew how important affirmative action was to the military, especially its officer corps. Mr. Cannon had been told many times by the Navy's top brass that they did not want ships full of enlisted men, who tended to be heavily minority, to be commanded exclusively by white officers.

DOJ_NMG_0111680

Affirmative action wasn't social engineering, it was military necessity; and Mr. Cannon and Mr. Ford wanted to make sure the justices heard that message.

Active-duty officers could not take a stand on such a controversial issue, but Mr. Cannon, prompted by Mr. Ford, sought out the next best thing: retired military officers. In time, the University of Michigan defense team recruited Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf, Gen. John M. Shalikashvili, Gen. Hugh Shelton, Adm. William J. Crowe Jr. and two dozen others eminences to sign a friend-of-the-court brief in support of affirmative action written by a Washington lawyer, Carter G. Phillips.

The first case was argued at the court on April 1, 2003, less than two weeks after American and allied forces launched their invasion of Iraq. In this initial period, the war looked like a tremendous success; as a result, the military was held in especially high regard in the nation and at the court, and that attitude was reflected in the justices' many questions about the brief by the military retirees.

To the lawyer representing the plaintiff, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said, "May I call your attention in that regard to the brief that was filed on behalf of some retired military officers who said that to have an officer corps that includes minority members in any number, there is no way to do it other than to give not an overriding preference but a plus for race."

Justices Stevens, Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter and Sandra Day O'Connor followed up with similar queries. When Theodore B. Olson, the solicitor general, who was expressing the Bush administration's opposition to the Michigan program, rose to speak, Justice Stevens quickly interrupted: "Just let me get a question out, and you answer it at your convenience. I'd like you to comment on Carter Phillips's brief. What is your view of the strength of that argument?"

In the end, the court voted to uphold the affirmative action program at Michigan's law school. Justice O'Connor's opinion quoted Mr. Phillips's brief at length and then, in an extraordinarily rare tribute, adopted its words as part of the court's opinion: "To fulfill its mission, the military 'must be selective in admissions for training and education for the officer corps, and it must train and educate a highly qualified, racially diverse officer corps in a racially diverse setting.' "

The court, Justice O'Connor said, agreed with Mr. Phillips that " 'it requires only a small step from this analysis to conclude that our country's other most selective institutions must remain both diverse and selective.' "

In all, considering the statements at the oral argument and Justice O'Connor's opinion, the submission from the retired officers, as set in motion by Mr. Ford, may have been the most influential amicus brief in the history of the Supreme Court.

By Mr. Ford's later years, as the Michigan affirmative action controversy illustrated, the former president had fallen out of step with the strong conservative drift of the Republican Party. But more important, the Michigan case, and Mr. Ford's role in it, suggest that his views remained where they had long been — in the center of the country, politically and geographically — and by staying true to his beliefs, he left a quiet and powerful legacy for the university and the country that he loved.

ANTITRUST:

AT& T Completes BellSouth Takeover (WP)

By Alan Sipress, Sara Kehaulani Goo

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

The Federal Communications Commission yesterday overcame a seven-month deadlock and approved AT&T's $85 billion purchase of BellSouth, creating a new corporate giant that will stand astride the telecommunications industry like none other in the generation since the old AT&T empire was broken up in 1984.

The acquisition, which closed yesterday, reunites large parts of AT&T's former domain by folding BellSouth's nine-state territory into AT&T's existing operations spanning the Midwest, Southwest and West Coast. It gives AT&T complete control of Cingular Wireless, the country's largest mobile-telephone provider, at a time when wireless is the newest frontier for reaching the Internet. Cingular is jointly owned by AT&T and BellSouth.

Unequaled in capital and geographic reach, the new AT&T could be a tough adversary for cable companies by offering television service over the Internet, possibly lowering rates for customers in its service area. Several conditions imposed on the acquisition to protect consumers could encourage the availability of affordable broadband.

DOJ_NMG_0111681

AT&T agreed to offer high-speed Internet for $19.95 a month over the next 30 months without requiring customers to purchase phone service from the company.

AT&T's size could also give it more power to set prices for telephone and other services -- although it agreed temporarily not to impose new charges on Web companies that use its lines -- and to influence political debate over telecommunications well beyond its service area. In the Washington area, where Verizon Communications is the primary phone company, the immediate impact of the merger is likely to be limited, FCC officials said.

"AT&T will be an engine for innovation, competition, and growth for our customers at home and abroad," chief executive Edward E. Whitacre Jr. said in a written statement. "In the Southeast, we will build on BellSouth's excellent record of serving customers and communities. And we are ready to lead the way in a new era of integrated wireless services nationwide."

The FCC had long been deadlocked over AT&T's purchase of BellSouth as Republican and Democratic commissioners sparred over what conditions to impose on the deal. But in the past 10 days, AT&T redoubled its efforts to break the impasse, pressing for a resolution before the end of the year. On Thursday, the company offered significant concessions to protect consumers and ensure competition and, with only minutes remaining before the close of the year's business, the board's two Democrats set aside their objections to join with two Republicans to approve the acquisition.

Kevin J. Martin, the FCC chairman and the deal's principal advocate on the commission, said it would help realize his goal of extending broadband Internet service across the nation by fostering competition. "This deployment is critical to our nation's competitiveness in the global economy and to our national security," Martin and fellow Republican commissioner Deborah Taylor Tate said in a joint statement. "All consumers should expect to benefit from this technology."

AT&T's last-minute commitments include a two-year pledge to abide by "net neutrality" -- agreeing not to discriminate against Web companies in pricing or in access to lines. That was an about-face for the company, which has argued that it should be allowed to give priority to Internet firms such as Google, Yahoo and Microsoft if they pay for it. Whitacre said last year that anyone expecting to use the phone lines free was "nuts."

Besides offering to sell stand-alone Internet service for $19.95 a month, AT&T also agreed to give up some wireless licenses suitable for high-speed Internet so that other companies could compete. The company also said it would freeze the rates for "special access" lines that serve some large businesses and move 3,000 BellSouth jobs to the United States from overseas.

"A historic merger warrants historic conditions," said Jonathan S. Adelstein, a Democrat on the commission who had refused to support the deal without consumer protections. "We won far more concessions to benefit the public than anyone predicted when this deal was announced."

With a market capitalization of $225 billion, the new AT&T will vastly outgun its leading competitor, Verizon, which was born six years ago in a $52 billion merger between GTE and Bell Atlantic.

But while the merger creates a new AT&T behemoth, the combined company is far different from the one that reigned for 70 years as a government-regulated monopoly and architect of the world's most advanced, comprehensive and affordable telephone system. That corporation, at the time the largest in the United States, had so cornered the market on communications that many Americans referred to it simply as the phone company.

Even as the new AT&T faces limited competition from other telephone operators, it is challenged by cable and computer companies playing in a far larger, more complicated marketplace encompassing television, broadband and wireless, as well as local and long-distance land-line telephone service. In recent years, cable companies have been more successful at poaching the phone business -- bundling it with TV and broadband and selling it to subscribers -- than traditional telephone operators have been in crossing over to television.

Earlier this month, a divided FCC approved a measure aimed at helping telephone companies move into cable television markets by significantly limiting what local officials can demand in return for franchises.

Gary Arlen, president of Arlen Communications, a Bethesda research firm, said AT&T's acquisition of BellSouth "reflects a natural oligopoly." In the early days, "public utilities were a natural monopoly. In our digital era today, competition is now not between the Bell companies, but between Bell and cable operators and some wireless [companies] in there."

DOJ_NMG_0111682

Gigi B. Sohn, president of the Public Knowledge advocacy group, praised the FCC for approving the merger with strong conditions, especially on net neutrality, and urged the commission make sure that AT&T complies. In particular, she said the company might try to evade part of its net-neutrality commitment by claiming that the television service it provides over the Internet is akin to cable television and thus not subject to the condition.

Though the merger represents a landmark in U.S. telecommunications, it would be misleading to cast the corporate takeover as an epic tale of AT&T reconstituting itself from the wreckage of the 1984 breakup and its disastrous business decisions. The decline began with the divestiture, when AT&T gambled that it would be more lucrative to keep its long-distance business and cut loose the regional phone companies. But that meant jettisoning the huge number of employees and customers who gave the company political clout. In 1996, the regional companies and others won the right in Washington to compete for long-distance and the tide started turning against AT&T.

As intense competition forced prices for long-distance to fall, AT&T struggled to find a new calling and looked to cable. It again splintered six years ago, into four separately traded companies for broadband, wireless, business services and consumer services.

AT&T today is an utterly different corporation than the old Ma Bell, sharing little more than the name. The company that now flies the AT&T flag was until last year known as SBC Communications Inc. SBC, one of the original Baby Bells, gobbled up the relatively meager, sickly remains of the old AT&T, then took its venerated name before turning its appetite earlier this year to BellSouth.

AT&T Set To Take On Cable As Purchase Is Cleared (WSJ)

By Amol Sharma, Corey Boles

The Wall Street Journal, December 30, 2006

The Federal Communications Commission approved AT&T Inc.'s $85.8 billion takeover of BellSouth Corp. Friday, consolidating the telecom giant's global dominance as a phone, Internet and wireless provider and setting up its next big challenge: offering TV service to millions of consumers.

The agency approved the deal, the largest ever in U.S. telecommunications history, by a unanimous 4-0 vote, after AT&T offered a series of major concessions to pacify consumer groups and regulators.

The merger creates a behemoth that will have a market capitalization of more than $220 billion -- more than twice that of nearest rival Verizon Communications Inc. -- and will serve 67.5 million local-phone customers in 22 states, as well as 11.5 million broadband users.

Having completed the deal, AT&T plans to roll out its Internet video service aggressively in former BellSouth territory, the southeastern U.S., reaching 1.5 million homes by the end of next year. So far, AT&T has launched the service in 11 markets, including Houston and Indianapolis. It plans to reach 19 million homes in its own 13-state region, mainly in the central and southwestern U.S., by the end of 2008.

AT&T and Verizon are adding TV to the roster of services they offer consumers so they can better compete with cable companies that are already offering bundles of TV, phone and Internet service. So far, Verizon is in the lead, having signed up 118,000 customers for its TV service as of the end of the third quarter.

A slow rollout of video services hasn't hurt AT&T with investors. Its share price has been on a tear, up 46% this year. AT&T's stock was up 0.7% to $35.75 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange Friday. In the third quarter ended Sept. 30, the company's profit jumped 74% over the previous year, with much of the growth coming from cellphone operator Cingular Wireless, a joint venture with BellSouth that has emerged as the nation's largest carrier, with 58.7 million subscribers.

As it takes full control of the Cingular venture, AT&T is expected to begin phasing out the Cingular brand beginning early next year, replacing it with the AT&T moniker.

Approval of the deal was never in serious doubt, but it was held up for months because of objections from consumer groups and the commission's two Democrats. AT&T broke the logjam by proposing a series of conditions that won over the Democrats, including a pledge not to prioritize any Internet-content provider's traffic over another's, a principle known as "net neutrality."

DOJ_NMG_0111683

Lawmakers, consumer activists and some Internet companies said that without such regulation, AT&T would have been able to strike deals guaranteeing some Internet companies higher-quality transmissions than others.

Rep. Edward J. Markey, the Massachusetts Democrat who will head the House subcommittee on telecommunications in the next Congress and has been a vocal critic of the deal, said in a statement he was "pleased that the concerns of the Internet community are being acknowledged and addressed."

The net-neutrality condition applies to the portion of AT&T's network that connects consumers' homes to the Internet backbone. Special data and voice lines used by corporate customers wouldn't be subject to the rules. AT&T's own nascent TV offerings would also be exempted.

AT&T also agreed to lower rates for some high-volume voice and data lines that serve corporate customers and are leased on a wholesale basis to smaller telecom carriers. And it pledged to offer stand-alone high-speed Internet access for as much as $20 a month. Companies that offer Internet phone service, like Vonage Holdings Corp. and 8x8 Inc., would stand to gain if consumers don't have to buy their phone service and Internet service in a packaged bundle.

The company also will have to divest radio frequencies it controls that are ideal for the wireless broadband technology known as WiMax. Potential acquirers of those spectrum licenses include Clearwire Corp. and Sprint Nextel Corp., which are both building out WiMax networks.

AT&T Bends, Wins Deal OK (CHIT)

By Jon Van, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, December 30, 2006

FCC approves BellSouth buyout after giant agrees to maintain `net neutrality' for 2 years

A compromise proposed by AT&T Inc. to win federal approval of its $85 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. signals how much the impending takeover of Congress by Democrats has shifted telecom's regulatory landscape.

The Federal Communications Commission approved the acquisition Friday upon reviewing the proposal submitted Thursday night by AT&T. The companies closed the deal Friday after winning the FCC's OK.

After opposing restrictions on its ability to prioritize Internet traffic it carries, AT&T agreed to "maintain neutral network and neutral routing in its wireline broadband Internet access service" for two years.

The concept of preserving "net neutrality" has been the paramount telecom issue for consumer advocates all year.

While specific Internet traffic abuses have been rare, activists fear that the economic interests of big telecom and cable companies that own Internet infrastructure will compel them to discriminate against smaller competitors whose Internet-based voice and video services undermine the cash cows operated by the giants.

For their part, large telecom carriers contend that they need flexibility to manage the trillions of bits and bytes that flow across their lines daily. Government restrictions intended to ward off potential anti-competitive moves could stifle technologic innovation, say executives at big telecom concerns.

AT&T's concessions sparked year-end celebrations Friday among consumer advocates who had been stymied through most of 2006 in their efforts to pass network neutrality laws in the Republican-controlled Congress.

"We are no longer having a debate about whether net neutrality should be the law of the land," said Ben Scott, policy director for Free Press, a consumer advocacy group. "We are having a debate about how and when."

Another aspect of AT&T's compromise proposal would put a cap of $20 a month on its basic digital subscriber line high-speed Internet service for 30 months. At present consumers who want to buy DSL without also getting an AT&T phone line must pay a minimum of about $45 a month.

Gene Kimmelman, vice president of Consumers Union, said that customers who cannot afford AT&T's prices today should soon be able to "get fast connections to the Internet at a reasonable price."

The phone giant also agreed to freeze some rates it offers to customers who buy bulk service, to sell wireless spectrum licenses held by BellSouth and to "repatriate" some 3,000 jobs outsourced abroad by BellSouth.

AT&T's BellSouth takeover had received approval from state regulators and the Justice Department but was hung up by two Democratic members of the FCC who wanted consumer-friendly concessions.

DOJ_NMG_0111684

The three Republican FCC members could not override the two Democrats because one of them, Robert McDowell, had served as a telecom industry lobbyist before his federal appointment, and recused himself for ethical reasons.

Several Democratic House members slated to take leadership positions in the coming Congress had warned the FCC against approving the takeover without some concessions.

While the symbolic significance of AT&T's compromise is considerable, some observers said the substance may be less so.

David Burstein, who operates the DSLPrime.com telecom newsletter, said that buried in AT&T's proposal is a sentence that exempts its own Internet-based television service from network neutrality restrictions.

"In a seemingly innocuous sentence, AT&T opened a huge loophole for itself," said Burstein. "In the future, they can take anything they want, call it IPTV, and have no restrictions. If someone objects, they'll tie it up in court for longer than their two-year neutrality commitment."

Most consumer advocates chose to focus on the positive aspects of AT&T's proposal rather than speculate on future neutrality evasions.

"This will be a win for the public," said Mark Cooper, research director for the Consumer Federation of America.

---

jvan@tribune.com

AT&T Wins Backing On BellSouth Merger (FT)

By Paul Taylor, Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, December 30, 2006

AT&T, the largest US telecommunications group, on Friday won Federal Communications Commission approval for its planned merger with BellSouth after offering new concessions designed to break a regulatory deadlock over the $85bn deal.

The new concessions are seen as a significant climbdown by AT&T. It had wanted to complete the merger before the end of this year, but had been frustrated by the FCC, which has been deadlocked over the issue for three months.

Robert Quinn, AT&T's senior vice-president, described them as being "significantly more extensive than those submitted on October 13".

AT&T promised not to raise prices on some special access lines that provide high-capacity phone and data services for large businesses for four years and to sell DSL internet access to subscribers for $19.95 a month without requiring customers to buy phone service.

In addition, AT&T said it would refrain from charging companies such as Google premium fees for faster subscriber access – a significant concession to the mostly Democrat backers of so-called "network neutrality".

AT&T also offered to repatriate 3,000 BellSouth jobs now outside the US, pledged 200 jobs for New Orleans and to divest some wireless licences in BellSouth's nine-state region that cover airwaves suitable for wireless broadband internet services.

AT&T's proposed merger already had the backing of Kevin Martin, the FCC chairman, and fellow Republican Deborah Taylor Tate, but the panel's two Democrats, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, had demanded further concessions, including price controls.

Their position was strengthened by the prospective change of control in Congress following the November elections and the decision last week by the fifth commissioner, Republican Robert McDowell not to participate in discussions and the vote because of his earlier work as a telecommunications lobbyist representing some of AT&T's rivals.

BellSouth And AT&T Close Deal (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

Federal regulators approved AT&T's $85.8 billion acquisition of BellSouth yesterday, allowing the companies to close their delayed deal.

The approval came a day after the two companies disclosed concessions designed to win the support of dissenting policy makers.

DOJ_NMG_0111685

The Federal Communications Commission cleared the deal, the largest telecommunications merger in history, after AT&T offered to abide by certain conditions sought by two Democratic commissioners who found themselves with leverage after one of their three Republican colleagues recused himself from voting on the acquisition, leaving the agency tied 2-to-2.

The deal will go a significant distance toward recreating the prebreak-up AT&T. The company's local-phone network will traverse 22 states and stretch from Miami to San Francisco and include the Great Lakes region.

The old AT&T was broken up in 1984 into seven local-phone companies and one long-distance company, of which only three survive today: AT&T, Verizon Communications and Qwest Communications International. The acquisition also will give AT&T, based in San Antonio, total control of Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest mobile phone company and until now a 60-40 joint venture with BellSouth.

The combined company has 58 million cellphone customers, 67.5 million phone lines and 11.5 million broadband users. It would have reported revenue of $115 billion in 2005. It employs more than 300,000 people.

The approval hinged on a number of conditions, chief among them a "network neutrality" pledge by AT&T to allow its customers unfettered access to data and services over high-speed Internet connections. The company agreed to live by the pledge for two years or until Congress addresses the issue, something many officials and experts say could happen in the coming year.

In practical terms, the guarantee will not change how consumers use the Internet. But many advocates and policy makers have worried that with the dominance that cable and phone companies exercise over the broadband business, they could control, restrict or impede what customers can do with their connections.

That fear has been stoked by telecommunications executives who have said they would like to charge content providers like Google extra for the smooth and speedy delivery of services like TV shows over broadband connections.

"It's a historic breakthrough," Jonathan S. Adelstein, one of the Democratic commissioners who voted for the deal, said in a telephone interview. "It's going to set the terms of the debate going forward. It is going to cause us all to think deeply about how we address this."

In a statement, the other Democratic commissioner, Michael J. Copps, described the agreement as a step "that will preserve and encourage the truly transformative openness and power of the Internet."

Though hailed by several consumer advocates, critics said AT&T's pledge did not go far enough because it would not cover a new higher-speed service AT&T is building in California, Texas and elsewhere to provide video over fiber optic cables.

"Whether I want to watch the Southern Baptist Convention or Al Jazeera or The Jerusalem Post, that should be my decision," said Dave Burstein, the publisher of DSL Prime, an industry newsletter. "That's what we are fighting for: the basic First Amendment."

AT&T officials said that while its video service would not be covered, customers who signed up for broadband Internet services would be able to tap into Internet-based video and data services from other sources without restriction or interference.

"These commitments reflect our long history of providing consumers and businesses with the most advanced and affordable communications services," AT&T's chairman and chief executive, Edward E. Whitacre Jr., said in a statement.

The latest negotiations on this and other concessions between AT&T and the F.C.C. began after Robert M. McDowell, the Republican commissioner who had recused himself, announced on Dec. 18 that he could still not vote on the deal even though the commission's general counsel had cleared him to do so. Before being appointed to the commission this summer, Mr. McDowell was the general counsel for Comptel, a trade group that represented rivals of AT&T and opposed the deal.

His recusal left the F.C.C. chairman, Kevin J. Martin, without enough votes in favor of the deal, which had already won a unconditional approval from the antitrust division of the Justice Department.

Analysts and officials said the negotiations took on a sense of urgency because AT&T wanted the deal, which had already been delayed several times, completed by the end of the year so it could be closed and accounted for in the current year and to please investors. Shares of AT&T are up more than 26 percent and BellSouth 48 percent since the deal was announced in March. At that time the deal was valued at $67 billion. Both stocks rose slightly yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0111686

"While this is not at all show-stopping by any means, it is the best that all the parties could do given the enormous pressure to get this deal done before the end of the year," said Jessica Zufolo, senior policy director for Medley Global Advisors, a research firm.

Members of Congress with an interest in telecommunications have been urging the two sides to get the deal done. Representative John D. Dingell, the Michigan Democrat who is expected to head the Energy and Commerce Committee in January, publicly chided the Democratic commissioners for pressing AT&T to make concessions he said had nothing to do with the merger.

"I have significant concerns over the process followed at the F.C.C. during these final weeks, and believe that such process may be suitable for committee review," Mr. Dingell said in a statement yesterday.

Other concessions AT&T agreed to in exchange for approval included:

¶A freeze on some fees it charges rivals for the rent of some high-capacity wires that serve office buildings.

¶A commitment to offer high-speed Internet service to all of its local phone customers by the end of next year.

¶Allowing customers to buy high-speed Internet service without a local-phone line.

¶The sale of certain wireless spectrum.

¶Bringing back 3,000 jobs BellSouth has sent overseas.

A Win For Net Neutrality (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

TELECOMMUNICATIONS giant AT&T made a welcome concession to federal regulators this week that could help preserve the Internet's role as an engine for innovation and competition.

In order to win approval from the Federal Communications Commission for its $84.5-billion buyout of BellSouth, the reconstituted Ma Bell agreed Thursday to not offer for two years "any service that privileges, degrades or prioritizes" any data transmitted over its broadband network. In other words, AT&T guaranteed what has come to be known as "Net neutrality" — giving websites and services equal access to Internet users. The only exceptions are for AT&T's new TV service and the managed networks it sells to businesses.

Net neutrality became an issue last year after AT&T and BellSouth executives talked about making online companies cover more of the cost of broadband networks. In particular, they raised the prospect of charging high-traffic companies such as Google an extra fee to improve the picture quality of online movies and TV shows. Such charges could help established companies fend off upstarts by erecting a cost barrier to entry, suffocating the next YouTubes and Flickrs in their cribs.

The idea stirred so much opposition in the tech industry that two Democrats on the FCC refused to approve AT&T's purchase of BellSouth unless it agreed to Net neutrality. With only four of the five commissioners voting on the merger — one of the three Republicans recused himself — the Democrats essentially held veto power on the deal, and AT&T finally gave in.

Phone and cable companies operating broadband networks shouldn't be able to pick winners and losers among websites and services. Cordoning off toll roads on the information superhighway would undermine the Internet's nondiscriminatory nature, which has been critical to its entrepreneurial and inventive spirit.

At the same time, network operators should be free to introduce prioritized services elsewhere on their data pipelines, separate from their Internet offerings. AT&T's new TV service, which acts as a sort of private network within AT&T's Internet business, is a good example. The TV service relies on prioritization to ensure picture quality, particularly for high-definition TV channels. The only limitation there should be that network operators offer the same terms to competitors as they do to affiliated companies.

The merger makes AT&T the dominant phone provider in 22 states, with more than one-third of the country's phone lines. This kind of mass is far less troubling today than it would have been 10 years ago, before the advent of cheap wireless and Internet-based phone services. What is still troubling is the paucity of competition in the market for broadband service, which promises to be the next dominant platform for communications. In most parts of AT&T's turf, it competes only with the local cable operator, if anyone. That's not enough to protect consumers or Web sites, which is why a temporary Net neutrality requirement makes sense for the entire industry.

DOJ_NMG_0111687

US Patents For Financial Services Soar (FT)

By David Wighton

Financial Times, December 30, 2006

The number of US patents issued for financial services has soared this year as banks have rushed to take advantage of a protection once seen as the preserve of technology and drug companies.

Patents issued in the main US financial services category had risen more than threefold to 238 by the end of last week, with General Electric's finance arms heading the field with 11.

Many financial companies have stepped up efforts to protect intellectual property in recent years. Innovations that would not have been tried previously are being pursued because they can now be patented.

But experts warns that financial services is a fertile area for "patent trolls", who obtain and aggressively litigate patents.

Josh Lerner, a professor at Harvard Business School, said large numbers of financial services patents were of questionable quality. "In many cases patents are being used not as a tool to promote innovation but as a tool for extracting 'rents' from companies with deep pockets."

John Squires, chief intellectual property lawyer at Goldman Sachs, said a big worry was the way US courts granted injunctions to force companies found guilty of patent infringement to stop using disputed technology. Because of the highly interdependent nature of modern financial services, such injunctions could pose severe problems for the broader industry.

The dramatic growth in financial patents comes amid increasing concern about the patent system in the US and attempts to reform the process in Europe. In Europe, financial services or so-called business methods patents, are rare and lawyers say they are seldom enforced in the courts.

But in the US, a 1998 court ruling in a case involving State Street Bank made clear that businesses' processes were patentable. A flood of applications followed and these are now feeding through into issued patents.

Many financial services patents this year were issued to large US financial companies such as GE, Citigroup, JPMorgan, First Data and Goldman Sachs, or technology companies such as IBM, Hewlett-Packard and Accenture.

An increasing number of patents have been issued to individuals. Vergil Daughtery, a Georgia Tech MBA, was awarded patents for the pricing of "expirationless options". This was "despite the fact that perpetual options had been extensively studied in the finance literature since the 1960s", Prof Lerner said.

In June, the company to which Mr Daughtery licensed the patents filed a suit against the Philadelphia Stock Exchange for infringement.

Financial patents were being litigated at almost 30 times the rate of patents as a whole, Prof Lerner found in a recent study.

ENVIRONMENT:

U.S. Official Overseeing Oil Program Faces Inquiry (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 29 — The Justice Department is investigating whether the director of a multibillion-dollar oil-trading program at the Interior Department has been paid as a consultant for oil companies hoping for contracts.

The director of the program and three subordinates, all based in Denver, have been transferred to different jobs and have been ordered to cease all contacts with the oil industry until the investigation is completed some time next spring, according to officials involved.

The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation had not been announced publicly, said investigators were worried that senior government officials had been steering huge oil-trading contracts to favored companies.

Any such favoritism would probably reduce the money that the federal government receives on nearly $4 billion worth of oil and gas, because it would reduce competition among companies that compete to sell the fuel on behalf of the government.

If the allegations prove correct, they would constitute a major new blot on the Interior Department's much-criticized effort to properly collect royalties on vast amounts of oil and gas produced on land or in coastal waters.

DOJ_NMG_0111688

The Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which oversees royalty collections, is now the target of multiple investigations by Congress and the Interior Department's inspector general.

Those investigations are focused on allegations that the agency ordered its own auditors to abandon claims of cheating by large oil companies; that the agency's arcane rules for calculating sales value and royalties make it easier for companies to understate their obligations; and that the agency's basic sources of data are riddled with inaccuracies and are unreliable.

Interior officials have promoted "royalties in kind" as a much simpler and more efficient way for the government to get its proper share, because it eliminates much of the arcane accounting and reduces the opportunities for sleight-of-hand bookkeeping.

About a quarter of all oil and gas produced in the United States comes from federal property, and the Interior Department collected about $10 billion in royalties last year on about $60 billion in oil and gas.

At issue is the "royalty in kind" program, a fast-growing program under which companies pay their royalties in the form oil or gas rather than in the traditional form of cash.

For the 12 months ending last April, the government collected about $3.7 billion in oil and gas. Until recently, most of the oil simply went to the government's Strategic Petroleum Reserve. But the strategic reserve was essentially filled this year, so the Interior Department hires private companies to resell the fuel on the open market.

To ensure that it gets the best price, the Interior Department takes bids for contracts in which companies typically offer to pay a specific premium over the daily spot-market prices quoted on the Nymex commodity exchange. The companies offering the biggest premium over the spot market get the contracts.

People familiar with the investigation said it had begun several months ago, but had picked up speed in the last few weeks.

The most prominent figure in the inquiry is Gregory W. Smith, who was director of the royalty-in-kind program at the Minerals Management Service in Denver. Mr. Smith oversaw the entire program, which now covers 75 percent of royalties for all oil and 30 percent of royalties for all natural gas produced in the Gulf of Mexico.

One person familiar with the investigation said it originally had focused on potentially improper social ties between some of Mr. Smith's subordinates and executives at companies vying for contracts. The subordinates include two women, including one who is said to be in charge of oil marketing, and a second man.

All four people were transferred out of the royalty-in-kind office several weeks ago. Mr. Smith was reassigned as a "special assistant" to Lucy Querques Dennett, associate director of the Mineral Management Service in Washington. He was given strict orders to avoid any contact with industry executives, according to one official.

One official said investigators were now looking at possible consulting arrangements between the Denver officials and oil companies. The official said the most recent information had, if anything, hardened the suspicions of investigators, and said the potential ramifications could turn out to be far-reaching.

Mr. Smith did not return calls to his office in Denver. Spokesmen for the Interior Department in Washington as well as in the inspector general's office, which began the investigation before referring the matter to the Justice Department, refused to comment on the matter.

Gentlemen, Start Your Plug-Ins (WSJ)

By R. James Woolsey

The Wall Street Journal, December 30, 2006

An oil and security task force of the Council on Foreign Relations recently opined that "[t]he voices that espouse 'energy independence' are doing the nation a disservice by focusing on a goal that is unachievable over the foreseeable future . . ." Others have also said, essentially, that other nations will control our transportation fuel -- get used to it. Yet House Democrats have announced a push for "energy independence in 10 years," and last month General Motors joined Toyota and perhaps other auto makers in a race to produce plug-in hybrid vehicles, hugely reducing the demand for oil. Who's right -- those who drive toward independence or those who shrug?

Bet on major progress toward independence, spurred by market forces and a portfolio of rapidly developing oil-replacing technologies.

DOJ_NMG_0111689

In recent years a number of alternatives to conventional oil have come to the fore -- oil sands, oil shale, coal-to-diesel and coal-to-methanol technologies. But their acceptability to a new Congress, quite possibly the next president, and a public increasingly concerned about global warming will depend on their demonstrating affordable and effective methods of sequestering the carbon they produce or otherwise avoiding carbon emissions.

Ethanol's appeal rose a few years ago when it became clear that genetically modified biocatalysts could break down the cellulose in biomass and thus enable ethanol's production from a wide range of plant life. This means that, compared with corn, little fossil fuel is needed during biomass cultivation and land use presents much less of a problem. Indeed two years ago the National Energy Policy Commission (NEPC), making reasonable assumptions about improved vehicle efficiency and biomass yields over the next 20 years, estimated that just 7% of U.S. farmland (the amount now in the Soil Bank) could produce enough biomass to provide half the fuel needed by U.S. passenger vehicles, and that production costs for cellulosic ethanol were headed downward toward around 70 cents per gallon. Further, conversion of only a portion of industrial, municipal and animal wastes -- using thermal processes now coming into commercial operation -- appears to be able to yield an additional several million barrels a day of diesel or, with some processes, methanol.

But in spite of the technological promise of alternative liquid fuels, skeptics rightly point out that it will take time to build production facilities and learn the practicalities of operating biorefineries and shifting industry from hydrocarbons to carbohydrates. Most of all there is a sense of investor caution, driven by memories of the mid-'80s and the late '90s when sharp drops in oil prices, driven in part by increased production from Saudi reserves, bankrupted such undertakings as the Synfuels Corporation. Also, industry support for moving away from oil dependence has long been weak outside agribusiness, and consumers see little immediate savings from using alternative liquid fuels.

All this is likely to change decisively, because electricity is about to become a major partner with alternative liquid fuels in replacing oil.

The change is being driven by innovations in the batteries that now power modern electronics. If hybrid gasoline-electric cars are provided with advanced batteries (GM's announcement said its choice would be lithium-ion) having improved energy and power density -- variants of the ones in our computers and cell phones -- dozens of vehicle prototypes are now demonstrating that these "plug-in hybrids" can more than double hybrids' overall (gasoline) mileage. With a plug-in, charging your car overnight from an ordinary 110-volt socket in your garage lets you drive 20 miles or more on the electricity stored in the topped-up battery before the car lapses into its normal hybrid mode. If you forget to charge or exceed 20 miles, no problem, you then just have a regular hybrid with the insurance of liquid fuel in the tank. And during those 20 all-electric miles you will be driving at a cost of between a penny and three cents a mile instead of the current 10-cent-a-mile cost of gasoline.

Utilities are rapidly becoming quite interested in plug-ins because of the substantial benefit to them of being able to sell off-peak power at night. Because off-peak nighttime charging uses unutilized capacity, DOE's Pacific Northwest National Laboratory estimates that adopting plug-ins will not create a need for new base load electricity generation plants until plug-ins constitute over 84% of the country's 220 million passenger vehicles. Further, those plug-ins that are left connected to an electrical socket after being fully charged (most U.S. cars are parked over 20 hours a day) can substitute for expensive natural gas by providing electricity from their batteries back to the grid: "spinning" reserves to help deal with power outages and regulation of the grid's voltage and amperage.

Once plug-ins start appearing in showrooms it is not only consumers and utility shareholders who will be smiling. If cheap off-peak electricity supplies a portion of our transportation needs, this will help insulate alternative liquid fuels from OPEC market manipulation designed to cripple oil's competitors. Indian and Chinese demand and peaking oil production may make it much harder for OPEC today to use any excess production capacity to drive prices down and destroy competitive technology. But as plug-ins come into the fleet low electricity costs will stand as a substantial further barrier to such market manipulation. Since OPEC cannot drive oil prices low enough to undermine our use of off-peak electricity, it is unlikely to embark on a course of radical price cuts at all because such cuts are painful for its oil-exporter members. Plug-ins thus may well give investors enough confidence to back alternative liquid fuels without any need for new taxes on oil or subsidies to protect them.

Environmentalists should join this march with enthusiasm. Replacing hydrocarbons with fuels derived from biomass and waste reduces vehicles' carbon emissions very substantially. And replacing gasoline with electricity further brightens the environmental picture. The Environmental and Energy Study Institute has shown that, with today's electricity grid, there would be a national average reduction in carbon emissions by about 60% per vehicle when a plug-in hybrid with 20-mile all-electric range replaces a conventional car.

DOJ_NMG_0111690

Subsidizing expensive substitutes for petroleum, ignoring the massive infrastructure costs needed to fuel family cars with hydrogen, searching for a single elegant solution -- none of this has worked, nor will it. Instead we should encourage a portfolio of inexpensive fuels, including electricity, that requires very little infrastructure change and let its components work together: A 50 mpg hybrid, once it becomes a plug-in, will likely get solidly over 100 mpg of gasoline (call it "mpgg"); if it is also a flexible fuel vehicle using 85% ethanol, E-85, its mpgg rises to around 500.

The market will likely operate to expand sharply the use of these technologies that are already in pilot plants and prototypes and heavily reduce oil use in the foreseeable future. And given the array of Wahhabis, terrorists and Ahmadinejad-like fanatics who sit atop the Persian Gulf's two-thirds of the world's conventional oil, such reduction will not be a disservice to the nation.

Mr. Woolsey, co-chair of the Committee on the Present Danger, was Director of Central Intelligence from 1993 to 1995.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drunk Or Not, Boggs Was Right About Wiretaps (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- It must have seemed peculiar on that April day 35 years ago when Rep. Hale Boggs took to the floor of the House of Representatives and accused the FBI of spying on the government it was supposed to protect.

History would prove that Boggs, a congressman from New Orleans and the House's second-most-powerful Democrat, was right about the extent of the FBI's secret surveillance.

But on April 6, 1971, Boggs' comments drew a different reaction from President Nixon and his successor, Gerald Ford: They thought Boggs must have been drinking.

Transcripts of the taped conversations between Nixon and then-House Minority Leader Ford resurfaced after Ford's death Tuesday. The Washington Post published a piece Friday by journalist Bob Woodward based on interviews with Ford about the friendship between Nixon and the man to whom he would hand the presidency. Nixon recorded his office conversations and Woodward drew on transcripts to show how the two men regularly engaged in political gossip.

Lindy Boggs, who went on to win election to her husband's New Orleans House seat after he was killed in a 1972 plane crash, said that while Nixon and Ford might have had their doubts, her husband knew exactly what he was talking about when he made his surprising allegations of FBI abuses under Director J. Edgar Hoover.

Gestapo tactics

Boggs used what are called "one minutes," the opportunity for House members to talk about any topic they want, to say:

"When the FBI taps the telephones of members of this body and of members of the Senate, when the FBI stations agents on college campuses to infiltrate college organizations, when the FBI adopts the tactics of the Soviet Union and Hitler's Gestapo, then it is time -- it is way past time, Mr. Speaker, that the present director thereof no longer be the director."

Lindy Boggs, 90, said that a surveillance truck was regularly positioned near the Boggs' family home shortly before her husband leveled his criticism and that she had been told that the FBI was recording their phone conversations.

"These were not happy times for our family," Lindy Boggs said Friday. "We were told the FBI was monitoring our phone conversations and to draw running water between you and the telephone to wipe out the monitors."

Hoover was feared

Her recollection is supported by a former House colleague, Rep. Cornelius Gallagher, D-N.J., who said Friday that the House, under bipartisan leadership that included Ford and Boggs, had commissioned an investigation and discovered members' phones had indeed been tapped by the FBI. But he said the report was never released.

"Too many people feared J. Edgar Hoover," said Gallagher, who later was convicted of tax evasion and forced to give up his House seat, but maintains to this day that he was set up by the FBI for his criticism of the agency.

But in their 1971 conversation, Nixon, whose decision to secretly record conversations at the White House ultimately led to his undoing in the Watergate scandal, and Ford weren't buying Boggs' allegations, according to transcripts.

'On the sauce'

"He's on the sauce," Nixon said, repeating rumors that Boggs was drinking. "Isn't that it?"

"Well, I'm afraid that's right, Mr. President," Ford replied.

"Or is he crazy?" Nixon said.

Gallagher said it was true that Boggs was drinking too much during the period he made his remarks about the FBI, but he believes the problem was triggered by FBI operatives spreading rumors of an investigation that never produced any charges.

"But that doesn't take away the fact that he was absolutely right about the FBI abuses," Gallagher said.

Ford, he said, was just one of many Washington leaders, including Democratic Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, who wouldn't turn a critical eye on the FBI for fear of retaliation from Hoover.

Harry Lee confirms

Jefferson Parish Sheriff Harry Lee, who was a driver for Hale Boggs, said he found out about the phone taps when he kept getting a call one day from a man asking for a woman named Mary. Lee said he later learned that the wire to "Mary's phone," which was located in the same New Orleans apartment building where the Boggses lived, somehow got switched to the congressman's when experts brought in to check the congressman's phone discovered a bug.

Hale Boggs' charges didn't go unnoticed by Hoover and his supporters. Deputy Attorney General Richard Kleindienst, said that Boggs must have been "sick, or not in possession of his facilities" when he made his remarks. On April 12, 1971, Jack Anderson, a syndicated columnist, wrote that reports of Boggs' drinking problems came directly from the FBI.

James Thurber, director of congressional and presidential studies at American University, said the allegations of drinking can't take away that Hale Boggs was right in his criticism of the FBI. The illegal wiretapping also included prominent civil rights leaders such as the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., Thurber said.

It's ironic that despite Ford's comments to Nixon, he and Boggs were friends.

Though they disagreed on many topics, Lindy Boggs said, they were always cordial to each other and enjoyed each other's company. She said she still relishes the camaraderie between her husband, Gerald Ford, Betty Ford and herself when the four went to China in 1971 after Nixon had normalized relations with the nation's communist government.

The former congresswoman and U.S. ambassador to the Vatican said that the civility between her husband, the Democratic House leader, and Ford, the GOP House leader, is in marked contrast to today's Congress. "I think the Congress is a reflection of the country and there's just so much bitterness around that it really is unfortunate," she said.

Hale Boggs died in an Oct. 16, 1972, plane crash in Alaska. J. Edgar Hoover died five months earlier.

. . . . . .

Bruce Alpert can be reached at bruce.alpert@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7861.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

President Takes Cover During Tornado Scare (AP)

AP, December 29, 2006

CRAWFORD, Texas (AP) -- President Bush and first lady Laura Bush were moved to an armored vehicle on their ranch Friday when a tornado warning was issued in central Texas, the White House said.

The vehicle was driven to a tornado shelter on the ranch at 1:30 p.m. CT, and the president, the first lady and their two Scottish terriers, Barney and Miss Beazley, sat inside until the weather cleared, deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said. They were never moved into the shelter, he said. The shelter is a few hundred yards away from the president's house on the ranch.

"He was in the vehicle for about 10 minutes and then he went back to the house," Stanzel said, adding that other members of the staff at the ranch were sheltered as well.

DOJ_NMG_0111692

About an hour later in Groesbeck, roughly 60 miles east of Crawford, a man was killed when a tornado struck an assisted living facility for veterans, emergency management officials said.

The rush to the tornado shelter interrupted Bush's day at the ranch, where his day included clearing some cedar. The windy day of rain and thunder began with morning calls to wish him a happy new year from outgoing U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Colombian President Alvaro Uribe.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who is visiting Miami, also called Bush to talk about Iraq. Stanzel said Bush also spent time contemplating the new plan for U.S. policy in Iraq that he plans to announce in the new year. Bush hosted a National Security Council meeting at his ranch on Thursday.

First Couple Evacuated Amid Texas Tornado Warning (WP)

The Washington Post, December 30, 2006

CRAWFORD, Tex., Dec. 29 -- President Bush and his wife, Laura, were briefly evacuated from their central Texas house into an armored vehicle on Friday when a tornado warning was issued for the area, the White House said.

They were driven to a tornado shelter on the ranch, and the president, the first lady and their two dogs sat inside the vehicle until the weather cleared, said Scott Stanzel, deputy White House press secretary. They were never moved into the shelter, he said.

Stanzel said that he did not know how long the Bushes and their Scottish terriers, Miss Beazley and Barney, had to stay in the vehicle but that it was not "terribly long."

Texas: Tornadoes Kill One; President Waits Out Storm (NYT)

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

Tornadoes swept across Texas, killing one person and injuring at least a dozen others. Rural counties around Waco suffered widespread damage, officials said. A tornado warning forced President Bush and Laura Bush to move to an armored vehicle outside a shelter on their ranch in Crawford, just west of Waco. The vehicle was driven to a tornado shelter on the ranch, and the president, Mrs. Bush and their two Scottish terriers sat inside until the weather cleared, a deputy White House press secretary, Scott Stanzel, said. They were never moved into the shelter, Mr. Stanzel said.

Bush Shelters Amid Tornado Alert (BBC)

BBC.com, December 29, 2006

US President George W Bush was evacuated from his ranch in Crawford after a tornado warning was issued in central Texas, officials said.

Mr Bush, his wife Laura and their two dogs Barney and Miss Beazley were taken by armoured car to a tornado shelter on the property, the White House said.

However, the couple did not need to enter the shelter as the bad weather only lasted a short while.

The couple and members of staff were in the vehicle for about 10 minutes.

The tornado warning, issued by the National Weather Service, lasted for less than an hour.

The rush to the tornado shelter interrupted President Bush's day at the ranch where he was being kept abreast of plans in Iraq to execute the former leader, Saddam Hussein.

After This Vacation, Bush Will Need Some Rest (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

CRAWFORD, TEXAS — President Bush spent part of Friday cutting down some of the ubiquitous cedar from his property here, indulging his inner Reagan, much as the former president cleared brush from his own ranch in the Santa Ynez Mountains.

In the morning he received his daily intelligence briefing.

Another routine day at the Western White House?

Not precisely.

DOJ_NMG_0111693

In the afternoon, with prairie winds blowing and the sky a mysterious gray, the president and First Lady Laura Bush were obliged to scoop up their two Scottish terriers, Barney and Miss Beazley, and hurry in an armored car toward a tornado shelter on their Prairie Chapel Ranch.

The storms swirling about central Texas on Friday — a tornado touched down north of Waco, perhaps 30 miles from here, and another was said to have been spotted west of the president's ranch — formed an apt metaphor for the president at the end of a tumultuous year.

He was at the midpoint of a weeklong vacation that normally revolves around ranch chores. But this has been a different and strange holiday in which Bush has been unable to leave behind reminders of the problems he faces, at a low point in public opinion polls after another deadly year in Iraq.

The intelligence briefing Friday included an update on the execution of Saddam Hussein. On Thursday, Bush met with his senior national security advisors at his office on the ranch to work on a new strategy to deal with the insurgency and sectarian violence in Iraq. There also were details to work out on his role in former President Ford's funeral and memorial services. And outside the property, as usual, were anti-war demonstrators, among them Cindy Sheehan, whose son's death in Iraq has led her into many months of public protest.

The vacation began Christmas weekend at Camp David, Md. The president and his wife exchanged gifts: Citrine earrings for her, to match a necklace he had given her for her birthday. For him, a CD by rhythm and blues singer Sam Moore, "Overnight Sensational"; biking shoes; and a new blue suit.

But soon after Bush arrived at the Texas ranch, the cable news channels became a video collage of past American turmoil and current Iraqi mayhem. With the death of Ford, the Watergate years and the end of the Vietnam War were once again playing out.

By Friday, screens were alternating between the studied grace of a presidential farewell in Palm Desert, Calif., and repeated displays of the disheveled Hussein's capture three years ago.

Late on his first night here, well after he would normally have turned out the lights, Bush was told of Ford's death. It took roughly another hour for him to reach Betty Ford on the telephone.

By 7 a.m. the next day, he was speaking before television cameras, offering condolences to the Ford family and paying respect to the former president as "a man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts."

Some of Ford's friends and former staff members complained that the administration dragged its feet in declaring a national day of mourning. White House officials said such complaints did not take into consideration the need to wait until the date of the funeral had been officially announced.

They also took pains to present their response to Ford's death as equivalent in every way to their response to the June 2004 death of former President Reagan. This was a sensitive point after newspapers on Thursday published Ford's sharp criticism of Bush's Iraq policy, made in an interview with the Washington Post in July 2004 and held for publication until after Ford's death.

And, having begun his vacation with word of Ford's death, the president is ending it several hours earlier than planned, heading back to Washington on Monday to participate in the public viewing of the former president at the Capitol. On Tuesday, he is scheduled to speak at the funeral at the Washington National Cathedral, again taking on the public role of mourner-in-chief.

As for the tornado shelter, it went unused Friday. The Bushes and dogs sat in their car for a period that White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said "wasn't terribly long."

After the immediate threat passed, they headed back to the ranch house to continue their vacation, such as it was.

Cheney Faces New Year Of Testing Times (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, December 30, 2006

Dick Cheney has forged a reputation as the most powerful but also least visible vice-president in recent history. In the next few weeks, however, he will be forced to fight some of his battles in the open - in the courtroom and on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0111694

The first test will come in the criminal trial of his former chief of staff, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, charged with lying to a grand jury during an investigation into how a CIA agent's name was leaked. The trial, due to begin in two weeks, is likely to set an ignominious precedent when Mr Cheney becomes the first vice-president to testify in a trial.

Mr Cheney's legal team are also steeling themselves for the launch of legislative investigations by the new Democrat-controlled Congress.

In 2004 the vice-president felt confident enough to dismiss questions from Patrick Leahy, then a powerless Democrat, with a lewd invitation for him to do something sexually impossible. Now, he faces political revenge: Mr Leahy, the incoming chairman of the judiciary committee, has said he will issue subpoenas to secure documents that show whether the Bush administration authorised torture as part of its "war on terror".

He also vowed to look into no-bid Iraq contracts, including those awarded to Halliburton, a company the vice-president once ran. He said: "At the risk of incurring another of Vice-President Cheney's special season's greetings, I ask: 'Where did all the money go?' "

Mr Cheney enters this spotlight a weakened but not necessarily chastened figure, with fewer allies.

Disaffected Republicans blame him as much as President George W. Bush for their minority status. His image for gravitas has been tarnished by public mockery. A dead deer recently found outside his residence revived mocking stories of when he went hunting and accidentally shot his friend in the face.

His influence has never come from his popularity outside the White House, but from his access within it. That has not changed. Josh Bolten, the White House chief of staff, told the FT: "He is a welcome participant in every meeting the president is in, he sits in on almost all the policy meetings and avoids a lot of the ceremonial stuff, he doesn't show-boat, I guess that's an understatement. But he's there with his advice and counsel, and experience on almost every area."

Even so, there are signs that the president's confidence in his judgment has waned. He was cut out of the decision to oust his ally Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defence, a move he vigorously opposed.

"They really are genuinely close friends but the president doesn't always take his advice," said Mr Bolten.

On economic policy, Mr Cheney is likely to see his influence overshadowed by Hank Paulson, the Treasury secretary. "Bush made Hank his singular economic policy adviser on domestic and international affairs," says a former Treasury official. "The president made it clear he would drive economic policy."

The first test of the relative power of the two men could come over concessions on social security reform.

"There is talk of a possible entitlement reform deal involving raising taxes. My guess is [Cheney] would play a role as someone who will resist that," says Cesar Conda, his former domestic policy adviser.

In the Senate, the vice-president - who formally presides over the chamber - holds a tie-breaking vote and Mr Cheney could be called to exercise this more often with the Democrats holding only a slim majority, and especially if Tim Johnson, the South Dakota Democrat who was taken ill before Christmas, remains in hospital.

With the Republicans losing control of the House, keeping the party's Senate minority unified is vital as the last line of defence for the presidential agenda.

"The Senate has become more critical. It is no longer about how to get 287 votes in the House and 60 in the Senate, but how you get 41 votes in the Senate to block something. That's your power," says one former senior Cheney aide.

Trent Lott, the incoming Senate Republican whip, who has known Mr Cheney since they were "young squirts in the House", predicts that the vice-president will have "increased significance over the next two years, keeping the relationship between the White House and Republican rank and file in reasonable bounds. Many have never been in the minority before and need a little stroking and coaching."

Nevertheless Mr Cheney is an awkward unifying figure. Senators Arlen Specter, John McCain, John Warner and Lindsay Graham are still smarting from clashes over the surveillance and interrogation of suspected terrorists.

"There is some damage with those individuals, but events could take care of that," says one former Cheney aide.

Indeed, there is a danger for the Democrats that if they push too hard with subpoenas Republicans could rally around the vice-president.

DOJ_NMG_0111695

Mr Lott warns them not to over-reach: "The Republicans found that when they impeached President Bill Clinton. They will find Cheney a tough hombre."

Recent Flexing Of Presidential Powers Had Personal Roots In Ford White House (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, December 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 29 — This year's annual gathering of Gerald R. Ford administration alumni took place in June at the National Archives, where graying former officials socialized near a display of the Constitution.

Mingling with the retirees were two men still very much in power: Dick Cheney and Donald H. Rumsfeld, each of whom had served under Mr. Ford as White House chief of staff.

The setting had an apt symbolism. Since taking office as part of the Bush administration in 2001, both Vice President Cheney and Mr. Rumsfeld, who stepped down as defense secretary this month, have consciously sought to restore what they see as the constitutional powers of the presidency, which they believe were severely eroded under President Richard M. Nixon and President Ford. Some of their colleagues from three decades ago — evidently including Mr. Ford — have wondered if they have gone too far.

In the 1970s, reacting to the upheavals of Vietnam and Watergate, a Democratic-controlled Congress acted repeatedly to curb the executive, passing the War Powers Resolution, which requires consultation with Congress before entering into hostilities; approving amendments expanding the Freedom of Information Act and probing deeply and publicly into intelligence agency secrets.

Mr. Ford, a 25-year veteran of Congress, fought back, despite his conciliatory personal style and sense that his presidency in the wake of the Watergate scandal, was, in the title he would give to his memoir, "a time to heal." He used his veto power 66 times in his two and half years in office, the highest rate among modern presidents, and Congress responded with override votes 12 times.

"He was an unelected president coming in a horrible time and facing a Democratic House and Senate," said Max L. Friedersdorf, Mr. Ford's top liaison to Congress. "In Congressional relations, the main job we had was trying to sustain those vetoes."

In other ways, too, Mr. Ford tried to exercise his presidential powers. He pardoned Nixon without consulting Congress. He ordered the Marines to retake the American merchant ship Mayagüez after it was seized by Cambodian forces, informing Congress only afterward.

"Ford dug in his heels as best he could to stop the erosion of presidential power," said John Robert Greene, a Ford biographer and historian at Cazenovia College.

Ringside seats for this constitutional combat went to Mr. Rumsfeld, a former Illinois congressman whom Mr. Ford chose as chief of staff in 1974 at age 42, and Mr. Cheney, a former political science graduate student who served as his deputy. When Mr. Rumsfeld was named defense secretary the next year, Mr. Cheney, just 34, took the top White House job.

"Ford treated Cheney and Rumsfeld in effect as his students, eager young men willing to learn the art of government at his side," Mr. Greene said.

Just days after arriving at the White House, those pupils saw Mr. Ford suffer an important defeat. At the urging of a Justice Department official named Antonin Scalia, who would later join the Supreme Court, Mr. Ford vetoed the Freedom of Information Act amendments, which he believed infringed the secrecy of the intelligence agencies and the F.B.I.

Newspaper editorials denounced what they said was a violation of Mr. Ford's pronounced policy of openness. A defiant Congress overrode the veto, by a vote of 371 to 31 in the House and 65 to 27 in the Senate.

"I think Ford, Cheney and Rumsfeld felt like Gulliver being held down by the Lilliputians," said Thomas S. Blanton, executive director of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, who helped edit a collection of documents on the episode.

After leaving office in 1977, Mr. Ford kept up the battle, devoting his first major public addresses to a critique of the War Powers Resolution, which he called an unconstitutional and impractical invasion of presidential power. He said it had been passed amid the "boiling passions of Vietnam and Watergate," which he said had encouraged "too much tampering with the basic machinery by which the United States government has run successfully for the past 200 years."

DOJ_NMG_0111696

That theme would be picked up repeatedly in later years by Mr. Cheney, who laid out his constitutional theories in the Republican minority report on the Iran-contra affair in 1987, and by Mr. Rumsfeld, who testified to Congress in 1995 about the problem of "legislative micromanagement of the executive branch."

After President Bush took office, they could put such views into action. Mr. Cheney took a stand on the secrecy of his consultations with industry officials on energy policy. Mr. Rumsfeld expanded the Pentagon's authority at home and abroad. Mr. Bush would cite his powers as commander in chief to justify the first eavesdropping on American soil without warrants since the 1970s.

Mr. Cheney has most explicitly linked such actions to a historic reassertion of presidential power. "In 34 years, I have repeatedly seen an erosion of the powers and the ability of the president of the United States to do his job," he said in an interview on ABC's "This Week" in 2002, referring to several 1970s laws.

In December 2005, after the disclosure of the National Security Agency's eavesdropping without warrants, Mr. Cheney told reporters that the program was a proper assertion of the president's authority. While the "the nadir of the modern presidency" had come in the 1970s, he said, "I do think that to some extent now, we've been able to restore the legitimate authority of the presidency."

In all the intervening years, Mr. Ford maintained close and friendly relations with both his former chiefs of staff. When Mr. Bush selected Mr. Cheney as his running mate in 2000, Mr. Ford lauded the vice-presidential candidate in an Op-Ed article in The New York Times for "a towering intelligence and probity, razor-sharp judgment and a seriousness of purpose that is the antithesis of modern political spin."

This year, when Mr. Rumsfeld came under fire from senior retired generals for his conduct of the war in Iraq, Mr. Ford issued a rare public statement defending his "creativity, vision and courage" and rebuking his critics.

But a private disillusionment appears to have been taking shape. In a 2004 interview with Bob Woodward, reported for the first time in The Washington Post this week, Mr. Ford singled out Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Cheney by name and sharply criticized the decision to go to war in Iraq.

"I don't think I would have gone to war," Mr. Ford said.

Of Mr. Cheney, he said, "He was an excellent chief of staff. First class." But as vice president, he said, "I think Cheney has become much more pugnacious."

Mr. Ford's remarks echoed those of some of his former aides. Brent Scowcroft, Mr. Ford's national security adviser, expressed puzzlement at his former colleagues in an interview last year with New Yorker magazine, declaring, "Dick Cheney I don't know anymore."

Carla A. Hills, Mr. Ford's secretary of housing and urban development, said Friday that "many of the travails of this administration could have been avoided with more transparency and collegiality, which were hallmarks of the Ford administration."

Some officials seem deeply torn. In an interview Friday, Mr. Friedersdorf, the former Congressional liaison, described his joy in speaking with both Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Cheney — "wonderful guys" — at the National Archives alumni gathering in June.

"I talked to the vice president about what a great place it was to get together — you could walk right up to the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution," Mr. Friedersdorf recalled.

But he added, "When I see them supporting the foreign policy of this president, the deficit spending, the eavesdropping, Guantánamo, I don't recognize them."

Las Vegas Judge Under Investigation (LAT)

By Michael J. Goodman, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, December 30, 2006

The 9th Circuit has hired a law firm to suggest action on James C. Mahan, sources say.

DOJ_NMG_0111697

LAS VEGAS — The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco has launched an investigation of a federal judge who awarded more than $4.8 million in judgments and fees without apparently disclosing his personal, political and business ties to those who benefited, two sources close to the inquiry told The Times.

U.S. District Judge James C. Mahan of Las Vegas, a popular state judge who joined the federal bench in 2002 after his nomination by President Bush, was the subject of Times investigative reports in June.

Investigations of federal judges are confidential. However, two people independently familiar with the matter said that a law firm hired by the 9th Circuit has scheduled interviews with key figures in the Mahan case.

The law firm was hired by the 9th Circuit "to investigate and make a recommendation" regarding possible disciplinary action for Mahan, one of the sources said.

The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because they might run afoul of the court's secrecy requirements for judicial inquiries. Ninth Circuit confidentiality rules apply to "any person in any proceeding" and provide that violators "could be held in contempt."

The federal investigation follows several reforms initiated at the state level after the series of Times articles exposing irregularities in the Las Vegas judiciary. The measures include the appointment last month of a 30-member statewide commission "to investigate and make recommendations" for reforming the state justice system.

On Mahan, the articles detailed how he awarded fees in a dozen state and federal cases to a former client and business associate who twice served as his judicial campaign treasurer and who was instrumental in getting him appointed to the bench.

Mahan also approved additional fees for his former law partner, who was providing free legal services for both the judge's wife and the judge's executive judicial assistant, and with whom the judge was still tied financially through property ownership and a profit sharing plan.

A search of court records found no indication that he disclosed his ties to those who were awarded the judgments and fees.

Mahan angrily denied any wrongdoing before publication of the articles, and has not responded to questions and repeated phone calls since.

The disclosures in June prompted U.S. District Judge Terry J. Hatter Jr. of Los Angeles, former chief judge of the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California, to publicly urge Chief Judge Mary M. Schroeder of the 9th Circuit, to investigate.

"I fully expect the chief judge to do something," Hatter said shortly after the articles appeared.

Bound by its strict rules of secrecy, the 9th Circuit, which oversees Nevada, California and seven other Western states, has kept silent on whether it is even considering an investigation.

But the hiring of an outside law firm by the 9th Circuit "suggests that a special committee has been appointed" by the chief judge to investigate Mahan, said Ronald D. Rotunda, a law professor at George Mason University who is an expert on legal ethics.

Special committees are appointed when the chief judge determines that an original complaint filed with the court clerk is credible and "raises an issue that should be investigated," according to rules of the 9th Circuit Judicial Council.

Special committees are then allowed to "arrange … for the hiring of special staff to assist in the investigation," Judicial Council rules state. A federal judge said this "special staff" sometimes consists of an outside law firm.

Typically, a special committee passes its findings and recommendations to the council for further investigation, or, in the case of impeachment, referral to the Judicial Council of the United States.

Impeachment of federal judges, who are appointed for life, is rare, as is lesser disciplinary action such as censure. Only a few 9th Circuit judges are believed to have been disciplined in the last 15 years.

Mahan was one of eight former and current Nevada judges featured in the Times report in early June. The articles detailed how some state judges routinely ruled in favor of friends, former clients and business partners, and how they solicited campaign donations from lawyers appearing before them and then ruled favorably.

Reaction by the Nevada Supreme Court, which supervises the state judiciary, was immediate and is ongoing.

Last week, the state's highest court added two reform measures as rule changes to the Nevada Code of Judicial Conduct. The reforms were proposed in a petition filed last month by retiring Chief Justice Robert E. Rose and discussed in a public hearing Dec. 5.

DOJ_NMG_0111698

One new rule requires judges to disclose their relationship to former law clerks appearing before them as attorneys for at least three years after the clerkship.

"Recent articles in the Los Angeles Times," Rose's petition stated, "roundly criticized Nevada judges for not disclosing that an attorney appearing before a judge was a former law clerk to the judge. This does appear to be a relationship that opposing counsel might reasonably consider relevant to the question of disqualification."

The Times' series showed how the state Supreme Court had to step in and order one judge to reduce the sweeping power he had granted a former law clerk he appointed to assist him.

Another judge, the series disclosed, consistently overturned drunken driving convictions for clients of his former law clerk, while consistently upholding convictions for clients of other lawyers.

The second reform allows the removal of senior judges from cases through the "peremptory challenge" process that applies to regular judges. Senior judges had been exempt from such removal.

Nevada's senior judges are typically retired but work part time as relief judges. As senior judges, they have the same power as elected state judges, but don't answer to voters and their terms are open-ended. Yet three of the most active senior judges, The Times revealed, had careers marked by scandal and controversy.

Rose's petition also proposed both a cap on leftover campaign funds and courtroom disclosure by judges when contributors of more than $10,000 appear before them. The high court referred those two proposals to the statewide commission it created in November.

With Rose as chairman, the commission held its first meeting in Las Vegas on Dec. 19. Composed largely of judges and prominent members of the Nevada legal community, the commission will pass its recommendations to the Nevada Supreme Court for presentation to the Legislature in February.

During its five-hour session, the commission targeted campaign fundraising by judges, selection of judges and the need for an appellate court as top priorities.

Of major concern was the practice of judges soliciting political donations from those who may appear before them.

"The last people you want asking for money are your judicial candidates," said commission member Frankie Sue Del Papa, a Reno attorney and former Nevada attorney general.

But another member, state Judge Lee A. Gates of Las Vegas, said judicial candidates have little choice: "If you want to win the game, you have to play the game."

Children Take Forefront Of Health-Care Plan (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, December 30, 2006

Democrats in Congress, itching to expand health coverage, will likely start by tackling the most politically appealing group: uninsured children.

In a show of bipartisanship in 1997, Congress created the State Children's Health Insurance Program1, which is providing nearly $40 billion over 10 years in federal grants to states to cover children from low-income families who aren't poor enough to qualify for other government coverage. The program now covers more than 6.1 million children.

The Schip2 (pronounced Ess-chip) program, along with the expansion of the state-federal Medicaid health-insurance program for the poor, is widely credited with reducing the fraction of uninsured children, even as the number of uninsured adults has risen.3 About 8.3 million children, or 11% of all children in the U.S., lack coverage.

For Democrats, covering these youngsters has obvious appeal. It would allow lawmakers to champion solutions to problems of people who they say have been a low priority for Republicans. It also would be a step toward universal health coverage, an old and elusive goal of many in the party.

"I am determined to pass legislation to cover all children as a first step to ensuring that all Americans have access to affordable health-care coverage," Nevada Sen. Harry Reid, the incoming majority leader, has said.

Democrats have yet to offer specific proposals or to put a price tag on possible plans. But as with most health-care initiatives, any significant effort to extend and expand coverage will cost billions of dollars, and collide with budget realities, resistance from Republicans and Democrats' vow to be fiscally responsible. "Given the politics and the fiscal constraints, this is not a small order," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a liberal advocacy group.

DOJ_NMG_0111699

Despite some bipartisan support for the program, squabbles loom on fundamental issues: Where to get the money to maintain and enlarge the program; whether to allow enrollment of lower-income parents; and whether to change the formula that divvies up money among states.

The program aims at children in low-income families that earn too much to qualify for Medicaid yet can't afford private insurance. Specifically, it aims to cover uninsured children in families earning twice the federal poverty level, or $40,000 for a family of four, though states can go beyond that. Enrollees are required to pay premiums and co-payments -- albeit often limited ones -- for plans that frequently resemble insurance offered to private or government employees.

Under the program, the federal government provides matching grants to states, which can then expand Medicaid or create a separate Schip program. Within broad federal guidelines, each state determines the design of its program, including eligibility rules and benefit packages. The current program expires Sept. 30, 2007, unless renewed by Congress.

